

The New International

Dictionary of New Testament Theology Vol.3

Editor:
Colin Brown

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY OF NEW TESTAMENT

THEOLOGY is a unique source of information, invaluable to ministers, teachers, and anyone interested in the study as well as the teaching of the Bible.

Some of its main features are:

- Concise discussion of the major theological terms of the Bible
- Arranged in English alphabetical order; does not demand prior knowledge of Greek or Hebrew
- Discusses the use of each key word in classical and secular Greek, the Old Testament and Rabbinic writings, the New Testament usage and reference
- English edition based on Theologisches Begriffslexikon zum Neuen Testament, extensively revised and enlarged
- Glossary of Technical Terms giving concise definitions of specialist expressions and usage in Vol. 1
- Index of Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, and theological subjects (Vol. 1 and 2 separately indexed, Combined Index to all three Vols. in Vol. 3)
- Full and up-to-date bibliographies
- International team of contributors

The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology

The New International Dictionary of Companion Volume

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL
DICTIONARY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Volume 3: Pri-Z

New Testament Theology

Colin Brown
GENERAL EDITOR

Translated, with additions and revisions, from the German

THEOLOGISCHES BEGRIFFSLEXIKON
ZUM NEUEN TESTAMENT

Edited by Lothar Coenen, Erich Beyreuther and Hans Bietenhard

ZONDERVAN PUBLISHING HOUSE OF THE ZONDERVAN CORPORATION
GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN 49506

THE NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY OF NEW TESTAMENT THEOLOGY, VOL. 3
Originally published in German under the title,
THEOLOGISCHES BEGRIFFSLEXIKON ZUM NEUEN TESTAMENT

© 1971 by Theologischer Verlag Rolf Brockhaus, Wuppertal. English Language edition copyright © 1978, The Zondervan Corporation, Grand Rapids, Michigan, U.S.A., and The Paternoster Press, Ltd. Exeter, Devon, U.K.

Sixth printing 1981

All rights in this work are reserved by the publishers, and no part may be reproduced without written permission, except for brief quotations in reviews.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Main entry under title:

The new international dictionary of New Testament theology.

“Translated, with additions and revisions, from the German Theologisches Begriffslexikon zum Neuen Testament, edited by Lothar Coenen, Erich Beyreuther, and Hans Bietenhard.”

“Companion volume: The new international dictionary of the Christian Church.”

Includes bibliographical references and indexes.

1. Bible. N.T.—Theology—Dictionaries. 2. Bible.
N.T.—Dictionaries. I. Brown, Colin.
BS2397.N48 230'.03 75-38895
ISBN 0-310-21910-8

Printed in the United States of America

Contents

PREFACE	7
TABLE OF ARTICLES IN VOLUME 3	11
CONTRIBUTORS TO VOLUME 3	21
ARTICLES	27
COMBINED INDEXES TO VOLUMES 1-3:
HEBREW AND ARAMAIC WORDS	1219
GREEK WORDS	1233
GENERAL INDEX	1274

Preface

ALMOST ALL OUR WISDOM, CALVIN OBSERVED, CONSISTS OF TWO PARTS: THE knowledge of God and of ourselves (Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1, 1, 1). But, as Calvin's subsequent reflections make clear, neither part of this knowledge exists in a vacuum. The two are closely intertwined, and the Word of God which makes this knowledge possible touches every aspect of life. It was this awareness of the range and relevance of biblical thinking which prompted the editors and publishers of the German original of this dictionary to conceive the project of compiling a lexicon of New Testament terms seen against the background of the Old Testament and the ancient world. Their aim was to produce a reference work which would be compact and yet scholarly, a book which would be of service to preachers, teachers, pastors, Christian workers, students and lay people who wished to study biblical thinking in depth.

The publication of this third and final volume of the English edition sees the culmination of nearly a quarter of a century of work. In the course of time the dictionary has grown considerably. The original German articles have all been revised and enlarged to take into account more recent literature and scholarly research of interest to English-speaking readers. The present volume contains 104 main articles, of which 32 are completely new. In all 237 key Greek terms are treated here; of these 87 appear for the first time. A special feature of this English edition are the survey articles which discuss topics arising out of New Testament thought. This third volume contains 10 such articles ranging from The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology to Jesus and Revolution, and from The Genealogies of Jesus Christ to Language and Meaning in Religion. Prepositions and Theology in the Greek New Testament are given separate treatment in an extensive appendix.

As in the previous volumes, the main entries are arranged under the alphabetical order of the English terms which serve as a focus for the articles on key Greek words. These are further sub-divided as follows:

CL Discussion of the word in secular Greek. Uses of the word are illustrated by reference not only to classical literature but also to inscriptions and papyri. In view of the expressly theological interest of the dictionary discussion here is kept to a minimum.

OT Discussion of the word and related terms in the OT. The language of the church in the NT era was Greek, and the Old Testament Scriptures used by the church were largely the Greek translation of the Hebrew known as the Septuagint (LXX). The discussion is therefore based on the terms as they occur in the LXX, but comparing the LXX throughout with the corresponding Hebrew Masoretic text. This section also takes account of terms as used by Philo, Josephus, the Dead Sea Scrolls and rabbinic writers.

NT Discussion of the word and related terms in the NT, noting statistical occurrences, usage in relation to the background, and the specific emphases of individual writers and writings.

For further discussion of the layout and scope of the dictionary the reader is referred to the Introduction to Volume I. A list of abbreviations and a key to the transliteration of Hebrew, Greek and Arabic words will be found in Volume I, pp. 31–47. Volume I, pp. 49–72, also contains a Glossary of Technical Terms which defines many of the terms currently used in theological discussion. This third volume contains a Combined Index to all three volumes, dealing with Hebrew and Aramaic words, Greek words, and subjects generally. In this connexion it is important to point out that, because of the inter-relation of ideas, relevant material on any given topic is not confined to the articles listed in the table of contents. There is, for example, an article on Blood in Volume I, but there is also a discussion of blood in relation to atonement in the article on Reconciliation in Volume III. Similarly, the treatment of Divorce in Volume I is supplemented by the discussions under Discipline in the same volume, under Marriage in Volume II, and under Separate in Volume III. For this reason it is important to make full use of the indexes in order to explore the range of ideas of any topic under study.

The work has been planned as a dictionary and not an encyclopedia. Its aim is not to say the last word on every subject, but to provide an introduction and the tools to enable the reader to make his own way into the field of study. For this reason the bibliographies at the end of the articles have been revised and enlarged to make them useful to an international readership. The bibliographies are normally divided into two sections: (a) works in English, and (b) works in other languages. The separation of the sections is designed to enable readers to see at a glance which works are relevant to their particular needs. Most English-speaking readers will naturally wish to consult the works in the first section. On the other hand, it was decided to include titles not available in English to meet the needs of the more specialist student. Even so, the works included represent only a fraction of the total volume of printed scholarly research. For the reader who wishes to take his studies still further, attention may be drawn to the following specialist bibliographical works: B. M. Metzger, Index to Periodical Literature on Christ and the Gospels, New Testament Tools and Studies 6, 1962; A. J. Mattill, Jr. and M. Bedford Mattill, A Classified Bibliography of Literature on the Acts of the Apostles, New Testament Tools and Studies 7, 1966; B. M. Metzger, Index to Periodical Literature on the Apostle Paul, New Testament Tools and Studies 1, 1970²; the massive Elenchus Bibliographicus Biblicus published annually by the Biblical Institute Press, Rome, under the editorship since 1949 of Peter Nober; the Book Lists of the Society for Old Testament Study (those for 1946–56 republished in Eleven Years of Bible Bibliography, 1957, those for 1957–66 in A Decade of Bible Bibliography, edited by G. W. Anderson, 1967, and those for 1967–73 in Bible Bibliography, 1974, edited by P. R. Ackroyd), and New Testament Abstracts: A Record of Current Literature published by Weston School of Theology, Cambridge, Massachusetts, in cooperation with The Council on the Study of Religion. Those who wish to keep abreast of German books should consult Das Evangelische Schrifttum: Ein systematisches Verzeichnis für Wissenschaft und Praxis, published annually by the Vereinigung Evangelischer Buchhändler, and Das Katholisches Schrifttum, published by the Verband Katholischer Verleger und Buchhändler. Also helpful are: J. L. Sayre and R. Hamburger, An Index of Festschriften in the Graduate Seminary Library of Phillips University, 1970, and An Index of Festschriften in Religion, New Titles 1971–1973, in the Graduate Seminary Library of Phillips University, 1973; the Index to Religious Periodical Literature published by the American Theological Library Association; and the review of journal articles in Themelios, currently compiled by Professor R. P. Martin. Most major libraries contain the Catalogues of the Libraries of Congress and the British Museum, together with catalogues of unpublished theses and theses available on microfilm.

8

The translation of the original German articles as they appeared in the Theologisches Begrifflexikon zum Neuen Testament was prepared by a team of scholars which included Professor G. H. Boobyer, the Rev. Dr. Colin Brown, Mr. H. L. Ellison, the Rev. M. C. Freeman, the late Rev. Dr. George Ogg, Mr. John D. Manton, the Rev. Dr. A. J. M. Wedderburn. The magnificent indexes are the work of the Rev. Norman Hillyer, assisted by Mrs. Ruth Hillyer. The unrelenting work of proof reading which extended over five months was shared with the Editor by three people to whom the Editor and the dictionary are immeasurably indebted: the Rev. Norman Hillyer, Professor F. F. Bruce of the University of Manchester and Mrs. Olive Brown. Each has read the entire work in galley and page proof. In addition to the detection of printing errors, each of them has made a significant contribution to the finished text. On numerous points of detail the Editor has benefited from the advice and comments of many friends and colleagues, especially in his teaching at Trinity College, Bristol, and Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena. The Rev. Dr. A. C. Thiselton of the University of Sheffield has kindly commented on the drafts of various bibliographies, and Professor D. W. Burdick of the Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary, Denver, Colorado, on the text in galley proof.

The article on Resurrection contains a synoptic table of events in the resurrection narratives based on the table given by Professor G. E. Ladd in his book I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975, published in Britain by Hodder and Stoughton and in the United States by Wm. B. Eerdmans Publishing Company. This is reproduced by kind permission of the author and publishers.

It goes without saying that no work of scholarship is ever final. New books are being published all the time, and existing work is always open to revision. As and when it becomes necessary to reprint any of the volumes of The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology, it is the editorial policy to include any supplementary material as an appendix to each volume, with appropriate cross references in the text of the existing articles. This supplementary material will be made available separately to purchasers of the first editions of the dictionary.

Table of Articles in Volume III

TITLE	KEY GREEK WORDS		AUTHOR	PAGE
Pride	ὑβρις	hybris	E. Güting	27
	ὑπερήφανος	hyperēphanos	E. Güting, C. Brown	28
Priest, High Priest	ιερεύς	hiereus	J. Baehr	32
Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma	ἀγγέλλω	angellō	U. Becker, D. Müller	44
	κηρύσσω	kēryssō	L. Coenen	48
	The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma		C. Brown	57
Promise	ἐπαγγελία	epangelia	E. Hoffmann	68
Prophet	προφήτης	prophētēs	C. H. Peisker, C. Brown	74
Punishment, Vengeance	δίκη	dikē	U. Falkenroth, C. Brown	92
	κόλασις	kolasís	C. Brown	98
Pure, Clean	ἄγνός	hagnos	H. Baltensweiler	100
	καθαρός	katharos	H.-G. Link, J. Schattenmann	102
Quench	σβέννυμι	sbennymi	R. K. Harrison, C. Brown	109
	ἄσβεστος	asbestos	R. K. Harrison	110
Quiet, Rest, Silence, Sound, Voice, Noise	ἡσυχία	hēsychia	M. J. Harris	111
	ἦχος	ēchos	M. J. Harris	112
	φωνή	phōnē	M. J. Harris	113
Rabbi	ράββί	rhabbi	H. L. Ellison	115
Ready, Prepare, Gird	ἔτοιμος	hetoimos	S. Solle	116
	κατασκευάζω	kataskeuazō	F. Thiele	118
	ζώννυμι	zōnnyμι	F. Selter	120
				11

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Reason, Mind, Understanding	νοῦς	nous	G. Harder	122
	σύνεσις	synesis	J. Goetzmann	130
Recompense, Reward, Gain, Wages	ἀποδίδωμι	apodidōmi	P. C. Böttger	134
	κέρδος	kerdos	B. Siede	136
	μισθός	misthos	P. C. Böttger	138
	ὀψώνιον	opsōnion	O. Becker	144
Reconciliation, Restoration, Propitiation, Atonement	ἀποκατάστασις	apokatastasis	H.-G. Link	145
	ἱλάσκομαι	hilaskomai	H.-G. Link, C. Brown	148
	καταλλάσσω	katallassō	H. Vorländer, C. Brown	166
Redemption, Loose, Ransom, Deliverance, Release, Salvation, Saviour	λύω	lyō	W. Mundle, C. Brown	177
	λύτρον	lytron	W. Mundle, C. Brown	189
	ρύομαι	rhyomai	J. Schneider, C. Brown	200
	σώζω	sōzō	J. Schneider, C. Brown	205
	σωτήρ	sōtēr	J. Schneider, C. Brown	216
	Remain	μένω	menō	K. Munzer, C. Brown
ἀδιάλειπτος		adialeiptos	C. Brown	229
Remember, Remembrance	μνησκομαι	mimnēskomai	K. H. Bartels, C. Brown	230
Remnant, Leave	λεῖμμα	leimma	W. Günther, H. Krienke	247
Rest	ἀνάπαυσις	anapausis	R. Hensel, C. Brown	254
Resurrection	ἀνάστασις	anastasis	L. Coenen, C. Brown	259
	ἐγείρω	egeirō	L. Coenen	279
	The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology		C. Brown	281
Revelation	ἀποκαλύπτω	apokalypō	W. Mundle	309
	δηλόω	dēloō	W. Mundle	316
	ἐπιφάνεια	epiphaneia	B. Gärtner, C. Brown	317
	χρηματίζω	chrēmatisō	C. Brown	324
	Revelation in Contemporary Theology		C. Brown	325

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Reville, Blaspheme, Slander	βλασφημέω	blasphēmeō	H. Währisch, C. Brown	340
	καταλαλέω λοιδορέω	katalaleō loidoreō	W. Mundle H. Währisch	345 346
Right, Worthy	ἄξιος	axios	E. Tiedtke	347
	ἄρτιος	artios	R. Schippers	349
	ὀρθός	orthos	R. Klöber	351
Righteousness, Justification	δικαιοσύνη	dikaiosynē	H. Seebass, C. Brown	352
Rob, Steal	ληστής	lēstēs	N. Hillyer	377
	συλάω	sylaō	N. Hillyer	379
	ἀποστερέω	apostereō	N. Hillyer	379
	ἀνδραποδιστής	andrapodistēs	N. Hillyer	380
	σπῆλαιον	spēlaion	N. Hillyer	380
Rock, Stone, Corner-stone, Pearl, Precious Stones	πέτρα	petra	W. Mundle, C. Brown	381
	γωνία	gōnia	W. Mundle	388
	λίθος	lithos	H.-G. Link, E. Tiedtke, C. Brown	390
	μαργαρίτης	margaritēs	N. Hillyer	394
	Precious Stones in the Apocalypse		N. Hillyer	395
Rule, Standard, Measure	κανών	kanōn	J. Guhrt, H.-G. Link, C. Brown	399
	μέτρον	metron	C. Brown	402
Sabbath, Lord's Day	σάββατον	sabbaton	W. Stott	405
	κυριακή	kyriakē	W. Stott	411
Sacrifice, First Fruits, Altar, Offering	ἀπαρχή	aparchē	H.-G. Link, C. Brown	415
	θύω	thyō	F. Thiele, C. Brown	417
Sadducees, Herodians	Σαδδουκαῖοι	Saddoukaiōi	J. J. Scott, Jr.	439
	Ἡρωδιανοί	Herōdianoi	N. Hillyer	441
Salt	ἅλας	halas	N. Hillyer	443
Samaritan, Samaria	Σαμαρίτης	Samaritēs	K. Haacker	449
Satan, Beelzebul, Devil, Exorcism	διάβολος	diabolos	H. Bietenhard, C. Brown	468
	ἐξορκιστής	exhorkistēs	J. Stafford Wright	473

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Scribe	γραμματεὺς	grammateus	N. Hillyer	477
Scripture, Writing	γραφὴ	graphē	R. Mayer, C. Brown	482
Seal	σφραγίς	sphragis	R. Schippers	497
Secret, Mystery	μυστήριον The Messianic Secret	mystērion	G. Finkenrath C. Brown	501 506
See, Vision, Eye	ὥρα κολλούριον ἀναβλέπω ἐμβλέπω ἀτενίζω θέατρον	horaō kollourion anablepō emblepō atenizo theatron	K. Dahn W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld	511 518 519 519 520 520
Seed, Plant, Grass, Flower, Harvest	σπέρμα θερισμός	sperma therismos	B. A. Demarest, C. Brown B. A. Demarest	521 525
Seek, Find	εὐρίσκω ζητέω ἐραυνάω	heuriskō zeteō eraunaō	B. Gärtner H.-G. Link M. Seitz	527 530 532
Separate, Divide	χωρίζω σχίζω	chōrizō schizō	M. J. Harris, C. Brown M. J. Harris	534 543
Serve, Deacon, Worship	διακονέω λατρεύω λειτουργέω	diakoneō latreuō leitourgeō	K. Hess K. Hess K. Hess	544 549 551
Shadow	σκιά	skia	H.-C. Hahn	553
Shake	σειώ σαλεύω ἐκτινάσσω	seiō saleuō ektinassō	N. Hillyer N. Hillyer N. Hillyer	556 558 560
Shame, Respect	αἰδώς αἰσχύνη	aidōs aischynē	H.-G. Link, E. Tiedtke H.-G. Link	561 562
Shepherd	ποιμὴν	poimēn	E. Beyreuther	564
Show, Proof, Demonstrate	δείκνυμι ἀπόδειξις τεκμήριον	deiknymi apodeixis tekmerion	C. Brown G. T. D. Angel G. T. D. Angel	569 570 571
Simplicity, Sincerity, Uprightness	ἀπλότης	haplotēs	B. Gärtner	571

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Sin	ἀδικία	adikia	W. Günther	573
	ἁμαρτία	hamartia	W. Günther	577
	παράβασις	parabasis	W. Günther	583
	παράπτωμα	paraptōma	W. Bauder	585
Sit	κάθημι	kathēmi	R. T. France	587
Slave, Servant, Captive, Prisoner, Freedman	αἰχμάλωτος	aichmalōtos	H.-G. Link, R. Tuente	590
	δέσμιος	desmios	H.-G. Link	591
	δούλος	doulos	R. Tuente	592
	Λιβερτίνος	Libertinos	G. T. D. Angel	598
Smell	ὄσμη	osmē	O. Flender, C. Brown	599
Snatch, Take Away, Rapture	ἄρπάζω	harpazō	E. Tiedtke, C. Brown	601
Solomon	Σολομών	Solomōn	D. F. Payne	605
Son, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David	παῖς θεοῦ	pais theou	O. Michel, I. H. Marshall	607
	ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου	ho hyios tou anthrōpou	O. Michel, I. H. Marshall	613
	υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ	hyios tou theou	O. Michel, I. H. Marshall	634
	υἱὸς Δαυὶδ	hyios Dauid	O. Michel, I. H. Marshall	648
	The Genealogies of Jesus Christ		N. Hillyer	653
	The Virgin Birth		J. Stafford Wright	660
Song, Hymn, Psalm	ὕμνος	hymnos	K. H. Bartels	668
	ψαλμός	psalmos	K. H. Bartels	670
	ὕδνη	ōdē	K. H. Bartels	672
Soul	ψυχή	psychē	G. Harder, C. Brown	676
Spirit, Holy Spirit	πνεῦμα	pneuma	E. Kamlah, J. D. G. Dunn, C. Brown	689
Stir up, Trouble, Agitate	ταράσσω	tarassō	H. Müller	709
Strength, Force, Horn, Violence, Power	βία	bia	G. Braumann	711
	ἰσχὺς	ischys	G. Braumann	712
	κέρας	keras	H.-G. Link, J. Schattenmann	714
	κράτος	kratos	G. Braumann	716

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Suffer	πάσχω	paschō	B. Gärtner	719
Suffice, Satisfy	ἀρκέω ϊκανός	arkeō hikanos	B. Siede W. von Meding	727 728
Sun, Moon, Stars	ἥλιος σελήνη ἀστήρ	hēlios selenē aster	D. A. Hagner D. A. Hagner D. A. Hagner	730 733 734
Swear, Oath	ὀμνύω	omnyō	H.-G. Link	737
Take, Receive	δέχομαι λαμβάνω	dechomai lambanō	H.-G. Link B. Siede	744 747
Tax, Tax Collector	λογεῖα στατήρ τέλωνιον	logeia stater telōnion	M. J. Harris C. Brown N. Hillyer	751 752 755
Teach, Instruct, Tradition, Education, Discipline	διδάσκω διδάσκαλος διδασκαλία κατηχέω παραδίδωμι παιδεύω	didaskō didaskalos didaskalia katecheō paradidōmi paideuō	K. Wegenast K. Wegenast K. Wegenast K. Wegenast K. Wegenast D. Fürst	759 765 768 771 772 775
Temple	ναός τὸ ἱερόν τὸ ἐσώτερον τὸ καταπετάσμα τὸ μεσότοιχον στῦλος γαζοφυλάκιον νεωκόρος περύγιον	naos to hieron to esōteron to katapetasma to mesotoichon stylos gazophylakion neōkoros pterygion	W. von Meding C. Brown D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig D. H. Madvig	781 785 794 794 795 795 795 796 796
Tempt, Test, Approve	πειρασμός δόκιμος	peirasmos dokimos	W. Schneider, C. Brown H. Haarbeck	798 808
Tent, Tabernacle	σκηνή	skēnē	M. J. Harris, C. Brown	811
Thank, Praise, Eucharist	αἰνέω εὐχαριστία	aineō eucharistia	H. Schultz H.-H. Esser	816 817
Think, Mean, Consider, Reckon	διαλογίζομαι δοκέω λογίζομαι	dialogizomai dokeō logizomai	D. Fürst D. Müller J. Eichler	820 821 822
Time	αἰών καιρός χρόνος	aīōn kairos chronos	J. Guhrt H.-C. Hahn H.-C. Hahn	826 833 839

TABLE OF ARTICLES

	ῶρα	hōra	H.-C. Hahn	845
Tithe	δεκάτη	dekatē	G. F. Hawthorne	851
Torment	βάσανος	basanos	W. Mundle	855
	κολαφίζω	kolaphizō	W. Mundle	857
	ὠδίνω	ōdinō	R. K. Harrison	857
	ταλαιπωρέω	talaipōreō	R. K. Harrison	858
Touch	ἅπτω	haptō	R. Grob	859
Transfigure, Transfiguration, Transform	μεταμορφόω	metamorphōō	W. L. Liefeld	861
	μετασχηματίζω	metaschematizō	W. L. Liefeld	864
Tree, Plant, Root, Branch	δένδρον	dendron	E. M. Embry	865
Tribe	φυλή	phylē	N. Hillyer	870
Trumpet	σάλπιγξ	salpinx	M. J. Harris	873
Truth	ἀλήθεια	alētheia	A. C. Thiselton	874
Turn Away	ἀποτρέπω	apotrepō	M. J. Harris	902
Type, Pattern	τύπος	typos	H. Müller	903
Unanimity	ὁμοθυμαδόν	homothymadon	E. D. Schmitz	908
Vessel, Pot, Potter, Mix	κεράμιον	keramion	W. L. Lane	910
	ὄστράκινος	ostrakinos	W. L. Lane	913
	πηλός	pēlos	W. L. Lane	915
	φύραμα	phyrama	W. L. Lane	917
Vine, Wine	ἄμπελος	ampelos	C. Brown	918
Virtue, Blameless	ἀνέγκλητος	anenklētos	H. Währisch	923
	ἀρετή	aretē	H.-G. Link, A. Ringwald	925
	Haustafeln		R. P. Martin	928
Walk, Run, Way, Conduct	ἀναστρέφω	anastrephō	G. Ebel	933
	ὁδός	hodos	G. Ebel	935
	περιπατέω	peripateō	G. Ebel	943
	πορεύομαι	poreuomai	G. Ebel	945
Wall, Hedge, Palisade	τεῖχος	teichos	N. Hillyer	948
	φραγμός	phragmos	N. Hillyer	950
	χάραξ	charax	N. Hillyer	951
Want, Lack,	ὑστερος	hysteros	W. L. Lane	952

TABLE OF ARTICLES

Need	χρεία	chreia	W. L. Lane	956
War, Soldier, Weapon	πόλεμος Jesus and Revolution	polemos	C. Brown, J. Watts M. Langley	958 967
Water, Lake, Sea, Well, River	θάλασσα πηγή ὑδωρ κατακλυσμός Ἰορδάνης λίμνη	thalassa pēgē hydōr kataklysmos Iordanēs limne	O. Böcher O. Böcher O. Böcher R. K. Harrison R. K. Harrison R. K. Harrison	982 985 988 991 991 992
Weakness, Sickness, Disease, Paralysis	ἀσθένεια νόσος μαλακία παραλυτικός	astheneia nosos malakia paralytikos	H.-G. Link H.-G. Link R. K. Harrison R. K. Harrison	993 996 999 999
Weather	ἀστραπή	astrapē	L. L. Morris	1000
Wilderness, Desert, Lay Waste, Mountain, Plain	ἔρημος ὄρεινος τόπος πεδινός ὄρος, ὑψηλός Σινά	erēmos oreinos topos pedinos oros, hypselos Sina	O. Böcher W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld W. L. Liefeld C. Brown C. Brown	1004 1008 1009 1009 1013
Will, Purpose	βούλομαι θέλω	boulomai thelo	D. Müller D. Müller	1015 1018
Wisdom, Folly, Philosophy	μωρία σοφία φιλοσοφία	mōria sophia philosophia	J. Goetzmann J. Goetzmann, C. Brown H. Weigelt	1023 1026 1034
Witness, Testimony	μαρτυρία	martyria	L. Coenen, A. A. Trites	1038
Woe	ουαί	ouai	N. Hillyer	1051
Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow	γυνή μήτηρ παρθένος χήρα	gynē mētēr parthenos chēra	H. Vorländer, C. Brown E. Beyreuther O. Becker, C. Brown S. Solle	1055 1068 1071 1073
Word, Tongue, Utterance	γλῶσσα λόγος ῥῆμα	glossa logos rhēma	H. Haarbeck G. Fries, B. Klappert, C. Brown O. Betz	1078 1081 1119

TABLE OF ARTICLES

	Language and Meaning in Religion		A. C. Thiselton	1123
Work, Do, Accomplish	εργάζομαι	ergazomai	H.-C. Hahn	1147
	ποιέω	poiēō	F. Thiele	1152
	πράσσω	prassō	H.-C. Hahn	1155
Yoke	ζυγός	zygos	H.-G. Link, C. Brown	1160
Zeal	ζήλος	zēlos	H.-C. Hahn	1166
	σπουδή	spoudē	W. Bauder	1168
Appendix: Prepositions and Theology in the Greek New Testament			M. J. Harris	1171

Contributors

Editors and Advisors

Editor of the English edition	Colin Brown
General Editor of the German edition . . .	Lothar Coenen
Greek philology, philosophy and classical background	Gerhard Fries
Old Testament and Septuagint	Horst Seebass
Qumran	Reinhard Deichgräber
Rabbinics	Hans Bietenhard
New Testament philology and theology .	Hans Bietenhard
Church history and historical theology .	Erich Beyreuther
Bibliographical consultant to the German edition	Werner Georg Kümmel
Indexes	Norman Hillyer

Contributors to Volume 3

In the following list the author's work is denoted by the Greek words or sub-title which follow the title.

- Gervais T. D. Angel, M.A., M.Ed., Dean of Studies, Trinity College, Bristol Show, Proof, Demonstrate, apodeixis, tekmerion; Slave, Servant, Captive, Prisoner, Freedman, Libertinos
- Jürgen Baehr, Langlingen über Celle
Priest, High Priest, hiereus
- Heinrich Baltensweiler, Dr. theol., Professor, Basel Pure, Clean, hagnos
- Karl-Heinz Bartels, Dr. theol., Niderbieber
Remember, Remembrance, mimnēskomai (part); Song, Hymn, Psalm, hymnos, psalmos, ōdē

- Wolfgang Bauder, Cologne Sin, paraptōma; Zeal, spoudē
- Oswald Becker, Bonn
 Recompense, Reward, Gain, Wages, opsōnion; Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow, parthenos (part)
- Ulrich Becker, Dr. theol., Professor, Hanover Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma, angellō (part)
- Otto Betz, Dr. theol., Professor, Tübingen
 Word, Tongue, Utterance, rhēma
- Erich Beyreuther, Dr. theol., Feldkirchen, Munich Shepherd, poimēn; Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow, mētēr
- Hans Bietenhard, Dr. theol., Professor, Steffisburg Satan, Beelzebul, Devil, Exorcism, diabolos (part)
- Otto Böcher, Dr. theol., Dr. phil., Professor, Mainz Water, Lake, Sea, Well, River, thalassa, pēgē, hydōr; Wilderness, Desert, Lay Waste, Mountain, Plain, erēmos
- Paul Christoph Böttger, Dr. theol., Rheydt
 Recompense, Reward, Gain, Wages, apodidōmi, misthos
- Georg Braumann, Dr. theol., Billerbeck Strength, Force, Horn, Violence, Power, bia, ischys, kratos
- Colin Brown, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Professor of Systematic Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California Pride, hyperēphanos (part); Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma, The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma; Prophet, prophētēs (part); Punishment, Vengeance, dikē (part), kolasis; Quench, sbennymi (part); Reconciliation, Restoration, Propitiation, Atonement, hilaskomai (part), katallassō (part); Redemption, Loose, Ransom, Deliverance, Release, Salvation, Saviour, lyō (part), lytron (part), rhyomai (part), sōzō (part), sōtēr (part); Remain, menō (part), adialeptos; Remember, Remembrance, mimnēskomai (part); Rest, anapausis (part); Resurrection, anastasis (part), The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology; Revelation, epiphaneia (part), chrēmatisō, Revelation in Contemporary Theology; Revile, Blaspheme, Slander, blasphēmēō (part); Righteousness, Justification, dikaiosynē (part); Rock, Stone, Corner-stone, Pearl, Precious Stones, petra (part), lithos (part); Rule, Standard, Measure, kanōn, metron; Sacrifice, First Fruits, Altar, Offering, aparchē (part), thyō (part); Satan, Beelzebul, Devil, Exorcism, diabolos (part); Scripture, Writing, graphē (part); Secret, Mystery, The Messianic Secret; Seed, Plant, Grass, Flower, Harvest, sperma (part); Separate, Divide, chōrizō (part); Show, Proof, Demonstrate, deiknymi; Smell, osmē (part); Snatch, Take Away, Rapture, harpazō (part); Soul, psyché (part); Spirit, Holy Spirit, pneuma (part); Tax, Tax Collector, statēr; Temple, to hieron; Tempt, Test, Approve, peirasmos (part); Tent, Tabernacle, skēnē (part); Vine, Wine, ampelos; War, Soldier, Weapon, polemos (part); Wilderness, Desert, Lay Waste, Mountain, Plain, oros, hypsēlos (part), Sina; Wisdom, Folly, Philosophy, sophia (part); Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow, gynē (part), parthenos (part); Word, Tongue, Utterance, logos (part); Yoke, zygos (part)
- Lothar Coenen, Dr. theol., Wuppertal
 Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma, kēryssō; Resurrection, anastasis (part), egeirō; Witness, Testimony, martyria (part)
- Karl Dahn, Dozent, Frankfurt am Main
 See, Vision, Eye, horāō
- Bruce A. Demarest, M.A., Ph.D., Associate Professor, Conservative Baptist Theological Seminary, Denver, Colorado Seed, Plant, Grass, Flower, Harvest, sperma (part), therismos

- James D. G. Dunn, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Lecturer in New Testament, University of Nottingham Spirit, Holy Spirit, pneuma (part)
- Günther Ebel, Speyer
Walk, Run, Way, Conduct, anastrephō, hodos, peripateo, poreuomai
- Johannes Eichler, Frankfurt am Main Think, Mean, Consider, Reckon, logizomai
- Henry Leopold Ellison, B.A., B.D., Dawlish, Devon Rabbi, rhabbi
- E. Margaret Embry, B.A., B.D., Lecturer, Trinity College, Bristol Tree, Plant, Root, Branch, dendron
- Hans-Helmut Esser, Dr. theol., Professor, Horstmar bei Münster
Thank, Praise, Eucharist, eucharistia
- Ulrich Falkenroth, Dr. theol., Braunschweig Punishment, Vengeance, dikē (part)
- Günter Finkenrath, Burscheid-Hilgen Secret, Mystery, mysterion
- Otto Flender, Villigst Smell, osmē (part)
- Richard Thomas France, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Warden of Tyndale House, Cambridge Sit, kathēmi
- Gerhard Fries, Director of Studies, Duisburg
Word, Tongue, Utterance, logos (part)
- Dieter Fürst, Director of Studies and Student Pastor, Bayreuth Teach, Instruct, Tradition, Education, Discipline, paideuo; Think, Mean, Consider, Reckon, dialogizomai
- Burkhard Gärtner, Hamburg
Revelation, epiphaneia (part); Seek, Find, heurisko; Simplicity, Sincerity, Uprightness, haplotēs; Suffer, paschō
- Jürgen Goetzmann, Essen
Reason, Mind, Understanding, synesis; Wisdom, Folly, Philosophy, mōria, sophia (part)
- Rudolf Grob, Obermeilen, Zürich Touch, haptō
- Walther Günther, Dr. theol., Stuttgart
Remnant, Leave, leimma (part); Sin, adikia, hamartia, parabasis
- Eberhard Güting, Dr. theol., Cappel bei Marburg Pride, hybris, hyperēphanos (part)
- Joachim Guhrt, Bentheim
Rule, Standard, Measure, kanōn (part); Time, aion
- Klaus Haacker, Dr. theol., Professor, Kirchliche Hochschule, Wuppertal Samaritan, Samaria, Samaritēs
- Hermann Haarbeck, Schwelm
Tempt, Test, Approve, dokimos; Word, Tongue, Utterance, glossa
- Donald A. Hagner, B.A., B.D., Th.M., Ph.D., Associate Professor, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California
Sun, Moon, Stars, hēlios, selēnē, astēr
- Hans-Christoph Hahn, Bad Boll
Shadow, skia; Time, kairos, chronos, hōra; Work, Do, Accomplish, ergazomai, prassō; Zeal, zēlos
- Günther Harder, Dr. theol., Dr. jur., Professor, Berlin Reason, Mind, Understanding, nous; Soul, psyche (part)

CONTRIBUTORS

- Murray J. Harris, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament, Bible College of New Zealand, Henderson, Auckland Quiet, Rest, Silence, Sound, Voice, Noise, hēsychia, echos, phōnē; Separate, Divide, chōrizō (part), schizō; Tax, Tax Collector, logeia; Tent, Tabernacle, skēnē (part); Trumpet, salpinx; Turn Away, apotrepo; Appendix: Prepositions and Theology in the Greek New Testament
- Roland K. Harrison, B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., D.D., Professor of Old Testament, Wycliffe College, Toronto
 Quench, sbennymi (part), asbestos; Torment, ōdinō, talaipōreō; Water, Lake, Sea, Well, River, kataklysmos, Iordanēs, limnē; Weakness, Sickness, Disease, Paralysis, malakia, paralytikos
- Gerald F. Hawthorne, A.B., A.M., Ph.D., Professor of Greek, Wheaton College, Illinois
 Tithe, dekate
- Robert Hensel, Dr. theol., Dekan, Bad Bergzabern Rest, anapausis (part)
- Klaus Hess, Nuremberg
 Serve, Deacon, Worship, diakoneō, latreuō, leitourgeo
- Norman Hillyer, B.D., S.Th., formerly Librarian, Tyndale House, Cambridge
 Rob, Steal, lēstēs, sylaō, apostereō, andrapodistēs, spēlaion; Rock, Stone, Cornerstone, Pearl, Precious Stones, margaritēs, Precious Stones in the Apocalypse; Sadducees, Herodians, Herōdianoī; Salt, halas; Scribe, grammateus; Shake, seiō, saleuō, ektinassō; Son, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David, The Genealogies of Jesus Christ; Tax, Tax Collector, telōnion; Tribe, phylē; Wall, Hedge, Palisade, teichos, phragmos, charax; Woe, ouai
- Ernst Hoffmann, Vevey, Switzerland
 Promise, epangelia
- Eberhard Kamlah, Dr. theol., Professor, Mainz
 Spirit, Holy Spirit, pneuma (part)
- Bertold Klappert, Dr. theol., Göttingen
 Word, Tongue, Utterance, logos (part)
- Rolf Klöber, Bayreuth
 Right, Worthy, orthos
- Hartmut Krienke, Wuppertal
 Remnant, Leave, leimma (part)
- William L. Lane, Th.D., Professor, Department of Philosophy and Religion, Western Kentucky University, Bowling Green, Kentucky Vessel, Pot, Potter, Mix, keramion, ostrakinos, pēlos, phyrama; Want, Lack, Need, hysteros, chreia
- Myrtle Langley, B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Lecturer, Trinity College, Bristol War, Soldier, Weapon, Jesus and Revolution
- Walter L. Liefeld, Th.B., A.M., Ph.D., Chairman and Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois
 See, Vision, Eye, kollourion, anablepō, emblepō, atenizō, theatron; Transfigure, Transfiguration, Transform, metamorphoō, metaschematizō; Wilderness, Desert, Lay Waste, Mountain, Plain, oreinos, topos pedinos, oros, hypselos (part)
- Hans-Georg Link, Dr. theol., Cologne
 Pure, Clean, katharos (part); Reconciliation, Restoration, Propitiation, Atonement, apokatastasis, hilaskomai (part); Rock, Stone, Cornerstone, Pearl, Precious Stones, lithos (part); Rule, Standard, Measure, kanon (part); Sacrifice, First Fruits, Altar, Offering, aparchē (part); Seek, Find, zeteō; Shame, Respect, aidōs (part), aischynē; Slave, Servant, Captive, Prisoner, freedman, aichmalōtos (part), desmios; Strength, Force, Horn, Violence, Power, keras (part); Swear, Oath, omnyō; Take, Receive,

- dechomai*; Virtue, Blameless, aretē (part); Weakness, Sickness, Disease, Paralysis, astheneia, nosos; Yoke, zygos (part)
- Donald H. Madvig, A.B., B.D., Th.M., M.A., Ph.D., Professor of Biblical Literature, Bethel Theological Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota
 Temple, to esōteron, to katapetasma, to mesotoichon, stylos, gazophylakion, neōkoros, pterygion
- I. Howard Marshall, M.A., B.D., Ph.D., Reader in New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen
 Son, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David, pais theou (part), ho hyios tou anthrōpou (part), hyios tou theou (part), hyios David (part)
- Ralph P. Martin, M.A., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California Virtue, Blameless, Haustafeln
- Reinhold Mayer, Dr. theol., Wiss. Rat, Tübingen
 Scripture, Writing, graphē (part)
- Wichmann von Meding, Winsen/Aller Suffice, Satisfy, hikanos; Temple, naos
- Otto Michel, Dr. theol., formerly Professor of New Testament, Tübingen
 Son, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David, pais theou (part), ho hyios tou anthrōpou (part), hyios tou theou (part), hyios David (part)
- Leon L. Morris, B.Sc., Th.L., B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., Principal of Ridley College, Melbourne Weather, astrapē
- Dietrich Müller, Marburg
 Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma, angellō (part); Think, Mean, Consider, Reckon, dokeō; Will, Purpose, boulomai, thelō
- Heinrich Müller, Dr. theol., Bleicherode Type, Pattern, typos
- Hermann Müller, Dr. phil., Hilchenbach
 Stir Up, Trouble, Agitate, tarassō
- Wilhelm Mundle, Lic. theol., Professor, Marburg Redemption, Loose, Ransom, Deliverance, Release, Salvation, Saviour, lyō (part), lytron (part), Revelation, apokalyptō, dēloō; Revile, Blaspheme, Slander, katalaleō; Rock, Stone, Corner-stone, Pearl, Precious Stones, petra (part), gōnia; Torment, basanos, kolaphizō
- Karlfried Munzer, Gauting
 Remain, menō (part)
- David F. Payne, M.A., Head of the Department of Semitic Studies, The Queen's University of Belfast
 Solomon, Solomōn
- Carl Heinz Peisker, Dr. theol., Mühlheim, Ruhr Prophet, prophētēs (part)
- Karl Heinrich Ringwald, Tübingen Virtue, Blameless, aretē (part)
- Johannes Schattenmann, D. theol., Ottobrun
 Pure, Clean, katharos (part); Strength, Force, Horn, Violence, Power, keras (part)
- Reinier Schippers, Dr. theol., Professor, Free University of Amsterdam Right, Worthy, artios; Seal, sphragis
- Ernst Dieter Schmitz, Wuppertal Unanimity, homothymadon
- Johannes Schneider, D. theol., Dr. theol., Professor, Berlin
 Redemption, Loose, Ransom, Deliverance, Release, Salvation, Saviour, rhyomai (part), sōzō (part), sōtēr (part)

CONTRIBUTORS

- Walter Schneider, Hanover Tempt, Test, Approve, peirasmos (part)
- Helmut Schultz, Marburg
Thank, Praise, Eucharist, aineō
- J. Julius Scott, Jr., B.A., B.D., Ph.D., Professor of New Testament, Wheaton Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois
Sadducees, Herodians, Saddoukaioi
- Horst Seebass, Dr. theol., Professor, Münster Righteousness, Justification, dikaiosynē (part)
- Manfred Seitz, Dr. theol., Professor, Heidelberg Seek, Find, eraunāō
- Friedel Selter, Rheinkamp-Repelen Ready, Prepare, Gird, zōnnyμι
- Burghard Siede, Coburg
Recompense, Reward, Gain, Wages, kerdos; Suffice, Satisfy, arkeo; Take, Receive, lambanō
- Siegfried Solle, Darmstadt
Ready, Prepare, Gird, hetoimos; Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow, chēra
- Wilfred Stott, B.A., B.D., B.Litt., D.Phil., formerly Principal of St. Paul's Theological College, Limuru, Kenya
Sabbath, Lord's Day, sabbaton, kyriakē
- Friedrich Thiele, Dr. theol., Kassel Ready, Prepare, Gird, kataskeuazō; Sacrifice, First Fruits, Offering, thyō (part); Work, Do, Accomplish, poieō
- Anthony C. Thiselton, B.D., M.Th., Ph.D., Lecturer in Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield Truth, alētheia; Word, Tongue, Utterance, Language and Meaning in Religion
- Erich Tiedtke, Frankfurt am Main
Right, Worthy, axios; Rock, Stone, Corner-stone, Pearl, Precious Stones, lithos (part); Shame, Respect, aidōs (part); Snatch, Take Away, Rapture, harpazō (part)
- Allison A. Trites, M.A., Ph.D., Acadia Divinity College, Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia
Witness, Testimony, martyria (part)
- Rudolf Tuente, Bremerhaven Slave, Servant, Captive, Prisoner, Freedman, aichmalotos (part), doulos
- Herwart Vorländer, Dr. phil., Professor, Ludwigsburg Reconciliation, Restoration, Propitiation, Atonement, katallasso (part); Woman, Mother, Virgin, Widow, gynē (part)
- Hans Währisch, Rheydt
Revile, Blaspheme, Slander, blasphēmēō (part), loidoreo; Virtue, Blameless, aneklētos
- John D. W. Watts, B.A., Th.M., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary War, Soldier, Weapon, polemos (part)
- Klaus Wegenast, Dr. theol., Professor, Lüneburg Teach, Instruct, Tradition, Education, Discipline, didasko, didaskalos, didaskalia, katēcheō, paradidōmi
- Horst Weigelt, Dr. theol., Professor, Erlangen Wisdom, Folly, Philosophy, philosophia
- J. Stafford Wright, M.A., formerly Principal of Tyndale Hall, Bristol Satan, Beelzebul, Devil, Exorcism, exhorkistes; Son, Son of God, Son of Man, Servant of God, Son of David, The Virgin Birth

Pri

Pride

ὑβρις ὑβρις (hybris), insolence, arrogance, insult, ill-treatment; ὑβρίζω (hybrizō), act arrogantly, ill-treat; ὑβριστής (hybristēs), violent, insolent man; ἐνυβρίζω (enhybrizō), despise, insult.

CL & OT hybris is a very ancient compound (E. Schwyzler, Griechische Grammatik, I, 1953², 495), formed from y (Cypriot, Rhodian equivalent of epi) and bri (cf. briaros, weighty; brithō, weigh, be heavy). Originally it meant excess weight, excess power; sometimes more concretely, ill-treatment, abuse, insult; sometimes more abstractly, arrogance, insolence, brutality. The word is frequently used in the Odyssey, to denote Penelope's suitors (e.g. 1, 227; 24, 352). hybris appears objectively as an infringement of the order of justice established by Zeus, which enabled community-life in the Greek polis to be maintained. It is the opposite of eunomia, good order, to the observance of which the gods pay close attention (as early as Homer, Od. 17, 487) and of noos theoudēs, the attitude that fears the gods. Classical tragedy contrasted hybris to sōphrosynē, modesty, which respects the limits laid down for men. Therefore hybris is not, strictly speaking, directed against the gods (J. J. Fraenkel, Hybris, 1942, 73). What the malefactor harms is good order. In the 5th century B.C. hybris became the classical expression of "numinous fear, i.e., of the Greek sense of sin from the religious standpoint" (G. Bertram, TDNT VIII 297; cf. Soph., Trach. 280; OT. 873). But in Euripides human norms replace those set by fate (Heraclidae 388; Or. 708).

There are many derivatives as early as the language of Homer; hybrizō, to act arrogantly, ill-treat, insult (after Homer: of animals, to be uncontrollable; of plants, to grow luxuriantly; as a legal term to inflict bodily harm); ephybrizō, insult; hybristēs, violent, dissolute, insolent man (after Homer: of animals, uncontrollable, restive; also of things, e.g. new wine). Of the numerous more recent formations the adj. hybristikos is important: arrogant, wanton, insolent (Plato onwards).

The OT material is dealt with under → hyperēphanos.

NT 1. It is remarkable that, in contrast with the OT, the abstract use of hybris in the sense of pride is completely absent from the NT. In 2 Cor. 12:10, where it is used alongside diōgmos, persecution, the word clearly means ill-treatment. The same is true of 1 Tim. 1:13, where Paul describes himself as one who formerly was a blasphemer, persecutor and a violent, insolent man (blasphēmōn kai diōktēn kai hybristēn). In Acts 27:10, 21 it refers to hardship, damage and disaster caused by the elements (cf. Pindar, Pyth. 1, 140; Josephus, Ant. 3, 133; Arndt, 839). Similarly the vb. hybrizō regularly has the meaning of ill-treat: 1 Thess. 2:2 and Acts 14:5 of the persecution of Paul and his companions; in the parable of Matt. 22:6 of the death of the servant; in the prediction of suffering in Lk. 18:32 of the passion. In Mk. 11:45 it means to insult.

2. The noun formed from this vb., hybristēs, violent, insolent man, occurs twice (Rom. 1:30; 1 Tim. 1:13). According to O. Michel on Rom. 1:30 a hybristēs was “originally a man who paid no attention to the wrath of God and committed an offence against the property or the honour of God (1 Tim. 1:13)” (Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1967¹³, 61 f.). But the words which occur in the context suggest in the first instance evil conduct in the world and inter-personal relationships, rather than open enmity towards God. The catalogue of vices listed in Rom. 1:29 f. is adduced by Paul as itself the outcome of idolatry and as a judgment by God (cf. 1:28). Thus RSV translates hybristas here as “insolent”. Similarly, theostygeis, which is a pass. form, is best translated as “hated by God”, bearing the same sense that it has in cl. Gk., although it can have an act. meaning (“haters of God”). It would be preferable, therefore, to interpret 1 Tim. 1:13 also in the light of the use of the vb. hybrizō; although hybristēs comes most near in meaning to hyperēphanos, one can scarcely trace the idea of pride in it.

3. The compound enhybrizō, to insult, outrage (with “the Spirit of grace” as its object) occurs in Heb. 10:29, in parallel with katapateō, to trample underfoot, to treat outrageously (“the Son of God”; suggesting arrogant outrage; cf. LXX Dan. 8:10; and possibly Jerusalem in Zech. 12:3 LXX) and koinon hēgeisthai, to treat as profane (“the blood of the covenant by which he was sanctified”). In the use of the word the distinction made in OT and rab. Judaism between deliberate and involuntary sin (v. 26) is taken up and expounded (Heb. hēzid, to act arrogantly, maliciously). Religious apostasy was regarded as an unforgivable sin at Qumran (IQS 2:13 f.; 3:4; cf. F. F. Bruce, “To the Hebrews” or “To the Essenes?”), NTS 9, 1962–63, 224 ff.; The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 256–64). In dealing with unforgivable → sin the present passage makes explicit allusion to Isa. 26:11; Deut. 17:2–6; 32:35 f.; and Exod. 24:8, arguing a fortiori from instances of judgment in the OT.

E. Güting

ὕπερήφανος	ὑπερήφανος (hyperēphanos), proud; ὑπερηφανία (hyperēphania), pride; ἀλαζών (alazōn), boastful; ἀλαζονεία (alazoneia), boastfulness.
------------	---

CL 1. The part. hyperēphaneontes is the oldest attestation of the word group (Homer Il. 11, 694). Its etymology is not clear; it is perhaps connected with katēphēs, cast down. Along with hyperēnōreōn it means proud. Other intrans. verbal forms used in the same sense occur in the LXX and later. From Polybius onwards the vb. is also used transitively: to treat arrogantly, despise. The adj. hyperēphanos (Hesiod onwards) usually means arrogant, proud; occasionally, prodigal. It also has a positive use (e.g. in Plato): magnificent. The writers of the classical period also used the noun hyperēphania in the sense of pride, arrogance, contempt.

2. The alazōn, the wandering charlatan or braggart, was a favourite comedy character (Cratinus, Eupolis, Aristophanes, Alkaios, Menander). The wandering sophist was also scornfully nicknamed alazōn. The word (occurring as an adj. from Herodotus) is derived either from the Thracian folk-name Alazōn (Bonfante, Frisk) or from alaomai, to wander (Boisacq, Hofmann). Its later meaning is generally braggart, show-off; and that of the corresponding abstract noun alàzoneia boastfulness, imposture. Similarly, likewise the vb. alazoneuomai (Aristophanes onwards) means to make false representations, to brag.

OT In the OT a central theme of the prophetic message (e.g. Isa. 13:11), and also of the Wisdom literature, is that God's judgment destroys all man's pride. Along with the four words mentioned above, many others occur which are not taken up by the NT (e.g. agerōchia, arrogance, meteōros, haughty, and especially those formed with megal- and hyps-, hypsēlo-). hybris, in particular, occurs frequently in senses not attested in the NT: pride, arrogance, and also insult, mockery (and, as in the NT, ill-treatment). Although the number of Heb. equivalents for which these words stand is large, more than half the occurrences stand for derivatives of the root, gā'āh, be exalted.

hybris stands for formations from gā'āh, be high, arrogant, at Lev. 26:19; Job 35:12; 37:4; Prov. 8:13; 14:3; 16:18 f.; 29:23; Hos. 5:5; 7:10; Amos 6:8; Nah. 2:2(3); Zeph. 2:10; 3:11; Zech. 9:6; 10:11; Isa. 9:9(8); 13:11; 16:6; 23:9; 25:11; 28:1, 3; Jer. 13:9; 48(31):29; Ezek. 30:6, 18; 32:12; 33:28. It also stands for gēwāh, arrogant speech at Jer. 13:17; for zādōn, insolence, presumptuousness at Prov. 11:2; 13:10; Jer. 50(27):32; Ezek. 7:10; for lāṣōn, boasting prattle, at Prov. 1:22; for 'alliz, wanton, presumptuous, at Isa. 23:7; and rūm, haughtiness, at Isa 2:17. It is without Heb. equivalent at Est. 4:17; Job 15:26 f.; 22:12; Prov. 14:10; 19:10, 18; 21:4; Wis. 2:19; 4:18; Sir. 10:6, 8; 21:4; Mic. 6:10; Isa. 10:33; Jer. 13:9; 1 Macc. 3:20; 2 Macc. 8:17; 3 Macc. 2:3, 21; 3:25; 6:12. hybrizō stands for formations from gā'āh at Isa. 13:3; Jer. 48(31):29; for 'alaz, exult, at Isa. 23:12; for qālal in hiph., treat with contempt, at 2 Sam. 19:44(43); and is without Heb. equivalent at 2 Macc. 14:42; 3 Macc. 6:9. hybristēs stands for gē' (Isa. 16:6) and gē'eh (Job 40:11[6]; Prov. 15:25; 16:19; Isa. 2:12), both words meaning haughty; for rūm at Prov. 6:17; and is without equivalent at Prov. 27:13; Jer. 51(28):2.

hyperēphania(-eia) stands mainly for formations from gā'āh, be high, arrogant: Pss. 17(16):10; 31(30):18, 23; 36(35):11; 59(58):12; 73(72):6; Prov. 8:13; Amos 8:7; Isa. 16:6; Jer. 48(31):29; Ezek. 7:20; 16:49, 56; Dan. 4:34 (Theodotion). It also stands for beṣa', profit, at Exod. 18:21; zādōn, insolence, at Deut. 17:12; 1 Sam. 17:28; Obad. 1:3; for rūm at Num. 15:30; and is without equivalent at Est. 4:17; 8:13; Pss. 74(73):3; 101(100):7; Wis. 5:8; Sir. 10:7, 12 f., 18; 15:8; 16:8; 22:22; 48:18; 51:10; Dan. 4:19; 1 Macc. 1:21, 24; 2:47, 49; 2 Macc. 1:28; 5:21; 7:36; 9:7 f., 11; 3 Macc. 2:5, 17. The vb. hyperēphaneuomai stands for gā'āh at Ps. 10:2 (9:23); Job 22:29; and zūḏ, act presumptuously, at Neh. 9:16; Dan. 5:20 Theodotion; and for gā'āh again at Sir. 10:9. hyperēphanos stands for zēḏ, insolent, presumptuous, at Ps. 119(118):21, 51, 69, 78, 122; gē'eh or gā'yōn, haughty, arrogant, Job 40:12(7); Pss. 94(93):2; 123(122):4; 140(139):5; gābōah, that which is high, exalted, Ps. 101(100):5; lūs, deride, scoff, scorn, Prov. 3:34; Isa. 29:20; 'ārīs, master, Isa. 13:11; rahaḏ, insolence, Ps. 89:11(88:10); and rūm, Job 38:15; Ps. 18(17):27; Isa. 2:12. It is without Heb. equivalent at Wis. 14:6; Sir. 3:28; 11:30; 13:20; 21:4; 23:8; 25:2; 27:15, 28; 32(35):12; 51:10; Zeph. 3:6; Isa. 1:25; 2 Macc. 9:12; 3 Macc. 1:27; 5:13; 6:4; 4 Macc. 4:15; 9:30.

The adv. hyperēphanōs (1 Macc. 8:34, 47; 2 Macc. 9:4, 12) has no Heb. equivalent.

alazoneia has no Heb. equivalent (Wis. 5:8; 17:7; 2 Macc. 9:8; 15:6; 4 Macc. 1:26; 2:15; 8:19). alazoneuomai stands for hāḏar, dignify oneself, at Prov. 25:6; but has no equivalent at Wis. 2:16. alazōn stands for šahaṣ, pride, Job 28:8; yāhîr, presumptuous, haughty, Hab. 2:5; the Heb. is uncertain at Prov. 21:24.

The fact that hybris and hyperēphaneia are used virtually as synonyms suggests that the LXX translators saw no fundamental distinction between them.

In the Wisdom literature the hyperēphanoi form a distinct group, contrasted with the righteous and the humble (→ Righteousness; → Humility) within but also outside Israel. hyperēphanos is never used of Israel. Behind this lies the fundamental conviction that “God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble” (Prov. 3:34 LXX). Just as the → fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, departure from the Lord is the beginning of pride (Sir. 10:12). Therefore, the one who prays cleanses himself from the suspicion of pride (Est. 4:17 LXX) and indicates his own lowliness in expectation of God’s help (Jud. 6:19). The prophetic message, on the other hand, accuses Israel himself of pride (e.g. Amos 6:8; 8:7; Hos. 5:5; 7:10; Jer. 13:9; Ezek. 7:10, 20; 16:56; Zeph. 2:10; cf. Lev. 26:19) and thus takes up a position in the sharpest opposition to deeply ingrained conceptions. There is no negative implication in the use of alazōn in Job 28:8; hyperēphanos in Est. 4:17; and hybris in Job 37:4.

NT 1. hyperēphania occurs only in Mk. 7:22 and hyperēphanos in Lk. 1:51; Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2; Jas. 4:6 (quoting Prov. 3:34); 1 Pet. 5:5 (also quoting Prov. 3:34).

The context of Lk. 1:51 is poetic. It occurs in the Magnificat (Lk. 1:46–55): “He has shown strength with his arm, he has scattered the proud [hyperēphanous] in the imagination of their hearts.” The verse appears to echo Ps. 89:10: “Thou didst crush Rahab like a carcass, thou didst scatter thy enemies with thy mighty arm” (where the LXX has hyperēphanon [88:11]). The Magnificat takes its name from the Lat. vb. with which this psalm opens which in EVV is translated by “magnifies”. E. E. Ellis comments: “A lyrical poem modelled upon Old Testament (and Qumran?) psalms, it has special affinity with the Song of Hannah (1 Sam. 2:1–10; cf. Lk. 1:38; P. Winter, BJRL, 37, 1954, 328–47). It expresses Mary’s joyous gratitude for her personal blessing (46–48), God’s graciousness to all who reverence him (49–50), his special love for the lowly (51–53) and for Israel (54 f.). The last half of the poem describes God’s victory in terms of a national deliverance from human oppression. This is a recurrent note in pre-Christian messianism. The New Testament writers do not deny it, but they redefine it and transfer it to Messiah’s parousia” (The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966, 72). On the psalm see further R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II, 1964⁴.

The remaining instances occur mainly in contexts which have a paraenetic function. They are strung together in so-called catalogues of vices which were used in early Christian catechesis. The sole instance of hyperēphania occurs in the things which Jesus declares to come from the → heart which must be dealt with at that level and cannot be cured by mere external ablutions: “For from within, out of the heart of man, come evil thoughts, fornication, theft, murder, adultery, coveting, wickedness, deceit, licentiousness, envy, slander, pride, foolishness. All these evil things come from within, and they defile a man” (Mk. 7:21 ff.). H. Anderson is representative of a cross-section of form-critical approach when he writes: “The list is without parallel in the teaching of Jesus. Similar catalogues occur in the Manual of Discipline from Qumran (IQS 4:9–11) and in Rom. 1:29–31; Gal. 5:19–23 (cf. 1 Tim. 1:9–10; 2 Tim. 3:2–5); they betray the influence of Hellenism and are characteristic of the Hellenistic world generally” (The Gospel of Mark, New Century Bible, 1976, 188). On the other hand, the concept of Hellenism as distinct from Palestinian Judaism is not as clear cut as was widely believed until recently. Whilst lists of virtues and vices were popular among the Stoics, they are also found in intertestamental literature (cf. Wis. 14:25 f.; Gr.Bar. 4:17; 8:5; 13:4; Test.Reub. 3:3–6; Test.Jud. 16:1; Sl.Enoch. 10:4 f.). And the existence of a parallel from Qumran confirms that such a list was not entirely foreign to Jewish soil. It is possible that Jesus himself was making use of an existing Jewish catechetical list in his debate with the → Pharisees over washing in order to show that merely external ritual cannot deal with man’s deepest problems (→ Baptism; → Hand). Christian catechesis continued the tradition of OT → wisdom, stringing together almost proverbial sayings which were otherwise loosely connected. (For further lists see Rom. 1:29 ff.; 13:13; 1 Cor. 5:10 f.; 6:9 f.; 2 Cor. 12:20; Gal. 5:19 ff.; Eph. 4:31; 5:3 ff.; Col. 3:5, 8; 1 Tim. 1:9 f.; 2 Tim. 3:2–5; Tit. 3:3; 1 Pet. 4:3.) Prov. 3:34 is cited twice in paraenetical passages in the NT exhorting → humility: “But he gives more grace; therefore it says, ‘God opposes the proud [hyperēphanois], but gives grace to the humble’ ” (Jas. 4:6); “Likewise you that are younger be subject to the elders. Clothe yourselves, all of you, with humility toward one another, for ‘God opposes the proud, but gives grace to the humble’ ” (1 Pet. 5:5; cf. Num. 15:30 LXX). The former passage is concerned with worldliness; the latter with relationships within the church in the wider context of living in the end times.

In Rom. 1:30 the word occurs in a catalogue of the vices which Paul sees as the outcome of idolatry which is itself an expression of God’s judgment. “They were filled with all manner of wickedness, evil, covetousness, malice. Full of envy, murder, strife, deceit, malignity, they are gossips, slanderers, haters of God, insolent [hybristas], haughty [hyperēphanous], boastful [alazonas], inventors of evil, disobedient to parents, foolish, faithless, heartless, ruthless” (Rom. 1:29 ff.; → hybris, NT 2). In 2 Tim. 3:2 it occurs in a list describing the characteristics of godless men in the last days: “For men will be lovers of self, lovers of money, proud [alazones], arrogant [hyperēphanoi], abusive, disobedient to their parents, ungrateful, unholy.” Timothy is urged to “Avoid such people” (2 Tim. 3:5).

2. Jas. 4:16 takes up the thought of Jas. 4:6 (noted above): “As it is, you boast in your arrogance [en tais alazoneiais hymōn]. All such boasting is evil.” The plur. here may suggest the numerous instances of confidence in one’s cleverness, luck, strength, or skill which may have brought material advantage (cf. J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. James, 1897², 75, 147). The context deals with laying plans for material gain without regard to God. Jas. counters this with a twofold remedy: “Instead you ought to say, ‘If the Lord wills, we shall live and we shall do this or that’. . . . Whoever knows what is right to do and fails to do it, for him it is sin” (Jas. 4:15, 17). The only other instance of the abstract noun is in 1 Jn. 2:16: “For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes [hē epithymia tēs sarkos kai hē epithymia tōn ophthalmōn] and the pride of life [hē alazoneia tou biou], is not of the Father but is of the world.” The contrast with → desire of the flesh and of the eyes suggests that “the pride of life” means lust for advantage and status. The threefold use of terms is not so much a classification of kinds of evil that stem from the world, i.e. fallen humanity. It aims, rather, to lay bare the world’s characteristically self-centred, grasping structure, which can only be overcome by love: “Do not love the world or the things of the world. If any one loves the world, love for the Father is not in him” (1 Jn. 2:15).

The noun alazōn occurs twice. It occurs in the catalogues in Rom. 1:30 and 2 Tim. 3:2, both of which passages include hyperēphanos (see above, 1). “alazōn denotes the man who tries to impress others by making big claims. It was used of the braggart, the charlatan, the quack, the impostor. The word is probably used here with the graver end of its range of meaning in mind. We may think of the ‘frantic boast and foolish word’ of the heathen heart, the sort of thing which is reflected in Isa. 10.7–11, in fact all the presumptuous claims and ostentatious behaviour of men by which they seek to impress one another, and very often delude themselves” (C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, I, ICC, 1975, 132).

→ Boast, → Height, → Humility, → Virtue

E. Güting, C. Brown

(a). K. Barth, CD, IV, 1, 413–78; G. Bertram, hybris etc., TDNT VIII 295–307; hyperēphanos etc. TDNT VIII 525–29; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology, 1955², 111–46; and “Paul and the Dead Sea Scrolls: Flesh and Spirit”, in K. Stendahl, ed., The Scrolls and the New Testament, 1957, 157–82 (reprinted in Christian Origins and Judaism, 1962, 145–78); E. R. Dodds, The Greeks and the Irrational, II, 1951, 28–63; B. S. Easton, “New Testament Ethical Lists”, JBL 51, 1932, 1–12; D. Grene, Man in his Pride: A Study in the Political Philosophy of Thucydides and Plato, 1950; S. Ranulf, The Jealousy of the Gods and Criminal Law at Athens, I–II, 1934; H. G. Robertson, “Dikē and Hybris in Aeschylus’ Suppliants”, Classical Review 50, 1936, 104–9; O. J. F. Seitz, “Lists, Ethical”, IDB III 137 ff.; P. Tillich, Systematic Theology, II, 1957, 56–59; J. A. Wharton, “Pride”, IDB III 876.

(b). G. Bertram, “Hochmut und verwandte Begriffe im griechischen und hebräischen Alten Testament”, Welt des Orients 3, 1964, 29–38; J. J. Fraenkel, Hybris, 1942; E. Kamlah, Die Form der katalogischen Paränese im Neuen Testament, 1964; M.-J. Lagrange, “Le Catalogue de Vices dans l’Épître aux Romains, 1.28–31”, RB 8, 1911, 534–49; A. Vögtle, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament, 1936; F. R. Walton, “Hybris”, *RGG*³ III 497 f.; S. Wibbing, Die Tugend- und Lasterkataloge im Neuen Testament, BZNW 25, 1959.

Priest, High Priest

ἱερεύς

ἱερεύς (hierēus), a priest; ἀρχιερεύς (archiereus), high priest; ἀρχιερατικός (archieratikos), high-priestly; ἱερωσύνη (hierōsynē), priestly office, priesthood; ἱερατεία (hierateia), priestly office; ἱεράτευμα (hierateuma), priesthood; ἱερατεύω (hierateuō), hold the office or perform the service of a priest; ἱερουργέω (hierourgeō), perform holy service, act as a priest with regard to something.

CL hierēus, a priest, and archiereus, high priest, like the nouns hierōsynē, priesthood, priestly rank, hierateia, priestly office, priestly attendance, and hierateuma, priesthood, are all formed from the adj. hieros, holy. The meaning of the words in the Gk.-speaking world is dealt with under → holy, art. hieros, CL.

It may, however, be added that, according to the Stoic Zeno (Stob., Ecl. 2, 67, 20) the priest, “versed in the sacrificial ordinances”, in chastity and in godliness, must be “within divine nature”, i.e. in concord and harmony with → nature here viewed as divine. For the Stoics “the wise man alone” is therefore a priest (cf. Origen, Commentary on Jn. 1:4; Diog. Laert., 8, 119). The wise man is also the just diviner (Stob., Ecl. 2, 114, 16).

OT 1. The Priesthood in Israel. The LXX uses hiereus to trans. Heb. kōhēn, priest, cognate with Arab. kahin, seer, soothsayer. The view that one takes of the development of the priesthood in the OT depends considerably upon the view that one takes of the dating of the various books and sources behind them. The following reconstruction represents a cross-section of scholarly opinion.

(a) The task of the priest in Israel was originally not sacrificial service, but oracular divination (cf. Jdg. 17:5; 18:5 ff.; 1 Sam. 14:36–42) and instruction in the Torah (Deut. 27:9 ff.; 31:4 ff.). The head of every family could offer → sacrifice (cf. Gen. 8:20; 31:54). Moses’ father-in-law, Jethro the priest of Midian (Exod. 2:18 ff.; 3:1), offered burnt-offerings and sacrifices at Sinai. He held a fellowship-meal with the elders of Israel and advised Moses in the regulations of sacral law (Exod. 18:12 ff.).

(b) The levitical order probably goes back to a priestly clan based on Kadash with which again Moses was closely related (cf. Arab. laway, to give an oracle). However, not every Levite was also a priest (Jdg. 19:1). The formula “the priests, the Levites” (e.g. Deut. 17:8) is first found in the Deuteronomic scheme. The Levites were in a particularly close relationship to Yahweh (Deut. 10:9; Jdg. 17:13), and claimed that they alone were called to the true priesthood (Exod. 32:25 ff.; Deut. 33:8 ff.; against this, polemically, Gen. 49:5 ff.). In point of law they stood close to aliens in possessing no land (Deut. 10:9; Jdg. 17:7; 19:1), but belonged to the tribal system, whose traditions of sacral law they cared for (Deut. 27:14–26; 31:24 ff.; 33:10). They claimed → Moses for themselves, declaring him to be a Levite (Exod. 2:1 ff.). It is a different matter with Aaron. In Num. 12:11 f. he appears as an intercessor; in Exod. 17:8 ff. as a rival of Moses when giving the blessing; and in Exod. 32:1 ff. as a priest of the idolatrous calf. If one links this with 1 Ki. 12:28 ff., Aaron was probably the eponymous ancestor of the priesthood at the sanctuary of Bethel in the northern kingdom; they defended their legitimacy against levitical criticism by declaring Aaron a Levite (Exod. 4:13–16). But → further Levite.

(c) In the pre-monarchic period priests are found only in connexion with a sanctuary, e.g. the shrine of the Ephraimite Micah (Jdg. 17); this man’s priest was a Levite who was carried off to Dan together with his cultic image (Jdg. 18). The priesthood of Dan is legitimized in Jdg. 18:30 by being traced back to Moses. At the sanctuary of the ark in Shiloh, Eli’s family carried out the priestly duties, which consisted of the offering of sacrifices and burnt-offerings and of oracular prophecy (1 Sam. 1:3; 2:27 ff.). After the decline of Eli’s family at Shiloh members of the family are mentioned at Nob (1 Sam. 21:27; 22:9–23).

(d) The flourishing temple cult of the monarchy gave rise to organized priest-hoods (1 Ki. 4:2 ff.; 12:26 ff.), which quickly gained recognition over against the local sanctuaries, since the monarchy and the court-priesthood entered into firm political alliances (2 Ki. 10:11, 19 ff.; 11:1–12). The priestly upper-classes which were formed in this way were deported by the conquerors of both northern and southern kingdoms (2 Ki. 17:27 f.; 25:18). Josiah's reform (begun c. 622–1 B.C.) centralized the Yahweh-cult in the Jerusalem temple and lowered the rank of the priests of the local sanctuaries to that of clerus minor (2 Ki. 23:5–9). The levitically-influenced Deuteronomic literature now succeeded in demanding levitical origin for priestly office (cf. Deut. 17:18).

(e) In exilic times priestly law was codified. Since not all Levites could be priests, “priests and Levites” were constructed as two divisions of the tribe of Levi, which now became the priestly tribe pure and simple (Num. 18:1–7). Aaron became the “priest”, and the priesthood belonged as of right to Aaron's descendants (Exod. 29:29 f.). Finally, according to Ezek. 44:15, the Zadokites put forward their claim to the high priestly offices. They derived their origin from Zadok, the pre-Davidic priest of Jerusalem, who was traced back through the family of Eli at Nob to that of Eli at Shiloh (2 Sam. 8:17; 1 Chr. 24:3).

(f) The post-exilic reconstruction demanded Zadokite origin for the chief priests, Aaronic descent for the ordinary priests and levitical parentage for the temple servants (1 Chr. 24). Since, as well as the sacrificial service, there now came in the care of the law of Yahweh, ordained by Ezra (Neh. 8), a body of experts in the scriptures grew up, which soon overshadowed the priesthood. This is reflected in Aboth 6:6: “Greater is [learning in] the law than priesthood and kingship”; B. Sanh. 59a: “A non-Jew who concerns himself with the Torah is as a high priest” (→ Israel, OT; Scripture).

(g) At the time of Jesus a social gap divided the chief priests from the ordinary priests. The latter formed twenty-four divisions of service in four to nine family-groups (1 Chr. 24; Josephus, Ant. 7, 365; cf. Lk. 1:5, 8). The divisions performed their service in the → temple in turn, a week at a time. For the rest of the time the priests carried out a profession in the surrounding land. In addition they could pass expert judgment on questions of ritual purity (Lev. 11–15) and often undertook the reading and exposition of the Torah in the worship of the synagogue. Priestly rank was hereditary. Strict regulations concerning purity and marriage were enforced for them (Lev. 21). The Levites were divided into temple musicians and temple servants (1 Chr. 6:16–33) and similarly formed twenty-four divisions of service. They had no access to the altar (Num. 18:3). According to Jos. 21, they lived in levitical cities.

(h) In the Qumran community the Zadokite priesthood, deprived of its powers by the Hasmonaeans, constituted itself as the priestly salvation-community of the last days (1QS 5:2, 9; 1QSa 1:2, 24; 1Qsb 3:22; CD 3:21). Its founder, the “Teacher of Righteousness”, was a priest of Zadok's line (4QpPs 37 2:16). Its opponent, the “Wicked Priest” (1QpHab 8:8), is probably to be identified with the high priest Jonathan (152–143 B.C.). The priests took precedence in the community: “Wherever there are ten men of the Council of the Community there shall not lack a priest among them” (1QS 6:3; cf. 2:19 f.; also 1QM, especially 7:10–9:9; 17; and 18). The chief priest of the last days is ranked above the messiah (1QSa 2:11–21; cf. also 1QpHab. 2:8 f.; 9:9 ff.; 1QS 4:11; 1QM 2:1; 7:12; 15:4). The purificatory prescriptions for priests were applied to all members of the community. Both the language and the conceptual world of the community breathe a priestly air throughout.

(i) Philo saw in the priest the symbol of the Logos (Abr. 198; Cher. 16 f.), and, when psychologizing, equated him with the conscience (Deus Imm. 131 ff.) or with the divine power of the soul in the reason of man (Som. 1, 215). Stoic influence betrays itself. The Levites are the picture of the true priesthood in renouncing the passions and in turning to the true Logos (Ebr. 76; Fug. 109). Everyone who no longer walks in the way of sin belongs to the priestly family (Spec.Leg. 1, 243).

2. The High Priest. archiereus occurs only 5 times in the canonical books of the LXX, but 41 times in the Apocrypha. The LXX translates the MT hakkōhēn haggādōl, the great priest, or kōhēn hārō'š, the chief priest, literally, or by simple hiereus.

(a) The post-exilic (life-long) office of high priest, which was traced back to Aaron, was until 172 B.C. in the possession of the Zadokites. Since the nation lacked an independent political head, political powers also devolved upon him. Out of this arose tensions, e.g., between the High Priest Eliashib and Nehemiah (Neh. 13:4-9:28), and tendencies towards Hellenistic customs (2 Macc. 4:12-15). Power struggles for the high-priestly office gave the Seleucid Antiochus IV (Epiphanes) several opportunities from 175 B.C. onwards for filling the position and intervening in the Yahweh cult. It was against this that the Maccabean uprising was directed. The son of the last legitimate high priest went to Egypt in 169 B.C. and founded a temple in Leontopolis which survived until A.D. 73. In Jerusalem the Hasmonean Jonathan (a member of an ordinary priestly family) usurped the high-priestly office in 152 B.C. (1 Macc. 10:20 f.). The Hasmoneans held it against the protests of the Pharisees until 37 B.C. Then Herod and, following him, the Romans arbitrarily installed and deposed twenty-eight high priests (of which twenty-five came from non-legitimate families) up till A.D. 67. Powerful families (Boethus, Hannas, Phabi, Kamithos) knew how to secure their high-priestly position by bribery. The last high priest before the destruction in A.D. 70 was once again a Zadokite. (See further Schürer, II, 1, 195-206.)

(b) At the time of Jesus the high priest was the highest representative of the people. Through his investiture with the magnificent eight-part vestments (Exod. 28) he received permanent sanctity (cf. Acts 23:4 f.). Every one of his robes carried atoning power for particular sins. The death of the high priest released the murderers in the cities of refuge (Num. 35). The high priest could take over the offering of the sacrifice at any time; he had the first choice of the parts of the sacrifice, the leadership of the priesthood and the chief seat in the Sanhedrin (→ Council). His greatest task was the absolution of the community on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16; Mishnah Yoma). The prescriptions for the purity and marriage of the high priest were especially strict (Lev. 21:10 ff.). The plural denotes the holders of the high-priestly offices: the chief temple office, the heads of the weekly and daily divisions, the temple keepers and treasurers.

(c) The high esteem of the high-priestly office led to a widespread Jewish expectation of an eschatological priest or high priest alongside the kingly messiah (Test. Reub. 6:8; Test.Lev. 18:2; Test.Jud. 21:2; 24:1; 1QS 9:10 f.; 1QSa 2:12 ff.; 1QSB 4:23; 4QpPs 37 2:15; CD 12:23 f.). This was joined with angel speculations (Test. Dan 6:2, Eth.Enoch 89:76; Sl.Enoch 22:4 ff.; Ḥag. 12b, where Michael offers a spiritual sacrifice), and the myth of the primeval man. Adam (Gen. R. 20; Num. R. 4), Enoch, or Metatron (Jub. 4:25, Heb.Enoch 48C, 7; 48D, 1; Sl.Enoch 64:5A) and → Melchizedek all appear as incarnations of the primeval man or primeval priest.

(d) Philo's idea of the high priest is a unique synthesis of these motifs. Moses is, as high priest (Rer. Div. Her. 182) and chief head of the people, the first Logos of all, who stands on the border-line between creation and Creator (Rer. Div. Her. 205 f.), since he is no longer man, but divine Logos (Fug. 108). Everyone who lives according to the law is, according to Wis. 18:20 ff., a high-priestly Logos (Spec.Leg. 2, 164). As Logos, the high priest holds sway in the temple of the cosmos of which his vestments are an image. He himself becomes a "cosmos in miniature" (Som. 1, 214 f.; Spec.Leg. 1, 82–97; Vit.Mos. 2, 109–135).

3. Melchizedek (MT malkī-šedeq), who in Gen. 14:18 and Ps. 110(109):4 is called king of Salem and priest of 'ēl-'elyôn (LXX "the Most High God"), is according to Josephus (War 6, 438; Ant. 1, 180 f.), the founder and first priest of → Jerusalem. The Melchizedek-fragment of Sl.Enoch ascribes to him an eternal priesthood in → paradise and titles such as "the great High Priest", "the Word of God", "the miraculous Power", holding sway as High Priest at the centre of the earth. For Philo, Melchizedek is "self-taught in knowledge of God" (Congr. 99) and image of "the reason of the King" and of the "Priest-Logos", who transports the soul aloft as in ecstasy to the vision of God (Leg.All. 3:79 ff.). Rabbinic literature sought to play down Melchizedek (frequently called Shem; cf. SB III 692 f.) as against Abraham. Because Melchizedek in Gen. 14:18 mentions Abraham's name before God's name, God removes the priesthood from him in Ps. 110:4 and hands it over to Abraham (Lev. R. 25; Ned. 32b). This was possibly anti-Christian polemic. An eschatological kōhēn-šedeq repeatedly stands alongside the messiah (Cant. R. on 2:13; Sukkah 52b; Ab.R.N. 34). Hippolytus (Haer. 7:36; 10:24) and Epiphanius (Haer. 55) report of a probably gnostic group of "Melchizedekians" who worshipped Melchizedek as a higher Logos than Jesus.

4. hierōsynē, only in 1 Chr. 29:22 in the LXX (for Zadok's priesthood), but several times in the Apocrypha (e.g. Sir. 45:24; 1 Macc. 2:54) goes back to the basic meaning of priestly office. Josephus (Ap. 1, 31) and Philo (Ebr. 65; 126) both testify to its high esteem. Josephus himself possesses the hierōsynē (Ant. 16, 187; Life 198).

5. hierateia is chiefly used for k^ehunnâh (priesthood) in the LXX (Exod. 29:2; 40:15; Num. 3:10; 18:1, 7; 25:13; Jos. 18:7; 1 Sam. 2:36; 2 Esd. 2:62; Neh. 7:46; 13:29). It stands for kāhan (Hos. 3:4) and 'ēpōd (Exod. 35:9; 39:19). It denotes in Num. 3:10 and 18:1 the priestly service, but more frequently simply the priestly office. By their investiture and anointing (Exod. 29:9 and 40:15) in accord with divine instruction (Num. 25:13; Neh. 13:29; Sir. 45:8), Aaron's descendants have an eternal hierateia, which, according to Test.Jud. 21:2, 4, is more than kingship. Josephus and Philo do not use the word.

6. Exod. 19:6 speaks of Israel as a mamlēket kōhⁿnīm "a kingdom of priests". This may be taken as "a kingdom [consisting] of priests", i.e. the heads of the families. But J. P. Hyatt takes it to mean that "the Israelites were all to have access to Yahweh, and the nation was to serve as priest for the rest of the nations of the world" (Exodus, New Century Bible, 1971, 200). A similar view is taken by B. S. Childs who insists that the term is to be understood in conjunction with the concept of "a special possession from all the peoples" and "a holy nation" (Exodus, 1974, 367). The LXX translates the phrase by basileion hierateuma, “kingly priesthood”, and thus lays the stress on the priestly aspect. Israel is called from amongst the nations to priestly service for God (cf. Isa. 61:6). The idea also appears in Exod. 23:22 LXX, but this is probably an interpolation, as there is no Heb. equivalent. The Peshitta, Syro-Hexaplar, Targum Onkelos and Targum Jerusalem II split up the MT in Exod. 19:6 into “kingship and priesthood”. 2 Macc. 2:17, Jub. 16:18; Test. Lev. Gk. Fragment 67 and Philo (Abr. 56; Sobr. 66) deal similarly with the LXX text and understand kingship and priesthood as distinguishing marks of Israel.

NT 1. In the NT hierous refers mainly to the levitical priests; in Heb. also to Christ and in Rev. to Christians. The word occurs 31 times, of which 14 are in Heb., 3 in Matt., 2 in Mk., 5 in Lk., 1 in Jn., 3 in Acts, and 3 in Rev.

(a) According to the evidence of the Gospels, Jesus had strikingly few dealings with the priesthood. When he sent healed lepers to the priests for confirmation of their healing (Matt. 8:4 par. Mk. 1:14, Lk. 5:14; Lk. 17:14), he was respecting their authority and acting in accordance with the law (cf. Lev. 13:49; 14:2 f.). It was also a challenge to recognize Jesus’ authority. The healing of the → Samaritan leper (who would not normally have gone to the Jewish priest) brings into sharp focus the question of Jesus’ authority and the status of the Jews and Samaritans. Lk. 10:31 is reminiscent of the prophetic critique of a merely external cult (but see further J. D. M. Derrett, “The Parable of the Good Samaritan”, in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 208–27). In Matt. 12:1–8 par. Mk. 2:23–28, Lk. 6:1–5, Jesus declared his eschatological freedom over against cultic precepts. In the light of Lev. 24:9; Num. 28:9 f.; Deut. 23:25; 1 Sam. 21:1–6 and Hos. 6:6, not only is plucking grain on the sabbath permitted, but Jesus as the Son of man is Lord of the sabbath. Only in Lk. 1:5, 8 and Acts 6:7 are priests found in a positive relationship to the salvation event. In the figure of Zechariah the priesthood is taken into the service of the immediate preparations for salvation, and seen to be dependent on faith. Lk. 1:8 provides the sole NT instance of hierateuō which is found in late Gk. including Josephus, Ant. 3, 189; 15, 253; 1 Clem. 43:4. The addition of a large number of priests from the lower classes to the Jerusalem congregation (Acts 6:7) does not appear incredible, in view of the social contrast with the priestly aristocracy.

(b) In Rev. 1:6 and 5:10 (cf. 20:6) Christians are called “kings and priests” and thus picked out from humanity for the service of God. The promise of Exod. 19:6 is thus fulfilled, but the new order no longer knows any → temple since God himself is now the temple (Rev. 21:22; cf. also 20:6).

(c) The thought of Exod. 19:6 is also taken up in 1 Pet. 2:9 “But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (cf. Exod. 23:22 LXX). This concept of priesthood embraces the idea of access to God in intimate knowledge and the prophetic rôle of priesthood in proclaiming the knowledge of God. It complements the earlier idea of offering spiritual sacrifices: “and like living stones be yourselves built into a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 2:5). In both cases the priesthood of all believers is seen to supersede that of the Jewish priesthood. And this is, in fact, the concept of Exod.

19:6. In addition to this, E. Best draws attention to other terms from the levitical cultus which are appropriated for Christian activity: “sprinkled” and “washed” come from the ritual consecration of priests (Heb. 10:22; cf. Exod. 29:21; Lev. 8:6, 30; → Baptism); “firstborn” recalls the Levites as the first born of Israel (Heb. 12:23; → First, art. prōtotokos); in Heb. 13:10 Christians have an “altar” (cf. I Peter, New Century Bible, 1971, 103; and E. Best, “Spiritual Sacrifice: General Priesthood in the New Testament”, Interpretation 14, 1960, 280–90; J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy, Supplements to NovT 12, 1966, 50–128).

(d) In Rom. 15:16 Paul describes his gracious calling “to be a minister [leitourgon] of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles in the priestly service of the gospel of God [hierourgounta to euangelion tou theou], so that the offering of the Gentiles [hē prosphora tōn ethnōn] may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit.” The context suggests that Rom. itself is a summary of this priestly ministry (cf. Rom. 15:15). In the light of Rom. 15:8 f., 13, D. W. B. Robinson writes: “Romans is both an exposition of the gospel of hope and at the same time Paul’s apologia for his ‘priesthood’ in that gospel” (“The Priesthood of Paul in the Gospel of Hope”, in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 232). On this verse see also C. Wiéner, “Hierourgein (Rom. 15.16)”, Stud. Paulin. Congressus, II, 1961, 1963, 399–404. The theme of Rom. is God’s saving purposes for both the Jewish nation and the Gentiles. The concern to show that the ground of salvation has always been grace received by faith (chs. 1–7) demonstrates that Jew and Gentile are on the same footing with regard to salvation. Chs. 9–11 consider God’s purposes for the Jewish nation. The thought of the self-offering of the individual’s life (Rom. 12:1) is paralleled by that of the Gentiles. Just as the OT priest presented the sacrifice to Yahweh, so Paul, as the apostle to the Gentiles (cf. Rom. 1:5; Gal. 2:8 f.; Acts 9:15; 22:21; 26:17 f.), is the one who has the special task of bringing them to God. This offering which would otherwise be unclean is made acceptable by the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 15:16 with 8:2–27). In the background of Paul’s thought may be Isa. 66:20 where the Jews of the Diaspora are an offering (MT minhâh; LXX dōron) which the Gentiles will bring to Jerusalem (SB III 153). Here, however, the rôles are reversed. In Phil. 2:17 the rôles are again reversed. Paul is in prison and awaiting possible execution (cf. Phil. 1:12 ff.; 17–26) and can envisage his own death as an offering for the sake of the church: “Even if I am to be poured out as a libation upon the sacrificial offering of your faith, I am glad and rejoice with you all.”

(e) Although the words priest and high priest do not occur in it, Jesus’ prayer in Jn. 17 is sometimes referred to as Jesus’ high priestly prayer. The chapter represents Jesus’ prayer for his people prior to his arrest and execution. Discussions include O. Michel, “Das Gebet des scheidenden Erlösers”, ZSTh 18, 1941, 521–34; and E. Käsemann, The Testament of Jesus: A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Chapter 17, 1968. In Jn. 17:19 Jesus says: “And for their sake I consecrate myself, that they also may be consecrated in truth.” The vb. hagiazō which is used here is also used for the sanctifying of priests (e.g. Exod. 28:41; 29:1, 21) and of sacrifices (e.g. Exod. 28:38; Num. 18:9) (→ Holy, art. hagios). The act of consecration through death for the sake of the people may reflect the Day of Atonement ritual carried out by the high priest (Lev. 16).

2. archiereus occurs only in the Gospels (Matt. 25 times, Mt. 22 times, Lk. 15 times, Jn. 22 times), Acts (22 times) and Heb. (17 times). In the Gospels and Acts it refers to the high priests chiefly in opposition to Jesus; in Heb. it has a christological and soteriological significance in that Jesus is depicted as the true high priest.

(a) In the Gospels and Acts the high priest is mentioned as the president of the Sanhedrin in the trials of Jesus and his followers (e.g. Matt. 26:62 par. Mk. 14:60; Acts 5:21, 27; 23:1 ff.; → Council). The frequent plurals (denoting the holders of the higher priestly offices) stand similarly in these contexts (e.g. Matt. 21:45 f. par. Lk. 20:19; Matt. 26:3 par. 14:1, Lk. 22:2; Jn. 12:10; 19:6, 15; Acts 5:24; 25:2). The priestly aristocracy thus appears as a closed group who staged persecutions and condemnations. Their combined act with the “elders” (→ Bishop, art. presbyteros, NT 2 (a)) and the → “scribes” is interpreted as being ordained by God (Matt. 16:21 par. Mk. 8:31, Lk. 9:22; Matt. 20:18 par. Mk. 10:33, Lk. 18:31; → Necessity, art. dei). Looking at it historically, it may well have been primarily the cleansing of the temple by Jesus (Mk. 11:18 par. Lk. 19:47; cf. Matt. 21:12 f.; Jn. 2:13–17) as an attack on the carefully preserved temple administration of the chief priests, which was the decisive factor in their hostility against him. Perhaps their arrangement with the occupying power also aroused their fears that the Romans might take measures against Jesus and his followers on their own account (Jn. 11:48). The remark in Jn. 11:51 that Caiaphas, in his office of high priest, prophesied Jesus’ death recalls the rabbinic accounts of heavenly voices and visions which various high priests are supposed to have received while sacrificing on the Day of Atonement (Sotah 33a; Yoma 53b). On the other hand, 1QpHab. 10:9 suggests that the prophetic gift of the high priest was disputed at Qumran. Josephus also said that John Hyrcanus was credited with having prophetic powers (Ant. 13, 299; cf. 11, 327). He even claimed a measure of prophetic foresight himself in view of his priestly descent, although his main emphasis fell on knowledge of prophetic books (War 3, 352). There was a Jewish belief that prophecy was often unconscious (SB II 546). Jn.’s observation is an ironical comment on what to Caiaphas was sheer political realism: “You know nothing at all; you do not understand that it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish.’ He did not say this of his own accord, but being high priest that year he prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation, and not for the nation only, but to gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad. So from that day on they took counsel how to put him to death” (Jn. 11:49b–53). In Jn. the concern of the chief priests and Pharisees was occasioned by the signs of Jesus (the most recent being the raising of Lazarus) and Jesus’ popularity: “If we let him go on thus, every one will believe in him, and the Romans will come and destroy both our holy place and our nation” (11:48).

Caiaphas is mentioned in the NT at Matt. 26:3, 57; Lk. 3:2; Jn. 11:49; 18:13 f., 24, 28; Acts 4:6. Josephus (Ant. 18, 35; 18, 95) says that he was made high priest by the Procurator Valerius Gratus (A.D. 18) and was deposed by the Procurator Vitellius (A.D. 36). His successor was “Jonathan the son of Ananus” who is commonly identified with the Annas of the NT. According to Jn. 18:13, he was the son-in-law of Annas who had been deposed as high priest in A.D. 15 by Valerius Gratus. Lk. dates the public ministry of John the Baptist “in the high-priesthood [epi archiereōs] of Annas and Caiaphas” (Lk. 3:2). Whereas some scholars see this as a mistake, others see this as a reflection of the real situation. As head of a powerful family, Annas continued to exert considerable influence which is evidenced by the fact that he procured appointment to the office for five of his sons. This may be the explanation of the fact that he is named as high priest in Acts 4:6. Annas is also mentioned in Jn. 18:3, 24. (For further discussion see S. Sandmel “Caiaphas”, IDB I 481 f.; D. E. Hiebert, ZPEB I 683 ff.) The late Gk. adj. archieratikos is used in the NT only at Acts 4:6 when “Annas the high priest and Caiaphas and John and Alexander, and all who were of the high-priestly family [ek genous archieratikou]” were gathered to deal with Peter and John. Schürer suggests that the term high priest embraced not only present and former ones but also members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken (Schürer, II, 1, 203–6).

Acts 22:30–23:10 depicts Paul’s interrogation before the Sanhedrin at which the high priest Ananias commanded that Paul should be struck on the mouth. “Then Paul said to him, ‘God shall strike you, you white-washed wall! Are you sitting to judge me according to the law, and yet contrary to the law you order me to be struck?’ Those who stood by said, ‘Would you revile God’s high priest?’ And Paul said, ‘I did not know, brethren, that he was the high priest; for it is written, “You shall not speak evil of a ruler of your people” ’” (Acts 23:3 ff.; cf. Exod. 22:28). On Paul’s remark → Black, White, Red, art. leukos. His failure to recognize the high priest has been ascribed to failing eyesight (on Paul’s thorn in the flesh → Fruit, art. skolops), a change of high priest since Paul’s last visit to Jerusalem, or irony (i.e. that one who spoke like that could not possibly be the high priest). However, the latter seems incompatible with the allusion to Exod. 22:28. The interrogation broke up in disorder when Paul played off the Pharisees and Sadducees against each other. Ananias appeared in person to support the renewed charges before Felix at Caesarea five days later (Acts 24:1). Ananias was appointed high priest by Herod, king of Chalcis in A.D. 48 (Josephus, Ant. 20, 103). He was sent to Rome in A.D. 52 by Quadratus, legate of Syria, to answer charges of cruelty, but was acquitted by Cláudius through the efforts of Agrippa the younger (Ant. 20, 131 ff.). An unscrupulous man (Ant. 20, 205 ff.), he was a typical powerful Sadducee. Because of his collaboration with the Romans he was hated by the nationalists, and was murdered at the outbreak of the Jewish war in A.D. 66 (War 2, 441).

(b) Whilst high priestly functions are attributed to Christ in the NT outside Hebrews, such as intercession (Jn. 17:19; Rom. 8:34; 1 Jn. 2:1), and the opening of the way of access to God (Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:18; 1 Pet. 3:18), only Hebrews offers a fully developed high-priestly christology. The writer interprets the suffering and the present work of Christ as a high-priestly service. Alongside the title archiereus, Christ also, on the basis of Ps. 109:4 (LXX), bears the title hiereus. But the interest is really focused on the high-priestly rank of Christ. The writer had probably already found this high-priestly title of Christ in confession-like liturgical tradition (Heb. 3:1). His scheme of thought appears to be influenced, not only by the Jewish expectation of the priest of the last days, but also by the motif of heavenly intercession (taken from angel speculations; cf. 1:5–14), and possibly elements of the gnostic myth of the primeval man: Acquaintance with these ideas could have been mediated through the Alexandrian-Jewish doctrine of the Logos. The thought of the high-priestly self-sacrifice is nevertheless new (even Sifre Num. 131 does not speak of a cultic self-sacrifice of the high priest). The writer develops his interpretation of the priesthood of Christ as the antitype of the levitical priesthood, and does so in respect of structure, scriptural basis, bearer, service, place and time.

(i) Structure. Every high priesthood, as representative of men before God (Heb. 5:1), must be founded, on the one side, on its solidarity with men in their susceptibility to sin (Heb. 5:2), and on the other side, on divine calling (Heb. 5:4). Of the duties of the high priest Heb. is interested only in the sacrificial service (Heb. 5:1; 8:3), and primarily in his double service on the Day of Atonement (Heb. 2:17; cf. Lev. 16) – the slaughter of the sacrificial animal (Heb. 9:22) and his entry with the sacrificial blood into the most holy place (Heb. 9:7). The goal of the high priestly service is to render possible access to God by blotting out the guilt of their sins (Heb. 4:16; 7:18 f., 25; 10:1, 19, 22).

(ii) Scriptural basis. The fact and significance of the priesthood of Christ are grounded on Ps. 110:4 (cf. Heb. 5:6) and Gen. 14:17 ff. (Heb. 7:1 ff.). Following an exegetical tradition of Hellenistic Judaism, Heb. is not interested in the historical figure of → Melchizedek, but in the OT picture of his priesthood. It is not tied to any descent and is therefore eternal (Heb. 7:3) and superior to the levitical priesthood, since Melchizedek blessed Abraham, the ancestor of the Levites, and received a tithe from him (Heb. 7:5 ff.). All this is a prefiguration of the priesthood of the Son addressed in Ps. 110 (Heb. 7:3). It is grounded moreover on a divine oath (cf. the exegesis of the divine oath in Philo, Leg. All. 3, 203 ff. and elsewhere), whereas the levitical hierōsynē, the setting-up of this priesthood, rests on legal ordinance (Heb. 7:11, 20 f.). The “fleshly” law (Heb. 7:16), however, can only install men in their weakness as high priests (Heb. 7:23, 28). God’s oath, by contrast, in which resides the “power of an indestructible life” (Heb. 7:16), entrusts to Jesus the Son of God, who has overcome all weakness, an unalterable hierōsynē (Heb. 5:7 ff.; 7:24, 28).

(iii) The bearer. The weakness of the levitical priesthood lies in its sinfulness (Heb. 5:3; 7:27). Although Jesus became like men in every respect (Heb. 2:17), he did not sin (Heb. 4:15; 9:14); and only such a high priest can act for us (Heb. 7:26), for he alone can atone. Behind this depreciation of the levitical high priesthood stands not so much the experience of its ethical decline in NT times as the dualistic moral doctrine of Hellenistic Judaism, and also the impression of the life of Jesus.

(iv) Service. The levitical priestly service is inadequate, since for an atoning sacrifice it must have recourse to animal → blood. This only effects an external “fleshly” purification, not the eradication of the guilt of sin from the conscience (Heb. 9:13 f.). On the contrary, it is only the necessity of continually renewed sacrifices which actuates a consciousness of sin (Heb. 10:1 ff.). But Christ, through his self-sacrifice, has effected once for all the liberation of the conscience from all sin (Heb. 9:14, 26) and thus opened the way to God (Heb. 10:19 ff.). Here Heb. takes up motifs of the prophetic critique of sacrifice, clothed in Hellenistic thought-forms (Heb. 10:5 ff.).

(v) Place. The levitical priestly service is imperfect, because its nature is earthly and it takes place in an earthly sanctuary (Heb. 9:1). According to Exod. 25:40, it is the shadowy replica of the heavenly sanctuary in which Christ officiates as high priest (Heb. 8:2, 5; 9:11, 24). Heb. understands "earthly" and "heavenly" not so much apocalyptically and cosmologically as dualistically, comparable with the Platonic doctrine of Being. The heavenly sanctuary is perfect, "true", because it is "not of this creation" (Heb. 8:2; 9:11). To that extent not only Christ's entrance into heaven, but also the death he suffered on earth is essentially "heavenly" high-priestly service. The question of the commencement of his high-priesthood receives its answer from this point. He is a high priest for ever, but is first proclaimed as such on the basis of his sacrificial death (Heb. 5:10).

(vi) Time. The words → "covenant" and → "promise" (Heb. 8:6 ff.; 10:16 f.) bring a historical moment into the dualism of the earthly levitical high priesthood and the heavenly high priesthood of Christ. The latter sets the former aside (Heb. 7:18 f.). Moreover, the unique self-sacrifice of Christ the high priest marks the arrival of the end (already prophesied in the OT) of the cult as an atoning institution (Heb. 10:5 ff., 18). The new cult of Christians knows only the sacrifice of praise: confession and service (Heb. 13:15 f.).

(c) By way of summary, it must be stressed that the high-priestly christology of Heb. does not serve speculative but paraenetical interests. Heb. is directed to Christians who are tempted by the hiddenness of salvation in Christ, as against the very palpable salvation presented and represented in the cults of the surrounding world. Heb. wants to encourage them to hold fast to their confession by giving a new interpretation, both of Jesus' historical work and his present significance by means of the already previously handed down high-priestly title of Christ. Thus Jesus' death on the cross represents the high-priestly self-sacrifice of the eternal Son of God, surpassing all other sacrifices and valid once and for all. His exaltation is interpreted as the entrance of the perfect high priest into the heavenly and true sanctuary, and as his continual intercession for believers. Christ, therefore, as the eternal and heavenly high priest, now gives to those who hold firm to their confession of him a present guarantee of immediate access to God, and a future guarantee of entrance into the lasting heavenly world. Heb. thus represents salvation in Jesus Christ as the fulfilment of every cultic intention and so as the end of every cult (as a human endeavour of relationship with God), and exhibits this by using the methods of Hel. scriptural exegesis on the example of the OT cult. Alongside Paul, who proclaims Christ as the end of the law, then, comes an independent sketch of early Christian preaching of Christ as the end of the cult. J. Baehr
→ Bishop, → Council, → Levite, → Melchizedek, → Moses, → Prophet, → Sacrifice, → Temple

(a). G. C. Aalders, "Priests and Levites", A Short Introduction to the Pentateuch, 1949, 66-71; R. Abba, "Priests and Levites", IDB III 876-89; G. Allon, "On the History of the High-Priesthood at the Close of the Second Temple", Tarbiz 13, 1941, 1-24; W. Arndt, "A Royal Priesthood", Concordia Theological Monthly 19, 1948, 241-49; N. B. Barrow, The High Priest, 1947; J. R. Bartlett, "Zadok and his Successors at Jerusalem", JTS New Series 19, 1968, 1-18; E. Best, "Spiritual Sacrifice: General Priesthood in the New Testament", Interpretation 14, 1960, 280-90; F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1957; and The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964; D. R. Catchpole, The Trial of Jesus: A Study in the Gospels and Jewish Historiography from 1770 to the Present Day, Studia Post-Biblica 18, 1971; R. E. Clements, God and Temple: The Idea of the Divine Presence in Ancient Israel, 1965; A. Cody, A History of Old Testa- ment Priesthood, Analecta Biblica 35, 1969; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963³, 83–107; A. Ehrhardt, “Jewish and Christian Ordination”, The Framework of the New Testament Stories, 1964, 132–50; C. Eastwood, The Priesthood of All Believers, 1969; and The Royal Priesthood of the Faithful, 1963; A. Edersheim, “The Officiating Priesthood”, The Temple, Its Ministry and Services, 1874, 58–78; J. H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy, Supplements to NovT 12, 1966, 50–128; J. A. Emerton, “Priests and Levites in Deuteronomy”, VT 12, 1962, 128–38; G. D. Fee, “Priest in the New Testament”, ZPEB IV 849–52; C. L. Feinberg, “Priests and Levites”, ZPEB IV 852–67; G. Fohrer, History of Israelite Religion, 1973; B. Gärtner, The Temple and the Community in Qumran and the New Testament: A Comparative Study in the Temple Symbolism of the Qumran Texts and the New Testament, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 1, 1965; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology: Their History in Early Christianity, 1969; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, I–II, 1974; D. A. Hubbard, “Priests and Levites”, NBD 1028–43; E. O. James, The Nature and Function of Priesthood: A Comparative and Anthropological Study, 1961; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 147–221; A. R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel, 1944; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel: A Cultic History of the Old Testament, 1966; G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, 1964²; R. N. Longenecker, The Christology of Early Jewish Christianity, SBT Second Series 17, 1970; T. W. Manson, Ministry and Priesthood: Christ’s and Ours, 1959; B. A. Mastin, “Scaeva the Chief Priest”, JTS New Series 27, 1976, 405–12; H. W. Montefiore, The Epistle to the Hebrews, BNTC 1964; M. Noth, “Office and Vocation in the Old Testament”, in The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Studies, 1966, 229–49; J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, III–IV, 1940, 150–97; C. Rabin, The Zadokite Documents, 1958²; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962; II, 1965; H. Ringgren, Israelite Religion, 1966; D. W. B. Robinson, “The Priesthood of Paul in the Gospel of Hope”, in R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 231–45; H. W. Robinson, “Revelation through the Priest”, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, 1946, 199–230; H. H. Rowley, The Zadokite Fragments and the Dead Sea Scrolls, 1952; and Worship in Ancient Israel: Its Forms and Meaning, 1967; H. H. Rowley, ed., The Old Testament and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research, 1951; K. H. A. Schelkle, A Priestly People, 1965; G. Schrenk, hieros etc., TDNT III 221–83; Schürer, II, 1, 195–298; W. M. F. Scott, “Priesthood in the New Testament”, SJT 10, 1957, 399–415; M. H. Shepherd, Jr., “Priests in the NT”, IDB III 889 ff.; J. Smith, A Priest for Ever: A Study of Typology and Eschatology in Hebrews, 1969; N. H. Snaith, “The Priesthood and the Temple”, in T. W. Manson, ed., A Companion to the Bible, 1939, 418–33; R. A. Stewart, “The Sinless High-Priest”, NTS 14, 1967–68, 126–35; A. Stöger, “Priest(hood)”, EBT II 700–9; S. van Tilborg, The Jewish Leaders in Matthew, 1972; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 345–405; G. Vos, “The Priesthood of Christ in the Epistle to the Hebrews”, Princeton Theological Review, 5, 1907, 423–47, 579–604; A. C. Welch, “The Priesthood”, and “The Priests and the Levites”, Post-Exilic Judaism, 1935, 172–84, 217–41; and Prophet and Priest in Old Israel, 1936; J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Ancient Israel, (1878) 1957; Y. Yadin, “The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Epistle to the Hebrews”, Scripta Hierosolymitana 4, 1957, 36–55.

(b) W. v. von Baudissin, Die Geschichte des alttestamentlichen Priestertums, 1889; E. Bammel, “archiereus prophēteuōn”, TLZ 79, 1954, 308 ff.; J. Begrich, “Das priestliche Heilsorakel”, ZAW 52, 1934, 81 ff. (reprinted in Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament, ThB 21, 1964); and “Die priesterliche Tora” in Werden und Wesen des Alten Testaments, 1936, 63–88; J. Blinzler, “HIERATEUMA. Zur Exegese von I Petr. 2, 5 u. 9”, Faulhaber Festschrift, 1949, 49–65; H. Bolewski, Christos Archiereus, Dissertation, 1939; G. Bornkamm, “Das Bekenntnis im Hebräerbrief”, ThBl 21, 1942, 56 ff. (reprinted in Studien zu Antike und Christentum, 1963³, 188 ff.); P. Dabín, Le Sacerdoce Royal des Fidèles dans les Livres Saints, 1941; M. Dibelius, “Der himmlische Kultus nach dem Hebräerbrief”, ThBl 21, 1942, 1 ff.; G. Friedrich, “Beobachtungen zur messianischen Hohepriestererwartungen in den Synoptikern”, ZTK 53, 1956, 265 ff.; J. Gabriel, Untersuchungen über das alttestamentliche Hohepriestertum, 1933; L. Gautier, “Prêtre ou Sacrificateur?”, in Études sur la Religion d’Israël, 1927, 247–76; J. Gnilka, “Die Erwartung des messianischen Hohenpriesters in den Schriften von Qumran und im Neuen Testament”, Revue de Qumran 2, 1960, 395 ff.; J. Goettsberger, “Das alttestamentliche Hohepriestertum und Ezechiel”, in Episcopus (Faulhaber Festschrift), 1969, 1–18; E. Grässer, Der Glaube im Hebräerbrief, 1965; A. H. J. Gunneweg, Leviten und Priester. Hauptlinien der Traditionsbildung und Geschichte des israelitisch-jüdischen Kultpersonals, FRLANT 89, 1965; F. Hesse, “Priester, Priestertum”, EKL III 322 ff.; G.

Hölscher, "Levi", Pauly-Wissowa, XII, 2, 2155–208; A. van Hoonacker, Le Sacerdoce Lévitique dans la Loi et dans l'Histoire des Hébreux, 1899; P. Honigsheim, K. Koch, B. Lohse, R. Prenter, "Priestertum", *RGG*³ V 569–82; E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk, FRLANT 37, 1961⁴; P. Ketter, "Das allgemeine Priestertum der Gläubigen nach dem 1. Petrusbrief", Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift 56, 1947, 43–51; F. Kühler, "Das priesterliche Orakel in Israel und Juda", in Abhandlungen zur semitischen Religionskunde und Sprachwissenschaft (Baudissin Festschrift), 1918, 285–301; E. Lohse, Die Ordination im Spätjudentum und im Neuen Testament, 1951; O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹²; O. Moe, "Das Priestertum Christi im Neuen Testament ausserhalb des Hebräerbriefs", TLZ 72, 1947, 335 ff.; S. Mowinckel, Religion und Kultus, 1953; S. Nomoto, "Herkunft und Struktur der Hohepriestervorstellung im Hebräerbrief", NovT 10, 1968, 10 ff.; A. Oepke, Das neue Gottesvolk, 1950; W. Pesch, "Zu Texten des Neuen Testaments über das Priestertum der Getauften", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Caritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin, 1970, 303–15; O. Plöger, "Priester und Prophet", ZAW 63, 1951, 157 ff.; E. Riggenbach Der Brief an die Hebräer, 1922³; K. Romaniuk, Le Sacerdoce dans le Nouveau Testament, 1966; F. J. Schierse, Verheissung und Heilsvollendung, 1955; G. Schille, "Erwägungen zur Hohenpriesterlehre des Hebräerbriefs", ZNW 46, 1955, 81 ff.; E. Schürer, "Die archiereis im Neuen Testament", ThStKr 44, 1872, 593–657; C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux, I–II, 1952–53; and La Spiritualité sacerdotale d'après Saint Paul, 1954; A. Stöger, "Der Hohepriester Jesus Christus", Theologisch-Praktische Quartalschrift 100, 1952, 309–19; F. Stummer, "Gedanken über die Stellung des Hohenpriesters in der alttestamentlichen Gemeinde", Episcopus (Faulhaber Festschrift), 1949, 19–48; A. Vanhoye, "Le Christ, Grand-prêtre selon Heb. 2, 17–18", Nouvelle Revue Théologique 91, 1969, 449–74; A. Wendel, "Hohepriester", *RGG*³ 427 f.; H. Wenschkewitz, "Die Spiritualisierung der Kultusbegriffe: Tempel, Priester und Opfer im Neuen Testament", Angelos. Archiv für neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte und Kulturkunde 4, 1932, 70–230; C. Wiéner, "Hierourgein (Rom. 15.16)", Stud. Paulin. Congressus, II, 1961, 1963, 399–404; H. Windisch, Der Hebräerbrief, HNT 14, 1931²; H. Wuttke, Melchisedek, der Priesterkönig von Salem, BZNW 5, 1927.

Proclamation, Preach, Kerygma

There are a number of different words in Gk. for the passing on of messages, reports and instructions. Leaving aside the groups of words dealt with under → Teach (didaskō and katecheō for the communication of material to be learned, and paradidōmi for the passing on of tradition); gnōrizō, to make known, which is dealt with under → Knowledge; and also the verbs mentioned under → Confess and → Witness; the principal words which are dealt with below are angellō and kēryssō and their derivatives. The NT uses the whole range of this vocabulary, partly because of the variety of the forms of communication which it mentions, and partly in the simple interchange of practically synonymous expressions. Of the two groups of words dealt with under this heading, that connected with angellō has more of the character of an offer of information or encouragement, while kēryssō indicates a public and authoritative announcement which demands compliance. See also → Gospel.

ἀγγέλλω	ἀγγέλλω (angellō), announce; ἀγγελία (angelia), message; ἀναγγέλλω (anangellō) and ἀπαγγέλλω (apangellō), report, announce, proclaim; διαγγέλλω (diangellō), make known, proclaim (far and wide); ἐξαγγέλλω (exangellō), proclaim, report; καταγγέλλω (katangellō), proclaim; καταγγελεύς (katangeleus), proclaimer; προκαταγγέλλω (prokatan-gellō), announce, proclaim beforehand, foretell.
---------	--

CL The vbs. of this group are largely interchangeable. They are to be found in their principal sense, to bring tidings, notify, proclaim publicly, in some cases as early as Homer. angelos, messenger (→ Angel), is even attested in Mycenaean Gk. In Koine, as opposed to classical, Gk. the compounds are preferred: e.g. an- and apangellō take the place of the classical angellō. Nuances of meaning can of course be distinguished in the various compounds: apangellō is a more official word than anangellō. On the other hand, both words can be watered down to mean simply relate, speak. di-, ex- and katangellō, often indicate the elevated, ceremonious style of proclamation. exangellō, however, emphasises rather the unknown or secret nature of what is being told, sometimes even in the sense of gossip; while katangellō can, among other things, mean to make a claim concerning oneself. The noun angelia can mean either message or command. The one who conveys the message is the katangeleus, herald.

1. In their basic meaning these words always refer to the activity of the messenger who conveys a message which has been given to him either orally or in writing (Xen., Anab. 1, 3, 21), and who in this way represents the sender of the message himself. The content of the message may vary very considerably. It may be private family news (Soph., Ajax 1355), reporting good or evil fortune. Such news may especially concern political events: war (Plato, Phaedrus 262b), victory or defeat of an army (Plato, Politicus 1, 15, 11), the solemn proclamation of a ruler (cf. Xen., Anab. 2, 3, 19), the accession of an emperor. Good news (angelia agathē) is also called euangelion (→ Gospel).

2. Just as the messenger who brings the news stands under the special protection of the gods (→ Angel), so too his message can acquire a sacred significance. This is, of course, true particularly where it is associated with the cultic veneration of rulers and gods: e.g. where the messenger solemnly proclaims the successful completion of a sacrifice which brings blessing, or the approach of a ceremonial procession. He proclaims the manifestation of a god, the reign of a new god-king, or announces the mighty deeds of his god or emperor.

OT In the LXX angellō appears 5 times and means to announce. an- and apangellō by contrast occur frequently, chiefly to render the Heb. nāḡad (hiph. or hoph.), in the sense of to report, announce (e.g. Gen. 9:22; 37:5; 2 Sam. 15:13), to proclaim (Pss. 19[18]:2; 51:15[50:17]), to speak out openly (e.g. Gen. 12:18; 1 Sam. 9:19), to direct or instruct (Deut. 24:8). di-, ex- and katangellō are seldom found in the LXX; proangellō and katangeleus do not appear at all.

The message of the OT and of rabbinic Judaism makes it quite clear that where the lordship of the divine Ruler is proclaimed, and his mighty deeds made known, no room is left for proclaiming the lordship of other gods. We ought therefore to ask whether the special meaning attached to these terms in the NT is not derived from OT and rabbinic usage. The might of God the Lord is declared to all the world (Exod. 9:16; Ps. 64[63]:9), his righteousness (Ps. 22[21]:30 f.), his faithfulness (Ps. 30[29]:9), his wondrous deeds (Ps. 71:[70]:17), his steadfast love (Ps. 92:2 [91:3]). He himself, the Lord, proclaims what is to come: "Behold, the former things have come to pass, and new things I now declare; before they spring forth I tell you of them" (Isa. 42:9; cf. 46:10). This is something idols cannot do (Isa. 44:7 ff.). It is above all the → prophets, the chosen messengers, who make known the saving acts of God among his people and in all the earth (Isa. 12:5), who proclaim his will (Mic. 6:8) and announce what is to come. The latter idea, the announcement of eschatological events, is one that comes strongly into focus in intertestamental writings (cf. the Lat. adhuntiare of 2 Esd. Vulg.) One or two texts indicate that the prophets of the OT were even called angeloi (→ Angel), angels (Hag. 1:13; Mal. 3:1; Moses in Ass. Mos. 11:17 as the magnus nuntius). They make use of the same forms of expression as messengers in the surrounding world of the OT (e.g. the priests of Mari). Thus there is theological content in these expressions wherever in the LXX proclamation or announcement takes place at the behest of Yahweh or in the knowledge of his acts of salvation.

NT 1. In the NT angellō and angelia are only found twice each, and in each case in the Johannine writings (Jn. 4:51 v.l.; 20:18; 1 Jn. 1:5; 3:11). More frequently we find compounds with the same meaning: anangellō (13 times, 5 of which are Johannine and 5 in Acts); apangellō (46 times, 27 of these in Luke/Acts); and katangellō (18 times, of which 11 are in Acts and 7 in Paul). The other derivatives, as in classical Gk., are only found occasionally in the NT: prokatangellō (Acts 3:18); 7:52); diangellō (Lk. 9:60; Acts 21:26; Rom. 9:17); exangellō (1 Pet. 2:9) and katangeleus (Acts 17:18).

Statistical analysis shows that of the 88 occurrences, 48 are to be found in the Lucan writings, and 12 each in the Johannine literature and Paul.

As in classical usage, an- and apangellō can lose their full meaning and signify simply relate or speak (cf. e.g. Matt. 2:8; 28:11; Lk. 8:20; Acts 16:38). On the other hand, it is not always quite clear whether the etymological sense has been totally disregarded, e.g. in the typical ending of miracle stories (“... and told [apēngeilan] it in the city and in the country”, Mk. 5:14).

2. Usually the words of this group mean proclamation in a special, technical sense: the making known of God’s activity, his will to save. This proclamation, the authority of which is derived from its ultimate source, enters deeply into the life of the messenger and makes total demands upon him. When used in this way, these terms can scarcely be distinguished in meaning from that word which is so central to the NT, euangelizomai, proclaim (good news) (→ Gospel). Thus, for example, 1 Jn. 1:5: “And this is the message [angelia] which we have heard from him and proclaim [anangellomen] to you, that God is light and in him is no darkness at all”; Lk. 9:60: “Leave the dead to bury their dead; but as for you, go and proclaim [diangelle] the kingdom of God.”

(a) It is noticeable, however, that John uses the words of this group exclusively in a theologically pregnant sense, whereas euangelizomai and → kēryssō, a term frequently used in the Synoptic Gospels, Acts and Paul, do not appear in his writings at all. G. Friedrich is of the opinion that John has consciously avoided both expressions, because in contrast to an- and apangellō they emphasize strongly the dramatic, dynamic proclamation of the age of salvation, the heralding of a coming event, an idea which does not fit into John’s realized eschatology (TDNT II 717; cf. III 703). John therefore prefers martyreō, to bear witness: what has already happened, and been seen or experienced, is the subject of → witness. If this is correct, it explains the peculiar nuance which, for instance, anangellō has in the Fourth Gospel: “when he [Messiah] comes, he will show [anangelei] us all things”

(Jn. 4:25); “and he [the Paraclete] will declare [anangelei] to you the things that are to come” (16:13; → Advocate); “he will take what is mine and declare [anangelei] it to you” (16:14). In these passages it is not so much a matter of a proclamation which will bring about its own fulfilment in the shape of an event, nor the announcement and heralding of a new age which is already dawning in the hidden messiah, as the revealing, the reporting of that “which was from the beginning” (1 Jn. 1:1). The believer may go forward with confidence into the darkness of the future, because the full truth of the word will one day be revealed to him by the Spirit. Similarly, in Jn. 16:25 apangelō (“I will tell you plainly”) brings no new subject into view, “Rather, what was once said will become clear in the eschatological existence, for which it was spoken from the beginning” (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 587).

The difference between this and the dynamic, dramatic announcement of the new age, which is conveyed by kēryssō and euangelizomai, is again made very clear in 1 Jn. 1:2 f.: “[we] proclaim [apangellomen] to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us – that which we have seen and heard we proclaim [apangellomen] to you, that you may have fellowship with us.” That which has been heard is being said anew, not in order to say something new, but in order to make effective what has been heard. God is light (1 Jn. 1:5), and therefore the believer is not to walk in darkness (cf. 1:7); to be in the light means to be walking in love. “He who loves his brother abides in the light” (2:10). The content of the proclamation is both information, or “reminding” of the saving event, and commandment. angelia can be thus rendered as message (so RSV) or command in 1 Jn. 1:5: “This is the message [or “command”, angelia] we have heard from him and proclaim [anangellomen] to you, that God is light and in him is no darkness at all”; and 1 Jn. 3:11: “For this is the message [or “command”, angelia] which you have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.”

(b) Luke and Paul use the words in a variety of senses ranging from the simple, somewhat watered down sense of give notice (Acts 21:26, diangelo), inform (2 Cor. 7:7, anangelō), and the more theologically significant give a report (e.g. Acts 14:27; 15:4), to the special meaning of command (Acts 17:30), confess (1 Cor. 14:25), proclaim, declare (e.g. Acts 4:2; 13:5; 26:20; cf. also 1 Pet. 2:9), and finally to the solemn, liturgical type of proclamation which results from the sacred celebration of the → Lord’s Supper. “For as often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim [katangellete] the Lord’s death until he comes” (1 Cor. 11:26). The proclaiming here has been taken to refer to the symbolic action of the breaking of the bread (cf. Augustine, In Ioannis Evangelium Tractatus 80, 3) and the pouring out of the wine, but it probably also includes the recital of the passion narrative in the same way as the story of the exodus was recalled at the celebration of the Passover (cf. C. K. Barrett, A Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 270). The number of different words used in translation demonstrates that the words of our group do not acquire any technical application to a particular form of proclamation. Luke and Paul are, however, in contrast to John, dealing with the proclamation of a completed event or the announcement of a particular one in the future. The subject of the proclamation is new to the hearers (Acts 4:2; 16:17; 1 Cor. 9:14) and becomes operative by being proclaimed (Acts 13:38; 1 Cor. 2:1). If it is at all possible to draw a distinction between this and euangelizomai, it is perhaps that the latter lays the emphasis more upon the eu, i.e. the good, on the God-sent intervention of something joyous into the human scene.

(c) The message of Christ is the message of the Risen One. apangellō becomes, in the resurrection narratives of all four Gospels, a technical term for witness to the resurrection (Matt. 28:8, 10 f.; Mk. 16:10, 13; Lk. 24:9; Jn. 20:18 angellō). The term is here used in its original sense: a messenger (→ Angel) conveys the news, which he has received directly beforehand from the sender of the message (the Risen One, Matt. 28:10; Jn. 20:18; angels, Lk. 24:6 ff.). It is no coincidence that Luke uses the same word in his account of the Transfiguration (9:36): the disciples do not pass on to anybody the message that they have seen Jesus transfigured, i.e. in his resurrection body.

(d) Jesus is proclaimed as the one in whom the prophetic promises (cf. prokat- and katangellō in Acts 3:18, 24) have found fulfilment. Paul opened the Scriptures to them and explained “that it was necessary for the Christ to suffer and to rise again from the dead, . . . saying ‘This Jesus, whom I proclaim to you, is the Christ’ ” (Acts 17:3). It is not surprising, then, that the commission to proclaim is itself backed by a variety of OT quotations (e.g. Rom. 9:17, cf. Exod. 9:16; Rom. 15:21, cf. Isa. 52:15). In the two places where the quotation does not agree with the LXX, Matt. 12:18 ff. (Isa. 42:1–4) and Heb. 2:12 (Ps. 22:22), it is Jesus himself who is the messenger of God. Schniewind conjectures “the influence of Palestinian tradition, i.e. that the Messiah will be the prophet of Dt. 18:15, 18 and the euangelizomenos of Is. 52:7; cf. Jn. 4:25 anangelei, Hb. 3:1 apostolos” (J. Schniewind, TDNT I 67).

(e) Just as the use of these terms varies widely, so does the content of the proclamation differ from case to case. Sometimes the reference is to everyday information, sometimes to repentance (→ Conversion, art. metanoia), → faith → forgiveness of sins, to the totality of the Christian message (→ Word), or to other things.

U. Becker, D. Müller

κηρύσσω κηρύσσω (kēryssō), announce, make known, proclaim (aloud); κήρυξ (kēryx), herald; κήρυγμα (kērygma) proclamation, announcement, preaching, kerygma.

CL 1. The words of this group derive from the noun kēryx, frequent in Homer; cf. Old High German (h)ruod, fame; Old Indian kāruḥ, singer; Old Persian xrauš (whence Aram. kārôz, Dan. 3:4; see OT 2). kēryx denotes the man who is commissioned by his ruler or the state to call out with a clear voice some item of news and so to make it known. Subsequently the vb. kēryssō (first attested Homer, Il. 2, 438) was formed from the noun to describe the activity of the herald, but it is much less common than the noun. By the addition of -ma to the stem keryk- the noun kērygma was later formed (attested in Xen. and Eur.), which is used, like other words of the same form, to describe either the phenomenon of kēryssein, i.e. the ring of the herald’s voice, the act of crying aloud (e.g. Xen., Ages. 1, 33), or, on the other hand, the content of the proclamation thus made, the announcement, edict (Hdt. 3, 52; Aristotle, Oeconomica 2, p. 1349b 36). This content may be anything from a mere report (Eur. Iph. Taur. 239) to an authoritative command (Aristotle, Ath. Pol. 4, 19).

2. The precise meaning of the terms depends upon the function of the kēryx in the historical period in question (cf. on this the very detailed and widely documented account of G. Friedrich, TDNT III 683–94).

(a) In Homer (e.g. Il. 3, 118, 248; 7, 276) kēryx is used of the attendants of a prince who perform duties which are in keeping with the rôle of senior court officials, whose task is to care for the personal well-being of the prince and of his guests (like cupbearer, adjutant, steward, e.g. Od. 1, 143 ff.). They are, however, raised above the status of the rest of the retinue by the respect accorded to them, and by a status similar to that of friends (Od. 19, 247; hetairos, companion, friend; → Brother). The herald's staff, a kind of sceptre, in their hands (Il. 18, 505; Od. 2, 38) makes it clear, as they carry out their commission (to inform or invite), that they are authorized by the prince.

(b) In the period of the polis, the democratic city-state (→ People), the institution was maintained, though it seems at first to have been lessened in significance by the multiplication of types of herald. The particular function of a herald was indicated by the addition of a qualifying adj. or noun in the genitive (thus, there were heralds of the city, of the archons, of the council, of the court, and even of the mysteries and of the gods). Despite the fact that it was sometimes difficult to find free men to do this job, and that some of them appear to have been disparagingly spoken of, the really important fact is the rôle in society which the heralds played. Formally they were servants (we would say messengers, or spokesmen) of certain authorities (Plato, Politicus 290b), whose chief qualification for office was a loud and clear voice; but it was the heralds also who called the soldiers to battle (Homer, Il. 2, 51, 437 ff.) and the full citizens to the assembly (cf. → Church, art. ekklēsia CL). They were responsible for good order in the assembly, and opened it with prayers and sacrifices and announced its end (cf. Aristophanes, Thesmophoriazusae 295 ff.; Acharnenses 45, 173). In public court hearings heralds announced the result of the drawing of lots for the judges, called on the judges to cast their votes, and beforehand asked the people whether anyone had objections to raise about the procedure of the statements of the witnesses. Thus they were, so to speak, responsible for the maintenance of the laws, and so for political and religious order generally. Their sacred, indeed sacrosanct position (Homer calls them angeloi Dios, Il. 1, 334 and angeloi theioi, divine messengers, Il. 10, 315), is even more evident from the fact that when the kēryx appeared, weapons were stilled, e.g. when heralds from one city invite all Greece to a festival in honour of the gods (Soph., Aj. 1240), and in the course of it they were responsible for the religious opening and the proclamation of victors and prizes. The herald who came to the enemy with a message in time of war must not be touched, since that would be to incur the wrath not only of the one who sent him, but also that of the gods, since it would be a gross asebeia, i.e. transgression of the religious and moral order (Dem., 12, 4; cf. the statement of Achilles in Homer, Il. 1,334). It is probably because of this position, guaranteed by the universally recognized moral and religious law, that heralds occasionally functioned as political ambassadors, or at least went out before them (Dem., 19, 163).

The following general characteristics may therefore be listed. The kēryx was always under the authority of someone else, whose spokesman he was. He himself was immune. He conveyed the message and intention of his master. He had, therefore, unlike for example the presbys, envoy (→ Bishop), no liberty of his own to negotiate. His office had in every case an official character, even when he appeared in the market-place as a public middleman or auctioneer (e.g. Hdt., 6, 121). He was, therefore, also the announcer of judicial verdicts. What he announced became valid by the act of proclamation. The binding, commanding and settling nature of this proclamation distinguishes kēryssō and its cognates from → angellō and its compounds, which refer rather to the imparting of information, or making of an offer.

3. With the relaxation of the rigid order of the polis, the Stoics were provided with the opportunity for giving a quite different interpretation to the office of kēryx, after it had largely lost its significance for society. In addition to the political authorities, the Eleusinian mysteries already possessed their special heralds, who carried out liturgical functions in the cult, took over responsibility for the announcements, and together with the priests exercised great influence; and to Hermes had been attributed the function of a herald sent to men by the gods. Epictetus (Dissertationes 3, 22, 13 ff.) saw the real kēryx of his day in the Cynic philosopher, who moved around the country as a messenger of the gods and guardian of the moral order (kataskopos, Dissertationes 3, 22, 69). Without means of his own, and totally dedicated to his task, he came to denounce the way of life of his contemporaries and to call them to repentance, reformation of life, and concern about salvation. These preachers of → virtue, who deliberately dissociated themselves from every religious observance, laying all their emphasis upon integrity in everyday living and on an inner, higher peace (Epictetus, Dissertationes 3, 22, 9 ff.), dissolved religion, morality and philosophy into a single whole. They prepared the stage on which later the messengers of the gospel of Jesus Christ were to stand. How close the message of the latter could on occasion seem to Stoic preaching, both in language and in content, may be seen from the remarks which for instance Paul has to make in 1 Thess. 2:3 ff., in order to make the distinction clear.

OR 1. (a) In striking contrast to the generality of Gk. literature, the noun kēryx occurs only four times altogether in the LXX, and in three of these instances without a Heb. equivalent. Even here it never refers to a Jewish institution or person, but to foreign ones: in Gen. 41:43 (where the LXX has paraphrased the Heb. qārâh as ekēryxen . . . kēryx, a herald called out before him . . .), the reference is to the function of a servant of Pharaoh; in Dan. 3:4 it is Nebuchadnezzar's herald who calls the people to worship the image; in 4 Macc. 6:4 it is the herald of Antiochus IV; and in Sir. 20:15 the figure of a herald is used metaphorically for the raising of the voice. In Gen. 41 and Dan. the emphasis is upon the vb. kēryssō, which appears in addition to the noun.

All this is evidence that a figure comparable to the Gk. kēryx was unknown in Israel, and that it was clearly not appropriate to describe the → prophets in this way.

(b) As far as the vb. kēryssō is concerned, the picture is a little different. The LXX uses the word 29 times, usually to render the Heb. qārâh; but in Jon. 3:7 for zā'âq, to → cry; and in Hos. 5:8, Joel 2:1, Zeph. 3:14, Zech. 9:9, for the high. of rûa', which refers to a loud cry (in the first two instances, the cry of alarm raised or accompanied by instruments, both times on the mountain; in the other two, the triumphant battle-cry or shout of victory). In Exod. 36:6 and 2 Chr. 36:22, kēryssō is used for an announcement (Heb. qôl, voice) made throughout the camp by Moses, and throughout the kingdom by Cyrus, the Persian king.

Since, however, qārâh is found over 650 times in the OT and is usually translated in the LXX by kaleō, to → call, or ek kaleō, to call forth, we have to ask for what special kind of calling the vb. kēryssō is used in the translation. If we leave aside Zech. 9:9 and Zeph. 3:14, as being special cases, we may say that the word is used only for three classic functions of the herald: (i) for the proclamation of a cultic festival (Exod. 32:5; 2 Ki. 10:20; 2 Chr. 30:5; also Dan. 3:4 LXX, of the cultic call to worship made by the Babylonian herald; → Feast), or → fast (2 Chr. 20:3; Joel 1:14; 2:15; also Jon. 3:5, 7, by the citizens or the king of → Nineveh); (ii) for the orders of the military commander in the field, or a decree of the prince, which have to be proclaimed (Exod. 36:6; 2 Chr. 24:9; also the apocryphal passages 1 Esd 2:2, the decree of Cyrus that the Jews should return and the temple be rebuilt; and 9:3, Ezra's command to the Jews; 1 Macc. 5:49[51], Judas' command to attack Ephron); (iii) for the proclamation of → judgment (Hos. 5:8; Joel 3:9; Jon. 3:2, 4) or of Yahweh's day of judgment (Joel 2:1), or in Isa. 61:1 the announcement of liberty to captives; in this category also, following classical usage, belongs the proclamation of the rehabilitation of those accused (Mordecai, Est. 6:9, 11; Jonathan, 1 Macc. 10:63 f.).

Prov. 1:21, 8:1 and 9:3 belong in a special category of their own. These are the passages in which → wisdom cries out with a loud voice, in a way comparable with the Stoic use of the word. In Mic. 3:5 kēryssō is used to render the false prophets' proclamation of peace. The noun kērygma is found once in each of the above categories, describing the content of what is proclaimed (2 Chr. 30:5; 1 Esd. 9:3; Jon. 3:2; Prov. 9:3). Categories (i) and (ii) move within the familiar framework of orders given by human authorities; but all the prophetic passages mentioned under (iii) speak of the proclamation of a judgment of Yahweh. The number of references is, however, relatively small, a fact which confirms that the caution with which the OT makes use of the noun also applies to the vb. The latter never becomes a term of central importance in the OT's proclamation of salvation; this purpose is served by other vbs. (e.g. angellō).

2. In Jewish writings outside the OT, the noun kārôz, herald, public crier, probably a word borrowed from the Persian, is found frequently in the rabbis. Josephus' use of kēryx corresponds to the classical Gk. usage, when reference is made to the conveying of military commands, and to diplomatic missions (cf. Ant. 10, 75; War 2, 624; 3, 92). In Philo, on the other hand, the words are found only here and there, and then as a technical term for the utterances of the OT prophets (cf. K. Goldammer, ZNW 48, 1957, 80). In rabbinic literature both the noun and the vb. appear, where an announcement (e.g. Shabbath 15d, 38) or a judicial verdict (Sanhedrin 6:1; Sanhedrin 43a) is publicly proclaimed; and also for the public announcement of rabbinic decisions on doctrine when these are relevant to the keeping of the law (Rosh ha-Shanah 21a), and to describe the one who is commissioned by the rabbi to make known instructions for conduct during the synagogue service (Berakoth 7c, 59). Sometimes, the sound of the bat-qôl, the voice from heaven (→ Word, art. phônē, OT 3), is linked with kāraz, call together, call out, announce. On the whole, however, the term which is found relatively often, is used in a technical and formal way. It is used to introduce rabbinic decisions on doctrine, or the citation of scripture.

3. In the literature of Qumran the vb. sāpar, to tell, recount, which can sometimes come close in meaning to the Gk. kēryssō, occurs fairly frequently in the Hymns. Here, of course, it is used of the congregation's, or the individual worshipper's, act of witnessing and proclaiming in praise of God, recording the wonderful works of Yahweh (e.g. IQH 3:20; 10:20), or his honour (IQH 11:6), majesty (IQH 12:30), patience and mercy (IQH 17:17; 18:14). Occasionally also God's own proclamation is spoken of, e.g., in his creation and his deeds (IQH 1:12; 13:11).

NT 1. The first noticeable feature in the NT is that, in keeping with the LXX, it uses the noun kēryx only 3 times, and that in later writings (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; 2 Pet. 2:5). kērygma, too, is found relatively seldom: in Paul, for the message of Christ which he proclaims (Rom. 16:25, kērygma Iēsou Christou), or his preaching generally (in 1 Cor. 2:4; 15:14 with possessive pronouns; cf. 1 Cor. 1:21); more formalized in 2 Tim. 4:17 and Tit. 1:3; and finally in Matt. 12:41 par. Lk. 11:32, for the message of → Jonah to → Nineveh.

The vb. kēryssō, on the other hand, is found relatively frequently (61 times). It occurs 19 times in the Pauline epistles including Col., and 1 and 2 Tim.; 8 times in Acts; 9 times each in Matt. and Lk.; 14 times in Mk.; and once each in 1 Pet. and Rev. It is notable for its total absence in the Johannine writings, Heb. and Jas. An analysis of the grammatical object of the vb. reveals that in early passages of Paul (1 Thess. 2:9; Gal. 2:2; but cf. also Col. 1:23) and in some Marcan (Mk. 1:14; 13:10; 14:9) and Matthean (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14; 26:13) contexts the object is to euangelion, the → gospel; while in the Corinthian letters (1 Cor. 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor. 1:19; 11:4), Phil. 1:15 and Acts 8:5; 9:20; 19:13 it is Christos (4 times), Iēsous (3 times) or Christ Jesus who is proclaimed. John the Baptist proclaimed the baptisma metanoias eis apheisin hamartiōn, "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins" (Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3; cf. Acts 10:37; → Baptism). For Luke the basileia, → kingdom, is the object of proclamation (Lk. 8:1; 9:2; Acts 20:25; 28:31); for Matthew, too, the kingdom is the actual content of the gospel which is proclaimed (cf. Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14).

2. (a) This evidence makes it quite clear that, no doubt deliberately, the NT witnesses, following other streams of Judaism, avoided identifying themselves or the messengers of Jesus with the Gk. institution of the kēryx, open as it was to such a wide variety of interpretation. Only in the later passages 1 Tim. 2:7 and 2 Tim. 1:11 (leaving aside the description of → Noah as a kēryx of righteousness in 2 Pet. 2:5), is the word introduced, and then in combination with apostolos, → apostle, which qualifies it. This is probably to be explained by the stronger tendency of the church to think in terms of institutions at a time when the eschatological aspect was diminishing in importance, and the church was adjusting herself to a permanent existence in the world. (On this whole question → Present: The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT.) But even these two texts still reveal the basic difference between the biblical viewpoint and that of the surrounding world: it is not the institution or the person to which importance is attached, but only the effective act of proclamation. This appears to be the reason why the establishment of a definite, protected, official position was avoided by not using the noun which was ready to hand. This is confirmed by the fact that Jn., who in similar contexts prefers the vb. martyreō, to witness, uses the noun martyria, testimony, but not martys, a witness (→ Witness, NT 4). Even in the case of the unusual description of Noah as a kēryx, the writer is hardly thinking of an office but rather of the sign constituted by Noah's actions as a whole.

(b) A similar finding results from a study of the term kērygma, proclamation, in the NT. Where it is used, in Matt. 12:41 par. Lk. 11:32 for the kērygma of → Jonah, it undoubtedly includes also the content of Jonah's message to Nineveh. But the emphasis probably lies much more on the carrying out by Jonah of a divine commission: the delivery of a message containing not only a threat of judgment but also an invitation to repentance and salvation. Similarly Matt. 3:3 par. Mk. 1:3, Lk. 3:4 cites Isa. 40:3: "the voice of one crying [boōntos]. . ." (→ Cry, art. boāō). In the three texts accepted as Pauline (1 Cor. 1:21; 2:4; 15:14), this emphasis is even more obvious. Though it may not be clear where dia tēs mōrias, by the foolishness (1:21), refers to content or to means of delivery, it must be said that ouk en peithois sophias logois, "not in plausible words of wisdom" (2:4), goes further in the direction of describing the apostle's manner of speaking; and similarly that 15:14 has in mind the apostle's activity of preaching just as much as the content of his message. In Rom. 16:25 kērygma, message, is already becoming hypostasized: it is Christ-preaching, as carried out by Paul. Furthest of all along this line goes 2 Tim. 4:17. "But the Lord stood by me and gave me strength to proclaim the word fully [hina di' emou to kērygma plērophorēthē], that all the Gentiles might hear it." Here the kērygma is the actual act of proclamation, which has need of the particular messenger only in order, as it were, to complete it and give it concrete fulfilment (→ Fullness, art. plēroō). Tit. 1:3 is similar: "and at the proper time manifested in his word through the preaching with which I have been entrusted [ton logon autou en kērygmati ho episteuthēn] by command of God our Saviour."

(c) The nouns of this group are thus used in the NT generally to express the form of activity: what the kērygma is, what the content that it makes known, can be seen only from the context in each case. The NT is therefore as faithful to the original meaning of the word as is the OT. kērygma is the phenomenon of a call which goes out and makes a claim upon the hearers: it corresponds to the life and activity of the prophets. The idea that in terms of content it "can or must be as it were the 'evangelical' substance of the Christian message, the nuclear revelation after the mythical has been eliminated" cannot be established from the NT (K. Goldammer, ZNW 48, 1957, 96). The qualitative concept of kērygma, as it appears in the mid-twentieth-century theology of R. Bultmann and his school, is the product of theological reflection. It takes up the language of the NT, but uses the word in a sense which is at most marginally present in the NT. If we seek the origin of this usage, we may find it in the 4th cent. Athanasius, who, after centuries in which the word had been used in the most various of ways, was probably the first to use it in the full sense of Christian or church doctrine (De Decretis Nicaenae Synodi 26, 7; cf. K. Goldammer, ibid.)

3. (a) The NT's completely predominant conception of proclamation as a process and event, whose content can only be determined by closer definition, is confirmed by the considerably greater frequency with which the vb. is used in comparison with the nouns. kēryssō is one of a number of formal verbs of telling and communication, which connote a certain means of communication but are not limited as to the content (e.g. didaskō, to teach; angellō, to report, together with its compounds; legō, to say; homologeō, to confess; martyreō, to bear witness, with its compounds; euangelizomai, to preach; gnōrizō, to make known; and others (cf. G. Friedrich, TDNT III 703). The wide range of words used in the NT indicates that none of the vbs. gained a position of clear dominance or was able to become a technical term.

Just how fluid the terminology was is seen from the fact that Paul in 1 Thess. 2:2, 9, describes his ministry in the same context as lalēsai . . . to euangelion, “to tell . . . the gospel”, and as ekēryxamen . . . to euangelion, “we proclaimed . . . the gospel”; while in Phil. 1:18 he expresses this same act of proclamation by the vb. katangellō. Similarly, Luke in Lk. 4:43 (par. Mk. 1:38) and Lk. 9:6 (par. Mk. 6:12) replaces the Marcan kēryssō by euangelizō. But in Lk. 8:1 he uses both vbs. synonymously side by side, and in Lk. 6:13 (par. Mk. 3:14) he appears to have subsumed the kēryssein which Mark expressly mentions into the term → apostle.

The nearest the NT comes to the classical figure of the herald is in Rev. 5:2, where the angel makes a proclamation with a mighty voice, and 1 Pet. 3:19, where the voice of the Crucified rings out in Hades (here the vb. is used on its own without an object). (For alternative interpretations of the latter passage → Flesh, art. sarx, NT 2 (a); → also Hell.) But Matt. 10:27 par. Lk. 12:3, where proclaiming from the roof-tops is a reference to the public revelation of what has hitherto been secret and hidden, ought also to be mentioned in this context.

(b) Traces of the original meaning of the word are also to be found here and there in Paul. In Rom. 2:21 he addresses those who make a demand that men should not steal, and yet do it themselves: “While you preach against stealing, do you steal [ho kēryssōn mē kleptein klepteis]?”. Here kēryssōn may be compared with the Stoic sense of proclamation of a definite commandment which demands obedience. There is a similar thought in 1 Cor. 9:27. The call to a certain course of action or behaviour, though it is not here a matter of ethics, is also expressed by the vb. in Gal. 5:11, where Paul is dissociating himself from the continuing proclamation of circumcision, i.e. the propagation of conversion to Judaism as an expression of obedience to the only God.

Positively Paul sees himself as one who proclaims to euangelion tou theou, the → gospel of God (1 Thess. 2:9), among the Gentiles (Gal. 2:2), something which can be done only if it is accompanied by a total giving of his own person (1 Thess. 2:8). For Paul proclamation is not, as with Jonah, a once-for-all cry which might be compared with simply sticking up a poster. The proclamation of the message of Christ, as he understands it, requires unceasing pleading and wooing, with a love that seeks, and is accompanied by a constant care for the individual (cf. the labour and toil by day and night of 1 Thess. 2:9; cf. also 2 Cor. 5:18 ff.). It also involves exhortation (→ Exhort, art. parakaleō), warning (parakalountes), encouragement (→ Comfort, art. paramytheomai), and → witness. In such a context kēryssein appears as the central act of proclamation, which is needed, like the setting up of a signpost, if the → call of God (tou theou tou kalountos hymas, the God who calls you, 1 Thess. 2:12) is to be realized – as it is when the hearers enter upon the kind of life which is worthy (axiōs) of the glory of God which is about to be revealed.

The basis for this invitation (i.e. its content and origin) may be discovered from those passages in his later epistles where Paul uses kēryssō, to proclaim. It is Christ, i.e. a person, whom Paul proclaims in this way (1 Cor. 1:23; 15:12; 2 Cor. 1:19; 4:5; Phil. 1:15; cf. 2 Cor. 11:4 Iēsoun, Jesus). It is in fact the crucified Christ (1 Cor. 1:23; cf. 2:2), that is the death of this Jesus, which is presented in this proclamation as the basis of life. It is the Christ in whom Paul sees all the previous → promises of God as being fulfilled and taking concrete form (2 Cor. 1:20). It is the Christ to whom Paul bears witness on the ground of the tradition handed down to him (→ Teach, art. paradidōmi), but also on the ground of his own experience (1 Cor. 15:3–8), as the one who appeared to his own after his death, as the Risen One (→ Resurrection). 1 Cor. 15:1 f. leaves no doubt that the → death of Jesus for the sin of others, and his presence and exaltation, made possible only by this means (cf. Phil. 2:8–11), formed the central content of what Paul preached as the saving and world-changing message (1 Cor. 15:12). According to 1 Thess. 4:13 ff., the promise of the general resurrection and of the parousia, i.e. the presence, of Jesus also form part of it (→ Present). W. Baird (JBL 76, 187) is probably right when he points out that (according to Gal. 1:11–17) it is not the facts and doctrines which had already been formulated in the pre-Pauline era which characterize Paul's proclamation, but the preaching of Jesus as the Son, raised to life, of which Paul had become convinced through revelation. If such a teaching be regarded as mythological, it will be difficult to disentangle the gospel from it completely without at the same time altering the gospel's content.

The act of proclamation is ultimately a prerequisite of → faith, inasmuch as it has as its goal not simply the imparting of information or a formal allegiance, but a faith which involves self-surrender and trust (cf. 1 Cor. 15:11). Therefore, Paul sees proclamation as legitimate and possible only where a commission and authority has been given (Rom. 10:8 ff.; cf. Rom. 10:15 with Acts 13:3 and Isa. 52:10). This means that Christ is not merely an object of proclamation, but also the subject, who has authority over it. He himself is the one who commands the proclamation, who at the same time wills to be present, and allows the hearers to experience him in and through such human proclamation (cf. Gal. 3:1).

(c) The Synoptic Gospels all use kēryssō for the activity of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:1; Mk. 1:4; Lk. 3:3), indicating, as the allusion to Isa. 40:3 also shows, that he is the last of the → prophets (→ Cry, art. boaō). Mk. sums up his preaching as that of a baptisma metanoias eis aphasin hamartiōn, "baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins." The phrase includes both the means and the end. Matt. and Lk. develop this further with some examples of his teaching. All three Gospels record, however, that the Baptist's preaching extended to the announcement of the coming Stronger One (ischyroteros), through whose Spirit-baptism a new order will begin (Matt. 3:11 par. Mk. 1:7, Lk. 3:16; cf. Jn. 1:26 f.).

(i) Matthew inserts at this point (Matt. 3:2), as the factor which legitimates and motivates John's kēryssein, the sentence ēngiken gar hē basileia tōn ouranōn, "for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This means that John's call to repentance is set against the background of the promised lordship of Christ. This is why it is taken up by Jesus in exactly the same words (Matt. 4:17), and is emphasized at Matt.

10:7 as the centre of the message the disciples are to proclaim, which begins as they are sent out. Jesus himself thus moves into the area, as it were, between the Testaments, into the centre of time. Just as the prophets, represented by John, have pointed forward to his coming, before he himself establishes the signs of the basileia (cf. the summaries in Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 11:1), so the disciples bear witness to its dawning, as something that has already happened and is now present in their proclamation (“He who receives you, receives me”, Matt. 10:40; cf. 24:12). The content of the kēryssein remains the same – a proclamation of the Lordship of Christ. But the form and perspective of the preaching is conditioned by its setting in history (and in the history of salvation).

It is to be observed that Matt. is the only evangelist to use the term kēryssein exclusively in reference to the ministry of John, Jesus, and the disciples expressly sent out by him. He thus underlines the binding, almost judicial and official character of the proclamation, which, in contrast to didaskein, to teach, takes place not only in the synagogues but also in the wilderness and the villages, in short even outside the traditional limits of the community and the places and meetings where it might be expected, even among the Gentiles (Matt. 24:14, throughout the whole inhabited world).

(ii) No such systematization can be found in Mark. Here too the line may indeed be followed from John (Mk. 1:4, 7), through Jesus (Mk. 1:38 f.), to the commissioned disciples (Mk. 3:14; cf. 6:12). Likewise the extension of the sphere of proclamation from Israel to the Gentiles is noted in the so-called “Little Apocalypse” (Mk. 13:10; cf. Matt. 24:14; on this → Present: The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT, 2 (a)). But Mk. emphasizes the inner power and the necessity of proclamation, rather than its official character. Even before the disciples have been commissioned, those who have been healed proclaim, despite being expressly forbidden to do so. What has happened to them is a result of their encounter with Jesus (Mk. 1:45; 5:20 par. Lk. 8:39; Mk. 7:36). Their encounter with Jesus, their experience of the mercy of God, their own recognition of the dawn of the new age in this Jesus (Mk. 7:37 echoes Isa. 35:5) are enough to compel them to tell others. Without any formal ratification this telling becomes proclamation.

(iii) Finally, Luke (Luke/Acts) taking up the prophetic words of Isa. 61:1 f. in Jesus’ sermon at Nazareth (the place of proclamation is first of all the synagogue: Lk. 4:16, 44; cf. Mk. 1:39) and his declaration that the word has been fulfilled by his coming, describes Jesus as the one who both proclaims and carries through the work of God, and then sends out the disciples to proclaim it (Lk. 10:9 par. Matt. 10:7). When they speak of Christ, they proclaim by that very act the basileia, as God’s new ordering of the things in the world, taking place in and through Jesus (cf. the activity of Philip in Samaria, Acts 8:5, with the description of the work of Paul in Acts 9:20; 20:25; 28:31). Conversely the proclamation of the basileia is tied up with the words and teaching of Jesus (Acts 28:31, didaskōn ta tou kyriou Iēsou Christou, “teaching the things of the Lord Jesus Christ”). Jesus is described as the Son of God (Acts 9:20), as the Risen One (e.g. Acts 2:32; 4:10), the guarantor of resurrection from the dead (Acts 4:2), in whose name alone the → forgiveness of sins which John proclaimed can be realized (Acts 2:38; cf. Lk. 24:47). Acts 15:21 (“from early generations Moses has had in every city those who preach him”, i.e. the law) makes it clear that the proclamation to which kēryssein refers also lays down binding principles of faith and life for the fellowship which it sets up and which is set up in accordance with it. In this respect the vb. goes beyond euangelizomai, a word which Luke uses in an otherwise synonymous sense.

4. We must now ask what is the particular nuance of kēryssō as compared with the other, synonymous words used for the passing on of the message of Christ. Both Luke and Paul prefer the vb. euangelizō when they want to describe the total activity of proclamation (in the case of Lk., katangellō also). But it may also be noted that kēryssō is particularly used when the message of the rule of God as it has dawned in Christ, and of his resurrection, is proclaimed in a particular instance by angels (Lk. 1:19; 2:10) or men (Lk. 3:18; 9:6; Acts 5:42; 8:4 ff.). Here the messengers are not bandying slogans. The proclamation in each case has a thoroughly personal character and the one who proclaims must stake his existence upon it. "If the word has precedence over the text, because the word intended is God's word, as it was heard and could be said in Jesus as God's 'yes' to man, faith has to proclaim this word by repeating Jesus. The task of proclamation is to repeat Jesus" (E. Fuchs, Studies of the Historical Jesus, SBT 42, 1964, 200). The vb. keryssō characterizes the concrete proclamation of the message in a particular instance, with special reference to the claim that is being made, and its authority to set up a new order. It includes information, but is always more than mere instruction or a bare offer, and is equally distinct from the communication of philosophical teaching or general → wisdom. kēryssō sets a standard, to ignore which is not simply indifference but refusal.

At the same time the conveying of the message of Christ does not consist solely in kēryssein, as Matt., who has given the vb. its firmest position, makes clear. He describes the work of Jesus as didaskōn . . . kai keryssōn . . . kai therapeuōn, "teaching . . . and preaching . . . and healing" (Matt. 4:23; 9:35). The description of the disciples' work follows the same pattern, albeit without didaskōn (Matt. 10:7 ff.; cf. Mk. 3:14 f.; 6:12 f.). For Matt. significantly, Jesus alone is the teacher, apart from the OT quotation in Matt. 15:9. The word does not appear in connexion with the disciples until the great commission of Matt. 28:20. All this is to say that the event of proclamation is surrounded by objective instruction and by events and actions which symbolically make known the dawn and the power of the new age. It is not only the proclamation of the new age, but it makes space for the latter to grow. This, and probably only this, provides the protection against blind fascination, on the one hand, and against spiritualization and idealization, on the other.

L. Coenen

The Structure and Content of the Early Kerygma

The subject of the kerygma has never been far from the forefront of critical discussion for the past half-century. It was virtually an axiom of Bultmann and his school that the primitive church was deeply interested in the Christ of the kerygma but cared little for the historical Jesus (cf. R. Bultmann, "The Significance of the Historical Jesus for the Theology of Paul", in Faith and Understanding, I, 1969, 220–46; New Testament Theology, I, 1952, 33–183; and "The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus", in C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, eds., The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, 1964, 15–42). This was bound up with two wider theological positions. On the one hand, there was the philosophical and dogmatic conviction that the knowledge of God is on a different plane from the knowledge of facts which, of course, include historical facts. On the other hand, it was related to a sceptical approach to form criticism which maintained that careful analysis of the literary forms detected within the NT writings showed a lack of interest in historical questions (cf. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, [1921] ET 1968²; M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, [1933] ET [1934] 1971; K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu. Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Überlieferung, [1919] 1964). It was argued that the first Christians were so absorbed by the thought of the Risen Christ and the parousia that they had no concern for biographical details of Jesus. Such an interest developed later on with second and third generation Christians.

W. Schmithals has argued that gospel traditions remained unknown or virtually apocryphal until the time of Justin Martyr ("Paulus und der historische Jesus", ZNW 53, 1962, 145 ff.). Within the ranks of Bultmann's disciples E. Käsemann signalled a return of interest in the historical Jesus in a lecture delivered in 1953 on "The Problem of the Historical Jesus" (Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 15–47). The considerable debate which followed focused on the question of the relationship between the kerygma and the historical Jesus and the adequacy of the existentialist interpretation of history. Moreover, interest in form criticism has given way to interest in redaction criticism and tradition criticism investigating the treatment of the hypothetical sources and traditions at various stages of alleged development. For discussions see J. M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus, SBT 25, 1959; J. Rohde, Rediscovering the Teaching of the Evangelists, 1968; N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus, 1967; and What is Redaction Criticism?, 1970; R. H. Fuller, The Foundations of New Testament Christology, 1965; R. S. Barbour, Traditio-Historical Criticism of the Gospels, 1972; and more briefly G. N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 27, 1974, 1–12.

Käsemann contends that the Gospels are a (late) reaction to early Christian enthusiasm which at least partly overlooked the earthly Jesus ("Blind Alleys in the 'Jesus of History' Controversy", New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 23–66). Others see a difference of interest in the separation of Gentile and Jewish Christianity, but with apparently contradictory results. G. Ebeling suggests that cultured Hellenistic circles would have appreciated a biographical presentation of Jesus especially as the presuppositions of OT thought and Jewish apocalypticism were less strong for them (Theology and Proclamation, 1966, 133). But U. Wilckens believes that the Hellenistic churches, including Paul, preached a Christ-kerygma which knew virtually nothing about the teaching and ministry of Jesus. The latter remained the preserve of Jewish Christians in Palestine; only later did the traditions about Jesus penetrate the Hellenistic churches ("Tradition de Jésus et Kérygme du Christ: La Double Histoire de la Tradition au Sein du Christianisme Primitif", Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 47, 1967, 1–20; "Hellenistisch-christliche Missionsüberlieferung und Jesustradition", TLZ 89, 1964, 518 ff.). Similar views have been argued by S. G. F. Brandon, The Fall of Jerusalem, 1951; P. Vielhauer, "Ein Weg zur neutestamentlichen Christologie?", EvTh 25, 1965, 24–72; and S. Schulz, "Die neue Frage nach dem historischen Jesus", in H. Balten-sweiler and B. Reicke, eds., Neues Testament und Geschichte. Historisches Geschehen und Deutung im Neuen Testament. Oscar Cullmann zum 70. Geburtstag, 1972, 33 ff. It may be noted in passing that any thesis which posits a sharp cultural and religious difference between Palestinian and Hellenistic Judaism is likely to be subjected to increasingly sharp scrutiny in the light of the growing conviction that Hellenistic culture had pervaded Jewish life more early and more deeply than had been considered. Although the Hellenists formed a separate group in Acts, it is now highly questionable whether these two outlooks can be set in diametrical opposition in the NT period (cf. I. H. Marshall, "Palestinian and Hellenistic Christianity: Some Critical Comments", NTS 19, 1972-73, 271-87; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, I-II, 1974).

A somewhat different approach has been advanced by Scandinavian scholars. H. Riesenfeld argues that the origin of the gospel tradition goes back to Jesus' own messianic consciousness ("The Gospel Tradition and its Beginnings", StudEv, I, 1959, 43-65; reprinted as a separate paper, 1957, and also in The Gospels Reconsidered: A Selection of Papers read at the International Congress on the Four Gospels in 1957, 1960, 131-54; and The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 1-29). "Jesus is not only the object of a later faith, which on its side gave rise to the growth of oral and also written tradition, but, as Messiah and teacher, Jesus is the object and subject of a tradition of authoritative and holy words which he himself created and entrusted to his disciples for its later transmission in the epoch between his death and the parousia" (The Gospel Tradition, 29). Missionary preaching was not the Sitz im Leben of the gospel traditions (op. cit., 11; on this point he leans on the arguments of C. H. Dodd discussed below). Rather, "the recitation of the tradition about Jesus as the sacred word of the New Covenant was an essential constituent in Christian public worship" (op. cit., 21). The need for authorized transmitters of the text gave rise to the growth of the Christian ministry and in turn led to the production of the Gospels. Jesus himself adopted the methods of a Jewish rabbi, and taught his disciples to learn likewise. In other words, they learned by heart and the Gospels have their ultimate origin in the teaching of Jesus himself.

Riesenfeld's position has been extended by his pupil, B. Gerhardsson, in Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 12, 1961; and Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, Coniectanea Neotestamentica 20, 1964 (in which he replies to criticisms of the earlier work). Gerhardsson made a detailed study of later rabbinic methods of transmitting teaching and suggested that they were employed by Jesus himself. His critics have accused him of reading into the NT period the methods of a later age. They also point out that the Gospels themselves admit of variations in the choice of what is given, the precise wording of common material and the paraenetic interest of the evangelists. However, whilst there are points of substance here and more work needs to be done on teaching methods, this approach at least has the merit of seeking to relate the teaching of Jesus to the life-setting of Jewish teaching. A somewhat different position has been argued by T. Boman in Die Jesus-Überlieferung im Lichte der neueren Volkskunde, 1967. In the light of recent study of the transmission of folklore tradition, he argues that the kerygma tradition proclaimed by the apostles was separate from the gospel traditions which were recounted by a special group of narrators who were subject to the apostles and prophets. But it is not easy to find direct evidence for a separate class of narrators or believe that the two activities could be reserved for different functionaries.

A number of writers have suggested that interest in the life of Jesus in the early church grew out of the need to have an example for Christian conduct in order to supplement the missionary kerygma (cf. A. M. Ramsey, "The Gospel and the Gospels" in StudEv, I, and The Gospels Reconsidered, 99–106; and the discussions of E. J. Tinsley, The Imitation of God in Christ: An Essay in the Biblical Basis of Christian Spirituality, 1960; and "Some Principles for Reconstructing a Doctrine of the Imitation of Christ", SJT 25, 1972, 45–57; E. Larsson, Christus als Vorbild, 1962; H. D. Betz, Nachfolge und Nachahmung Jesu Christi im Neuen Testament, BHTh 37, 1967; → Disciple). But whilst there are traces of this motivation in the NT (cf. 1 Cor. 11:1; 1 Thess. 1:6), G. N. Stanton points out that Jesus did not encourage the disciples to follow him in the ethical sense (op. cit., 8). Rather, following Jesus in the Gospels is a matter of personal commitment to him and preparedness to share his fate (cf. Mk. 8:34; Matt. 10:38 par. Lk. 14:27). Moreover, the vb. to imitate (mimeomai) and the corresponding noun (mimētēs) are not found in the Gospels.

Throughout the debate there have always been those who rejected as a false choice Bultmann's alternative of a kerygmatic Christ and the historical Jesus. It was felt that an interest in the former to the exclusion of the latter was simply unrealistic and that those who responded to the kerygma of the crucified Christ and risen Lord would have wanted to know something of his life, what made him what he was, and how he came to be crucified (cf. E. B. Redlich, Form Criticism: Its Value and Limitations, 1939; D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement, 1948, 30–58; A. M. Ramsey, op. cit.; P. Althaus, The So-Called Kerygma and the Historical Jesus, 1959; R. A. Bartels, Kerygma or Gospel Tradition . . . Which Came First?, 1961; C. F. D. Moule, "Jesus in New Testament Kerygma", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin, 1970, 15–26). Moule takes up a suggestion of G. J. Paul that Mark was taken by Paul on his missionary journeys because his eye-witness reminiscences supplied an element in Paul's preaching which he himself could not supply. "He took, as it were, a 'gospel source' with him, in the form of a person acquainted with the facts" (op. cit., 25; cf. G. J. Paul, St. John's Gospel: A Commentary, 1965, 26). Similarly, the Fourth Gospel complements the Johannine Epistles, in that without it some might conclude that the circle from which the epistles emanated had no concern for the sort of material that the Gospel of Jn. contains. Thus for Moule it is a mistake to assume that the epistles constitute the total kerygma. It is the thesis of G. N. Stanton's work "that there is plenty of evidence which, taken cumulatively, indicates that the early church was interested in the life and character of Jesus and that the primary (though not the only) Sitz im Leben of that interest was the missionary preaching of the church" (op. cit., 9).

Although the distinction is commonly drawn between missionary proclamation (kērygma) and Christian teaching (didachē; → Teach), in practice the two were closely intertwined. It would appear that the confession of Jesus Christ as Lord was a very primitive response to the kerygma and may indeed have been part of the baptismal profession of initiates (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3; Rom. 10:9; with Acts 11:17, 20; 16:31; Col. 2:6; and Acts 8:16; 19:5; 1 Cor. 6:11). At the same time the contexts in which these passages appear indicate that they were also used for teaching. (On the emergence of confessional formulae in the NT see O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions, 1949; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 1950, 6–29; V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions, New Testament Tools and Studies 5, 1963; and E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology, 1955, 235–57.) The following passages contain summaries of the gospel which may well be couched in rhythmical language relating specifically to beliefs about Jesus as the Christ: Rom. 1:3 f.; 8:34; 1 Cor. 15:3 ff.; Phil. 2:6–11; 1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 2:8; 1 Pet. 3:18 ff. Perhaps the following contain echoes of catechetical formulae: Gal. 1:4; 1 Thess. 4:14; 5:9 f. There may also be traces of a formula used in exorcism and healing in Acts 3:6 and 4:10. Two-part formulae which link Jesus with the Father occur in Rom. 8:24; 1 Cor. 8:6; 1 Tim. 2:5 f.; 6:13 f.; 2 Tim. 4:1.

The NT epistles contain a variety of phrases which suggest a corpus of teaching. Among those found in the later writings are: “the faith once delivered to the saints” (Jude 3); “your most holy faith” (Jude 20, implying a body of beliefs); “the pattern of sound words” (2 Tim. 1:13); “the healthy doctrine” (2 Tim. 4:3; Tit. 1:9); “the deposit [tēn parathēkēn]” and “the noble deposit” (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:14); “the faith” (1 Tim. 1:19; Tit. 1:13); “the splendid teaching” (1 Tim. 4:6); “the confession” (Heb. 3:1; 4:14; 10:23); “the elementary doctrines” (Heb. 6:2); “the word of life” (1 Jn. 1:1, though this may refer to Christ rather than the proclamation, cf. Jn. 1:1; but cf. also Acts 5:20; Phil. 2:16). Whilst some scholars take such expressions as evidence of the crystallization of a tradition towards the end of the NT period, there is strong evidence that the process of formulating Christian truth began at a much earlier stage. Thus in one of the earliest of his epistles Paul could write: “hold fast to the traditions [tas paradoseis] which you have been taught” (2 Thess. 2:15). In Rom. Paul could speak of “the pattern of doctrine [typon didachēs]” (Rom. 6:17). To the Corinthians he could insist that his teaching on the Lord’s Supper was no innovation: “For I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you, that the Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took bread” (1 Cor. 11:23). But the element of tradition also extended to the content of Paul’s kerygma: “Now I would remind you, brethren, in what terms I preached to you the gospel [to euangelion ho euēgelisamen], which you received [parelabete], in which you stand, by which you are saved, if you hold it fast – unless you believed in vain. For I delivered [paredōka] to you as of first importance what I also received, that Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures, that he was buried, that he was raised on the third day in accordance with the scriptures, and that he appeared to Cephas, then to the twelve” (1 Cor. 15:1–5). The term “the gospel” also occurs in Rom. 2:16; 16:25; Gal. 2:2; cf. 1 Cor. 15:1). Paul speaks of “the preaching [kērygma]” and the “preaching of Jesus Christ” (Rom. 16:25), not in the sense of the activity of preaching but in that of its content. Similarly “the faith” (Gal. 1:23; Col. 2:7) denotes not simply the act of believing but also what is believed (cf. also Eph. 4:5). In various letters Paul refers to “the word of the cross” (1 Cor. 1:18) or the word of God and of the Lord (1 Cor. 14:36; Gal. 6:6; 1 Thess. 1:6; 2 Thess. 3:1; Phil. 1:14; cf. 1 Pet. 1:25). J. N. D. Kelly comments: “In contradiction to the view that St Paul was a daring doctrinal innovator, virtually the inventor of Catholic theology, all the evidence goes to prove that he had a healthy regard for the objective body of teaching authoritatively handed down in the Church" (op. cit., 10; cf. A. M. Hunter, Paul and his Predecessors, 1940; G. Bornkamm, Paul, 1971; and J. W. Fraser, Jesus and Paul: Paul as Interpreter of Jesus from Harnack to Kümmel, 1974).

In various writings C. H. Dodd endeavoured to go beyond this and establish the structure of apostolic preaching. In "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative" (ExpT 43, 1931–32, 396–400; reprinted in New Testament Studies, 1953, 1–11) Dodd examined K. L. Schmidt's form-critical approach to Mk. which insisted that Mk. was a compilation of separate pericopae transmitted independently. The present arrangement was due to the evangelist himself. Support for this thesis was found by Schmidt in the absence of precise chronological and geographical data and the way in which Mk. regularly introduces episodes by such expressions as "And he . . .", "And they . . .". Whereas Schmidt maintained that Mk.'s editorial cement was historically worthless, Dodd put forward the thesis that, when the generalizing summaries were put together, they formed "a perspicuous outline of the Galilaean Ministry, forming a framework into which the separate pictures are set" (New Testament Studies, 8). Into this framework Mk. arranged his material combining a chronological with a typical order. Dodd then compared this with the summary outlines of Jesus embedded in the primitive teaching in the speeches in Acts (the fullest being Acts 10:37–41 and 13:23–31) and 1 Cor. 15:3–7 and 11:23 ff. (cf. M. Dibelius, op. cit.).

Dodd took the argument further in The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments, 1936, where on the basis of an analysis of certain speeches in Acts (2:14–39; 3:13–26; 4:10 ff.; 5:30 ff.; 10:36–43; 13:16–41) and of passages in Paul (Gal. 3:1, 3 f.; 4:6; 1 Thess. 1:10; 1 Cor. 15:1–7; Rom. 1:1–4; 8:34; 2:16; 10:8 f.) he sought to establish a basic pattern of apostolic kerygma. He observed that three points in the Pauline kerygma do not appear in the kerygma of the Jerusalem church. (i) In the latter Jesus was not called "Son of God"; he is called the holy and righteous servant, drawing on Isa. In Acts Paul is the first to call Jesus the Son of God (Acts 9:20; cf. Rom. 1:1–4), but Dodd suggests that the phrase "Son of God with power" means much the same as "Lord and Christ", both having a messianic significance (op. cit., 25). (ii) The Jerusalem kerygma did not explicitly say that "Christ died for our sins. The result of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ is the forgiveness of sins, but this forgiveness is not specifically connected with Christ's death" (ibid.). (iii) "The Jerusalem kerygma does not assert that the exalted Christ intercedes for us" (ibid.). This may have originated with Paul (cf. Rom. 8:34), but it may be non-Pauline (Heb. 7:25; Matt. 10:32). Dodd concludes: "For the rest, all the points of the Pauline preaching reappear: the Davidic descent of Jesus, guaranteeing His qualification for Messiahship; His death according to the Scriptures; His resurrection according to the Scriptures; His consequent exaltation to the right hand of God as Lord and Christ; His deliverance of men from sin into new life; and His return to consummate the new Age. This coincidence between the apostolic preaching as attested by the speeches in Acts, and as attested by Paul, enables us to carry back its essential elements to a date far earlier than a critical analysis of Acts by itself could justify; for, as we have seen, Paul must have received the tradition very soon after the death of Jesus" (op. cit., 26).

Dodd went on to note a similar outline theology restated in Heb. and 1 Pet. (op. cit., 44 f.; cf. 1 Pet. 1:11, 20; 2:22 f.; 3:18–22; Heb. 2:10, 18; 4:15; 5:7; 9:12, 24; 10:1, 5–9, 20). This is due not so much to Paul's direct influence as to the fact that it reflects the primitive apostolic kerygma generally. But the structure of the apostolic kerygma also sheds light on the structure of the Gospels. Mk. is an expanded form of the kerygma in which the ministry of Jesus is narrated as a preface to the passion story and the passion story is set within a framework of fulfilment (op. cit., 47 ff.; cf. Mk. 1:1). Like the speeches in Acts, Mk. is concerned especially with the acts of Jesus. The teaching of Jesus is kept to a bare minimum in Mk. Matt. and Lk. modify the perspective, because they combine didachē with kērygma (op. cit., 52 ff.). They do, however, include the Davidic descent in their genealogies which Mk. omits (cf. Matt. 1:1, 17; Lk. 2:4; 3:31). "In the Fourth Gospel we can discern, no less clearly than in Mark, and even more clearly than in Matthew and Luke, the fixed outline of the historical section of the kerygma as we have it in Acts x and xiii: the ministry of John the Baptist, the 'anointing' of Jesus with the Holy Spirit, His teaching and works of mercy and power in Galilee; His ministry in Judea and Jerusalem, His arrest and trial before Pilate, His crucifixion, burial, and resurrection" (op. cit., 69). "It is in the Fourth Gospel, which in form and expression, as probably in date, stands farthest from the original tradition of teaching, that we have the most penetrating exposition of its central meaning" (op. cit., 75).

Independently of Dodd, M. Dibelius put forward a case for tracing the speeches in the opening chapters of Acts to primitive material though he ascribed much less historical value to them ("The Speeches in Acts and Ancient Historiography", in Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, 1956, 138–85). Dodd's whole line of approach has met with considerable opposition particularly among those who adopt a redaction-critical approach. E. Haenchen endorses without further argument the view that U. Wilckens "has proved against Dibelius and Dodd that Peter's speeches in the first part of Acts do not contain any old pattern of Jewish-Christian missionary preaching" (The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 129 f.; cf. U. Wilckens, Die Missionsreden der Apostelgeschichte, 1963²). Rather Luke is here using his pattern of the Gentile Christian missionary preaching to present the early Christian mission. This criticism reflects the outlook that Luke was the inventor of the Christian historical perspective in the early church, following the decline of parousia expectation. (For a statement and critique of this position → Present; and for a critique of Wilckens's specific arguments see G. N. Stanton, op. cit., 19–30.)

Dodd's argument has also come under fire from D. E. Nineham in "The Order of Events in St. Mark's Gospel – an Examination of Dr. Dodd's Hypothesis" (in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, 1955, 223–41). Nineham takes up Schmidt's original position that Mk. is made up of disconnected units, claiming that the proposed outline is so brief and the units themselves contain so little internal evidence of chronology that a chronological arrangement lacks any substantial base (op. cit., 226). With regard to the speeches in Acts, Nineham tries to force a dilemma. "On the one hand, if the speeches in the early part of Acts reflect genuine historical reminiscence of what was said by the Apostles, then they can afford no evidence for the existence of a formal outline account of the ministry; for it can hardly be supposed that the original Apostles were dependent on any such traditional outline; they had their own memories. If, on the other hand (and this seems more probable to many scholars), these speeches were produced by the author of Acts as a general summary of the sort of thing likely to have been said, after the Thucydidean model, then the outline of the ministry contained in them can have no independent evidential value; for it may have been derived by St. Luke from St. Mark's gospel, which we know him to have had before him. And this point is not affected if it be conceded that St. Luke used sources in the compilation of these speeches, for it still remains true, that, in the form in which we have them, these speeches have passed through the medium of St. Luke's mind, and St. Luke intended Acts to be read as a complement to the gospel he had just finished writing" (op. cit., 229).

Nineham's argument is, however, less telling than might appear at first sight. The first half of his dilemma has the logical defect of a heads-I-win-tails-you-lose-argument, for it dismisses without argument the possibility that the summaries of the Acts speeches could be based on "genuine historical reminiscence" and at the same time afford "evidence for the existence of a formal outline account of the ministry". It is an a priori rejection of the possibility that the speeches could be both. It further overlooks the fact that the speeches in question are attributed to Peter, except that in Acts 13 which is attributed to Paul. What we have is material ostensibly based on Peter's memory giving Peter's kerygma together with that of Paul which (as we have seen above) he claimed to have received on authority and to have transmitted faithfully. Nineham's argument leaves untouched the possibility that Peter, either by himself or in conjunction with others, developed a kerygmatic outline which formed the core of his proclamation and which was adapted by others in the way that Dodd suggests. Furthermore, this could have bearing on the interpretation of the testimony of Papias that "Mark, indeed, having been the interpreter of Peter, wrote accurately, howbeit not in order, all that he recalled of what was either said or done by the Lord" (Eusebius, HE 3, 39, 15). Nineham has a point of substance when he claims that Mk. does not necessarily give a chronological account of the acts of Jesus, but the outline framework of Mk.'s Gospel may well reflect the kerygma of Peter.

The accounts of the preaching in Acts are clearly summaries and do not give everything that the speaker said. They also are clearly used by Lk. with an apologetic intent, having a part in the total purpose and structure of Acts. On the other hand, it does not follow from this that they were freely constructed on the model of uncritical ancient history, or that they have no independent evidential value. There is in Nineham's argument the same logical defect as before. Any similarity with Mk. is assumed to be derived from direct borrowing. The alternative possibility that the Gospel and the speeches in Acts might have a common origin in the kerygma cannot simply be swept aside because of the fact that they were edited in the process. Although the Thucydidean model is frequently appealed to by scholars who are content with a low estimate of the historical value of Acts, it does not actually support the idea that speeches were irresponsibly composed to fill gaps, support the author's contentions, or to show off his style. Thucydides himself wrote: "As to the speeches which were made before or during the war, it was hard for me, and for others who reported them to me, to recollect the exact words. I have therefore put into the mouth of each speaker the sentiments proper to the occasion, expressed as I thought he would be likely to express them, while at the same time I endeavoured, as nearly as I could, to give the general purport of what was actually said" (History of the Peloponnesian War 1, 22, 1). The burden here is on accuracy rather than rhetoric. If Luke had this model in mind it would suggest a conscientious endeavour to give an accurate summary. On the other hand, Lk. is more indebted to the OT tradition of historiography tracing the activity of God in historical events (cf. I. H. Marshall, Luke: Historian and Theologian, 1970, 56). Moreover, the Greek of the speeches in Acts seems hardly designed to show off the writer's style; if anything, it is inferior to the rest of Lk.'s writings. The absence of Semitisms in the speeches does not settle the matter one way or the other (cf. M. Wilcox, The Semitisms of Acts, 1965, 165–71). (Wilcox allows that the credal elements in Acts may go back to Gk. written sources, oral tradition or Lucan composition, though he himself favours an earlier separate existence.) We do, however, have evidence of Lk.'s use of Mk., and where we can compare such reproduction of teaching (as in Lk. 21 par. Mk. 13), there is evidence of editing but not of free invention or substantial change. It is possible that the OT quotations in the speeches go back to a book of testimonia. The christology of the speeches is relatively primitive, as compared with the developed christologies of the later NT epistles. Finally, the reference to the "house of Israel" (Acts 2:36) and the hope that Israel as a nation will be saved suggests an early dating.

Perhaps it may be added that the speech of Stephen in Acts 7, which reviews Israelite history without actually describing the saving events of Christ's death and resurrection, constitutes an interesting commentary on the debate. For this speech does not contain the same kerygmatic features as the speeches attributed to Peter and Paul. On the other hand, Stephen was not an apostle but belonged to the Hellenists (cf. Acts 6:5, 8–15) who constituted a separate group, though his preaching ministry does not seem to have been confined to any particular group. Paul, however, associated himself with the apostles at Jerusalem and even disputed with the unbelieving Hellenists (Acts 9:26–30). The different emphases of Paul and Stephen would accord with Dodd's account of the kerygma. Similarly, Paul's Areopagus address in Acts 17 was a deliberate departure from his earlier preaching. For whereas the speech of Acts 13:16–41 was addressed to Jews of the Dispersion in the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia, the Areopagus address was to Greeks. The former (like Stephen's speech) contained a review of Israelite history; the latter appealed to Greek beliefs about God. Both, however, contained the themes of judgment and resurrection.

There is a further instance of kerygma in Philip's encounter with the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26–40) and further examples of Pauline preaching in Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus (Acts 20:17–37) and his defences before Felix (Acts 24) and Agrippa (Acts 26), while at Rome Paul is said to have testified to the kingdom of God "trying to convince them about Jesus from the law of Moses and the prophets" (Acts 28:23). This last instance might well sum up the kind of preaching that Paul gave in Acts 13, but the other instances are palpably different from the Petrine kerygma. The variety of preaching certainly makes it clear that Luke did not attempt to reduce all preaching to a uniform pattern. The explanation of the differences may be sought in Philip's case in the fact that the identity of the servant was raised by the eunuch (though the fact that the eunuch raised the question of the significance of Isa. 53:7 f. may be an indication that this was already a kerygmatic issue). In any case, Philip like Stephen was a Hellenist (Acts 6:6) and not one of the Jerusalem apostles. Paul's preaching to the Ephesian elders was not kerygma either to unbelieving Jews or to unbelieving Gentiles; it was teaching for the elders. Moreover, Paul's defences focused on the account of his actions rather than the substance of his apologetic. In other words, these instances of preaching indicate that the examples of Petrine preaching given in Acts were not typical of all preaching. Rather, they lend implicit support to the suggestion that the examples considered by Dodd contain the elements of an apologetic directed specifically to the Jews focusing on the person of Jesus in the light of salvation history and the crisis brought about by Jewish rejection of him. It might be objected that Peter's address to Cornelius does not fall within this category, as Cornelius was a Gentile and the address was the occasion for opening the church to Gentile believers. But it may be noted that Cornelius was one who worshipped with the Jews (Acts 10:1 ff.), and what is given in Acts 10:36-43 is the rationale of the conflict with Judaism, which in turn provides the rationale for turning to the Gentiles with the proclamation of Christ. What is given in the Petrine preaching in Acts is not simply a christology, but a christologically interpreted eschatology. The theme of the preaching is the eschatological significance of Christ for Israel.

The above survey has not been able to take into account the wealth of discussion of the speeches in Acts. For a recent review see F. F. Bruce, "The Speeches in Acts - Thirty Years After" (in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 53-68); and see also the works listed in the bibliography below. It is clear that the last word on the origin and structure of the kerygma has not yet been said. On the other hand, there are grounds for holding with Riesenfeld and Moule that the kerygma of missionary preaching, the teaching of the epistles and the Gospel accounts of Jesus were not separate compartmentalized activities belonging to different phases of the church, but were in fact simultaneous and complementary. In the view of the present writer, the argument of Dodd for certain identifiable features of the structure of the apostolic kerygma is far from being overthrown, though it requires modification and restatement. For the common features discerned by Dodd are not common to all the preaching in Acts. Rather, they provide a summary of the preaching attributed to Peter which was taken over by Paul in the specific context of the conflict of the church with Judaism which focused on the identity of Jesus as the messiah in the light of OT testimonia and the Jewish rejection of Jesus. Where these factors did not obtain, the preaching took on different forms. The absence of explicit ascription of saving significance to the death of Christ in the earlier speeches does not lie in Luke's own theology, but in the circumstances of the primitive community. As F. F. Bruce observes: "That God had raised the crucified Jesus to life again was the great new fact which, in their eyes, dwarfed all others. The claims of Jesus, disallowed by his judges, had been confirmed by God: he was divinely vindicated as both Lord and Messiah, and as such he should be acknowledged by the whole house of Israel" (op. cit., 59). Moreover, as Bruce goes on to say (taking up a phrase of J. A. T. Robinson): "In Acts 3:19-21 we may not have 'the most primitive Christology of all', but it might well be argued that we do indeed have the most primitive eschatology of all' (op. cit., 68).

C. Brown

→ Apostle, → Gospel, → Jesus Christ, → Teach, → Word

(a). E. L. Allen, "The Lost Kerygma" NTS 3, 1956–57, 349–53; P. Althaus, The So-Called Kerygma and the Historical Jesus, 1959; W. Baird, "What is the Kerygma?", JBL 76, 1957, 181–91; W. Barclay, "A Comparison of Paul's Missionary Preaching and Preaching to the Church", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 165–75; R. A. Bartels, Kerygma or Gospel Tradition . . . Which Came First?, 1961; J. W. Bowker, "Speeches in Acts: A Study in Proem and Yelammedenu Form", NTS 14, 1967–68, 96–111; C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, eds., The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ, 1964; F. F. Bruce, The Speeches in the Acts of the Apostles, 1942; The Acts of the Apostles, 1953²; "The Speeches in Acts – Thirty Years After", in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 53–68; and Paul and Jesus, 1977; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 33–183, 306–14; D. R. Carnegie, "The Kerygma in the Fourth Gospel", Vox Evangelica 7, 1971, 39–74; H. Conzelmann, "The Address of Paul on the Areopagus", in L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn, Studies in Luke-Acts: Essays Presented in Honor of Paul Schubert, 1968, 217–30; O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions, 1949; W. D. Davies, "Reflections on a Scandinavian Approach to 'The Gospel Tradition'", in The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount, 1964, 464–80; M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1934) 1971; "The Speeches in Acts and Ancient Historiography", in Studies in the Acts of the Apostles, 1956, 138–85; C. H. Dodd, "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative", ExpT 43, 1931–32, 396–400 (reprinted in New Testament Studies, 1953, 1–11); and The Apostolic Preaching and its Developments, 1936; J. W. Doeve, Jewish Hermeneutics in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, 1954; G. Ebeling, Word and Faith, 1963; Theology and Proclamation, 1966; and The Word of God and Tradition, 1968; C. F. Evans, "The Kerygma", JTS New Series 7, 1956, 25–41; J. W. Fraser, Jesus and Paul: Paul as Interpreter of Jesus from Harnack to Kümmel, 1974; G. Friedrich, euangelizomai etc., TDNT II 707–37; and keryx etc., TDNT III 683–718; B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 20, 1964; and Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, Coniectanea Neotestamentica 20, 1964; T. F. Glasson, "The Kerygma: Is Our Version Correct?", Hibbert Journal 51, 1952–53, 129–32; and "The Speeches in Acts and Thucydides", ExpT 76, 1964–65, 165; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971; A. J. B. Higgins, "The Preface to Luke and the Kerygma in Acts", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., op. cit., 78–91; A. M. Hunter, Paul and his Predecessors, 1940; E. Käsemann, Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964; and New Testament Questions of Today, 1969; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 1950; R. Koch, "Preaching", EBT II 686–93; R. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975; R. P. Martin, New Testament Foundations I, The Four Gospels, 1975; C. F. D. Moule, "Jesus in New Testament Kerygma", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin, 1970, 15–26; V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions, New Testament Tools and Studies, 5, 1963; D. E. Nineham, "The Order of Events in St. Mark's Gospel – an Examination of Dr. Dodd's Hypothesis", in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, 1955, 223–41; H. Rahner, A Theology of Proclamation, 1968; A. M. Ramsey, "The Gospel and the Gospels", in The Gospels Reconsidered: A Selection of Papers read at the International Congress on the Four Gospels in 1957, 1960, 99–106; B. Reicke, "A Synopsis of Early Christian Preaching", in A. Fridrichsen et al., The Root of the Vine: Essays in Biblical Theology, 1953, 128–60; H. N. Ridderbos, The Speeches of Peter in the Acts of the Apostles, 1961; H. Riesenfeld, "The Gospel Tradition and its Beginnings", StudEv, I, 1959, 1–29 (printed as a separate paper in 1957); and also in The Gospels Reconsidered, 1960, 131–54; and The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 1–29; J. Rohde, Rediscovering the Teaching of the Evangelists, 1968; J. Schniewind, angelia etc., TDNT I 56–73; E. Schweizer, "Concerning the Speeches in Acts", in L. E. Keck and J. L. Martyn, eds., op. cit., 208–16; M. Simon, St. Stephen and the Hellenists, 1958; D. M. Stanley, "The Primitive Preaching: The Traditional Schema", Concilium 20, 1966, 88–100; N. B. Stonehouse, The Areopagus Address, 1949 (reprinted in Paul before the Areopagus and Other New Testament Studies, 1957, 1–40); G. N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in New Testament Preaching, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 27, 1974; J. M. P. Sweet, "Second Thoughts VIII. The Kerygma", ExpT 76, 1964–65, 143–47; D. O. Via, Jr., Kerygma and Comedy in the New Testament, 1974; J. J. Vincent, “Didactic Kerygma in the Synoptic Gospels”, SJT 10, 1957, 262–73; A. N. Wilder, “Kerygma, Eschatology and Social Ethics”, in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology: In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1954, 509–36 (reprinted separately Facet Books: Social Ethical Series 12, 1966); R. C. Worley, Preaching and Teaching in the Earliest Church, 1967.

(b) R. Asting, Die Verkündigung des Wortes im Urchristentum, 1939; H. E. Bahr, Verkündigung als Information, 1968; T. Boman, Die Jesus-Überlieferung im Lichte der neueren Volkskunde, 1967; R. Bultmann, “Allgemeine Wahrheiten und christliche Verkündigung”, ZTK 54, 1957, 244 ff. (reprinted in Glauben und Verstehen, III, 1965³, 166 ff.); L. Cerfaux, “Témoins du Christ d’après le Livre des Actes”, Receuil L. Cerfaux, II, 1954, 157–74; H. Flender, “Lehren und Verkündigung in den synoptischen Evangelien”, EvTh 25, 1965, 701 ff.; J. Gewiess, Die Urapostolische Heilsverkündigung nach der Apostelgeschichte, 1939; K. Goldammer, “Der Kerygma-Begriff in der ältesten christlichen Literatur”, ZNW 48, 1957, 77–101; E. Grässer, “Von der Exegese zur Predigt”, WuD 60, 1971, 27 ff.; D. Grasso, “Il kerygma e la predicazione”, Gregorianum 41, 1960, 424–50; and L’Annuncio della Salvezza, 1965; J. Herrmann, “Kerygma und Kirche”, in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze, Festschrift J. Schmid, 1963, 110–14; P. Hitz, L’Annonce Missionnaire de l’Évangile, 1954; G. Hummel, ed., Aufgabe der Predigt, Wege der Forschung, 1971; W. Jetter, “Die Predigt als Gespräch mit dem Hörer”, Praktische Theologie 56, 1967, 212 ff.; K. Kertelge, “Verkündigung und Amt im Neuen Testament”, BuL 10, 1969, 189 ff.; E. Lerle, Die Predigt im Neuen Testament, 1957²; K. E. Lögstrup, “Verkündigung”, *RGG*³ VI 155 ff.; F. W. Marquardt, “Geschichte und kirchliche Verkündigung”, in Antwort. Karl Barth zum siebzigsten Geburtstag, 1956, 620–29; H. Ott, “Kerygma”, *RGG*³ III 1250–54; A. Rétif, “Qu’est-ce que le Kérygme?” Nouvelle Revue Théologique 81, 1949, 910–22; “Témoignage et Prédication Missionnaire dans les Actes des Apôtres”, ibid. 83, 1951, 152–65; and Foi au Christ et Mission d’après les Actes des Apôtres, 1952; H. Ristow and K. Matthiae, eds. Der historische Jesus und der kerygmatische Christus, 1962²; J. Roloff, Apostolat, Verkündigung, Kirche, 1965; and Das Kerygma und der irdische Jesus, 1970; H. Schlier, “Kerygma und Sophia”, EvTh 11, 1950–51, 181 ff. (reprinted in Die Zeit der Kirche, 1956, 206 ff.); and Wort Gottes, 1962²; K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu. Literarische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (1919), 1964; H. Schürmann, Aufbau und Struktur der neutestamentlichen Verkündigung 1954; and “Kerygma”, LTK VI 122–25; K. Stendahl, “Kerygma und kerygmatisch”, TLZ 77, 1952, 715–20; A. Strobel, Kerygma und Apokalyptik, 1967; U. Wilckens, “Kerygma und Evangelium bei Lukas”, ZNW 49, 1958, 223–37; and Die Missionsreden der Apostelgeschichte. Form- und traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, 1961.

Promise

ἐπαγγελία ἐπαγγέλλομαι (epangellomai), announce, proclaim, promise, profess; προεπαγγέλλομαι (proepangellomai), announce before, promise before; ἐπαγγελία (epangelia), announcement, promise; ἐπάγγελμα (epangelma), announcement, notification, promise.

CL 1. epangellomai and epangelia are derived from the root angel-, as are euangelizomai and euangelion (→ Gospel). In classical Gk. (the active form is attested in Homer) they are originally synonymous with other words from the same root (e.g. other compounds of angellō, like an-, apangellō), and mean respectively to announce, proclaim (Hdt. 3, 36), and announcement, report. In the context of state proclamations they denote summoning (e.g. Polybius, 9, 38, 2). In legal usage the noun means notification of a charge (Aeschines, 1, 64). In the mid. the vb. means to announce one’s accomplishments, to make a profession (Xen., Mem. 1, 2, 7), or to take up a moral position.

2. The nearest point of contact to the NT usage of these terms is in the meaning to announce an intention, to offer to do something, to promise, to vow (e.g.

Polybius, 1, 72, 6). It is significant that, when they are used in this sense, it is never the gods who promise something to men, but only men to gods. The Gks. were very conscious of the tension between human promises and their fulfilment. In this connexion, the word often carries the specific sense of a promise of money. Characteristically, in the whole of the Eastern Hellenistic world, the concept became a technical term for a free-will payment, gift or endowment (F. Hiller, Inschriften von Priene, 1906, 123, 5 ff.). ho epangeilamenos (lit. the one who promised) thus means the founder. In early Hellenistic usage hē epangelia can also mean the proclamation of a feast (cf. TDNT II 578).

OT Unlike euangelion, good news (→ Gospel), epangelia has no Heb. equivalent.

The LXX uses the word in Est. 4:7 to render the Heb. pārāšāh, exact statement, information.

1. (a) Despite the absence of a special term for it, the OT is of course familiar with the concept. G. von Rad attempts to show how “from Abraham to Malachi, Israel was kept constantly in motion because of what God said and did, and that she was always in one way or other in an area of tension constituted by promise and fulfilment” (Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 371). In some cases the fulfilment of certain promises is painstakingly recorded (e.g. Jos. 21:43–45; 23:14; “not one thing has failed of all the good things which the Lord your God promised concerning you; all have come to pass for you”). But generally the fulfilment appears as a partial or token fulfilment, which does not reveal the whole of the divine plan. Hence Israel is compelled in every new situation of his history to reinterpret the old promises, and is called to new expectancy by new proclamations of salvation (for details → Word, art. logos, OT).

Basic to the theme of Israel’s existence under promise is Gen. 12:1–3. “Now the LORD said to Abram, ‘Go from your country and your kindred and your father’s house to the land that I will show you. And I will make of you a great nation, and I will bless you, and make your name great, so that you will be a blessing. I will bless those who bless you, and him who curses you I will curse; and by you will all the families of the earth bless themselves.’” There is here a triple promise of the land, a great nation, and blessing (on the development of these themes → Earth, Land; cf. also W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; → Abraham; → Israel; → People → Bless). Gen. develops the promise of the nation through the story of Isaac (→ Abraham), the wanderings of Abraham and his descendants, and the → covenant theme (Gen. 17). In Jer. 31:31–34 there is the promise of a new covenant. This was at a time of national collapse, when the whole idea of surviving in the promised land was problematic. The central idea of the new covenant is that of the law written on the heart (cf. also Ezek. 18:1–32 and 36:26–37 which couples a new spirit and heart with national restoration). The teaching of the prophets consists of promises of → judgment and → grace, culminating in the promises of the Servant Songs of Isaiah (Isa. 42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12; → Serve). The promises of return from exile and sustenance in calamity of the later chapters of Isa. renew the exodus theme (cf. Exod. 3:24 f.; 12:1 ff.; 15:1 ff.; Hos. 11:1; Isa. 40:1–31). But as in Gen. 12:3, there is also a theme of blessing which will extend beyond Israel, so that Yahweh promises that the servant will be “a light to the nations” (Isa. 49:6). And as early as Isa. 2:24 and Mic. 4:1–3 there is the prophecy of the nations flowing to the mountain of the house of the Lord so that they may learn the ways of Yahweh in peace and righteousness.

(b) The OT records various vows made by the righteous (→ Swear). But while the law and the prophets demand faithfulness in personal dealings (Exod. 20:15 f.; Deut. 27:19; Hos. 4:1 f.; Mic. 6:8), human promises are ultimately secondary to the promises of God. In the last analysis it is he alone that can both promise and fulfil, for he alone knows and overrules the whole of the future.

2. (a) Jewish writers in the Gk. language (Macc. in the LXX, Philo, etc.) adopted Hellenistic usage. Thus they use epangellomai in the ordinary sense of promise (e.g. money, 1 Macc. 11:28). But they also prepare the way for Paul's use of epangelia for God's activity. In 3 Macc. 2:10 God promises to answer prayer.

(b) In rabbinic writings b'ṭāḥāh is used as a description of the promises of God. This word is not found in the OT, but it is derived from the root bāṭah, to trust, which is frequent in the MT, and thus emphasizes the trustworthiness of the promises of salvation (cf. SB III 207 ff.). The reference is often to the promises made to the patriarchs (the making of the people, the conquest of the land).

(c) With the appearance of apocalyptic, interest is strongly attracted to the 'ōlām habbā', the world to come (e.g. 2 Esd. 7:119), and the warning "to make sure that one will be a son (daughter) of the world to come" is frequently found (e.g. Berakoth 4b). At the same time assurance of salvation is considerably dampened by the doctrine that a part in the salvation to come is dependent on strict observance of the → law.

NT 1. General Review. (a) epangellomai, to promise, is found 15 times in the NT, but only in 4 instances is it used of human promises (Mk. 14:11, the offer of money to Judas; 2 Pet. 2:19, the promise of a false freedom by heretics; 1 Tim. 6:21, the profession of false teachings; 1 Tim. 2:10, the profession of theosebeia, fear of God). It is not found in a theological sense either in the Gospels, 1 Pet., Jude or Rev. Acts and 1 Jn. have it only once each. Most of the instances are in the Pauline corpus (5), Heb. (4), and Jas. (2).

(b) proepangellomai means to announce beforehand, to promise beforehand. In the NT it is found just twice (in Paul's writings): in 2 Cor. 9:5 he speaks of tēn proepēngelmenēn eulogian hymōn (the vb. is passive in meaning here), the blessing which you have promised in advance (i.e. the collection; → Poor, art. ptōchos, NT 4); and in Rom. 1:2 Paul refers to the gospel of God which he promised beforehand (proepēngelato) in the old covenant by his prophets in the scriptures.

(c) epangelia, found 52 times, is used only once in a secular sense; the noun is used absolutely 33 times, most of these instances being in Paul; the sing. form is greatly predominant, but in 11 instances the plur. occurs. epangelia is not found in Matt., Mk., Jn., Jas., Jude or Rev. It is found once in 1 Jn., twice in 2 Pet., but 9 times in the Lucan writings (once in the Gospel; 8 times in Acts), 26 times in the Pauline corpus and 14 times in Heb. As in classical Gk., so also in the NT, epangelia can refer either to form or to content, words of promise, or things promised, though the distinction is not always clear in every case. It is clear that it is the thing promised to which reference is made in passages like Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4; and likewise Heb. 11:33 and 39.

(d) epangelma in classical Gk. means announcement, order, promise. In the NT its meaning cannot be distinguished from that of epangelia. It is used only twice (in 2 Pet.). The aim of the letter being to stir up the hope of the return of Christ at a time when it was flagging, the concept of promise is restricted to this event and the subsequent new creation of heaven and earth: “But according to his promise [kata to epangelma autou] we wait for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells” (2 Pet. 3:13). Since this consummation brings with it a share in eternal life and a partaking of the theia physis, divine nature (NEB “the very being of God”), the author calls the promises which point to it “precious and very great” (1:4).

(e) The absence of the words of this group from the Gospels (with the exception of Mk. 14:11 and Lk. 24:49) is to be explained by the fact that the Gospels tell of Jesus’ words and deeds, but rarely reflect upon them. Moreover, where they do so, they are interested in the continuity between God’s word of old and his word now. Thus they interpret Christ in terms of the OT, as in the case of Lk. 4:21: “Today this scripture has been fulfilled [sēmeron peplērōtai hē graphē hautē] in your hearing” (referring to Isa. 61:1 f.; cf. the Matthean introductory formula for OT citations, hina plērōthē, “that it might be fulfilled”). Thus in spite of the absence of the term epangelia, the Gospels (especially Matt.) do deal with the category of promise and fulfilment (→ Fullness, art. plēroō, NT).

2. Theological Exposition. The theological significance of the concept is worked out particularly in three groups of NT writings: Luke–Acts, the Pauline letters, and Heb.

(a) Luke–Acts. (i) The giver of the promise is, as elsewhere in the NT, God alone, “the God of glory” (Acts 7:5; cf. 7:2 for the subject), “the Father” (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4). The promise provides insight into his plan of salvation, and carries with it the future realization of that plan, so that the fulfilment is a creative act (Acts 13:32 f.: he has fulfilled [ekpeplērōken] it in sending Jesus).

(ii) The recipients of the promise are “the fathers” (13:32) especially → Abraham (7:17), → Israel as the covenant people (13:23), the → disciples of Jesus (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4), the hearers of Peter’s sermon at → Pentecost with their children, and those living far away from Jerusalem (2:38 f.). It is through Israel that Gentiles first hear the promise.

(iii) The content of the promise is the historical sending of Jesus as the sōtēr, saviour (13:23, 32 f.; 26:6). Because he, the crucified and risen one, has wrought forgiveness of sins, all those who turn to him in faith and are baptized in his name receive the Holy → Spirit, the promised gift of God in the last days (2:38–40; cf. 2:17–21; and 2:32–36).

(iv) By being fulfilled (→ Fullness, art. plēroō), the promise (epangelia) becomes the good news, the → gospel (euangelion). Acts 13:32 uses the vb. euangelizesthai, to bring good news, to describe Paul’s testimony to the fulfilment of the promise.

(b) Paul. It is Paul who gives the most emphatic testimony that the epangelia is a gift of God’s free grace. God alone has the absolute power to fulfil his word of promise (Rom. 4:21). For he is the God “who gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist” (Rom. 4:17). He is ho apseudēs theos, the God who cannot lie (Tit. 1:2).

(i) In his struggle against mixing the gospel with Jewish legalism, Paul thought through the question of the relation between God's law and his promises, his demands and his bountiful grace. In answer to the Jewish theory, that man can come to enjoy the promised salvation only on the basis of prior fulfilment of all the duties required by the law, the apostle set out in antithetical form three basic insights afforded by the gospel.

It is not the law which makes us recipients of the word of promise and its fulfilment, but justifying grace: ou dia nomou hē epangelia tō Abraam ē tō spermati autou, to klēronomon auton einai ton kosmon, alla dia dikaiosynēs pisteōs, "not through the law did the promise come to Abraham or his descendants, that he should inherit the world, but through the righteousness of faith" (Rom. 4:13). Since the law can make no man "alive" to God (zōopoiēsai), i.e. enable him to do the will of God, the law and the promise are in reality opposites. "For if the inheritance is by the law, it is no longer by promise; but God gave it to Abraham by a promise [tō de Abraam di' epangelias kecharistai ho theos]" (Gal. 3:18). "Is the law then against the promises of God? Certainly not; for if a law had been given which could make alive, then righteousness would indeed be by the law. But the scripture consigned all things to sin, that what was promised to faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe" (Gal. 3:21 f.).

Law and promise can neither limit nor supplement one another, since the law demands works, whereas faith is neither a work of man nor a legalistic achievement. If those who make the law into a way of salvation were able by doing so to become "heirs", then faith would be null and the promise void (Rom. 4:14).

The example of Abraham shows in any case that the law cannot be a condition for the reception of the promise or substance of salvation, since Abraham lived before the law was given. The promise to Abraham is the characteristic type of all other promises. But it was given centuries before the revelation of the law, and the law must certainly not be interpreted as an added clause by means of which God might invalidate the binding nature of his promises, as a man might add a clause to his will. Thus Paul uses the picture of a diathēkē, will, → covenant, in Gal. 3:15–18, to emphasize the irrevocability of God's promises.

This note of assurance is not weakened by the ethical imperatives of the NT. 2 Cor. 7:1 makes it clear that it is not our sanctification which brings about the fulfilment of the promises; rather, the promises have a sanctifying effect upon the way we live.

(ii) For Paul it is fundamental that all God's promises have been given his "yes" in Christ (2 Cor. 1:20). The sending of Jesus, and all that he did, is God's active ratification of all his promises of salvation. Christ's ministry to Israel demonstrated God's alētheia, truthfulness (→ Truth), and took place in order to confirm the promise given to the patriarchs (Rom. 15:8). By dying in our place under the curse with which the law threatens every transgressor, he prepared the way for the sending of the Holy → Spirit. He died "that in Christ Jesus the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith" (Gal. 3:14).

Although in a wider context dikaiosynē (→ righteousness), hyiothesia (sonship), and klēronomia (inheritance) might be mentioned first, it is nonetheless strictly speaking the Holy Spirit who is chiefly spoken of as the promised gift of salvation (so Gal. 3:14; cf. also Eph. 1:3). The three images of aparchē (first fruits), arrabōn

(deposit), and sphragis (seal) are used to emphasize the certainty of salvation. In view of the close association of the Holy Spirit with eternal life, it is not surprising that in Tit. 1:2 "eternal life" is mentioned as the substances of the promise.

(iii) Historically, Israel is the first to receive the promise. The ethnē, Gentiles, originally stood outside the promise, tied as it was to the covenant order (Eph. 2:12).

In Gal. 3:16 Paul interprets to sperma tou Abraam, "the seed of Abraham", not collectively but in the singular, as referring to one individual, Christ. He is the universal heir; believers are only synklēronomoi Christou, co-heirs with Christ. Since, however, it is not physical descent from Abraham, but faith in Jesus Christ, that makes us entitled to the inheritance, believers from among the Gentiles are also "fellow heirs . . . and partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 3:6).

(c) Hebrews. The situation to which this letter is addressed differs from that of the Pauline churches. The question of the relation of law to promise plays no part here; faith itself is in danger. Doubt is being expressed as to whether the promises will be fulfilled at all. The purpose of the letter is therefore to call its readers to hold fast to the promises, and to testify to God's faithfulness to his word.

(i) The writer has in mind a "cloud of witnesses" (12:1) who have borne witness to the character and depth of their faith both by divine interventions in their lives, and by personal hypomonē, steadfastness (→ Patience). As believers they lived out their lives on the basis of the divine promises, and with the same promises as their goal. Mention is made of the men and women of faith in the early history of Israel: Abraham (6:12 ff.; 7:6), Isaac and Jacob ("heirs with him of the same promise", 11:6), Sarah (11:11). Chapter 11 mentions, along with the judges, Samuel, David, and generally "the prophets", as people who experienced the promised help of God. In Heb. 4:1-9 the example of Israel in the → wilderness is used to make it clear that unbelief makes fulfilment of the promises impossible (cf. Ps. 95:11; → Rest).

(ii) The content of the promises mentioned in Heb. is the blessing of multitudinous descendants (6:14), rest (katapausis), and the new covenant, which on the basis of the remission of sins holds out the prospect of "the eternal inheritance" (9:15).

At the same time Heb. emphasizes that in the old covenant the promises neither were nor could be completely fulfilled. When it is said of Abraham in 6:15 that "he obtained the promise", the reference is still to no more than a partial fulfilment (the birth of Isaac). In the final analysis the promises are interpreted in terms of the gospel, and therefore as referring to complete salvation in Christ (cf. 4:2). Thus the writer declares in 11:39 that the whole cloud of witnesses who came before Christ have been made to wait: "they did not receive what was promised." For this reason he ascribes to the patriarchs an understanding of the promise which looks far beyond all historical foreshadowings and partial fulfilments, to an eternal consummation (11:10-16).

The keyword kreittōn, better, which is found 12 times, is used to describe the superiority of the new covenant to the old (→ Good). Christ is the "mediator of a better covenant . . . enacted on better promises" (8:6). Jeremiah's promise of a new covenant is cited twice, indicating that by the better promises we should understand full forgiveness, deep knowledge of God, and a Spirit-worked obedience to his commandments (Heb. 8:8–12 = Jer. 31:31–34; Heb. 10:16 f. = Jer. 31:33 f.). Yet the content of the promises also includes all the other aspects of eternal, eschatological salvation, such as the unshakeable → kingdom (12:28), the future city (13:14), and the → sabbath for the → people of God (4:9).

The new covenant has been brought into operation by the death of Jesus. This means that the fulfilment of the promises is drawing steadily nearer. “You see the Day drawing near” (10:25). “Yet a little while, and the coming one shall come and shall not tarry” (10:37; cf. Isa. 26:20 LXX). It is, therefore, all the more necessary to remain steadfast during the short time that remains, not to cast away one’s parrhēsia, confidence (→ Openness), and to “hold fast the confession of our hope without wavering” (10:23, cf. v. 35). As far as God is concerned, the promises remain unbreakable. They are an oath of God (6:13). This makes it all the more important for the members of the people of God to observe the exhortation to hold fast to the promises for their part (6:11 f.).

E. Hoffmann

→ Covenant, → Fullness, → Hope, → Prophet

(a). I. Blythin, “The Patriarchs and the Promise”, SJT 21, 1965, 56 ff.; J. Bright, Covenant and Promise: The Future in the Preaching of the Pre-exilic Prophets, 1977; F. F. Bruce, ed., Promise and Fulfilment: Essays Presented to Professor S. H. Hooke, 1963; R. Bultmann, “Prophecy and Fulfilment”, in Essays Philosophical and Theological, 1955, 182–208; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; A. T. Hanson, “Birth with Promise”, Studies in Paul’s Technique and Theology, 1974, 87–103; J. Jeremias, Jesus’ Promise to the Nations, SBT 24, W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfilment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus, SBT 23, 1961²; J. Moltmann, “Promise and History”, in Theology of Hope: On the Ground and the Implications of Christian Eschatology, 1967, 95–138; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962; II, 1965; J. Schniewind and G. Friedrich, epangellō etc., TDNT II 576–86; C. Westermann, “The Way of Promise through the Old Testament”, in B. W. Anderson, ed., The Old Testament and Christian Faith, 1964, 200–24; C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963.

(b). F. Baumgärtel, Verheissung, 1954; F. W. Marquardt, Die Bedeutung der biblischen Landverheissungen für die Christen, ThEH Neue Folge 116, 1964; G. Sauter, Zukunft und Verheissung, 1965; C. Westermann, “Verheissungen an Israel”, EKL III 1645 ff.; W. Zimmerli, “Verheissung und Erfüllung”, EvTh 12, 1952–53, 6 ff. (reprinted in Probleme alttestamentlicher Hermeneutik, ThB 11, 1968³, 69 ff.).

Prophet

προφήτης προφήτης (prophētēs), prophet, proclaimer; προφήτις (prophētis), prophetess; προφητεύω (prophēteuō), make prophetic revelations, prophesy; προφητεία (prophēteia), prophetic activity, prophetic gift, prophetic word, prophetic saying; προφητικός (prophētikos), prophetic; ψευδοπροφήτης (pseudoprophētēs), false prophet; μαντεύομαι (man-teuomai), foretell, utter oracles, prophesy.

CL 1. (a) prophētēs (Pindar, Nemean 1, 60:9, 50; and Hdt., 8, 36 f., 135) is a noun made up of the stem -phē-, to say, proclaim, which always has a religious connotation, and the prefix pro-, which as a temporal adv. has the meaning of before, in advance. This may suggest the meaning: one who predicts, one who tells beforehand. It appears to be confirmed by the use of prophēmi, to predict, proclaim in advance. However, prophēmi is not found until very late, and so has no value as etymological evidence. Indeed, when one examines the combination of pro- with vbs. of speech in earlier writings, it is evident that in no case does the object of the vb. point to the future. Several other vbs. are found: proagoreuō (Hdt., 3, 61 f.; Thuc., 2, 13); prolegō (Hdt., 8, 136; Thuc. 1, 139); prophōneō (Eur., Hippolytus 956). The meaning of these vbs. is clearly to proclaim openly, to state publicly, to proclaim aloud. This suggests that prophēteuō should be translated in the same way. This is corroborated by the use, found as early as the 5th century, of prophētēs in the sense of declarer, speaker (Pindar, Paean 6, 6; Eur., Bacchae 211). The religious flavour of the stem -phē- gives the word a special weight, and expresses the authority which can be claimed for the prophet's word.

(b) From this noun are derived the fem. prophētis (Eur., Ion 42, 321), the noun prophēteia (not found before 2nd century A.D.), and the corresponding adj. prophētikos and vb. prophēteuō (Pindar, Fragment 150).

2. The nature of the Gk. prophet is more easily ascertained from his place in public life than from etymological considerations. The words derived from this root are firmly tied up with the Gk. oracle. The most famous oracle was that of Delphi, presided over by Apollo (on this see especially H. W. Parke and D. E. W. Worrell, The Delphic Oracle, I-II, 1956²). In this connexion we meet the words in two senses.

The Pythia was called prophētis, but had the further title of promantis (Eur., Ion 681; Hdt., 6, 66). This office belonged originally to one, two or three girls drawn from the local population, but in later times at least the Pythia was elderly. The Pythia sat on a tripod over a cavity in the earth, from which an "oracular spirit" (pneuma mantikon) in the form of smoke arose and gave her the inspiration. This was enhanced by the chewing of bay-leaves (Apollo's plant). As a result she would burst out with enigmatic inarticulate sounds, similar to glossolalia (→ Word, art. glōssa). These concerned future events, as the title promantis suggests, and had a direct connexion with the person consulting the oracle, who came to it baffled by a problem about which he sought help in the form of instruction. He would present in writing a question which had arisen in his own life. Such questions might concern matters of business, religion, politics, ethics or education, and in them we find reflected the whole range of life in the ancient world.

Since, however, the Pythia's reply was usually incomprehensible to the visitor, there was need for other officials at the shrine, whose task it was to translate the utterance into a saying that could be clearly understood and remembered. The task was carried out by wise and highly respected old men, called to this position by the oracle, and likewise known as "prophets". They did not work by direct inspiration; had they done so, they would have been given the further title of mantis. Instead, their transmission of the message involved the use of their understanding (logismos). They received the Pythian oracles, tested them, completed them, interpreted them and formulated the final saying. Thus they never spoke on their own initiative, but only after a visitor had presented a question and the Pythia had uttered the oracle. (On the oracle of Delphi, which may be regarded as typical, cf. Plato, Timaeus 71e-72b. It should be noted that Plato idealizes the prophet to fit his philosophical concepts.) As an example, we may take the question put to the Delphic oracle by the Spartan Glaucus (Hdt., 6, 86). A stranger had deposited some money with him. If he committed perjury, he would be able to appropriate the sum himself. Might he, therefore, commit perjury? The prophetic response was that he could afford this act of perjury, and that such a thing would never happen again. It might appear that he was not punished; but the false oath would pursue him (→ Curse). If it did not fall upon him, it would upon his children and his children's children. It would not rest until the whole family was destroyed.

From this example we may note the following basic features:

(a) The prophet expresses something for the content of which he is not responsible, since he has himself received it indirectly from the god. Where the inspiration is direct, a privilege reserved at Delphi at least solely for the Pythia, the prophet has the further title of mantis. Thus the Pythia bore the title of promantis in addition to that of prophet. Indirect inspiration comes through the inarticulate utterances of a Pythia, or through symbola such as the blowing of the wind, the rustling of the sacred oaks, the clanging of cymbals, or the shaking of an image of a god borne by priests. The prophets are thus "interpreters of mysterious utterances and visions" (Plato, Timaeus 72b).

(b) The prophet does not give advice unless he is asked for it. The initiative is the questioner's alone, not the god's or the prophet's.

(c) For this reason the words of the Gk. prophet are always addressed to a unique, historical, concrete, present situation in the life of the client. The advice then given embraces the whole range of counselling help which is called for, even up to the present day, by the troubles and needs of men and women.

(d) The prophet is called to his office by the oracular institution, and so not by a god.

To sum up, a prophet is a person, employed by the oracle, who by direct inspiration or by the interpretation of sounds and omens declares the will of the gods to a person who asks for advice. Accordingly, prophēteuō means to proclaim the counsel and will of the gods concerning a historical, concrete, present situation, in response to a definite question put by the client.

3. In early times the poet also has the title of prophet (Pindar, Paeon 6, 6; cf. Homer, Il., 1, 1; 2, 484–492), since he achieves in his poetry something which is otherwise impossible to mortals, and must therefore derive his wisdom, his sophia, from the gods (Pindar, Paeon 7b, 11–15).

4. The prophet must be clearly distinguished from the soothsayer (mantis, seer, soothsayer). Admittedly, both titles can be held by one person (see above), but they refer to very different functions. If it is etymologically correct to say that mantis is derived from mainomai, to rage, to be out of one's senses, to be in ecstasy, it may suggest that the soothsayer is in origin one who makes a proclamation from or in a state of ecstasy. The prophet, on the other hand, speaks "with his reason". His divination is mediate, i.e. he receives his information from the gods through a medium (e.g. the Pythia).

The content of soothsaying, as in the case of prophecy, is never a timeless truth of universal validity, but a message directed to definite, individual events. Unlike prophecy, which sometimes deals with religious matters, soothsaying never concerns this realm (Plato, Charmides 173c). Soothsaying foretells future events, while prophecy is aimed at correcting a person's behaviour in view of events which may be expected. The chief impulse behind soothsaying is human curiosity (cf. J. Haeckel in L. Adam and H. Trimborn, eds., Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde, 1958, 62).

OT 1. The Heb. word for prophet, nābî', is usually derived from the Akkad. vb. nabû, to call, to proclaim. In the past, therefore, most scholars saw the etymology as parallel to the Gk. and understood the word in the active sense, one who calls, forth-teller, preacher (cf. H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel, 1966, 102). However, a parallel development in the Akkad. indicates that nābî' should be understood not actively but passively; one called, one appointed (W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity, [1940] 1957, 303 ff.). Behind the passive form stands God as the agent, here the one who calls. Later nābî' became a technical term, and the literal meaning was forgotten.

From this noun the vb. nābā' is derived, which means to show, present, or express oneself, to speak as a prophet. It is found in hith. and niph. In early texts the dominant use is in the hith., meaning to behave as a prophet, implying adopting ecstatic behaviour. In later texts the niph. predominates, and is in most cases to be translated to speak prophetically (1 Sam. 10:5 f., 10 ff.; 19:20; 1 Ki. 22:10, 12). This point is corroborated by a second observation: the vb. is found among the earlier writing prophets only in Amos, and in none of the later ones but Jer., Ezek., Joel and Zech. This may suggest that in early times prophecy was dominated by ecstatic behaviour which later became suspect. Later still (from Jer. onwards) the vb. no longer suggested ecstasy and could be used without embarrassment.

(a) The noun nābî' is found in the OT 309 times, of which 92 instances are found in Jer. alone. The plur. signifies in the historical books groups of prophets; the sing. in early texts widely varying types of person, in later texts only, one who speaks on behalf of Yahweh. In earlier texts, the prophet can also have the title 'iš hā'elōhîm, man of God, or rō'eh or hōzeh, seer. Man of God seems to be a title of distinction, which is also given to great leaders: → Moses (Deut. 33:1), → David (Neh. 12:24, 36 etc.), but above all Elisha (29 times), and the unnamed prophet of Judah in 1 Ki. 13:1–31 (15 times). This title expresses the close association of the person concerned with God.

The seer has the ability to reveal hidden secrets and future events (1 Sam. 9:6–20). With him the emphasis is on visions, with the prophet rather on his words (Isa. 30:10).

(b) Various figures in the history of Israel were given the title of nābî'. They include → Abraham (Gen. 20:7), Moses (Deut. 34:10) and Aaron (Exod. 7:1). Miriam received the title of prophetess (Exod. 15:20), which is doubtless linked with the Song of Moses at the Red Sea which was used as a cultic hymn (see below 2 (c)).

2. Before the fully-fledged prophecy of the so-called writing prophets took shape certain earlier forms are found in the OT.

(a) One of these is the appearance of groups of ecstatics who moved freely about the country, putting themselves by the use of musical instruments into a state of trance, and in such a condition babbling out their messages (cf. the phenomena in the NT period in 1 Cor. 14). This → ecstasy was infectious, so that Saul also came to be counted "among the prophets" (1 Sam. 10:5 ff.; cf. 19:18 ff.). The prophets of Baal were also ecstatics (1 Ki. 18:19–40). The ecstatic who could temporarily become "another man" (1 Sam. 10:6) constituted a certain attraction for the Israelites (1 Sam. 10:5). But on other occasions these "mad fools" (Hos. 9:7) repelled them. In Num. 11:10–30, where the 70 elders were seized by the Spirit of God and went into an ecstasy, it is related that Joshua was critical. However, Moses replied: "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, that Yahweh would put his spirit upon them!" (Num. 11:29). This is interpreted by some scholars as the attempt of the Elohist, by the inclusion of this story in the Mosaic tradition, to introduce the strange, repellent, un-Israelite phenomenon of ecstatic prophecy into the worship of Yahweh. Thus, G. von Rad comments: "The end which the story tries to serve is therefore that of the legitimation of this new religious phenomenon which may have caused the orthodox a good deal of perplexity. The story may actually be taken as evidence of an acceptance of the ecstatic movement into the institutions of Jahwism, or at least as an etiology of the prophetic movement which gave it legitimation" (Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 19).

(b) Another early form is that of groups of prophets in monastic communities. These groups formed themselves around a prominent figure (e.g. Elisha, 2 Ki. 2:3 ff.; 4:38; 6:1), whom they addressed as "master" or "father", at whose feet they sat and learned, and with whom they lived in communal dwellings. → Elijah and Elisha were heads of separate bands of prophets (2 Ki. 2:1 ff.). Such groups are always found in connexion with a sanctuary (1 Ki. 13:11, Bethel; 2 Ki. 2:1, 4, 5, Gilgal, Jericho). Ecstasy has here a markedly reduced rôle (traces may be found at 2 Ki. 3:15). Instead, the gift of the Spirit seems to be manifested rather by the working of → miracles (2 Ki. 2:19–22; 2:23–25; 4:1–7, 18–37). Even these popular accounts, however, with their emphasis on miraculous deeds, reveal that Elisha was also a man of the word, who gave both spiritual (2 Ki. 4:1–7, 8–37; 5:1–14) and political counsel (2 Ki. 13:14 ff., "The chariots of Israel and its horsemen"; cf. 6:12; 8:7–15).

(c) One more early form must be mentioned: the cultic prophets employed as officials at the national sanctuary. They are to be distinguished clearly from the writing prophets (contra S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship I–II, 1961), since the latter strongly criticized the cult (e.g. the temple, Hos. 8:14, RV mg.; Mic. 3:9–12; Jer. 7:1–15; sacrifice, Amos 3:14; Hos. 5:6; Isa. 1:10–17; priests, Hos. 4:4; Mic. 3:11; Jer. 2:8). Moreover, they acted and spoke in a way foreign to the cult (G. von Rad, op. cit., II, 54 f.). The cultic prophet had his place along with the priest in the cult. His task would have been to give oracles in answer to communal laments, and especially to the king. For this reason he had great influence in the royal court (1 Ki. 1:8), where he spoke as a man of God (1 Ki. 22:24 ff.) with remarkable severity (2 Sam. 12:1 ff.). The cultic prophets were feared, because their powerful → word could bring success or disaster (1 Sam. 16:4; 1 Ki. 17:18). Their words of salvation would be formulated after the manner of proverbs. In Isa. 33:1–24 there is preserved a prophetic liturgy (H. Gunkel, "Jesaia 33, eine prophetische Liturgie", ZAW 42, 1924, 177–208), which gives us insight into the language of these prophets. Among the cultic prophets we may count Shimei (1 Ki. 1:8), Zedekiah (1 Ki. 22:24), and perhaps also Nathan (2 Sam. 12:1 ff.; 1 Ki. 1:11 ff.) who worked in close association with the court and yet enjoyed an astonishing degree of independence. No books have come down to us from these prophets, unless one includes Nahum and Habakkuk who at least have some affinity with them. There are, however, unmistakable traits of the cultic prophet in Zechariah and still more in Haggai.

3. Prophecy in the characteristic sense associated with the prophetic literature of the OT began in Israel with the monarchy. However, no sharp dividing-line can be drawn. Ecstasy, soothsaying and miracle-working fade into the background, and the → word comes increasingly to the fore. Ties with the cult, with institutions and with the monarchy also become progressively looser. From Amos to Malachi the word was the predominant means of proclamation. The only actions of the prophets were symbolic actions. These were not strictly illustrations, but the acting out the content of the word (Hos. 1:4, 6, 9; Isa. 7:3; 8:3 f.; 20:2; Jer. 16:2, 5, 8). The classical prophets were active during three periods: the time of the dissolution of the Northern Kingdom (around 721 B.C.), of the Southern Kingdom (around 597–587 B.C.), and the time of the exile (around 539 B.C., the end of the Babylonian supremacy). In relation to history their message had a horizontal (the nation and the nations) and a vertical (past, present, future) dimension. The future dimension was in the nature of a warning, where the future is linked with the present situation of the hearer. It was not a prediction, where, as in soothsaying, the attention is taken away from the present to a point in the future and it is foretold what will happen. The themes include the following:

(a) Prophecy of judgment. Especially before the exile, it was the task of the prophets to warn the people, their representatives or a group of the people about the approaching → judgment. This could take various forms, such as droughts, earthquakes and wars. Since, however, the prophets were also responsible for exhorting and counselling the people, and preached with a view to repentance, the threat was accompanied by an explanation of the reason for the judgment. Thus the judgment comes about because of the → sin of the nation, of the king, or of a group within the nation. For the prophets, sin is human behaviour which is out of accord with the actions of God. In detail, this means in Isaiah, that the people is not putting its trust in Yahweh alone; in Amos and Micah, that the people is disregarding the law and commandments of Yahweh; in Hosea, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the emphasis is rather on the unfaithfulness of the people in idolatry.

(b) Prophecy of salvation. Prophecies of salvation did not originate in curiosity about what will happen after God's judgment. They were based upon the loving will of God (in contrast to prophecies of judgment, which resulted from the wrong behaviour of men). This is further indicated by the various forms which the word of salvation, or promise, could take: the pledge is clearly the answer to a previous complaint, and so is not far removed from the favourable oracle (Isa. 43:1 ff.); the announcement promises God's future help (Isa. 41:17 ff.; Jer. 28:2 ff.); the description depicts the future reality of the salvation which God will bring about (Isa. 11:1 ff.; Zech. 8:4 f.). Prophecies of → salvation predominate during and after the exile. Salvation becomes a reality in the renewal of the relationship between Israel and God, in the eschatological king (the messiah), in the new ordering of the cult, the renewal of the state and political liberation of the nation. Majestic representation of salvation is often followed by an explanation of the ground on which it is based: not the faithfulness or holiness of the people, in its zeal for God and the covenant, but the faithfulness, holiness, zeal and unconditional love of God alone.

To sum up, the OT prophet is a proclaimer of the word, called by God to warn, exhort, comfort, teach and counsel, bound to God alone and thus enjoying a freedom that is unique.

4. Although later tradition added the book of Daniel to the prophets, it is in fact an example of Jewish apocalyptic. The latter is distinguished from prophecy by “pseudonymity, eschatological impatience and exact calculations about the last things, the range and fantasy of its visions, concern for world history and a cosmic horizon, numerical symbolism and esoteric language, doctrines of angels and hope of the afterlife” (W. Baumgartner, “Ein Vierteljahrhundert Danielforschung”, ThR 11, 1939, 136 f.). Apocalyptic is therefore not a straightforward continuation of prophecy, though both share the element of future expectation. Its heyday comes after the prophets, between the 2nd century B.C. and the 2nd century A.D. The transition may be clearly seen in Zechariah: in the seven visions of the night (1:7–6:8) the prophet becomes a seer to whom the eschatological future of the nations and of Israel is revealed (cf. Isa. 24–27; Ezek. 38 f.; Joel).

5. The rabbis naturally saw in apocalyptic the legitimate successor of prophecy. “Up to this point [i.e. up to Alexander the Great] the prophets preached through the Holy Spirit. From then on, bow thine ear and hear the words of the wise [i.e. the apocalyptic writers]” (Seder ‘Olam Rabbah 30). Prophecy itself is extinguished. In rabbinic writings the “voice from heaven” (→ Word, art. phōnē) begins to gain importance alongside apocalyptic. God still spoke but only through the echo of his voice (baṭ qōl) (SB II 125 ff.; cf. J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I 1971, 80 ff.). Josephus (Ant. 13, 311 ff.), on the other hand, reports that the Essenes had a great number of prophets who were held in high repute.

The cessation of prophecy is indicated by Ps. 74:9 and 1 Macc. 9:27 (cf. 4:46; 9:27; 14:41). On the other hand, some scholars see evidence for the expectation of an eschatological prophet connected with the person of → Moses on the basis of Deut. 18:15–18 (cf. Acts 3:22 f.; 7:37; and Jn. 6:14; 7:40) and connected with the person of → Elijah on the basis of Mal. 3:1 (cf. Matt. 11:10; Mk. 1:2; Lk. 1:17, 76; 7:27) and 4:1–6 (MT 3:19–24; cf. Matt. 17:11; Mk. 9:12; Lk. 1:17). (For further discussion see F. Hahn, “The Eschatological Prophet”, in The Titles of Jesus in Christology: Their History in Early Christianity, 1969, 352–406; G. Molin, “Elijah. Der Prophet und sein Weiterleben in den Hoffnungen des Judentums und der Christenheit”, Judaica 8, 1952, 65–94; M.-J. Stiassny, “Le Prophète Élie dans le Judaïsme”, in Élie le Prophète, Études Carmélitaines 35, 199–255; SB II, 626 f.; IV 764–98; R. Schnackenburg, “Die Erwartungen des ‘Propheten’ nach dem Neuen Testament und den Qumran-Texten”, StudEv 1, TU V, 18, 1959, 622–39; H. M. Teeple, The Mosaic Eschatological Prophet, 1959; and the literature listed in the articles on Moses and Elijah.)

6. The Qumran community treasured the prophetic writings of the OT (including the Psalms) to an extraordinary degree. They applied the prophecies to the events of their own day, which they saw as the “end of days” (i.e. the end-time). The Teacher of Righteousness reveals the secrets of the prophetic words (1QpHab 7:1–5) and so takes on the rôle of an actual prophet. The eschatological event which the Qumran community awaited was the coming of “the Prophet and of the Messiahs of Aaron and Israel” (1QS 9:11). This suggests a triumvirate, not a ruler with a threefold office (cf. Test. Lev. 18:9 ff.; cf. K. G. Kuhn, “Die beiden Messias Aarons und Israels”, NTS 1, 1954–55, 168 ff.; F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1956, 13).

NT In the NT prophētēs is found 144 times, most frequently in Matt. (37 times) and Luke (Gospel 29 times; Acts 30 times). In Mk. it is found only 6 times, and 14 times each in Jn. and Paul. It occurs 8 times in Rev., twice each in Heb. and 2 Pet. and once each in Jas. and 1 Pet. The noun means a prophet, one who proclaims and expounds divine revelation. In most cases it refers to OT prophets, but it is also applied to John the Baptist, Jesus and others who proclaim the Kingdom of God or Christ, and to the believer who possesses the gift of prophecy. Only in one place (Tit. 1:12) does a pagan receive the title of prophet. This is the poet Epimenides (6th century B.C.), from whose Theogony a proverbial saying is quoted (“Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons”). Epimenides was regarded as a prophet by Plutarch (Solon 12), Plato (Laws 1, 642d) and others in the ancient world. The fact that he is regarded as a prophet here lends authority to the judgment.

As well as referring to a person, prophētēs can also be used of the OT prophetic writings (e.g. Matt. 5:17; Jn. 6:45; Rom. 3:21).

In the NT the title prophetess is not given to a woman who prophesies, with the exception of Lk. 2:36, where Anna, the daughter of Phanuel, is given this title because she proclaimed Christ. Jezebel, the type of the woman led astray into idolatry, gives herself the title (Rev. 2:20).

The abstract noun prophēteia is found only 19 times in the NT, and of these 9 times in Paul (including 5 times in 1 Cor. and twice in 1 Tim.) and 7 times in Rev. Otherwise it occurs once in Matt. and twice in 2 Pet. It refers to the prophetic word of an OT (e.g. Matt. 13:14) or Christian prophet (e.g. 1 Cor. 14:6). Only Paul uses it also as a term for the gift of prophecy (charisma; → Grace; e.g. Rom. 12:6). At Rev. 19:10 it probably means prophetic word, while at Rev. 11:6 it probably signifies prophetic activity.

It is similar with the occurrences of the vb., which is found 28 times in the NT, and of these 11 times in Paul, all in 1 Cor. The remaining instances are 4 in Matt., 2 each in Mk. and Lk., 1 in Jn., 4 in Acts, 1 each in 1 Pet. and Jude, and 2 in Rev. The basic meaning is to proclaim divine revelation (e.g. Matt. 7:22; cf. above, 2). This can be understood in an ethical, paracletic sense (e.g. 1 Cor. 14:3, 31; to comfort, exhort, teach); in a revelatory sense (e.g. Matt. 26:68) or as pointing to the future (e.g. Matt. 15:7; to foretell). Since the title of prophet is not given to women in the church, a circumlocution is used (Acts 21:9; Philip the evangelist’s “four unmarried daughters who prophesied”).

The late word pseudoprophētēs is found 11 times in the NT, including 3 times each in Matt. and Rev., but not at all in Paul. It occurs once each in Mk., Lk., Acts, 2 Pet. and 1 Jn. Normally it is used of a person who makes a false claim to being a prophet (e.g. Matt. 7:15). Since such people proceed to preach what is not true, the name comes to be applied to anyone who does this (1 Jn. 4:1) and so shows himself to be a false prophet. The adj. prophētikos occurs only in Rom. 16:26 and 2 Pet. 1:19. The vb. manteuomai is found only at Acts 16:16 of the soothsaying of the girl at Philippi who prior to her exorcism by Paul brought her owners great gain.

The NT term prophet is used in the following five senses.

1. The Old Testament Prophet. As in the OT (“Thus saith the Lord”) he is described as “the mouth of God” (Jer. 15:19; Acts 3:18, 21). God is behind the passive construction in Matt. 2:17, 23 etc. Some take the reference in 1 Pet. 1:11 to

“the Spirit of Christ”, the one at work in the prophets, to indicate the pre-existent Lord, who in 1 Pet. is one with God (cf. A. T. Hanson, Jesus Christ in the Old Testament, 1965, 133–36). In Heb. 1:1 (where en is used, on the analogy of Heb. b^e, of the instrument), the prophet is likewise seen as an instrument of God who makes an open proclamation. But the prefix pro- comes to be understood more and more in a temporal sense, so that, in contrast to the OT, the prophet is seen as one who foretells. He predicts everything which is later fulfilled in Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:22 f.; 2:5 f., 15, 17 f., 23, etc.). These texts are not proof-texts in the sense that the prophets make a prediction, and Jesus Christ fulfils it, therefore the prophecies are confirmed by → Jesus Christ or the scriptures proved through him. (For a discussion of the notion of fulfilment in Matt. which sees it not as direct, predictive prophecy but as fulfilled typology → Fullness, art. plēroō, NT 1 (b)–(c).) For Matt. the authority of the OT is so incontestable that it does not need to be proved. Rather, the texts are reflective quotations, intended to show that Jesus Christ does something, or that with his coming something happens. Matt. does his reflecting by the use of a suitable OT quotation. Since the prophets (→ Scripture) constitute an absolute authority for Matt., this means that Jesus Christ is proved by the quotation to be messiah. The direction of his argument is thus the opposite to that of a proof-text which establishes the truth of scripture.

A striking feature is the frequency of NT references to the violent deaths of the prophets (Matt. 23:31; the saying at Matt. 23:37 par. Lk. 13:34; in Acts 7:52 a line is drawn through the murder of the prophets to the death of Jesus). In early Christianity martyrdom was integrally related to the concept of the prophet (Matt. 23:35). Jesus presented himself as one who stood in the line of rejected prophets whose own rejection marked the climax of evil and brought open judgment on Jerusalem. He was also the culminating figure of those who were martyred for their righteousness (Matt. 23:35; Lk. 11:51). Abel (Gen. 4) was the first. Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, is mentioned towards the end of the last book of the OT canon (2 Chr. 24:20 ff.). The latter may be identified here with Zechariah the son of Berechiah (Zech. 1:1). A Zechariah, son of Baris or Baruch was martyred in the Temple in A.D. 70 (Josephus, War 4, 5, 4), but he could hardly be the figure here. The Jewish tradition and LXX texts about the various Zechariahs show confusion.

2. John the Baptist. John is consistently given the title of prophet. This is justified by the fact that he takes up and makes even more radical the prophetic preaching of judgment and repentance (Amos 9:7 ff.; Mic. 3:12; Jer. 7:3 ff.; 26:1 ff.). His preaching was aimed at moral improvement, and at shaking the religious self-confidence of the Jews. His → baptism, which was not proselyte baptism or that practised at Qumran, must be seen as an eschatological sacrament of repentance, which is a testimony of conversion and forms a seal of salvation. It is not surprising that John was therefore regarded as the expected eschatological prophet who would bring in the age of salvation (cf. above, OT 3; Matt. 11:8 ff.). The NT however suppresses this (false) view, and portrays him as the eschatological forerunner (Matt. 3:1 ff.; 11:11 f.; 14:2 ff.; 16:14; 17:13; Mk. 6:25; 8:28; Lk. 7:20, 33; 9:19), or “witness” of Jesus (Jn. 1:6 ff.), who points in his preaching to Jesus Christ and in his baptism to Christian baptism (O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963², 23–30; cf. J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I, 1971, 43–49;

C. H. H. Scobie, John the Baptist, 1963; W. Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 7, 1968).

3. Jesus Christ. Only occasionally in the NT is Jesus Christ called a prophet, and generally only by the people (Mk. 6:15 par. Lk. 9:8; Matt. 16:14 par. Mk. 8:28, Lk. 9:19; Lk. 7:16). They may have in mind here contemporary prophets, but → Elijah is also mentioned by all three evangelists, and Matt. also refers to Jeremiah, suggesting that Jesus is thought of as in the succession of OT prophets. However, Jesus never described himself directly as a prophet. No great weight may be laid on Lk. 13:33 as a self-designation, since it is probably a quotation of a proverbial saying. In the passages ascribed to Q, the word prophet never occurs as a christological title; it is most frequently found in Lk. (cf. F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969, 379 ff.; O. Cullmann, op. cit., 30–38). According to the NT, Jesus Christ is greater than the prophets (Matt. 12:41), since he not only announced but also brought salvation (1 Pet. 1:10 f.; Lk. 10:24). Christ is presented as a prophet in the sense of Deut. 18:15: “The Lord your God will raise up a prophet like me from among you, from your brethren – him shall you heed” (cf. Acts 3:22 f.; 7:37; Matt. 2:1–23; 4:1–11; 5:1 ff.; Jn. 6:14; 7:40).

J. Jeremias sees Jesus as a charismatic rather than as a professional theologian (Matt. 7:29 par. Mk. 1:22, Lk. 4:32). “The unanimous verdict on him was that he was a prophet. There was a constant echo to this effect among the people (Mark 6:15 par.; 8:28 par.; Matt. 21:11, 46; Luke 7:16; John 4:19; 6:14; 7:40, 52; 9:17) and even – though coupled with some scepticism – in Pharisaic circles (Luke 7:39; Mark 8:11 par.). According to Luke 24:19, Jesus’ disciples, too, saw him as a prophet. Finally, it was as a false prophet that Jesus was arrested and accused. This is clear from the account of the mockery under Jewish confinement” (New Testament Theology, I, 1971, 77; cf. also J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit, 1975, 82 ff.). In support of the latter point Jeremias cites Matt. 26:68 par. Mk. 14:65, Lk. 22:64, and notes that a false prophet had to die (Deut. 18:20; cf. 13:6; 17:13). “‘Prophet’ was not a full description of the task for which he had been sent . . . , but he included himself among the ranks of the prophets (Luke 13:33; Matt. 23:31 f., 34–36 par., 37–39 par.; cf. Mark 6:4 par.; Luke 4:24; John 4:44). He does this not only in those passages in which he uses the term ‘prophet’, but also in those in which he claims to possess the spirit. For the synagogue regarded the possession of the holy spirit, i.e. the spirit of God, as the mark of prophecy. To possess the spirit of God was to be a prophet” (op. cit., 78; cf. the Beelzebul controversy, Matt. 12:25–37 par. Mk. 3:23–30, Lk. 11:17–23; and Mk. 13:11; Lk. 6:23, 26 par. Matt. 5:12; Jn. 7:37 ff.). Whereas the Spirit had long been quenched, Jesus initiated the time of salvation. It was heralded by John the Baptist who was more than a prophet (Matt. 11:9 par. Lk. 7:26). It is indicated by his own presence as one who is greater than → Jonah (Matt. 12:41 par. Lk. 11:32). “The time of barrenness and judgment is coming to an end. The quenched spirit is returning after a long absence. God is breaking his silence and is speaking again, as he once did in the days of the prophets” (op. cit., 82). But the “more” implied in these latter references “has an eschatological ring. . . . With the new activity of the spirit the time of salvation has begun” (ibid.).

4. Those Specially Commissioned. In the nativity narrative of Lk., and only here, we find people who have been specially commissioned and equipped by God to proclaim prophetic messages which have been given to them by the Holy Spirit (cf. R. Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I-II, 1964). Of these only Anna has the title of prophet (Lk. 2:36). Zacharias' song, the Benedictus, is described as a prophecy inspired by the Holy Spirit (Lk. 1:67). Elizabeth (Lk. 1:41 f.) and Simeon (Lk. 2:25) speak by the Holy Spirit, which is intended to imply a prophetic gift.

5. Christian Prophets. The early Christian church had Christians who possessed the gift of prophecy. They were regarded as a sign that the Spirit was present in the church (→ Spirit; → Grace). It must be assumed that at a very early stage this charismatic, impulsive prophecy became institutionalized, and prophets were then seen as the holders of a spiritual office. This had its own standing in the community between, or on a par with, → apostles and teachers (1 Cor. 12:28 f.; Eph. 4:11); next to apostles (Lk. 11:49; Eph. 2:20, though possibly OT prophets are referred to here; Eph. 3:5; Did. 11:3); next to teachers (Acts 13:1; Did. 15:1 f.); next to saints and apostles (Rev. 18:20).

(a) In the worship at Corinth they had in the service (1 Cor. 14:23 f.) the task of exhorting (1 Cor. 14:3, 24 f., 31), comforting (1 Cor. 14:3), and edifying the church (1 Cor. 14:3), and of communicating knowledge and mysteries (1 Cor. 13:2). Paul instructed them to do this in words which could be understood (1 Cor. 12:1; 14:15 f., 23 f.), and not in a state of → ecstasy. There was evidently a danger, however, that the prophetic spirit might break out in uncontrolled, ecstatic power and invade the church's worship in such a way that not just one (1 Cor. 14:30) but several (v. 31) would be prophesying at the same time. Paul handled this problem by declaring that the spirits of prophets should be subject to prophets (v. 32), by which he meant submission to order and the peace of God (v. 33a). The prophet must also be able to remain silent. It remains debatable whether we can detect in the epistles the utterances of early Christian prophets, in the form of "statements of holy law" (cf. E. Käsemann, "Sentences of Holy Law in the New Testament", New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 66–81). Käsemann cites Rom 11:25 f.; 1 Cor. 3:17; 14:38; 15:51 f.; 16:22; Gal. 5:21 and 1 Thess. 3:4 as eschatological logia.

(b) In Eph. 2:20 the prophets form part of the "foundation" of the church. This image suggests that the period in which the foundations of the church were laid is over, i.e. the prophetic office is a thing of the past. The apostles are here the NT counterpart of the OT prophets. Together they constitute the foundation, "Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone" (→ Rock).

(c) Warnings against false prophets in the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 7:15, 22 f.; 24:24 par. Mk. 13:22) permit the conclusion that there must have been a great number of Christian prophets in the area of Syria and Palestine.

Using form-critical analysis, E. Käsemann attempts to isolate forms of prophetic proclamation (statements of holy law, curses, blessings, etc.) in the synoptic tradition, and to demonstrate that these are the logia of early Christian prophets ("The Beginnings of Christian Theology", op. cit., 82–107). Such "spurious" dominical sayings, he suggests, formed part of the sayings-source, and were understood in the early church to be words of the risen Lord given by the mouth of Christian prophets.

C. H. Peisker

Käsemann's view which is shared by many goes back to R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1968², 127 f., and beyond that to H. Gunkel, Reden und Aufsätze, 1913, 173, and H. von Soden, Das Interesse des apostolischen Zeitalters, 1892, 153. (For this and the following points see D. Hill, "On the Evidence for the Creative Rôle of Christian Prophets", NTS 20, 1973–74, 262–74.) In support of his view of this creative rôle for the Christian prophets Bultmann appealed generally to Rev. and Od.Sol. 42:6: "For I have risen and stand by them and speak through their mouth."

But the view has not gone unquestioned. M. Dibelius, himself a leading form-critic, drew attention to Paul's distinction between commands which came from the Lord and his own advice (1 Cor. 7:10, 12, 25; cf. From Tradition to Gospel, 1971, 241 f.). F. Neugebauer has pointed out that no similar transformation of logia occurs in Jewish and NT writings and that the theory pays no heed to the difference in literary genre between "Gospel" and "Apocalypse" ("Geistsprüche und Jesuslogien", ZNW 53, 1962, 218–28). Moreover, if, as Bultmann allows, the words of the prophets only gradually came to be regarded as those of the historical Jesus, this in itself presupposes that the community originally made a distinction between the two. And if the words of the risen Lord uttered by the prophets had the same value as those of the historical Jesus, there is no reason for projecting them back into a fictitious pre-Easter setting. Bultmann and his followers have not paid sufficient attention to the rôle of → tradition in early Christian → proclamation. "The place given by Bultmann and others to the Christian prophets is precisely that occupied by the Gnostic authors of apocryphal Gospels: in these works it is not the Jesus of history who teaches by action and by word, but the resurrected Lord who conveys truths and revelations to this or that privileged disciple" (D. Hill, op. cit., 264).

Hill draws attention to the weakness of the exegetical basis of Bultmann's view. The Odes of Solomon is probably not a 1st century Jewish-Christian work, but a gnostic hymn-book from the 2nd century A.D. (Henn.Schn., II, 809 f.; cf. Hill, op. cit., 265). Moreover, the verse on which Bultmann leans does not refer to Christian prophets but to believers in general. In the letters to the seven churches in Rev. 1–3, the Spirit of Christ addresses the churches as the Spirit of the exalted Lord (cf. also Rev. 16:15) and not in a form of words projected back into the life-situation of the historical Jesus. Similarly, Paul was careful to distinguish his own opinions from the teachings of Jesus, even though he claimed to have the Spirit as the Corinthians did (1 Cor. 7:40). Moreover, there is evidence to suggest that the early church distinguished between the Spirit addressing a man (Acts 10:1; 11:12; 13:2; 21:11) and the utterances of the glorified Lord (Acts 9:4 ff., 10 f.; 18:9; 23:11). Nowhere in the Pauline letters is there an implied identity between an encounter with the Spirit bringing a revelation and the words of the historical Jesus (Hill, op. cit., 267).

Whilst passages in Rev. may echo words attributed to the earthly Jesus (cf. Rev. 16:15 with Lk. 12:39; and Rev. 3:20 with Lk. 22:29 f. and Lk. 12:36), they clearly do not purport to be utterances of the earthly Jesus. In any case, the author of Rev. cannot be appealed to as a model of the activity and consciousness of Christian prophets generally in the NT period. The author is the authoritative mediator of the revelation (Rev. 1:1). Those who keep the words of his book are blessed (Rev. 1:3; cf. 22:7). Readers of his book, including the prophets, are subordinate. The prophets of the community do not make any independent contribution to the prophecy; their function is to teach (cf. the teaching of the false prophetess in Rev. 2:24) (on all this see further D. Hill, "Prophecy and Prophets in the Revelation of St John", NTS 18, 1971–72, 401–18; A Satake, Die Gemeindeordnung in der Johannes-Apokalypse, 1966). The evidence of Acts 11:28 and 21:11 does not support the idea of the prophets producing utterances in the name of the historical Jesus; rather, Agabus speaks here by the Spirit. Similarly, there is no hint in 1 Cor. 7:40 and 14:3 of the charismatic prophet using the name of Christ in the first person.

Examples of Käsemann's concept of "Sentences of Holy Law" include 1 Cor. 3:17 and Matt. 10:32. But from a study of the form of such sentences, there is nothing to require the existence of a community of prophets to promulgate eschatological laws of this kind (cf. K. Berger, "Zu den sogenannten Sätzen heiligen Rechts", NTS 17, 1970–71, 10–40). Whilst such formulations can be transposed in to the realm of eschatology, their form "belongs to the genre of sapiential exhortation in which the sanction corresponds to the action according to a law of immanent justice" (D. Hill, op. cit., 271). Finally, Hill observes that Käsemann's attempt to link the activity of the Christian prophets with gnosticism fails because of sheer lack of knowledge about the Christian prophecy and the origin and nature of gnosticism (op. cit., 272 f.).

(d) Acts gives considerable information about prophets. It includes the prophecy of Agabus which involves prediction of future events: widespread famine (Acts 11:28) and Paul's arrest (Acts 21:10 f.). But among contemporary German scholars the accounts of Acts are commonly conceived to be of little value as a historical source. The reason for this sceptical attitude is bound up with the acceptance of Conzelmann's ascription to Luke of a view of time which divides history into three eras: the period of Israel, the middle time, and the period of the church. The third era begins with → Pentecost (Acts 2:1 ff.), and therefore takes up most of the book of Acts. It is characterized as, among other things, the time when the Spirit is poured out on all Christians (whereas in the second era Jesus was the only bearer of the Spirit). One sign of the superabundant outpouring of the Spirit is the great number of early Christian prophets who are named (Acts 11:27 f.; 13:1; 15:32; 21:9 ff.), and the principle that all Christians are given prophetic inspiration (Acts 2:17 f.; 19:6). The numerous references to prophecy are held to be theologically motivated. However, theological interpretation need not necessarily be something alien superimposed on a situation that was historically different. (For discussion of Luke's view of history → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT, especially NT 2 (b).)

In the Lucan writings OT prophets are referred to in Lk. 4:24; 7:16; 39; 9:8, 19; 13:33; 24:19; Acts 3:22 f. Acts 7:37 sees Jesus as a prophet in terms of the prophecy of a successor to → Moses in Deut. 18:15, 18. John the Baptist is described as a prophet in Lk. 1:76 (cf. Mal. 4:5); 7:26; and 20:6. Christian prophets are envisaged in Lk. 11:49: "Therefore also the Wisdom of God said, 'I will send them prophets and apostles, some of whom they will kill and persecute.'" Here Wisdom may be identified with the Spirit of God as in later Judaism (cf. Wis. 9:17), implying a contrast with the wisdom of Solomon (Lk. 11:31) (for further discussion see E. E. Ellis, The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966, 170 ff.). The passage may well be a comment attributed to the Spirit which is intended to supplement the previous words of the historical Jesus. Acts mentions a group of prophets from the Jerusalem church visiting Antioch, including Agabus (Acts 11:27 f.; cf. 21:10), a group resident in Antioch, including Barnabas and Paul (Acts 13:1), and the two prophets who accompanied the Jerusalem decree to Antioch, Judas Barsabbas and Silas (Acts 15:22, 32). The vb. prophēteuō is always used in Acts of Christians (Acts 2:17 f.; cf. Joel 2:28 ff.; Acts 19:6; and 21:9). Although Peter is not called a prophet, he has the marks of one, which include the knowledge of men's hearts (Acts 5:3; 8:21 ff.; cf. Lk. 7:39). He also had experience of visions and dreams fulfilling the prophecy of Joel (cf. also Acts 10:10). Similarly others had these prophetic experiences (Acts 9:10; 16:9; 22:17 ff.; 27:23; cf. Num. 12:6). Acts 21:9 refers to the four daughters of Philip who prophesied (cf. also the references to them in Eusebius, HE 3, 31, 4; 3, 37, 1). E. E. Ellis sums up this evidence by saying that "Christian prophecy in Acts is represented as an eschatological power of the Holy Spirit from God (Acts 2:17) or from the risen Jesus (Acts 1:8; 2:17; 33; cf. Psa. 68:19(18); Eph. 4:8). Although prophecy is a possibility for any Christian, it is primarily identified with certain leaders who exercise it as a ministry" ("The Role of the Christian Prophet in Acts", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 56).

The purpose of Ellis's study is to try to ascertain more precisely Luke's understanding of what constitutes and what distinguishes prophecy. Certain functions are reminiscent of the OT prophet: prediction of future events (Acts 11:28; 20:23, 25; 27:22), the declaration of divine judgments (Acts 13:11; 28:25-28), and the employment of symbolic actions (Acts 21:11). Ellis notes a particular link between prophecy and exhortation. "And Judas and Silas, who were themselves prophets exhorted [parekalesan] the brethren with many words and strengthened [epestērixan] them" (Acts 15:32; → Exhort, art. parakaleō). The vb. parakaleō is used of the ministry of John the Baptist (Lk. 3:18; cf. 7:26), as well as of that of the prophets (Acts 11:23; 16:40; 20:2), though not that of Jesus. It is applied to Peter (Acts 2:40; cf. also 1 Thess. 2:12), and is found in the NT only in Acts 14:22 of the prophets Paul and Barnabas and in the Thessalonian letters with the cognate stērizō (1 Thess. 3:2; 2 Thess. 2:17). The corresponding noun paraklēsis which occurs in Lk.-Acts, Paul and Heb. is associated by Luke with the activity of the Spirit (cf. Acts 9:31; 13:15). Ellis observes that "the written paraklēsis of the Jerusalem Decree is set in parallel with the verbal 'exhortation' of the prophets Judas and Silas, and the term 'son of paraklēsis', applied to Barnabas in Acts 4:36, possibly represents 'son of prophecy'. The understanding of paraklēsis as the specific ministry of a prophet is supported in the Pauline literature by I Corinthians 14:2 f." (op. cit., 57; cf. also Rom. 15:4 f.; 2 Cor. 5:20). The interpretation of scripture, usually in the synagogues, is a central feature of the mission of the prophets, though it is not confined to them (Acts 2:14-36; 3:12-26; 4:8-12; 6:9 ff.; 7:2-53; 8:30-35; 9:20 ff.; 13:5, 16-41; 16:22 f.; 17:2, 10 f., 17, 22-31; 18:4, 24-28; 19:8; 28:23). The interpretation of scripture was understood as a prophetic function (Dan. 9:2, 14; Targum to Jdg. 5:9; cf. SB IV 116; R. Meyer, TDNT VI 817). Similarly, the allusion to the rabbis sitting "in Moses' seat" (Matt. 23:2) indicates that the rabbis saw themselves as the successors to the prophets (Ellis, op. cit., 58).

As at Qumran, there was no sharp division between the prophet and the teacher (op. cit., 59). Jesus himself was seen as teacher and eschatological prophet (cf. Lk. 7:39 f. with Mk. 1:21 par. Lk. 4:31; and Mk. 6:1–6 par. Matt. 13:53–58; Lk. 4:16 ff.). In the light of the implied connexions in these contexts between prophecy and the exposition of scripture, Ellis suggests “that the prophets Judas and Silas were not chosen incidentally to accompany the Decree. Probably they were chosen because they had already exercised an influential role in establishing (or proclaiming) the biblical rationale upon which the provisions of the Decree were justified” (op. cit., 62).

Ellis observes that the prophets in Acts exercised a widespread ministry in a varied fashion – singly or in groups, travelling or in settled congregations. But their functions were not restricted to those who were specifically designated as prophets. This is, in fact, paralleled by other ministries and → gifts in the NT where sometimes the gifts are shared by anyone and sometimes they relate to specific offices (cf. Acts 2:33; 6:3, 8 ff. with 1 Cor. 12:28, 31; 14:1; 2 Tim 1:11; op. cit., 63 f.). On the basis of his comparison of the rôle of the prophet with that of the apostle and elder, Ellis concludes that “the role of the prophet may overlap that of the elder as it does that of the apostle and teacher, especially in certain teaching functions. But unlike the prophet the apostle (in Jerusalem at least) and the elder or ‘shepherd’ are incorporated into the organizational structure” (op. cit., 66; → Apostle; → Bishop). At various points in Acts, Luke presents the Christian mission as a continuation of the mission of Jesus who is now the exalted Lord (Acts 1:1; 9:5; 10:13; 16:7; 22:18; 23:11) and as a contest between conflicting spiritual powers (Acts 8:9–24; 13:6 ff.; 16:16; 19:13–20). Ellis concludes: “The role of the Christian prophet is related to both of these Lucan themes. The prophet is the Lord’s instrument, one among several means by which Jesus leads his church. As one who makes known (gnōstos) the meaning of Scripture, exhorts, and strengthens the congregation, and instructs the community by revelations of the future, the Christian prophet manifests in the power of the Spirit the character of his Lord, who is the Prophet of the end-time (3:22)” (op. cit., 67).

(e) In Rev. prophets appear to have superseded apostles. In the three passages where the latter are mentioned Rev. 2:2 refers to false apostles, and Rev. 18:20 and 21:14 refer to the apostolic Twelve who are the counterpart of the OT prophets. On the other hand, prophets are mentioned in Rev. 10:7; 11:10, 18; 16:6; 18:20, 24; 22:6, 9. The author regards himself as a prophet (Rev. 22:9). He has received from the exalted Lord a revelation of the meaning of the events of history (Rev. 1:1). This is embodied in a series of seven sets of visions which constitute the substance of his book (→ Number, art. hepta). He is called to console and exhort (cf. above (d)). Although the words parakaleō and paraklēsis do not occur, the letters to the Seven Churches (chs. 2 and 3) and indeed the whole work constitutes a series of messages of consolation and exhortation. The work carries the authority of the exalted Christ, speaking through the Spirit (Rev. 22:18 f.).

In “Prophecy and Prophets in the Revelation of St John” (NTS 18, 1971–72, 401–18) D. Hill argues that the author “considered himself to be a prophet, and that his writing, while employing much of the traditional apparatus of Apocalyptic but lacking many of the most characteristic features of that genre, may justifiably, and probably correctly, be regarded as prophetic in intention and character, especially in its concern with and interpretation of history" (op. cit., 406). The term prophet in the book denotes primarily Christian prophets who, while they may be separable from the body of believers, cannot be said to have special precedence or position on the basis of existing evidence (op. cit., 410). The phrase hē martyria Iēsou (Christou), "the witness of Jesus (Christ)", occurs six times (Rev. 1:2, 9; 12:17; 19:10 twice; 20:4) and the clause "to have the witness" or "the witness of Jesus" three times (Rev. 6:9; 12:17; 19:10). On the basis of his study of these passages, Hill contends that the author holds a unique position. He stands in the tradition of OT and Jewish prophecy, rather than of Christian prophecy, and mediates to his brethren (the Christian prophets) the revelation of Jesus Christ. The Christian prophets are distinguished from other Christians in that they actually fulfil the ministry of witness and prophecy that is expected of the entire church which, at least in Rev. 19:10, is potentially a community of prophets (op. cit., 414; cf. 1 Cor. 14 where prophecy is a gift to be sought by all, though exercised by a few). The concept of prophetic activity in Rev. is comparable with that seen by Ellis in Lk.-Acts in relation to interpreting the meaning of scripture (see above (d)). As A. Feuillet has observed, Rev. is a "re-reading of the OT in the light of the Christian event" (L'Apocalypse. État de la Question, 1963, 65; cf. op. cit., 417).

(f) For a time prophecy continued to have a place in the church. Prophets are known in the Didache, but the author shows some nervousness about false prophets and those who outstay their welcome (Did. 10:7; 11:7-12; 13:1-7; cf. also Justin, Dial. 82, 1). They featured in Montanism in the 2nd and 3rd centuries (cf. Eusebius, HE 5, 16, 3-17; 5, 19, 2; Epiphanius, Haer. 48, 49; Hippol., Haer. 8, 19, 1-3; Tert., De anima 9). Besides Montanus himself, Priscilla and Maximilla claimed to be prophetesses. But Montanist abuse led to the gradual discrediting and disappearance of prophecy.

C. Brown

→ Covenant, → Ecstasy, → Elijah, → Jonah, → Law, → Moses, → Priest, → Revelation, → Sacrifice, → Wisdom, → Word

(a). B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson, eds., Israel's Prophetic Heritage: Essays in Honor of James Muilenberg, 1962; G. W. Anderson et al., Studies on Prophecy: A Collection of Twelve Papers, Supplements to VT 26, 1974; J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, TC, 1972; A. Bentzen, "The Ritual Background of Amos i. 2-ii. 16" OTS 8, 1950, 85-99; E. Best, "Prophets and Preachers", SJT 12, 1959, 129-50; J. Bright, Jeremiah, Anchor Bible, 1965; and Covenant and Promise: The Future in the Preaching of the Pre-exilic Prophets, 1977; F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1956; M. Buber, The Prophetic Faith, 1949; R. Bultmann, "Prophecy as Fulfilment", in C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963, 50-75; M. Burrows, "Prophecy and the Prophets at Qumran", in B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson, eds., op. cit., 223-32; H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries, 1969; K. W. Carley, Ezekiel among the Prophets: A Study of Ezekiel's Place in the Prophetic Tradition, SBT Second Series 31, 1975; B. S. Childs, Isaiah and the Assyrian Crisis, SBT Second Series 3, 1967; R. E. Clements, Prophecy and Covenant, SBT 43, 1965; and Prophecy and Tradition, Growing Points in Theology, 1975; J. L. Crenshaw, "The Influence of the Wise upon Amos. The 'Doxologies of Amos' and Job 5:9-16; 9:5-10", ZAW 79, 1967, and 45 ff.; Prophetic Conflict: Its Effect upon Israelite Religion, BZAW 124, 1974; P. E. Davies, "Jesus and the Role of the Prophet", JBL 64, 1945, 214-54; A. B. Davidson, Old Testament Prophecy, ed. J. A. Paterson, 1903; C. H. Dodd, "Jesus as Teacher and Prophet", in G. K. A. Bell and A. Deissmann, eds., Mysterium Christi: Christological Studies by British and German Theologians, 1930, 53-66; "The Prophecy of Caiaphas (John xi 47-53)", in Neotestamentica et Patristica (O. Cullmann Festschrift), Supplements to NovT 6, 1962, 134-43; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament, 1975; and Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity, 1977; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 289–391; and Ezekiel, 1970; O. Eissfeldt, “The Prophetic Literature”, in H. H. Rowley, ed., The Old Testament and Modern Study, 1951, 115–61; and The Old Testament: An Introduction 1965, 241–442; E. E. Ellis, The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966; and “The Role of the Christian Prophet in Acts”, in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 55–67; H. L. Ellison, Men Spoke from God: Studies in the Hebrew Prophets, 1952; I. Engnell, “Prophets and Prophetism in the Old Testament”, in Critical Essays on the Old Testament, 1970, 123–79; S. Erlandsson, The Burden of Babylon: A Study of Isaiah 13:2–14:23, Coniectanea Biblica OT Series 4, 1970; J. E. Fontenrose, Python: A Study of Delphic Myth and its Origins, 1959; G. Fohrer, “Remarks on Modern Interpretation of the Prophets”, JBL 80, 1961, 309–19; and History of Israelite Religion, 1973; S. B. Frost, Patriarchs and Prophets, 1963; N. K. Gottwald, All the Kingdoms of the Earth: Israelite Prophecy and International Relations in the Ancient Near East, 1964; A. Guillaume, Prophecy and Divination, 1938; W. K. Guthrie, “Delphic Oracle”, OCD 322 f.; H. A. Guy, New Testament Prophecy, 1947; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology Their History in Early Christianity, 1969; R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament, 1970, 663–962; and Jeremiah and Lamentations, TC, 1973; J. H. Hayes, “The Use of Oracles against Foreign Nations in Ancient Israel”, JBL 87, 1968, 81–92; E. W. Heaton, The Old Testament Prophets, 1976 (revised); D. Hill, “Prophecy and Prophets in the Revelation of St John”, NTS 18, 1971–72, 401–18; and “On the Evidence of the Creative Rôle of Christian Prophets”, NTS 20, 1973–74, 262–74; D. R. Hillers, Treaty Curses and the Old Testament Prophets, 1964; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I, The Proclamation of Jesus, 1971, 76–84; A. R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel, 1962²; O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, 1972; and Isaiah 13–39, 1974; E. Käsemann, “Sentences of Holy Law in the New Testament”, and “The Beginnings of Christian Theology”, in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 66–81, 82–107; R. Knierim, “The Vocation of Isaiah”, VT 18, 1968, 64–68; H. Krämer, R. Rendtorff, R. Meyer, G. Friedrich, prophètes etc., TDNT VI 781–861; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Ancient Israel: A Cultic History of the Old Testament, 1966; C. Kuhl, The Prophets of Israel, 1960; J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel, 1962; A. Lods, The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism, 1937; W. McKane, Prophets and Wise Men, SBT 44, 1965; A. A. MacRae, “Prophets and Prophecy”, ZPEB IV 875–903; J. L. Mays, Amos, 1969; F. L. Moriarty, “Prophets and Covenant”, Gregorianum 66, 1965, 817–33; S. Mowinckel, Prophecy and Tradition: The Prophetic Books in the Light of the Study of the Growth and History of the Tradition, 1949; and The Psalms in Israel’s Worship, I–II, 1962; J. Muilenburg, “The ‘Office’ of the Prophet in Ancient Israel”, in J. P. Hyatt, ed., The Bible in Modern Scholarship: Papers Read at the 100th Meeting of the Society of Biblical Literature, 1965, 74–97; B. D. Napier, “Prophet, Prophetism”, IDB III 896–919; M. Newman, “The Prophetic Call of Samuel”, in B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson, eds., op. cit., 86–97; M. Noth, “History and the Word of God in the Old Testament”, and “Office and Vocation in the Old Testament”, in The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Studies, 1966, 179–93, 229–49; H. M. Orlinsky et al., Interpreting the Prophetic Tradition, 1969; H. W. Parke and D. E. W. Worrell, The Delphic Oracle, I–II, 1956²; J. B. Payne, Encyclopedia of Biblical Prophecy: The Complete Guide to Scriptural Predictions and their Fulfilment, 1973; N. W. Porteous, “The Prophets and the Problem of Continuity”, in B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson, eds., op. cit., 11–25; G. von Rad, “The Deuteronomistic Theology of History in the Book of Kings”, in Studies in Deuteronomy, SBT 9, 1953, 74–91; Old Testament Theology, II, 1965; and The Message of the Prophets, 1968 (containing material from Old Testament Theology); J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy: A Study of the Eleventh Mandate, Supplements to NovT 37, 1973; H. Ringgren, Israelite Religion, 1966; T. H. Robinson, Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel, 1953²; H. H. Rowley, “The Law and the Prophets”, in The Unity of the Bible, 1953, 30–61; Men of God: Studies in Old Testament History and Prophecy, 1963; From Moses to Qumran, 1963; “The Prophets and the Cult”, in Worship in Ancient Israel: Its Forms and Meaning, 1967, 144–75; “The Nature of Old Testament Prophecy in the Light of Recent Study”, in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, 1965², 95–134; H. H. Rowley, ed., Studies in Old Testament Prophecy Presented to Professor Theodore H. Robinson, 1950; M. H. Shepherd, Jr., “Prophet in the NT”, IDB III 919 f.; J. Schildenberger, “Prophet”, EBT II 716–22; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament, SBT 32, 1961; J. B. Taylor, Ezekiel, TC 1965; H. M. Teeple, The Mosaic Eschatological Prophet, 1959; W. C. van Unnik, "A Formula Describing Prophecy", NTS 9, 1962–63, 86–94; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 384 ff.; and "Jerusalem and the Prophets", in Interpreting the Prophetic Tradition, 1969, 275–300; B. Vawter, The Conscience of Israel: Pre-Exilic Prophets and Prophecy, 1973³; T. C. Vriezen, "Prophecy and Eschatology", Supplements to VT 1, 1953; and "Essentials of the Theology of Isaiah", in B. W. Anderson and W. Harrelson, op. cit., 128–46; J. W. Wevers, Ezekiel, New Century Bible, 1969; C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech, 1967; Isaiah 40–66, 1969; C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963; C. F. Whitley, The Prophetic Achievement, 1963; R. N. Whybray, Isaiah 40–66, New Century Bible, 1976; G. Widengren, Literary and Psychological Aspects of the Hebrew Prophets, 1948; H. W. Wolff, Hosea, Hermeneia, 1974; E. J. Young, My Servants the Prophets, 1955; and The Book of Isaiah, I–III, New International Commentary, 1965–72; F. W. Young, "Jesus the Prophet: A Re-examination", JBL 68, 1949, 285–99; W. Zimmerli, The Law and the Prophets: A Study of the Meaning of the Old Testament, 1965; and Ezekiel, I, Hermeneia, 1977.

(b) R. Bach, Die Aufforderung zur Flucht und zum Kampf im alttestamentlichen Prophetenspruch, WMANT 9, 1962; E. Balla, Die Botschaft der Propheten, 1958; T. Chary, Les Prophètes et le Culte à Partir de l'Éxil, 1956; W. Dietrich, Prophetie und Geschichte. Eine redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum deuteronomischen Geschichtswerk, FRLANT 108, 1972; E. Fascher, Prophétès. Eine sprach- und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, 1927; G. Fohrer, "Neuere Literatur zur alttestamentlichen Prophetie", ThR 19, 1951, 277 ff.; ibid. 20, 1952, 192 ff.; ibid., 28, 1962, 1 ff. 235 ff., 301 ff.; Die symbolische Handlungen der Propheten, ATHANT, 25, 1953; "Prophetie und Magie", ZAW 78, 1966, 25 ff.; and Studien zur alttestamentlichen Prophetie, BZAW 99, 1967; F. Gils, Jésus Prophète d'après les Évangiles Synoptiques, Orientalia et Biblica Lovanensia 2, 1957; H. Greeven, "Propheten, Lehrer, Vorsteher bei Paulus", ZNW 44, 1952–53, 1–43; and "Die Geistesgaben bei Paulus", WuD Neue Folge 1959, 111 ff.; J. Haeckel, "Religion", in L. Adam and H. Trimborn, Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde, 1958, 40 ff.; J. Harvey, Le Plaidoyer prophétique contre Israël après la Rupture de l'Alliance, 1967; M. L. Henry, Prophet and Tradition. Versuch einer Problemstellung, BZAW 116, 1969; S. Herrmann, "Das Prophetische", in Reich Gottes und Wirklichkeit, Festschrift A. D. Müller, 1961 (reprinted in Probleme alttestamentlicher Hermeneutik, ThB 11, 1968³, 341 ff.); Die prophetischen Heilswartungen im Alten Testament, BWANT 5, 5, 1965; Prophetie und Wirklichkeit in der Epoche des babylonischen Exils, AzTh 1, 32, 1967; and "Die konstruktive Restauration. Das Deuteronomium als Mitte biblischer Theologie", in Probleme biblischer Theologie, Festschrift G. von Rad, 1971, 155–70; F. Hesse, "Würzelt die prophetische Geschichtsrede im israelitischen Kult?", ZAW 65, 1953, 45–53; and Das Verstockungsproblem im Alten Testament, BZAW 74, 1958; F. Haeussermann, Wortempfang und Symbol in der alttestamentlichen Prophetie, BZAW 58, 1932; F. Horst, "Die Visionsschilderungen der alttestamentlichen Propheten", EvTh 20, 1960, 193 ff.; E. Jenni, Die politischen Voraussetzungen der Propheten, ATHANT 29, 1956; and Die alttestamentliche Prophetie, 1962; A. Jepsen, "Gottesmann und Prophet. Anmerkungen zum Kapitel I. Könige 13", in Probleme biblischer Theologie, Festschrift G. von Rad, 1971, 171–82; G. Jeremias, Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, StUNT 2, 1963; J. Jeremias, Kultprophetie und Gerichtsverkündigung in der späten Königszeit Israels, WMANT 35, 1970; H.-J. Kraus, Prophetie und Politik, ThEH Neue Folge 36, 1952; K. G. Kuhn, "Die beiden Messias Aarons und Israels", NTS 1, 1954–55, 168 ff.; G. Mensching et al., "Propheten", *RGG*³ V 608 ff.; O. Michel, Prophet und Martyrer, BFChTh 37, 2, 1932; L. Monloubou, Prophète qui est-tu? Le Prophétisme avant les Prophètes, 1968; F. Neugebauer, "Geistsprüche und Jesuslogien", ZNW 53, 1962, 218–28; F. Nötscher, "Prophetie im Umkreis des alten Israel", BZ 10, 1966, 161 ff.; C. H. Peisker, "Propheten", in Kleine Predigttypologie, II, 1965, 159 ff.; E. Osswald, Falsche Propheten im Alten Testament, 1962; P. von der Osten-Sacken, Die Apokalyptik in ihrem Verhältnis zur Prophetie und Weisheit, ThEH Neue Folge 157, 1969; O. Plöger, "Priester und Prophet", ZAW 63, 1951, 157 ff.; G. Quell, Wahre und falsche Propheten, 1952; and "Der Kultprophet", TLZ 81, 1956, 401 ff.; R. Rendtorff, "Priesterliche Kulttheologie und prophetische Kultpolemik", TLZ 81, 1956, 339 ff.; "Propheten", EKL III 343 ff.; "Erwägungen zur Frühgeschichte des Prophetentums in Israel", ZTK 59, 1962, 145 ff.; and "Tradition und Prophetie", ThV 8, 1962, 216–26; H. Graf von Reventlow, Das Amt des Propheten bei Amos, FRLANT 80, 1962; "Prophetenamnt und Mittleramt", ZTK 58, 1961, 269–84; Liturgie und prophetisches Ich bei Jeremia, 1963; and Wächter über Israel. Ezechiel und seine Tradition, BZAW 82, 1962; H. Riesenfeld, "Jesus als Prophet", in Spiritus et Veritas, Festschrift K. Kundzin, 1953, 135 ff.; W. Richter, Die sogenannten vorprophetischen Berufungsberichte, FRLANT 101, 1970; A. Satake, Die Gemeindeordnung in der Johannes-Apokalypse, 1966; SB II 626 f.; IV 764–98; E. A. Schächter, "Bundesformular und prophetischer Unheilspruch”, Biblica 48, 1967, 128–31; J. Scharbert, Die Propheten Israels, I–II, 1967; W. Schmauch, “Das prophetische Amt in der Gemeinde”, Junge Kirche 19, 1958, 126 ff.; R. Schnackenburg, “Die Enderwartungen des ‘Propheten’ in den Hoffnungen des Judentums und der Christenheit”, Judaica 8, 1952, 65–94; and “Die Erwartung des Propheten nach dem Neuen Testament und den Qumrantexten”, TU 73, 1959, 622 ff.; H.-J. Schoeps, “Die jüdischen Prophetenmorde”, in Aus frühchristlicher Zeit. Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, 1950, 126 ff.; K. Schwarzwäller, “Kirche und Prophetie”, ErTh 26, 1966, 580 ff.; K. Seybold, Das davidische Königtum im Zeugnis der Propheten, FRLANT 107, 1972; O. H. Steck, Israel und das gewaltsame Geschick der Propheten. Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung des deuteronomischen Geschichtsbildes im Alten Testament, Spätjudentum und Urchristentum, WMANT 23, 1967; and Überlieferung und Zeitgeschichte in den Elia-Erzählungen, WMANT 26, 1968; J. Steinmann, Le Prophétisme biblique des Origines à Osée, 1959; and Le Livre de la Consolation d’Israël et les Prophètes du Retour de l’Éxil, 1961; C. Tresmontant, La Doctrine morale des Prophètes d’Israël 1958; J. Vollmer, Geschichtliche Rückblicke und Motive in der Prophetie des Amos, Hosea und Jesaja, BZAW 119, 1971; E. von Waldow, Der traditionsgeschichtliche Hintergrund der prophetischen Gerichtsreden, BZAW 85, 1963; H. W. Wolff, “Hauptprobleme alttestamentlicher Prophetie”, EvTh 15, 1955, 446 ff. (reprinted in Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament, ThB 22, 1964, 206 ff.); “Das Geschichtsverständnis der alttestamentlichen Prophetie”, EvTh 20, 1960, 218 ff. (reprinted in Probleme alttestamentlicher Hermeneutik, ThB 11, 1968³, 319 ff.) and “Hoseas geistige Heimat”, Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament, 232–50; E. Würthwein, “Der Ursprung der prophetischen Gerichtsrede”, Wort und Existenz, 1970, 111–26; “Amos-Studien”, ibid., 68–110; “Jesaja, 7, 1–9. Ein Beitrag zu dem Thema: Prophetie und Politik”, ibid., 127–43; W. Zimmerli, Studien zur alttestamentlichen Theologie und Prophetie, Gesammelte Aufsätze, II, 1973.

Punishment, Vengeance

$\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\eta$	$\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\eta$ (dikē), justice, punishment, vengeance; $\acute{\epsilon}\kappa\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\acute{\epsilon}\omega$ (ekdikēō), execute justice, punish, avenge; $\acute{\epsilon}\kappa\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\omicron\varsigma$ (ekdikos), avenger; $\acute{\epsilon}\kappa\delta\acute{\iota}\kappa\eta\sigma\iota\varsigma$ (ekdikēsis), vengeance, recompense, punishment.
---------------------------------	--

CL 1. The noun dikē can mean, on the one hand, a mythological personification, the goddess of just punishment (Hesiod, Works 256 ff.), and on the other hand, in legal language, justice (Homer, Il. 16, 388), a judicial case (Hesiod, Works 249), a legal decision or judgment (Homer, Il. 18, 508; Od. 11, 570). It can also mean vengeance or punishment (Hesiod, Works 712; Josephus, Ant. 6, 237 f. War 7, 450; Philo, Op. Mund. 80). Along with the later word dikaïosynē (→ Righteousness), dikē is one of the basic concepts in the Gk. legal world, particularly in the administration of justice.

2. The vb. ekdikēō, be outlawed, avenge, punish, which is first attested in Apollodoros of Athens in 150 B.C., has undergone a striking change in meaning. Etymologically it is derived from ekdikos (Aesch. onwards): one who places himself through his own fault outside the law is outlawed and acts unlawfully. The adj. means something unjust: paschō ekdika, “I suffer injustice.”

But the much more common word with the same content in the Gk. language is ekdikazō (Aristoph. onwards) which means to decide a legal case, punish, avenge. This word gave its meaning to the new Hel. form ekdikēō, so that it moved from the meaning be outlawed to that of avenge, and ekdikos from the meaning outlaw to that of avenger. Correspondingly ekdikēsis should be translated vengeance, recompense. The juridical use of ekdikēō in the papyri is also important. Here it means to decide a case, work as an advocate, defend or help someone to obtain his rights.

OT 1. In the LXX the noun dikē, justice, vengeance, punishment, is surprisingly seldom used to translate Heb. words in comparison with the other words in this group, like dikaioσynē, → righteousness; 21 out of 28 instances of dikē are in the apocryphal literature. Only 9 times does it represent riḥ, law-suit (over 60 occurrences in the MT) and 4 times nāqām, vengeance (which, with nēqāmāh, occurs over 40 times in the MT). It can be used of Yahweh's intervention to exact vengeance and punishment from his people: Lev. 26:25 speaks of the "sword . . . that shall execute vengeance for the [breach of] covenant" (cf. M. Noth, Leviticus, 1965, 194 ff.). Similarly, in Amos 7:4 Yahweh summons fire, to punish with it. But it can also be used of his intervention against his enemies (Deut. 32:41). At a later period, particularly in the Pss., there was an emphasis on his intervention to ensure justice for the person offering prayer (Pss. 9:4 f.; 35:23; 43:1; 74:22; → Righteousness) and for the 'ebyônīm, the poor (Ps. 140:12; → Poor).

In the apocryphal literature dikē means justice (Wis. 1:8), vengeance (cf. Wis. 18:11) and punishment (cf. 2 Macc. 8:11).

2. The LXX's translation of OT concepts like nāqam, avenge, pāqaḏ, visit, punish, riḥ, conduct a law-suit, and dāraš, seek, by ekdikēō is a problem in so far as quite different concepts of justice are here brought into contact with one another. Concepts from the OT's message of justice which communicates to individual men the will of God and from its judicial procedure, which is carried out solely with God's authority, are translated by words from a legal terminology that was previously neutral and secular. The OT took the thought embodied in Deut. 32:35 very seriously, and left vengeance to God (cf. Gen. 4:15; 1 Sam. 24:12[13]; 2 Ki. 9:7; and Pss., e.g. 37:28; 99:8; 58:10; 79:10) or practised it as God's command (Num. 31:2). The day of vengeance is spoken of in Hos. 9:7. Vengeance remained something → holy just as → blood is holy.

The various constructions used are numerous: the thing and the person that are avenged, as well as the victim of the avenging, are generally in the acc. after ekdikēō and in the gen. after ekdikēsis. The phrase ekdikēin ekdikēsin comes from the Heb. nāqam nēqāmāh, take vengeance (e.g. Ezek. 25:12; cf. Lk. 18:7 f.).

U. Falkenroth

3. In the OT punishment and → judgment go together. Sodom and Gomorrah provided a classical instance of Yahweh's punishment of a notoriously wicked pagan city providing a theme which was taken up in the NT (cf. Gen. 19:24 f. with Lk. 17:29; Gen. 19:26 with Lk. 17:32; Gen. 19:28 with Rev. 9:2). For other references to Sodom see Gen. 10:19; 13:10, 12 f.; 14:8, 10 ff.; 18:16–32; Deut. 29:23; 32:32; Isa. 1:9 f.; 3:9; 13:19; Jer. 23:14; 49:18; 50:40; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:46–56; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9 (cf. Matt. 10:15; 11:23 f.; Mk. 6:11; Lk. 10:12; Rom. 9:29; 2 Pet. 2:6; Jude 7; Rev. 11:8). The prophet Amos announced the punishment of the surrounding nations for their crimes against humanity (Amos 1 and 2), but this culminates in the announcement of the punishment of Israel for his transgressions in the form of idolatry (Amos 3:14) and the crimes committed against fellow Israelites (Amos 4:1 ff.). The foreign invasions were construed by the prophets as punishment for Israel's sin, culminating in the destruction of the Northern Kingdom after the fall of Samaria in 722 B.C. (2 Ki. 15–17) and the exile of large sections of the population of Judah in the time of Jeremiah (2 Ki. 23–25), following the fall of Jerusalem (597 B.C.) and its destruction (587 B.C.).

On an individual level the Mosaic legislation specified a range of punishments for crimes both against God and against man. Some of the laws are comparable with those formulated in the Code of Hammurabi who belonged to the old Babylonian Amorite dynasty and reigned between 1728 and 1686 B.C. (for text see ANET, 163–80). However, there was a fundamental difference of outlook. As G. L. Archer observes, “Biblical jurisprudence was based upon the assumption that man is under obligation to carry out the revealed will of God in leading a holy life, respecting the rights of God and man, not simply upon a utilitarian basis of a pragmatic nature, but rather as a creature made in the likeness of God” (“Crimes and Punishments”, ZPEB I 1031).

Archer notes the following crimes against God. Idolatry was punishable by death, normally stoning (Deut. 13:10–16; cf. Exod. 20:3–6; 22:20). Idols, cultic objects and altars were to be destroyed (Deut. 7:5, 25). Infant sacrifice (cf. 2 Ki. 21:6, 16) which was involved in the worship of Moloch and Canaanite idols, was also punishable by death (Exod. 22:18; Lev. 20:27; Deut. 18:10 f.; → Magic). Blasphemy was deemed to bring retribution from Yahweh (Exod. 20:7; 22:28; Lev. 19:12; 24:11–23; Deut. 5:11). The penalty for false prophecy was death (Deut. 18:20 ff.; cf. Jer. 26:8 f.). Violation of the → sabbath (Exod. 20:9 f.; cf. Gen. 2:3; Exod. 16:23) was punished by death (Exod. 31:13–17; Num. 15:32–36), though the punishment was evidently not widely carried out. The warning of Jer. 17:27 suggests that the sabbath was not being kept, but pronounces national retribution. Whereas offences committed by inadvertence could be atoned for (Lev. 16; Num. 15:27), stubbornness was punishable by being cut off from the people, which could mean death (Num. 15:30 f.; Deut. 17:8–12).

Civil crimes included murder which was punishable by death (Gen. 9:6; Exod. 21:12; Num. 35:31). Heb. law permitted no monetary damages as a substitute, as did Hittite law. However, those who had killed inadvertently or accidentally might flee to cities of refuge (Num. 34:22–15). The law provided for execution by the nearest able-bodied male relative of the deceased, “the avenger of blood” (Num. 35:19). But under the monarchy the king seems to have assumed jurisdiction (2 Sam. 13:19; 14:7, 11; 1 Ki. 2:34). In the case of unsolved murder, ritual and sacrificial provision was made lest the land should remain polluted (Deut. 21:1–9). Second degree murder with no clearly specified penalty was recognized (Exod. 21:22–25).

The penalty for criminal assault resulting in serious or permanent injury was stated in terms of the lex talionis, i.e. the same injury must be inflicted on the offender. “If any harm follows, then you shall give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burn for burn, wound for wound, stripe for stripe” (Exod. 21:23 ff.; cf. Lev. 24:19 f.; Deut. 19:21; Matt. 5:38). This was much less severe than the Middle Assyrian laws (cf. ANET, 186), and, in fact, what the OT appears to be doing here is to establish a principle of equity so that punishments fit the crimes. It is perhaps significant that nothing is said as to how the law was to be implemented. Assault on one’s parents was deemed serious enough to be punishable by death (Exod. 21:15). Serious injuries to slaves entitled the slaves to manumission (Exod. 21:26 f.). In cases of robbery, provision was made for restitution plus punitive damages (Exod. 22:1, 4; 22:3; Lev. 6:2-7; 19:13).

In contrast with the Sumerian, Babylonian, Assyrian and Hittite law codes, the Mosaic law made no provision for religious prostitution, and prostitution in general was opposed (→ Discipline). Sodomy and homosexuality were punishable by death (Lev. 18:22, 29; 20:13), as were carnal relations with animals (Lev. 18:23; 20:15). G. L. Archer comments: "All crimes of unchastity were regarded as grievous offences against God, adversely affecting the whole community; failure to punish them would mean the moral decline of Israel to the degenerate level of the pagan Canaanites before them. This, in turn, would lead to their expulsion from the Land of Promise" (ZPEB I 1033; cf. Lev. 18:24-29). Remarriage of a divorced wife would cause the land to sin (Deut. 24:4; → Divorce). The adultery committed by married persons was punishable by stoning (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:14; cf. Exod. 20:14). This extended even to those who were betrothed (Lev. 22:23 f.). There was, however, no set penalty for fornication. An Israelite might even marry a reformed harlot, though priests were not allowed to do so (Lev. 21:7), and fornication by a priest's daughter was a capital crime (Lev. 21:9). Rape carried the death penalty, though the law drew a distinction between acts perpetrated out of doors, where the victim was unable to summon help, and cases where help could be summoned (Deut. 22:23-27). In the case of the seduction of a consenting unbetrothed virgin, the man might take her to wife in payment of fifty shekels to her father (Deut. 22:28 f.; cf. Exod. 22:16 f.). Polygamy was countenanced (→ Marriage), but there were certain forbidden degrees of marriage, and incest constituted a capital crime (Lev. 18:7-18; 20:11-21). On the case of levirate marriage, where a surviving brother marries the childless wife of a deceased brother (Deut. 25:5-10; cf. the Book of Ruth) → Marriage. Intercourse during menstruation (which was treated in the context of the laws dealing with incestual relations) was not subject to a civil penalty but brought ritual uncleanness (Lev. 18:19; 20:18; cf. 15:24).

The Fifth Commandment laid down the decree: "Honour your father and your mother, that your days may be long in the land which the Lord your God gives you" (Exod. 20:12; cf. Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16; Matt. 15:4; Mk. 7:10; Eph. 6:2). Not only was assault on one's parents a capital offence, but so was cursing (Exod. 21:15, 17; Lev. 20:9; Deut. 21:18 ff.). Kidnapping (which in ancient times was practised for purpose of selling the victim as a slave) carried the death penalty (Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). False accusation and perjury carried the same penalty as that required for the crime (Deut. 19:19).

Cases of torts (i.e. personal wrongs dealt with by personal actions rather than by public prosecution) were judged by the elders of a town sitting by the gate (cf. Ruth 4). Such cases included damage to crops and vineyards from straying cattle or fire (Exod. 22:5 f.), injury to livestock or to persons from livestock (Exod. 21:33 f.; Lev. 24:18, 21). On the case of the oppressed who came under Yahweh's special protection (Exod. 22:11-24) → Poor.

Stoning is the most frequently mentioned form of capital punishment in the OT. Perhaps it was used in cases affecting the community at large because it involved the maximum participation of the community including the prosecuting witnesses (Deut. 17:7). For instances see Lev. 20:2-5, 27; 24:15 f.; Num. 15:32-36; Deut.

13:1–5; 17:2–7; 22:22 f.; Jos. 7:27; Jn. 8:7; Acts 7:57. In the case of murder, death by the sword is prescribed by Num. 35:19, 21 (but cf. also Exod. 32:27 and Deut. 13:15 in the cases of apostasy and idolatry). Death by burning was prescribed for certain sexual offences which involved prohibited degrees of intercourse (Lev. 20:14; 21:9). Execution by hanging on a tree involving the public exposure of the victim involved particular shame (Deut. 21:22 f.; cf. Jos. 10:27; for fuller discussion → Cross).

Mutilation is mentioned in Deut. 25:12 and the case of the lex talionis (Exod. 21:23 ff.) noted above. Scourging to a maximum of forty stripes is stipulated in Deut. 25:1–3 (cf. Josephus, Ant. 4, 238; 2 Cor. 11:24; → Beat for other NT instances). It was apparently a penalty for one who unjustly accused his wife of unchastity before marriage (Deut. 22:18). Archer suggests that imprisonment was largely restricted to detention prior to trial (ZPEB I 1036; but cf. Jer. 37:15 f. where Jeremiah was detained without a formal hearing). Monetary fines are mentioned in Exod. 21:22, 30 f.; 22:1–4; Deut. 22:18 f., 29. Enslavement was the penalty prescribed for the thief who could not repay damages (Exod. 22:3). It was also allowed for non-payment of debts (2 Ki. 4:1; Neh. 5:5; Amos 2:6). Exod. 21:2 lays down a maximum of six years in the case of an Israelite. Voluntary slavery is discussed in Lev. 25:39 ff. (→ Slave).

C. Brown

4. Late Judaism remained within the bounds laid down by the OT tradition. The Qumran texts often repeat the prohibition of the independent taking of vengeance. Vengeance belongs to God or to men to whom he has deputed it.

NT 1. In the NT dikē only occurs 3 times, of which 2 are found in the context of the expectation of the judgment (→ Judgment, art. krima). 2 Thess. 1:9 uses it of the punishment of eternal destruction meted out to those who oppress the community, and Jude 7 of the punishment by eternal fire (→ Fire, art. pyr) of the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah, which is used as an example of the judgment of the godless. Acts 28:4 tells how the Maltese supposed that Paul, who had been attacked by the snake, is a murderer whom dikē “does not allow to live.” Some scholars see here an allusion to the Gk. mythological concept of a punitive deity (cf. E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 713).

2. ekdikeō also occurs only seldom in the NT. The passages where it occurs go back to OT traditions, especially to Deut. 32:35, 43, and also to the descriptions of the day of judgment and the tradition of teaching about the state. Lk. gives one example of the purely Gk. sense to execute justice (18:3 ff.), but otherwise it means to punish or avenge.

(a) As in the case of the OT, ekdikeō and its derivatives are chiefly used in the NT with the sense of avenge. No important new thinking lies behind this, since the occurrences mostly appear in the form of OT phrases (and also in quotations) and thus naturally give expression to the vengeance of God. The translation avenge or vengeance is particularly appropriate where ekdikeō is used of God’s activity. This divine vengeance is frequently mentioned in connexion with descriptions of the divine day of judgment. 2 Thess. 1:8 is typical in this respect, using motifs from Isa. 66:15. God’s vengeance on his enemies is a compensation for those who suffer persecution.

Similarly both passages in Rev. (6:10; 19:2) are concerned with the Last Judgment. Both are connected with one another. The first records the anguished questioning and petition of the martyrs for vengeance, i.e. for the final judgment. This is not fulfilled immediately; there is still a delay, a little interval; hence vengeance, purged of all human lust for it, is left to God and its execution is first proclaimed in 19:2 (using the words of 2 Ki. 9:7), once the number of their fellow-servants and brothers is complete (6:11). Here we can see a motive for waiting for God's vengeance; in the words of E. Lohmeyer "only when judgment has been fully executed does full blessedness come to the martyrs" (Die Offenbarung Johannis, HNT 16, 1970³, on Rev. 16:10 f.).

(b) It is not the only motive. While Rev. makes the persecutors and the unbelievers the recipients of vengeance, in Heb. 10:30 it is the community itself. Those who have experienced → grace and who live by it know that God's vengeance is a serious matter and acknowledge his justice in his acts of vengeance. Paul recalls Lev. 19:18 and Deut. 32:35, when he says that vengeance is God's (Rom. 12:19 f.; cf. Heb. 10:30; Matt. 5:38–42). It is always God's prerogative to execute vengeance; instead of vengeance the community is called upon to love its enemies. He who does so "heaps coals of fire upon the head" of his enemy, i.e. he bestows upon him the fruit of → grace, that is, → love and → peace (cf. Prov. 25:21 f.; Matt. 5:44; Lk. 6:27; → Head, or 2). But God will one day uphold his rights in gracious or vengeful judgment.

(c) ekdikos, avenger, in Rom. 13:4 designates an office, since this particular pericope contains a remarkable collection of expressions derived from the language of secular government. The might of the state is entrusted by God with the office of avenger. It is in line with OT thinking that an institution, conceived of in a wholly unmythological way (i.e. the authorities of Rom. 13:1 are not demonic powers), should thus have authority conferred upon it. This applies both to the kings of Israel and to other kings to whom Yahweh has given power (cf. Exod. 22:28; 1 Sam. 15:1; 24:6; 2 Sam. 1:14; 1 Ki. 19:16 ff.; 2 Chr. 36:22 f.; Ezra 1:1 ff.; Prov. 8:15; Isa. 10:5 ff.; 44:28; 45:1). (On Rom. 13:1 ff. → Might, art. exousia, NT.) The very similar passage in 1 Pet. 2:13 ff. confirms that this is a tradition (cf. also Jn. 19:11; Tit. 3:1). If we can translate God's activity of ekdikeō as avenging, then we can also follow Luther in translating ekdikos as avenger in 1 Thess. 4:6 without ignoring the official ring of the word.

(d) We must also mention the secular use of the word as, e.g., in 2 Cor. 7:11 where ekdikēsis, punishment, and apologia, vindication, defence, two terms from criminal law, occur together. Here it just means punishment: Paul's sharp intervention against an "offender" produces his punishment. Similarly he makes known in 2 Cor. 10:6 his readiness to punish every disobedience.

(e) Luke is the only one to use the word once in the everyday legal language of Hellenism, in the parable of the importunate widow (Lk. 18:3 ff.). Here it means to provide someone with justice. On the other hand, the other two passages in Lk.'s writings (Lk. 21:22; Acts 7:24) follows closely the language of the LXX.

3. On the forms of punishment inflicted by the Jews and the Romans in the NT period → Beat, → Council, → Cross. On the penalties imposed in the early Christian communities in connexion with church discipline → Bind, → Destroy, art. olethros, → Open.

U. Falkenroth

κόλασις

κολάζω (kolazō), punish; κόλασις (kolasis), punishment.

CL J. Schneider links the original meaning of kolazō with its etymology, i.e. to maim, cut off. "Punishment is designed to cut off what is bad or disorderly" (TDNT III 814). Both the noun and the vb. were fixed terms in Gk. sacral jurisprudence. In inscriptions there are references to the deity punishing violations of the cultic laws. Plato put forward the view that he who punishes aright does good, and that punishment is a blessing since it frees one from a false frame of soul (Grg. 476a ff.; cf. TDNT III 815).

OT The two terms occur chiefly in non-canonical literature. The vb. kolazō is without Heb. equivalent and is found in 1 Esd. 8:24; Wis. 3:4; 11:5, 8, 16; 12:14 f., 27; 14:10; 16:1, 9; 18:11, 22; Sir. 23:21; Dan. 6:13(12); 1 Macc. 7:7; 2 Macc. 6:14; 3 Macc. 3:26; 7:3, 14; 4 Macc. 2:11; 8:6; 18:5. kolasis stands for miḱšōl, cause of guilt, offence, in Ezek. 14:3, 4, 7; 18:30; 44:12. It is used in connexion with the vb. kālam in the niph., be put to shame, in Ezek. 43:11. It has no Heb. equivalent in Wis. 11:13; 16:2, 24; 19:4; Jer. 18:20; 2 Macc. 4:38; 3 Macc. 1:3; 4 Macc. 8:9; 13:7.

Philo distinguished between the beneficent power of God with which he made the world and which is called God, and the judicial power in virtue of which he rules what is created and which is called Lord (Rer.Div.Her. 166; cf. TDNT III 815 for further references). God's mercy is older than punishment (Deus.Imm. 76) and God prefers to forgive rather than to punish (Spec.Leg. 2, 196). Punishment is for those who will not listen to reason (Agric. 40). Both Josephus (e.g. Ant. 1, 60) and Philo speak of kolasis as divine retribution. For other instances in non-biblical literature see Arndt, 440. The idea of eternal punishment kolasis aiōnios is found in Test.Reub. 5:5.

NT Both words occur only twice each in the NT. The vb. is found in Acts 4:21 of the Jewish leaders' treatment of Peter and John: "And when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding no way to punish them, because of the people; for all men praised God for what had happened." It is used of divine chastisement in 2 Pet. 2:9: "then the Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trial, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment until the day of judgment."

The noun occurs in 1 Jn. 4:18: "There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear. For fear has to do with punishment, and he who fears is not perfected in love." Schneider takes this to mean that "the man who lives in fear (before God) is already punished by this fear. His fear is his punishment" (TDNT III 817). He notes, however, that most commentators do not take it in this way. Rather, the meaning would seem to be that continued existence in fear is a sign of an inadequate relationship with God which is meant to exist on the plane of love. The love in question is both God's love for us and ours for him and the brethren (cf. v. 19 with 2:9 ff.; 3:11-18; 4:7-12). When men live on that level, they have "confidence for the day of judgment" (v. 17).

Matt. 25:46 raises the question of eternal punishment. At the end of the parable of the sheep and the goats the Lord separates the blessed, who manifested their righteousness in practical love, from the cursed who failed to do so, not recognizing the incognito presence of Christ in the needy brethren. "Then he will say to those at his left hand, 'Depart from me, you cursed, into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels. . . .' And they will go away into eternal punishment [eis kolasin aiōnion], but the righteous into eternal life [eis zoēn aiōnion]" (Matt. 25:41, 46). The passage has often been cited in support of the doctrine of endless torment. But it may be questioned whether it implies more than the finality of judgment. The term eternal has both qualitative and quantitative overtones (→ Time, art. aiōn). Jesus did not teach, like Plato and others, that the → soul was intrinsically immortal and that it would necessarily go on after death. References to the eternal → fire (Matt. 18:8; cf. Mk. 9:43–48; Jude 7) are necessarily figurative.

In attempting to determine the meaning of such passages, attention needs to be paid to semantics and the philosophical analysis of the structure and function of language. The words "life" and "judgment" are what I. T. Ramsey called models which describe something in familiar terms which is, in fact, not capable of being described in a purely literal way. For although eternal can be entered into now, its future character lies hidden beyond this life. The word "eternal" is what Ramsey termed a qualifier which serves as a directive to understand the model in a special way (Religious Language: An Empirical Placing of Theological Phrases, 1957, 61 f.; cf. also Freedom and Immortality, 1960, 91–148). The qualifier is not simply a literal description of the noun but a reminder that it is being used in a non-literal sense (cf. such phrases as "heavenly Father", "infinite love"). Similarly the phrase "eternal sin" (Mk. 3:29) does not mean an endless sin but one which has dimensions and ramifications beyond the present life.

Eternal → judgment is referred to in Heb. 6:2 and 2 Thess. 1:9. This, like the idea of eternal fire, does not necessarily imply that those concerned go on being judged or continue to be consumed. If the metaphor of fire is to be pressed at all, it would imply that the fire of righteousness continues to burn, but that what is consumed once is consumed for good (cf. also Paul's observation about works being consumed by fire, 1 Cor. 3:15). Rev. 20:10 speaks of the beast and false prophet tormented for ever in the lake of fire into which are also cast Death, Hades and anyone whose name is not in "the book of life" (Rev. 20:14 f.). The latter passage suggests that the lake of fire is not the same as → hell. For the author of Rev., all "dogs and sorcerers and fornicators and murderers and idolaters, and every one who loves and practises falsehood" are excluded from the new Jerusalem (Rev. 22:15). The parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Lk. 16:19–31) pictures the rich man's conscious awareness of torment in the after-life (for discussion see J. D. M. Derrett, "Dives and Lazarus and the Preceding Sayings", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 78–99). In interpreting this parable it has to be decided whether the parable is intended to teach the conscious ongoing torment of the unrighteous or whether the point is: if only the unrighteous could return to life, they would testify to the tragic mistake that they have made, which has led to their eternal rejection, but as it is, people have sufficient warning in the law and the prophets.

C. Brown

→ Anger, → Beat, → Council, → Cross, → Death, → Destroy, → Discipline, → Divorce, → Hell, → Judgment, → Life, → Might, → Present, → Resurrection, → Time.

(a). A. Alt, "The Origins of Israelite Law", in Essays on Old Testament History and Religion, 1966, 79–132; G. L. Archer, "Crimes and Punishments" (ZPEB I 1030–36); B. F. C. Atkinson, Life and Immortality: An Examination of the Nature and Meaning of Life and Death as they are Revealed in the Scriptures, 1969; J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting, 1934; L. Boettner, Immortality, 1956; H. Buis, The Doctrine of Eternal Punishment, 1956; and "Punishment, Everlasting", ZPEB IV 954–57; H. B. Clark, Biblical Law, 1944²; O. Cullmann, The State in the New Testament, 1957; and Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead?, 1958; R. B. Girdlestone, Dies Irae: The Judgment of the Great Day, Viewed in the Light of Scripture and Conscience, 1869; H. E. Guillebaud The Righteous Judge: A Study of the Biblical Doctrine of Everlasting Punishment, 1964; M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross, 1977; M. Horbery, An Enquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Duration of Future Punishment, 1744; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, 1969; J. H. Leckie, The World to Come and Final Destiny, 1922²; C. S. Lewis, "The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment", The Churchman 78, 1959, 55–60; W. Lillie, "Towards a Biblical Doctrine of Punishment", SJT 21, 1968, 449–61; G. E. Mendenhall, Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East, 1955; A. Phillips, Ancient Israel's Criminal Law: A New Approach to the Decalogue, 1970; J. A. T. Robinson, In the End God, 1968²; S. D. F. Salmond, The Christian Doctrine of Immortality, 1903⁵; J. Schneider, kolazō etc., TDNT III 814–17; G. Schrenk, dikē, TDNT II 178–82; and ekdikeō etc., TDNT II 442–46; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1963²; V. F. Storr, Christianity and Immortality, 1918; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 143–63.

(b) J. Blinzler, "Die Strafe für Ehebruch in Bibel und Halacha", NTS 4, 1957–8, 32–47; H. Gollwitzer, "Das Wesen der Strafe in theologischer Sicht", EvTh 24, 1964, 195 ff.; E. Käsemann, "Römer 13 in unserer Generation", ZTK 56, 1959, 16 ff.; A. Strobel, "Zum Verständnis von Röm. 13", ZNW 47, 1956, 67 ff.

Pure, Clean

The study of religions reveals a widely held view that the world is divided into areas of purity and impurity; cf. the corresponding distinction between sacred (→ Holy) and profane. Through a process of purification, originally of a cultic and ritual nature, separation can be effected from areas of impurity (e.g. dirt, disease) and unclean powers (e.g. foreign gods, demons, or one's own sin), so as to achieve the state of purity needed for participation in the cult or enjoyment of the blessing of God. The Gk. language has two adjectives signifying purity: hagnos and katharos. hagnos is a word originally connected with a root meaning holy; it signifies a qualitative holiness or purity belonging to the deity and the associated things or persons (cultic objects and officials). More common are katharos and its cognates, indicating cultic, physical or moral cleanliness in persons and things. In the NT words from both roots are found in a specifically limited and usually metaphorical sense.

 ἁγνός 	ἁγνός (hagnos), pure, holy; ἁγνίζω (hagnizō), purify; ἁγνεΐα (hagneia), purity, chastity, propriety; ἁγνισμός (hagnismos), purification; ἁγνότης (hagnotēs), purity, sincerity.
--	---

CL hagnos, adj. from the vb. hazomai which is in turn derived from* hagiomai, to stand in awe of someone, originally meant that which inspires (religious) awe, tabu (→ Godliness, art. sebomai). In secular Gk. usage hagnos is found from Homer onwards. In religious language it is primarily an attribute of deity; then it refers to things having some relation to the deity. It thus comes to mean holy, in the sense of pure. Ritual purity is in mind here, e.g. avoidance of blood-guilt, touching corpses. Since to the primitive mind sexual intercourse also makes a person ritually unclean, hagnos came to mean chaste. The originally cultic, religious term was then transferred to the sphere of morality, and is frequently used in the Hellenistic period in the sense of innocent, morally faultless. It is also used as a compliment for faultless execution of office. From hagnos are derived the vb. hagnizō, to purify (by means of expiatory rites), first found in Soph., and the cognate noun hagnismos, purification. Both terms are limited to the cultic sphere. hagneia, a noun derived from hagnos, is likewise found first in Soph., and is used of cultic purity, chastity, purity of mind. Another noun derived from hagnos is hagnotēs, which is unknown outside the NT and means purity, moral blamelessness.

OT 1. In the LXX hagnos is rare (11 examples), since the word normally used for cultic purity is → katharos. hagnos translates the Heb. ṯāhōr, ritually pure, and zak, morally upright. In distinction from hagios (Heb. qāḏōš, set apart for God, appropriate to God, → holy), and katharos, which refers to both cultic and ethical purity, the particular nuance of hagnos is one of integrity: e.g. Ps. 12:6, “The promises of the Lord are promises that are pure” (cf. Ps. 19:8); Prov. 20:9, “Who can say, I have made my heart clean; I am pure from my sin?” (cf. Prov. 15:26; 21:8). It is significant that hagnos is found chiefly in the Wisdom Literature.

2. More common in the LXX is the vb. hagnizō, which describes the measures taken to achieve eligibility for the cult. Whereas hagios (→ holy) always includes the thought of the power and might of that which is holy, hagnizō expresses consistently the removal of what is not seemly (e.g. Exod. 19:10, washing of garments; Num. 6:3, abstinence from alcohol), especially in the sense, to purify oneself from sin or uncleanness (hith. of hāṯā, e.g. Num. 8:21; 19:12). hagneia also refers in the OT (Num. 6:2–21, law of the Nazirite; 2 Chr. 30:19, sanctuary) and Apoc. (1 Macc. 14:36, temple) to ritual purity.

NT 1. In the NT only hagnizō and hagnismos (only at Acts 21:26) occur in their proper meaning, ritual purification: once in connexion with the Jews before the Passover (Jn. 11:55); later when Paul takes a vow in Jerusalem (Acts 21:24–26; 24:18). In Jas. 4:8; 1 Pet. 1:22; 1 Jn. 3:3, on the other hand, hagnizō refers to moral purification. hagnos is lacking in the Gospels, Heb. and Rev. altogether; it is found only in the epistles, where Hellenistic influence is noticeable. It means: (a) chaste (2 Cor. 11:2; Tit. 2:5); (b) innocent with regard to something (2 Cor. 7:11); (c) morally pure, upright: said of Christ (1 Jn. 3:3); in respect of a Christian’s behaviour (1 Tim. 5:22; 1 Pet. 3:2; Phil. 4:8); as an attribute of wisdom (Jas. 3:17). The adv. hagnōs refers to sincerity in Christian service (Phil. 1:17); the noun hagneia to moral purity and blamelessness (1 Tim. 4:12; 5:2).

2. This survey of the occurrence and meaning of this root in the NT shows that the original significance, i.e. ritual purity, no longer has a great part to play. This is understandable, since it was only the Jewish Christian community in Jerusalem which clung to the temple cult and therefore had to observe the ordinances connected with it (Acts 3:1; 21:18–26). To all the Gentile churches, ritual purification probably meant nothing, for nowhere in the NT – apart from the apostolic decree (Acts 14:28–29), which was intended to make it possible for Gentile and Jewish Christians to live together in mixed churches – are cultic regulations for Christians to be found. The concept of purification gains however a new meaning, for the term is used to express the moral purity which is demanded in the behaviour of Christians. Here the starting point is the fact that Christ is hagnos, pure, i.e. without sin (1 Jn. 3:3). Because he is pure, those who belong to him should also be pure. Through his unique sacrificial death Christ has not only made the normal sacrifices of the temple cult unnecessary, but he has also exposed their real meaning. It is a similar situation with the purity which he gives his own. It is more than ritual purity. Purity and integrity are, moreover, not merely human virtues: they indicate the relation of a person to God. Therefore this term is no longer used of sexual purity or abstinence. The NT term for that is enkrateia (→ Discipline).

H. Baltensweiler

καθαρός	καθαρός (katharos), clean, pure; καθαίρω (kathairō), to clean, make clean; ἐκκαθαίρω (ekkathairō), clean out; καθαρίζω (katharizō), cleanse, purify; καθαρότης (katharotēs), cleanness, purity; καθαρισμός (katharismos), cleansing; ἀκάθαρτος (akathartos), unclean; ἀκαθαρσία (akatharsia), uncleanness; περικάθαρμα (perikatharma), refuse, offscouring.
---------	--

CL The family of words which go with katharos embraces the realms of physical, cultic and ethical purity.

1. The adj. katharos (derivation obscure, probably nothing to do with Latin castus) is common from Homer onwards, and means: (a) originally, clean, in a physical sense as opposed to rhypparos = dirty (e.g. pure, clean water, Eur. Hippolytus 209); (b) clean, in the sense of free, without things which come between, as opposed to plērēs or mestos, full (e.g. en katharō, Homer Il. 23, 61); (c) ritually clean, as opposed to akathartos, unclean; (d) in a religious sense, morally pure (e.g. katharos adikias, Plato, Republic 6, 496d; katharos cheiras, Hdt., 1, 35).

The cognate vb. kathairō meant originally to clean, sweep, cleanse (Diod.Sic. 19, 13, 4); in the Koine it means to clean (in the NT only at Jn. 15:2). The compound vb. ekkathairō (Homer) expresses an intensification of the primary meaning; to sweep out, cleanse thoroughly (e.g. Hdt. 2, 68; in the NT, 1 Cor. 5:7; with an accusative of the one cleansed, 2 Tim. 2:21). More common is the later Hellenistic vb. katharizō, to cleanse, in physical, ritual or religious sense (e.g. Josephus, Ant. 10, 70, to purify the land).

The noun katharotēs goes back to cl. Gk. (Xen., Mem. 2, 1, 22; Plato, Laws, 778c), and means cleanness, in both literal and figurative senses. The later Hellenistic term katharismos, which replaces the Attic katharmos, is found first as a technical term in agriculture, and then generally in the sense of physical or ritual cleaning (Michigan Papyri 185, 16).

The negative terms formed by the addition of alpha-privative, i.e. the adj. akathartos and the noun akatharsia, refer to the whole realm of uncleanness, ranging from menstruation to moral pollution through wrongdoing (cf. Plutarch, De Placitis Philosophorum 5, 6; Plato, Laws 4, 716e). perikatharma, a substantival form from perikathairō, to clean all round, from every side, refers to what is removed in a thorough clean-up. It means dirt, refuse (Epict. 3, 22, 78; in the NT only at 1 Cor. 4:13, offscouring of the world; → Dirt).

2. In Gk. religion the system of purificatory and expiatory rites had nothing to do with penitence for sin or an inward purification of the heart. It was concerned rather with the warding off of demonic spirits, which wandered round about, by means of exorcism and ritual acts. It thus had an apotropaic function. A woman after childbirth, and also her child, were unclean. So too was a dead person. Those who touched them must therefore undergo purification, which removed the uncleanness which had come from without. A person who shed blood, even if he had done so in the course of executing justice, had to be cleansed. The blood of an → animal was poured over the hands of the person who had become unclean, so banishing death by death, i.e. by the substitutionary sacrifice of an animal. Later these rites, which had affected the whole of people's ordinary and religious life, were given a deeper, ethical meaning. The credit for this goes to the Orphics and Pythagoreans, but above all to the mystery religions and the philosophers. This transformation in the concept of purity may be seen from the inscription on the temple of Asclepius at Epidaurus: "Let only the pure cross the threshold of the fragrant temple: and no one is pure, save he who has holy thoughts." A person who was initiated was called kekatharmenos (Plato, Phaedo 69c).

The Delphic oracle had a great influence. Not only was it responsible for purification in cases of murder; quite apart from this, the spirit of Delphi, which inspired the whole life of Greece, led to a relaxation and deeper interpretation of the old purificatory rites (cf. T. von Scheffer, Hellenistische Mysterien und Orakel, 1940, 139; → Prophet CL). It was a liberating spirit, a spirit of moderation, that went out from Delphi. It is typified by the third of the old inscriptions which adorn the Temple of Apollo at Delphi: along with gnōthi seauton, "Know thyself", and mēden agan, "Nothing overmuch", are the words metanoei hamartōn, "Repent [i.e. get a new spirit] if you have sinned" (cf. R. Pfeiffer, "The Image of the Delian Apollo and Apolline Ethics", Journal of the Warburg Institute 15, 1952, 20 f.).

3. The concept "pure" and its opposite "impure" are woven into the history of all religions. In primitive culture there is the idea of a supernatural force (tabu), possessing dangerous powers which are conceived in material terms and thought to be transferable by physical contact. In particular, → birth, → death, and sexual processes (discharges, menstruation, intercourse) are associated with the power-charged tabu, making subsequent purification necessary where there has been contact with them. As religions developed, this supernatural force came to be seen not only as a threat, but also as a friendly deity. A person wishing to approach the deity must be careful not to offend the latter by uncleanness which contradicts its nature. This is how the demand arose for cultic purification. The priest must undertake purificatory rites, removed and washing away what is unclean, in order to free the individual from the evil and demonic influences which constantly threaten him and cause him anxiety. Not until later was purity conceived in an inward sense, with the result that it was freed from ritual and linked instead to morality, so gaining an ethical character. In the comparative study of religions, however, the general rule is that purificatory rites are divorced from ethics, and this may be traced throughout the whole range of world religions.

OT 1. In the LXX katharos renders 18 different Heb. equivalents, but by far the most frequent is ṭāhōr, in the sense of ritual purity. Occasionally the LXX also translates the Heb. nāqî, pure, innocent (Job 4:7), and zākaḳ, to be bright, pure, innocent (Job 15:15) by katharos. The negative adj. akathartos corresponds to ṭāmē', the noun akatharsia to ṭum'āh, both principally in the sense of ritual impurity (e.g. Lev. 5:3; 15:24). katharizō is the equivalent of the qal and piel of tāhar (Lev. 12:7, 8), and sometimes also of the piel of hāṭā' (Lev. 8:15). katharizō can thus also be used as a synonym for exhilaskesthai, to atone (Lev. 16:30). The majority of references to purity and impurity are widely thought to come from relatively late texts, viz. the Priestly writer and the prophet Ezekiel with his background in priestly circles. But this does not preclude the possibility that the distinction between clean and unclean goes back to a very early period. Within the same realm of ideas are the concepts of → holy (Heb. qādōš; LXX hagios), and profane (Heb. hōl; LXX koinos; → Fellowship, art. koinōnia).

2. In the OT also purity and impurity are spoken of chiefly in a cultic sense. The distinction between them is inseparably connected with Israel's belief in Yahweh. It is grounded on the presupposition that uncleanness and Yahweh are irreconcilable opposites. Purity is therefore regarded, as a rule tacitly, as the norm, qualifying one to take part in the cultus; impurity is inimical to Yahweh and separates one from worship and from God's people, so that it must be opposed and purged out as an abomination (Lev. 7:19 f.). This distinction can be described as the pre-ethical foundation of the cultic and secular life of Israel.

(a) It begins with the person himself. Diseases, especially → leprosy, render him unclean. One of the duties of the priests is to pronounce a person who has contracted leprosy either clean or unclean by means of the so-called declaratory formulae (e.g. Lev. 13:17, 44). Here the close association between sin and disease in the faith of Israel finds expression. Likewise sexual processes are regarded as making a person unclean (emission of semen, Lev. 15:16; menstruation, Lev. 15:19; unhealthy discharges, Lev. 15:2, 25; intercourse, 1 Sam. 21:5 f.; adultery, Lev. 18:20; rape, Gen. 34:5; homosexuality, Lev. 18:22; and other sexual aberrations, Lev. 18:6 ff.). These regulations are directed in particular against the sexual practices of the Canaanites. A dead body is unclean in the highest degree; its uncleanness is transferred to every person who is present and also to open vessels (Num. 19:14 f.). Whereas in general, cleansing with clear water is sufficient, in cases of defilement by contact with a dead body special cleansing water, previously mixed with the ashes of a red heifer, is necessary (Num. 19). This practice expresses Israel's decisive rejection of all forms of a cult of the dead, as found in the religions round about.

(b) Lev. 11 presents a catalogue of clean and unclean → animals, which may or may not be eaten. The purpose of this distinction is to guard against animal worship (which was occasionally practised in the Northern Kingdom, 1 Ki. 12:28 ff.), to show Israel's rejection of animals symbolizing foreign religions (e.g. the pig in the Adonis-Tammuz cult), and to formulate health regulations. Foreign territory is likewise regarded as unclean, since foreign gods are worshipped there (Amos 7:17). Even Israel's own land and his temple can be defiled by idolatry (Jer. 2:7; 7:30). The temple, the altar and the most holy place, as the abodes of Yahweh, are the places of greatest purity and sanctity; because of the uncleanness of the Israelites, they need regular purification by the ritual of atonement (Lev. 16).

(c) Even the prophets, with the occasional polemic against the cult, do not abandon the distinction between clean and unclean. They extend and spiritualize the cultic concepts, for in criticizing cultic abuses they introduce a concept of purity which has to do with people and their behaviour (Jer. 2:23; Isa. 6:5). The concept of impurity thus approaches those of → guilt and → sin (Jer. 33:8; Ezek. 39:24; cf. Ps. 51).

Thus when the OT distinguishes between clean and unclean, it is far from being concerned merely with cold, legalistic superficialities. Rather, we have here evidence of the dynamic struggle of the Yahweh religion, as it sought to establish itself in the face of rivals constantly appearing in the cultic world of Israel and her neighbours. "It is precisely in this grasp of the material side of life by the cultic sphere that Jahweh's urgent will to be immanent comes to expression, a will which is wholly unsatisfied with Israel's spirituality" (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 279).

3. It was left to late Judaism to surround the laws of purity with a multitude of casuistic and sometimes grotesque prohibitions and commands, which made the regulations into a law which was hard to fulfil. A → Pharisee was defiled even by sitting on the clothes of one of the "people of the land" (am hā'āreṣ), who could not read the Torah (Hagigah 2:7).

The commonest act of ritual purification was the washing of the hands before the blessing at a meal (cf. Jn. 2:6; Mk. 7:3 f.). The requirement of hand-washing applied also to the hours of prayer (→ Baptism; → Hand). According to Rabbi Johanan (c. A.D. 250), the recitation of the Shema must be done as follows to be perfectly correct: one must relieve oneself, wash one's hands over it, put on one's phylacteries (the small cases containing parchment rolls on which were written the passages Exod. 13:1–10; 11–16; Deut. 6:4–9; 11:13–21), and then speak and pray the "Hear, O Israel" (R. Meyer, TDNT III 421 f.; → Command; → Hear).

The regulations about purity were meant as a guide for life, but they became a heavy burden. Certainly there can be found in Judaism the development of a spiritual and ethical view of purity, e.g., when Rabbi Meir (c. A.D. 150) says, "Cleanse and sanctify yourself from every sin and fault" (Berakoth 17a). But this and similar sayings were unable to check the development of a legalistic system of casuistry.

4. The Essenes were even stricter than the Pharisees on matters of purity and purification. Since they regarded themselves as the priestly, redemptive community of the end-time, they made the rules for the priests, particularly those regarding purity, binding on the whole community. Daily immersion was practised in the water-pools which have been uncovered in the excavations of the ruins at Qumran. If a person offended in some way against the rules of the community he was excluded temporarily or permanently from the purity of the many (i.e. the whole community) (e.g. IQS 6:16 f., 25; 7:3, 16). At the same time, however, fig. language is used when an individual gives thanks that God has cleansed him from sin (IQS 3:4–12; 4:20 f.). (For further discussion see A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, especially 141 f., 191 f.)

NT In the NT katharos and its cognates occur in nearly all the writings. Instances are rather more common in the Synoptic Gospels, Heb. and the Pastoral Epistles than elsewhere. Paul seldom uses the words. On the whole, references to purity are not so frequent as, for instance, those to words derived from hagios, → holy. It is not possible without bias to speak of a unifying concept of purity in the NT. Here too we find katharos used in the physical (e.g. Rev. 15:6), cultic (e.g.

Matt. 8:2-4; Lk. 17:14) and spiritual (e.g. Matt. 5:8) senses. However, the concept of purity did acquire a new character through the preaching and person of Jesus.

1. (a) Jesus developed his doctrine of purity in the struggle against Pharisaism. In Matt. 23:25 f. he rejects the observance of ritual regulations on the ground that this kind of purity is merely external. Behind the practices of the Pharisees lurks the misguided notion that uncleanness coming in a concrete form from outside can defile a person (Matt. 15:11, 16 f. par. Mk. 7:15, 18). The opposite is true: "The things which come out of a man are what defile him" (Mk. 7:15, 20 par.). For from within, out of the heart of man, come evil thoughts, murder, wickedness, fornication, foolishness etc. (Mk. 7:21-23). Jesus countered the Pharisaic emphasis on cleansing the hands with a demand for purity of heart, as expressed in the sixth Beatitude: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. 5:8). "In Ps. 24.3 f. access to God's presence during Temple worship is for him who has 'clean hands and a pure heart'. These are the spiritually 'pure', not the ritually or ceremonially clean. To 'see God' is a pictorial expression indicating the bliss of fellowship with God in the Kingdom (cf. Ps. 17.15; 42.3; 4 Ezra 7.98 - 'for they hasten to behold the face of him whom they served in life and from whom they are to receive their reward when glorified')" (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 113). For the pure love of Jesus, i.e. the love which surrenders itself fully to God and to other men, there are no longer any unclean foods (Mk. 7:19c). Jesus sat down at table with tax collectors and sinners (Mk. 2:13-17). He did not repel the lepers, but healed them (Lk. 17:11-19). He talked to → Samaritans (Lk. 17:19c) and even Gentiles (Matt. 8:5-13; 15:21-28; → Greek; → People). This does not mean that Jesus annulled the purity regulations of the Torah (cf. e.g. Lk. 17:14-17). But in removing the dividing barriers of the ceremonial law, and turning the Pharisaic concept of purity on its head by demanding purity of heart and of character, he broke through the innermost essence of Judaism and left it behind him (cf. E. Käsemann, Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 39 f.).

(b) For the Christian community at Jerusalem, at least, it was a very difficult matter to bring themselves to step across the barriers which Jesus had broken down; for as Jewish Christians they held on at first to the ceremonial law and the temple cultus. This difficulty is illustrated by the story of the conversion of the centurion Cornelius as a result of Peter's preaching (Acts 10:1-11:18). In a vision Peter becomes aware of the invalidity of the outward distinction between clean and unclean, "What God has cleansed, you must not call common" (Acts 10:15). In the apostolic decree of the Jerusalem council, ritual requirements were laid upon the Gentile church at Antioch (Acts 15:29; → Noah on possible link with the "Noachian decrees"); but on the same occasion the view prevailed that God has made no distinction between Jews and Gentiles, but cleanses men's hearts by faith (Acts 15:9).

2. (a) Paul was the first to recognize clearly that Christ had brought about the end of the law, and that accordingly all cultic and ceremonial distinctions had become obsolete. In the controversy between the strong brethren and the weak, distinguished by their attitude to the eating of meat which had been used in heathen sacrifice, Paul comes down resolutely on the side of the strong: "Everything is clean” (Rom. 14:20; cf. also Tit. 1:15; “To the pure [through faith] all things are pure”). For him the only reason for observing any kind of legalistic rules (e.g. religious festivals, Rom. 14:5; abstinence from alcohol, Rom. 14:21) is regard for the weaker brother. There is no longer any question of their having absolute validity.

(b) In the Johannine writings purity is brought into relation with the saving death of Jesus. In other words, it is given an explicit christological foundation: “The blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn. 1:7; cf. 1:9). The story of the washing of the disciples’ feet also shows that those who allow themselves to be served (as in baptism) by Jesus are clean (Jn. 13:10; cf. also Eph. 5:26). Purity is mediated by the word of Christ (Jn. 15:3). In Johannine thought, therefore, purity is not an ethical quality which a man must work for, but the outworking of the fact that the church belongs to Christ.

(c) The Epistle to the Hebrews interprets the death of Jesus with the help of OT ritual concepts, in order to demonstrate the superior quality of the new covenant over the old (Heb. 9:13–14). In contrast to the purification of the OT temple by sacrifice, repeated every year, which the writer interprets as an annual reminder of sin (10:1–4), the purification effected by the blood of Christ is valid once and for all. Moreover, it serves not only to bring outward purification, but rather cleansing from sin (1:3; 10:22). Like 1 Jn., Heb. links the concept of purity with that of → forgiveness (Heb. 9:22).

(d) It is not until the Pastoral and Catholic Epistles (especially Jas., 1 Pet.) that the concept of purity gains in part an ethical character. The Epistles to Timothy, in language formally similar to the preaching of Jesus, exhort to purity of heart and conscience (1 Tim. 1:5; 3:9; 2 Tim. 2:22). Meanwhile in content, the focus shifts from the person of Jesus to didactic instruction: “The aim of our charge is love that issues from a pure heart and a good conscience and sincere faith” (1 Tim. 1:5; cf. 1 Pet. 1:22).

The Epistle of James shows a certain tendency to return to a concept of purity already discarded by Paul and John, in that it describes self-denial in the face of a sinful world as pure and undefiled religion (Jas. 1:27). The nearest the NT comes to traditional Jewish thinking is in the Revelation, with its talk of purity in terms of physically clean linen garments (15:6; 19:8, 14) and the new Jerusalem of pure → gold (21:18, 21).

3. This survey of the history of these terms goes to show how variously, even in the NT, the purity which Jesus demanded, and which he conferred, was understood. Paul and John come nearest to showing its universal scope and liberating character; in the later writings a narrowing and moralizing tendency may be observed. The history of the concept demonstrates how the NT writers struggled to maintain an evangelical doctrine of purity, and how easy it is to fall back into a legalistic outlook. It is significant that in the NT comparatively little use is made of the idea of purity in preaching Christ or in Christian ethics. The preaching and teaching are dominated rather by key words like → discipleship, obedience (→ Hear, art. hypakouō), sanctification (→ Holy, art. hagios), or → love. Probably the concept of purity was not an appropriate image to convey the whole breadth of NT ethics, or even the preaching of Christ. All the more surprising and alarming is it, therefore, that in the course of the church’s history there have again and again been groups and sects which have taught that a rigorous and ascetic purity is a distinguishing mark of Christian faith, and which have often enough sought to impose this by laws and by compulsion. Frequently, like the Essenes, they have assumed the name of katharoi, pure ones. Their genealogy stretches from the church of Marcion, through the Montanists, Manichaeans and Donatists of the early church, the medieval Cathari, and the Anabaptist movement at the time of the Reformation, to radical groups in the Pietist movement (Voetius, Arnold) – to mention only the most important. They all have in common a view of purity, which is, generally speaking, nearer to the radical Judaism of the Pharisees or Essenes, than to the NT doctrine of purity as introduced by Christ. This development shows that in Christian proclamation the struggle between → law and → gospel must constantly be fought anew, in order that a Christ-centred doctrine of purity may be achieved, liberating rather than bringing legalism and anxiety to men.

H.-G. Link, J. Schattenmann

→ Animal, → Baptism, → Defile, → Demon, → Dirt, → Hand, → Head, → Heart, → Holy, → Leprosy, → Priest, → Sacrifice, → Sin

(a). J. B. Bauer, "Clean and Unclean", EBT I 118–21; G. W. Buchanan, "The Role of Purity in the Structure of the Essene Sect", Revue de Qumrân 15, 4, 1974, 397–406; C. H. Cave, "The Obedience of Unclean Spirits", NTS 11, 1964–65, 93–97; F. Hauck, hagnos etc., TDNT I 122 ff.; J. Jocz, "Clean", ZPEB I 884–87; A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966; G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, 1964²; R. Meyer and F. Hauck, katharos etc., TDNT III 413–31; M. Noth, "The Laws in the Pentateuch: Their Assumptions and Meaning", in The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Studies, 1966, 1–107; R. Pfeiffer, "The Image of the Delian Apollo and Apolline Ethics", Journal of the Warburg Institute, 15, 1952, 20 ff.; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 272–79; L. E. Toombs, "Clean and Unclean", IDB I 641–48; G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries, 1967.

(b). J. Döllner, Die Reinheits- und Speisegesetze des Alten Testaments, Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen 7, 2 f., 1917; R. Hink, R. Rendtorff, and E. Lohse, "Rein, Unrein", *RGG*³ V 939 ff.; K. Koch, "Reinigung, kultische", EKL III 576 ff.; W. Kornfeld, "Reine und unreine Tiere im Alten Testament", Kairos 7, 1965, 134–47; T. von Scheffer, Hellenistische Mysterien und Orakel, 1940; T. Wächter, Reinheitsvorschriften im griechischen Kult, Religionsgeschichtliche Versuche und Vorarbeiten 9, 1, 1910.

Q

Quench

σβέννυμι

σβέννυμι (sbennymi), quench, extinguish, quell.

CL The underlying idea of the vb. is to extinguish by drowning with water, as opposed to smothering; to allay or subdue, the latter especially metaphorically. The vb. is of ancient origin, and is found from Homer onwards. It remained virtually unchanged in its basic meaning throughout the centuries. In the classical authors it means literally to put out, quell, quench, check (cf. Lat. extinguere). When applied to liquids, it means to dry up, evaporate. In the passive the term is used occasionally of people becoming extinct, while in medical literature it describes the disappearance of inflammation. These, however, are rather special uses of an otherwise well-understood term. In both voices sbennymi lent itself readily to metaphorical usage. In a late Gk. papyrus it means to wash out, erase.

OT In the LXX the term is found with its normal literal meaning, though metaphorical usage occurs in Cant. 8:7 (the quenching of love) and 4 Macc. 3:17 (the quenching of passion) and occasionally elsewhere. The common Heb. equivalent is kābah, extinguish, quench (Lev. 6:5 f. [12 f.]; 2 Sam. 14:7; 21:17; 2 Ki. 22:17; 2 Chr. 29:7; 34:25; Amos 5:6; Isa. 1:31; 34:10; 42:3; 43:17; 66:24; Jer. 4:4; 7:20; 17:27; 21:12; Ezek. 21:3 f. [20:47 f.]; 32:7; Cant. 8:7). Occasionally it translates dā'ak, be extinguished (Job 18:5 f.; 21:17; Prov. 13:9; 20:20; 24:20; Isa. 43:17). In Job 30:8 it translates nākā', be scourged out of. There is no Heb. equivalent in Lev. 9:2(9); Est. 4:17; Job 4:10; 16:15(16); 34:26; 40:12(7); Prov. 10:7; Wis. 2:3; 16:17; Isa. 42:4; Sir. 23:16; 28:12, 23; 3 Macc. 6:34; 4 Macc. 3:17; 9:20; 18:20. šābar, break, is used in Ps. 104(103):11, and dā'ak in Ps. 118(117):12, where the ET has quench, but neither verse has sbennymi in the LXX. In Josephus, War 7, 405, it is used of extinguishing fire.

NT sbennymi is used consistently in the NT in a literal sense (Matt. 12:20; 25:8; Mk. 9:48; Eph. 6:16; Heb. 11:34) and also in a metaphorical sense (1 Thess. 5:19).

In Eph. 6:16 the believer is urged to shelter behind an all-embracing → faith, so that he can deflect and extinguish all those evil temptations that would sear and consume the personality. The shield (thyreos) is the old wooden scutum familiar to the Romans, which protected most of the body. Its leather covering soaked in water effectively stopped and extinguished tow-headed darts dipped in pitch which were used as fiery missiles.

In 1 Thess. 5:19 the church is warned against any further quenching of the → Spirit, whose advent was marked by the likeness of fiery tongues (Acts 2:3; → Pentecost), by behaviour which is contrary to Christ's will. The reference does not apply specifically to the cessation of speaking in tongues. "In v. 20 attention is directed to one particular gift, prophecy, but here the concern is more general: no gift of the Spirit is to be extinguished (sbennyte). The metaphor is especially vivid – the putting out of a flame or light – and is appropriate since 'fire' is associated with the Spirit (Mt. 3.11 = Lk. 3.16; Acts 2.3 f; 18:25; Rom. 12:11; 2 Tim. 1.6). If those who have been given gifts by the Spirit are either not allowed to exercise them within the community or what they say and do is ignored then in effect the fiery power and light of the Spirit is quenched and the church is not built up (I Cor. 14.26; cf. W. C. van Unnik, " 'Den Geist löscht nicht aus' (I Thessalonicher v. 19)", NovT 10, 1968, 255–69, for parallels from Hellenistic religion and culture)" (E. Best, A Commentary on the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, BNTC, 1972, 238).

The expression "he will not break a bruised reed or quench a smouldering wick" is a quotation from Isa. 42:3 which occurs in the context of the application of the Servant Song of Isa. 42:1–4 to Jesus (Matt. 12:18:21). The passage shows that, "in refusing to quarrel with the Pharisees or to allow his Messiahship to be openly acknowledged, Jesus is the one who will not wrangle or cry aloud" (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 214). For further discussion of this passage see B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961, 144–52; K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew and its Use of the Old Testament, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 20, 1967², 144–52; R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel, Supplements to NovT 18, 1967, 110–16; → Serve. Commenting on the original meaning of the phrase in the context of Isa. 42, R. N. Whybray sees a contrast with the work of destruction of the earlier prophets. The Servant's work "will be to handle the bruised reed with great care and to keep the dimly burning wick from going out: that is, to nurture the remains of faith and hope among the exiles, by announcing the imminent arrival of Yahweh's universal rule" (Isaiah 40–66, New Century Bible, 1975, 73).

The description of → punishment in Mk. 9:48, "where their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched", is taken from Isa. 66:24 which Whybray sees as an early description of eternal punishment (op. cit., 294). The passage also influenced Sir. 7:17 and Jdt. 16:17. The picture is taken from the Valley of Hinnom (→ Hell, art. gehenna) where human sacrifice had been offered during the monarchy (2 Ki. 23:10; Jer. 7:31; 32:35). Later it became the city's rubbish dump, and unclean corpses which could not be otherwise buried were burnt there or left to decompose. For rabbinic teaching on this see SB II 9 f.

The mention of the heroes of old who by faith "quenched raging fire" (Heb. 11:34) is probably an allusion to Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego who were delivered from the fiery furnace for refusing to worship Nebuchadnezzar's golden image (Dan. 3; → Miracle, art. semeion, or 1 (c)). The readers of the epistle might also have to face a fiery ordeal in the near future (cf. the pyrōsis of 1 Pet. 4:12; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 335). R. K. Harrison, C. Brown ἄσβεστος (asbestos), inextinguishable, that which is not or cannot be quenched.

ἄσβεστος

CL The earliest secular sense was that of unquenchable, though Aeschylus extended the meaning to signify ceaseless. As a noun it was used by Dioscorides and others of unslaked lime, and subsequently of plaster. By the time of Pliny, the fire-proof asbestos fibres (asbestos) were being made into fire-resistant clothing which was known as asbestinos.

OT The adjective asbestos occurs once only in the LXX (Job 20:26), with some manuscript variations. It is not matched by any one word in the MT, the phrase lō' nuppāh, not blown upon, serving as the equivalent in Job 20:26.

NT asbestos is almost as rare in the NT as in the LXX, occurring three times only (Matt. 3:12; Mk. 9:43; Lk. 3:17). The Matthean and Lucan references quoted from part of the eschatological teaching of John the Baptist, while Mk. 9:43 refers to the unquenchable → fires of → hell. Fire was the most powerful destructive force known in the ancient world, and the NT use of asbestos implies utter and complete destruction of whatever is rejected by God as unsuitable or unworthy.

R. K. Harrison

→ Fire, → Hell, → Pentecost, → Prophet, → Spirit, → Word

(a). E. Best, A Commentary on the First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians, BNTC, 1972; F. Foulkes, The Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians, TC, 1963; F. Lang, sbennymi, TDNT VII 165 ff.; R. A. Ward, Commentary on 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1973.

(b). W. C. van Unnik, "‘Den Geist löschet nicht aus’ (I Thessalonicher v. 19)", NovT 10, 1968, 255–69.

Quiet, Rest, Silence, Sound, Voice, Noise

ἥσυχία	ἥσυχία (hēsychia), quiet, quietness, rest, silence; ἥσυχάζω (hēsychazō), be quiet, be silent, rest; ἥσυχιος (hēsychios), quiet.
---------------	---

CL In non-biblical Greek hēsychia is used of the quietness of peace (as opposed to war) (Thucydides), relief from pain (Plato), a place of solitude (Xenophon), and the tranquillity of the philosopher who escapes from the turmoil of politics (Plato). Herodotus uses the adjective hēsychios to describe a disposition that is quiet. hēsychazō commonly denotes a cessation of speech, work or conflict, a calming of oneself, or the imposition of silence.

OT In the LXX hēsychia is used in reference to freedom from war (1 Chron. 4:40; 22:9), the stillness of night (Prov. 7:9), and tranquillity of life (Prov. 11:12; Ezek. 38:11; 1 Macc. 9:58). The vb. hēsychazō is often used of the peace that follows warfare (e.g. Jdg. 3:11, 30; 2 Ki. 22:20), also of refraining from speech (Neh. 5:8, Job 32:6), ceasing from a course of action (Job 32:1), relaxation (Job 37:8; Jer. 46[26]:27), or even culpable inaction (Jdg. 18:9).

NT 1. Luke. In the Lucan writings hēsychazō denotes abstention from work (Lk. 23:56), the cessation of an effort to convince (Acts 21:14), and the silencing of potential opposition (Lk. 14:4; Acts 11:18), while hēsychia in Acts 22:2 portrays the silence that descended on the agitated Jerusalem crowd when they heard Paul address them in Aramaic, their native tongue.

2. Paul. In 1 Thess. 4:11 Paul exhorts the Thessalonians to aim at leading an unobtrusive life of tranquillity (hēsychazein), or, to reproduce his oxymoron, to make it their ambition to be free of (inordinate) ambition. Moreover, they are to avoid the disorderliness of → busybodies and to attend quietly (meta hēsychias, denoting an attendant disposition) to their business, and earn their own living (2 Thess. 3:12). Any eschatological excitement (cf. 2 Thess. 2:1–2) that produces corporate turmoil or individual laziness is here repudiated. And the Christian should pray for conditions that will permit “a quiet and tranquil [hēsychion] manner of life”, a life free from outward disturbance and marked by inner tranquillity (1 Tim. 2:2).

The apostle enjoins → women to listen silently (en hēsychia) to the instruction given in the church and to show the necessary deference to their teachers (1 Tim. 2:11). The public exposition of scripture (“to teach”) was outside a woman’s proper domain of service (but cf. Tit. 2:3–5), as was any exercise of ecclesiastical authority over a man. In the church she was to remain silent (einai en hēsychia) (1 Tim. 2:12).

3. Peter. Peter insists that a woman’s adornment should not be external but inward, “the imperishable ornament of a gentle and quiet [hēsychiou] spirit” (1 Pet. 3:4), a spirit which calmly bears the disturbances created by others and which itself does not create disturbances.

M. J. Harris

ἦχος

ἦχος (ēchos), sound, noise, report; ἠχέω (ēcheō), make a sound.

CL In secular Greek ēchos (a later form of ēchē and closely related to ēcheō in meaning) denotes the sound of words (as opposed to their meaning) or of letters or of a voice. It can, like ēcheō, be used of an echo (Aristotle) and, in a technical medical sense, of ringing noises in the ears (Hippocrates). The verb ēcheō may describe the clanging of a metal shield (Herodotus) or the chirp of a grasshopper (Theocritus).

OT In the LXX ēchos occurs 23 times, rendering 4 different Heb. terms, and ēcheō

22 times, representing 6 Heb. words. Both terms generally denote inarticulate sounds such as the blast of the trumpet (Exod. 19:16 [hāzāq]; Ps. 150:3 [tēqa]), the roaring of water (Ps. 46 [45]:3 [hāmāh]; Isa. 17:12 [šā’āh, niph.]), or the tumult of a city (Ruth 1:19 [hūm, niph.]; 1 Sam. 4:15 [no equivalent]; 1 Ki. 1:41 [hāmāh], 45 [hūm, niph.]).

NT 1. There are 4 NT uses of ēchos. It denotes the roaring of the sea and the waves

(Lk. 21:25), a sound (ēchos) from the sky like a violent blast of wind (Acts 2:2), the → trumpet-blast (Heb. 12:19), and (metaphorically) a rumour that was spread throughout a region (Lk. 4:37).

2. 1 Cor. 13:1 contains the only NT use of ēcheō. Paul may be insisting that to exercise the gift of glossolalia without love (i.e. without an interpretation that enabled all to understand and benefit, cf. 1 Cor. 14:5–12, 19) was to be as unedifying as “a noisy [ēchōn] gong or a clanging cymbal” (RSV) that might be heard in pagan worship. Or he may be making the more general observation that to have the gift of tongues but no Christian love amounted to nothing more than paganism.

M. J. Harris

φωνή

φωνή (phōnē), sound, noise, voice, language; φωνέω (phōneō), make a sound, call, summon.

CL To the Greeks phōnē signified an audible sound made by a living creature, and covered the whole range of animal noises or human sounds. As applied to man, it meant voice, speech (as articulate sound made by the voice) or statement (as significant speech). A deity was thought to have an extraordinary phōnē (cf. Acts 12:21–22). phōneō, on the other hand, may denote the sound produced by a musical instrument, as well as by man or animal.

OT In the LXX phōnē generally renders Heb. qōl which denotes any audible sound such as the clap of thunder (Exod. 19:16) or the twittering of birds (Ps. 104[103]:12), but not the organ of speech or speech itself. In several Psalms (e.g. Pss. 29[28]:3 f., 8; 104[103]:7) the creatorial and revelatory voice of God is described as thunder. To hear (i.e. obey) God's voice was the essence of covenantal religion (1 Sam. 12:14) and true religion (Jos. 24:19–24; → Hear, art. akouō). By the first century the rabbis had a developed view of the bat qōl ("daughter of a voice"), an echo of a heavenly voice that was audible on earth and proclaimed some divine oracle or judgment.

There are only 10 uses of phōneō in the LXX, the vb. being used of human speech (Ps. 115[113]:15; 3 Macc. 2:22), animal cries (Zeph. 2:14) and the trumpet-blast (Amos 3:6).

NT 1. As in the LXX, so in the NT phōnē describes any noise or sound, whatever its source (whether animate or inanimate); for example, the wailing of Rachel (Matt. 2:18), the rustling of wind (Jn. 3:8), the tumult of a crowd (Rev. 19:1).

2. Not all human voices sound alike (Jn. 3:29; Acts 12:14) and each person has more than one "tone of voice" (Gal. 4:20). Speaking "in a loud voice [megalē phōnē]" is not restricted to human beings (Lk. 23:23; Acts 7:57, 60; 14:10; 26:24) or the souls of martyrs (Rev. 6:9–10). Unclean spirits (Mk. 1:26; 5:7; Lk. 4:33, Acts 8:7), angels (Rev. 5:12; 14:7, 9), or the archangel (1 Thess. 4:16) may speak this way. Particularly noticeable is the close association of this idea with (a) the praise of God by angels (Rev. 5:11–12) or men (Lk. 17:15–16; 19:37–38; Rev. 7:9–10); (b) the power of Jesus to raise the dead (Jn. 11:43; cf. 5:25, 28–29) and his authority as the risen Son of man (Rev. 1:10–12, 15); (c) the death of Jesus (Matt. 27:46 par. Mk. 15:34; Matt. 27:50 par. Mk. 15:37; Lk. 23:46).

3. The "voice from heaven" that figures so prominently in Rev. (e.g. 1:10; 4:1; 10:8; 11:12) or that dialogues with Peter regarding Jewish food-laws (Acts 10:9–16) is distinguishable from the rabbinic Bath Qol by being generally identifiable as the personal voice of God (Rev. 16:17), Christ (Acts 10:13–14; 11:7–9), an → angel (Rev. 18:1–2) or some heavenly inhabitants (Rev. 11:15). Binding together the Synoptic records of the baptism (Matt. 3:13–17 par. Mk. 1:9–11, Lk. 3:21 f.) and the transfiguration of Jesus (Matt. 17:1–8 par. Mk. 9:2–8, Lk. 9:28–36) is the reference to the voice “from heaven” (Mk. 1:11) or “from the cloud” (Mk. 9:7) that, like the Bath Qol, issues a public divine declaration that is audible on earth (Matt. 3:17; 17:5 par.; but note the “You are” of Mk. 1:11; Lk. 3:22; cf. Jn. 12:28). The words “my Son” in this messianic confirmation clearly indicate that the voice belongs to God the Father (→ Son of God).

4. For John, to → hear (i.e. heed) the voice of Jesus (Jn. 10:3, 16, 27; 18:37) was to gain eternal → life (Jn. 5:24–25; 6:68; 10:27–28).

5. Perhaps the solution to the apparent contradiction between Acts 9:7 and Acts 22:9 with regard to Paul’s companions’ hearing “the voice” during his encounter with the risen Christ outside Damascus is that in Acts 9:7 it was Paul’s voice (not Christ’s) they heard or that the genitive case phōnēs after ākouō (“hear”) denotes hearing either without understanding (Acts 9:7) or with understanding (Acts 22:7), while the accusative case phōnēn describes only hearing with understanding (Acts 22:9; cf. 9:4; 26:14).

6. Not infrequently the content of a phōnē is a solemn declaration of confession of faith (Acts 13:27; 19:34; 22:14; 24:21; 2 Pet. 1:17).

7. The NT use of phōneō is restricted to the four Gospels, Acts and Rev. 14:18. In some cases (e.g. Lk. 8:8; 16:24; Acts 10:18) it is indistinguishable in meaning from krazō (→ “cry out”), especially when “in a loud voice” (megalē phōnē) is added (e.g. Mk. 1:26). On occasion it denotes an urgent request (Matt. 27:47 par. Mk. 15:35) or a powerful command (Lk. 8:54; Jn. 12:17), and not infrequently an authoritative summoning (e.g. Mk. 9:35; Lk. 16:2) or a polite invitation (e.g. Lk. 14:12; Jn. 1:48). In Palestine the cock would crow (phōneō expresses this in Matt. 26:34, 74 par. Mk. 14:30, 72; Lk. 22:34, 60) during the third watch (i.e. between midnight and 3 a.m.).

M. J. Harris

O. Betz, phōnē etc. TDNT IX 278–303; A. Marmorstein, Studies in Jewish Theology, 1950, 135 ff.; J. Schneider, ēcheō, TDNT II 954 f.

R

Rabbi

Rabbi was in NT times a title of respect given by the common man to the scribes and by a student to his teacher. Gradually it became a technical term for a man who had received ordination (s^mmīkâh), i.e. who had received authority to act as judge in religious matters. This was conferred on him by the laying on of hands. The use of the term ordination must not be understood to mean that he was in any sense a minister in the Christian sense; he was exclusively an authority on the law (Torah) as it had come to be understood in the synagogue. This ordination was practised only in Palestine and ceased in the 4th cent. From then on s^mmīkâh with the title of Rabbi has been conferred by the opinion of three rabbis that the person has adequate knowledge to expound the law.

ῥαββί

ῥαββί (rhabbi) (from Heb. rabbî, “my lord”), ῥαββουεῖ (rhabbounei) (from Aram. rabbûnî), Rabbi, my master.

On the alternative forms rhabbi and rhabbei see Funk § 38.

OT The Sem. rab means many or great. In the latter sense we find it both inside and outside Israel as a designation for chief officers (e.g. Jer. 41:1; 39:13; Dan. 1:3; Est. 1:8; Jon. 1:6, of a sea captain), and it has come down to us in the titles of certain Assyrian and Babylonian officials (e.g. 2 Ki. 18:17; Jer. 39:18).

NT 1. In NT times it was a title of respect for the scribes and their pupils, the Pharisees (Matt. 23:7, 8). John the Baptist’s disciples addressed him by this title (Jn. 3:26). It is applied to Jesus a number of times: by Nicodemus (Jn. 3:2), by Nathanael (Jn. 1:49), by Peter (Mk. 9:5; 11:21), by Judas (Matt. 26:25, 49; Mk. 14:45); it is also used by disciples and others in Jn. 1:38; 4:3; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8. rhabbounei comes from the Aram. equivalent of rhabbei; it is found in the mouth of Bartimaeus (Mk. 10:51) and of Mary Magdalene (Jn. 20:16).

2. In the Gospels the commonest form of address for Jesus is didaskale, i.e. teacher (→ Teach); Luke uses the synonym epistata six times (Lk. 5:5; 8:24, 45; 9:33, 49; 17:13). Frequently he is called kyrie, i.e. → Lord. This is often no more than a mark of respect (e.g. Matt. 13:27). Since, however, in parallel passages in the Synoptics, it is used where the others have Teacher – the best example is Matt. 8:25 (kyrie), Mk. 4:38 (didaskale), Lk. 8:24 (epistata) – we are probably safe in assuming that where Jesus is called Lord it normally represents Rabbi. This title was normally avoided in Gk.-speaking circles as unfamiliar (cf. the translation in Jn. 20:16). In some contexts, however, it probably represents mārî, i.e. My Lord. This was another title given to scholars. Behind “Teacher and Lord” in Jn. 13:13, 14 there lies rabbī ūmārī.

3. The argument is occasionally met that, since the use of the title Rabbi becomes normal only after the destruction of the temple, the NT usage is evidence of the late composition of the Gospels. The argument is baseless, for the technical use of Rabbi clearly derives from an earlier popular usage.

H. L. Ellison

→ Law, → Pharisee, → Scribe

(a). S. W. Barron, The Jewish Community, I–III, 1942; M. M. Berman, The Role of the Rabbi, 1941; J. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature, 1969, 40–92; J. Braydē et al., “Rabbi”, Jewish Encyclopedia X 294–97; G. H. Dalman, The Words of Jesus, Considered in the Light of Post-Biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language, 1902, 327 ff., 331–40; J. D. M. Derrett, Jesus’ Audience, 1973; A. J. Feldmann, The Rabbi and his Early Ministry, 1941; A. Finkel, The Pharisees and the Teacher of Nazareth, 1964; L. Finkelstein, ed., The Jews, I–III, 1971; W. Foerster, Palestinian Judaism in New Testament Times, 1964, 170–75; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions During the New Testament Period, 1969, 242–49; M. Kadushin, The Rabbinic Mind, 1952; E. Lohse, rhabbi, rhabbouni, TDNT VI 961–65, and The New Testament Environment, 1976, 115–20; C. G. Montefiore and H. Loewe, A Rabbinic Anthology, new edition 1974, 696–713; Moore, Judaism, III, 15 ff.; J. Neusner, “Pharisaic-Rabbinic’ Judaism”, History of Religions 12, 1972–73, 250–70; Schürer, II, 1, 315 ff.; A. Steinsaltz, The Essential Talmud, 1976; G. Vermes, Jesus the Jew, 1973, 113–28.

(b). E. Lohse, Die Ordination im Spätjudentum und im Neuen Testament, 1951; E. Nestle, “Rabbi”, ZNW 7, 1906, 184; SB I 916 f.; G. Schrenk, “Rabbinische Charakterköpfe im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter”, Studien zu Paulus, 1954, 9–45.

Ready, Prepare, Gird

The NT uses two different groups of words to convey the idea of preparing, equipping, being ready, or being resolved for something lying in the future. One is the group of words associated with hetoimos, the other the related vbs. kataskeuazō and paraskeuazō, derived from skeuos, vessel. As far as their meaning is concerned, the two groups cannot be clearly separated, except to say that kataskeuazō frequently brings out more strongly the idea of producing, making, constructing, while the hetoimos group refers to something already existing in a state befitting its purpose or use, or to the initiation of such a state. The same may be said of the zōnnyμι group. The meaning of this word is very similar. Originally it meant to gird; hence, to make oneself ready to depart, to stand in readiness. The words dealt with in this article describe the state of readiness primarily in its outward aspect. The other side of the picture, concerned with the inner attitude of a person, is supplied by the words considered under the article on Guard, Keep, Watch. The distinction between these two groups of words is not clear-cut, and the dividing line is a fluid one.

ἑτοιμος	ἑτοιμος (hetoimos), ready, prepared; ἑτοιμως (hetoimōs), readily; ἑτοιμάζω (hetoimazō), get ready, hold in readiness; ἑτοιμασία (hetoimasia), state of readiness, preparation; προετοιμάζω (prohetoimazō), prepare beforehand.
---------	---

CL “The clear meaning of this word group is preparation both in the active sense of ‘making ready’ and in the passive sense of ‘readiness’, ‘ability’ or ‘resolution’” or In the LXX the words serve chiefly to translate kûn (especially niph. and hiph.) and the principal meanings are to be firmly established, to establish, set up, make, prepare, get ready.

(W. Grundmann, TDNT II 704). In classical Gk. it is not found in a religious sense, except that Homer (Il. 10, 571) uses it in connexion with sacrifice: hiron hetoimassein.

1. Though widely used in a secular sense, the words have a religious meaning, e.g. in connexion with the Passover (2 Chr. 35:4, 6, 14 f. LXX); sacrificial animals (Num. 23:1, 29); the ark (1 Chr. 15:1; 2 Chr. 1:4); the showbread (1 Chr. 9:32); the temple vessels (2 Chr. 29:19); the temple (2 Chr. 31:11); divine service (2 Chr. 35:16).

2. Besides this, the words are used for the all-embracing divine activity of creation, preparation, and establishing.

(a) God has established the heavens (Prov. 3:19; 8:27) and founded the earth (Jer. 28:15 LXX), founded the earth upon the rivers (Ps. 24[23]:2), and established the mountains (Ps. 65[64]:6). He prepares rain (Ps. 147[146]:8; cf. Job 38:25). His hands have made man (Ps. 119:73 LXX v.l.). He provides food for his creatures (Pss. 65[64]:9; 78[77]:20; Job 38:41), and concerns himself with their destiny (Gen. 24:14, 44).

(b) God's creation and providence extends also to his acts of salvation in history. He has established Israel to be his → people for ever (2 Sam. 7:24), and sworn that he will bring them into a land appointed for them (Exod. 23:20; Ezek. 20:6). Therefore, he creates food for them (Ps. 78[77]:19 f.), and despite their recurring unbelief and all their enemies, leads them into the sanctuary that his own hands have prepared (Exod. 15:17), prepared for everlasting glory (Sir. 49:12 LXX). Moreover, he sets up the kings of Israel and establishes their rule. If Saul had been obedient, the Lord would have established his kingdom for ever (1 Sam. 13:13), whereas David, who is appointed by him, is given the promise, "I will establish your descendants for ever" (Ps. 89[88]:4; cf. 2 Sam. 7:12; 1 Chr. 14:2; 17:11; 1 Ki. 2:24).

(c) God does all this because his faithfulness is established in the → heavens (Ps. 89[88]:2). There he has set up his throne from the beginning (Pss. 93[92]:2; 103[102]:19), a throne founded upon righteousness and justice (Ps. 89[88]:14). He has established it for → judgment (Ps. 9:7), and for the judgment day he has prepared a sacrifice (Zeph. 1:7 f.; cf. Isa. 30:33; 14:21).

3. The all-embracing work of God in creating and providing for his people does, however, demand self-preparation and readiness on man's part. The → people and → Moses are called upon to prepare themselves (ritually) for the revelation of God at Sinai (Exod. 19:10 f., 15; 34:2; cf. Num. 16:16 LXX). In the prophets Israel is challenged: "Prepare to meet your God" (Amos 4:12; cf. Mic. 6:8; 2 Chr. 27:6). This involves also the preparation of the → heart: "Those who fear the Lord will prepare their hearts" (Sir. 2:17 LXX; cf. Pss. 57[56]:7; 108[107]:1; 112[111]:7; Sir. 2:1; 18:23; Prov. 23:12 LXX).

NT 1. In the NT the noun hetoimasia occurs only once (Eph. 6:15), but the vbs. hetoimazō and prohetoimazō between them appear 43 times, and the adj. and adv. 20 times. All are relatively rare in the writings of Paul. When used with reference to objects, the meaning corresponds exactly with that in the OT. It is noteworthy, however, that the words of this group are not used with reference to God's creation and providence in nature, and in a cultic setting only with reference to the Passover (Matt. 26:17, 19 par. Mk. 14:12, 16; Lk. 22:9, 13). Apart therefore from their wide use in a secular sense, they connote (a) God's activity of creating and providing in terms of the history of salvation; (b) man's self-preparation and readiness.

2. In his song of praise Simeon declared: "My eyes have seen thy salvation which thou hast prepared in the presence of all peoples" (Lk. 2:30 f.; cf. 3:6; Isa. 52:10). Yet the world is unable in its own light to recognize the salvation present and promised in Jesus: God has prepared it for those who love him (1 Cor. 2:9). It is his purpose, by his free elective grace "to make known the riches of his glory for the vessels of mercy, which he has prepared beforehand for glory" (Rom. 9:23). Jesus comforts his fearful disciples by saying, "I go to prepare a place for you" (Jn. 14:2 f.; but cf. Matt. 20:23 par. Mk. 10:39). So too Peter is able to encourage the Christians undergoing trials in Asia Minor by telling them that they "by God's power are guarded through faith for a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time" (1 Pet. 1:5). God's free mercy does not clash with, but rather forms the basis of, the doctrine that he is "ready to judge the living and the dead" (1 Pet. 4:5; cf. Matt. 25:34, 41). For the invitation "Come, for all is now ready" (Lk. 14:17; cf. Matt. 22:4, 8; and also Jn. 7:6 "Your time is always ready") has gone out, but many have proved unworthy. No one, however, has cause to glory in himself, "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them" (Eph. 2:10; cf. 2 Tim. 2:21).

3. To this sphere, which is marked out by God's work of preparation arising from his free elective choice (→ Elect), belong also the statements about man's self-preparation and readiness. The OT call, "In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord" (Isa. 40:3; → Cry, art. boaō), is applied in the NT to John (Matt. 3:3 par. Mk. 1:3, Lk. 3:4; cf. Lk. 1:17, 76), who by his preaching of repentance prepared the way for the coming of the Lord to his people. The Lord who has come is also, however, the Lord who is to come. He will come like a thief in the night, like a bridegroom to the wedding. The church is therefore exhorted to be ready for his coming (Matt. 24:44 par. Lk. 12:40; cf. also Rev. 19:7; 21:2). Only those virgins who are ready when the bridegroom arrives will be let in (Matt. 25:10). The servant, who made nothing ready despite his knowledge of the master's will, stands condemned (Lk. 12:47). The church is therefore exhorted to be ready "for every good work" (Tit. 3:1), "to make a defence to anyone" (1 Pet. 3:15), and also "to punish every disobedience" (2 Cor. 10:6). This is not contradicted by the exhortation to be shod "with the equipment [hetoimasia, lit. "preparation"] of the gospel of peace" (Eph. 6:15). In this context Paul's declaration should also be noted, that he is ready not only to be imprisoned but even to die for the Lord Jesus at Jerusalem (Acts 21:13; cf. by contrast Lk. 22:33). 2 Cor. 12:14 refers to Paul's readiness to visit the Corinthians, despite his painful relations with them.

S. Solle

κατασκευάζω

κατασκευάζω (kataskeuazō), make ready, prepare, build, construct, erect, equip, furnish; παρασκευάζω (paras- keuazō), get ready, prepare (oneself); παρασκευή (paraskeuē), day of preparation.

CL Classical writers from Hdt. onwards use both these compounds in passages relating to the setting up and decoration of rooms and festal routes (e.g. Lysias, Thuc.), or to preparations of various kinds, e.g. dressing, the preparation of a meal (only paraskeuazō), the building of a ship or preparation for battle on land or sea (e.g. Hdt., Xen.). kataskeuazō is also used in an inward sense, both in statements about the instruction of those who are learning, and concerning preparation for religious rituals (e.g. Aristotle, Josephus). Finally kataskeuazō is used in philosophical logic and geometry of the construction of positive arguments (Aristotle, Plutarch, Euclid).

OT 1. The LXX has kataskeuazō 30 times, of which 19 examples are in the Apocrypha. In Isa. 40:28; 43:7; 45:7, 9 the vb. refers to God's work of preparation in the sense of creation (in the Heb. text the terms are bārā', create, and yāšar, create, form, shape). It is found in the same sense 5 times in Wis., Bar., and 4 Macc. Equipping with arms and warships is mentioned particularly in 1 Macc. (3:29; 10:21; 15:3). The Apocrypha also uses kataskeuazō in connexion with the production of idols (Ep. Jer. 9, 45 f.; also in a LXX addition to Isa. 40:19).

2. paraskeuazō is found 16 times in the LXX. Jeremiah uses it in 6:4; 46(26):9; 50(27):42; 51(28):11 in connexion with preparing for battle. It is later used in reports of the preparation of a meal (Tob. 8:19; 2 Macc. 2:27; 6:21).

3. Otherwise the two vbs. are used of various activities of preparation: construction of a building (Num. 21:27; 2 Chr. 32:5); tilling a field (Prov. 24:27); spreading a net as a trap (Prov. 29:5). In 1 Sam. 24:3 paraskeuazō is used absolutely, clearly in a specialized sense, and is usually translated "relieved himself". The context would also allow the sense "to change".

NT In the NT, where the simple form skeuazō is lacking, paraskeuazō is found 4 times, always in a similar sense, and kataskeuazō 11 times.

1. In Acts 10:10 it refers to the preparation of a meal. In 1 Cor. 14:8, where the meaninglessness of speaking in tongues is compared with the indecision brought about if the battle trumpet makes an indistinct noise, we have the metaphor of preparation for battle. 2 Cor. 9:2 f. deals with the Christians in Achaia, who have "been ready since last year" to take the collection to Jerusalem (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4). The next verse contains, in the same context, the adj. aparaskeuastos, which occurs nowhere else in the NT; and is here used of the possibility of "not being ready".

2. (a) kataskeuazō is used in 4 cases in connexion with sayings about John the Baptist's function as the preparer of the way: Matt. 11:10; Mk. 1:2; Lk. 1:17; 7:27 (→ Elijah). In each case Mal. 3:1 is cited (with echoes of Exod. 23:20 and Isa. 40:3, where → hetoimazō is used), though Mal. 3:1 does not place any emphasis on kataskeuazō. In Lk. 1:17 the context is also one dealing with the Baptist, but here the subject is his task "to make ready for the Lord a people prepared".

(b) The other NT examples of kataskeuazō (almost all in Heb.; see below) refer to the construction and furnishing of a building. In these contexts we can always detect an association in content with man's preparation for his meeting with God, as we also found in the examples from the Gospels. 1 Pet. 3:20 mentions (in connexion with man's appropriation in baptism of the work of Jesus) the "preparation" of → Noah's ark.

Half of the NT examples of kataskeuazō are in Heb. The OT concept of God's all-embracing work of creation introduces the simile of the building of a house, and concludes that God has built everything (Heb. 3:3 f.). The underlying thought here is that of Christ as the builder of the church. The other places in Heb. where the word is used deal with building and furnishing according to a prescribed pattern: 11:7 speaks of Noah, building the ark in obedient faith, in order to prepare a way of escape. In a reflection similar to that found in the Synoptic Gospels, the word is here used of human preparation for God's saving act. The same is true of Heb. 9:2, 6: an exhaustive consideration of Christ's unique sacrifice is introduced in verses 1–10 by a description of the tabernacle, which was set up and furnished with all manner of contents according to strict instructions (→ Tent).

3. In secular Gk. paraskeuē is found in the general sense of preparation, but the NT uses the noun paraskeuē always as a temporal expression to indicate the "day of preparation" preceding a → Sabbath or Passover festival: Matt. 27:62; Mk. 15:42; Jn. 19:14, 31, 42. This suggests that in the NT, as in the OT, and in the same sense in all strands of the tradition, paraskeuazō and kataskeuazō are terms which have the sense of pointing to, preparing and equipping. They have the theological function of looking forward to God's saving activity towards man, which is introduced by a ministry of preparation having about it the flavour of Advent. F. Thiele ζώννυμι	ζώννυμι (zōnnymi), gird; ζώνη (zōnē), girdle, belt; διαζώννυμι (diazōnnymi), tie or gird around; περιζώννυμι (perizōnnymi), gird with, gird around.

---------	---

CL zōnnymi (Homer), gird (oneself or another); diazōnnymi (Thuc.), gird around, bind round oneself; and perizōnnymi (Aristophanes), gird around, bind round (oneself or another with something), are used in the act. and mid., and the compound forms also in the pass. The noun zōnē, girdle, is derived from zōnnymi. In classical usage zōnē is also found in the sense of a money belt or purse (cf. Mk. 6:8; → Bag).

OT Generally speaking the OT uses the words in the same way as classical Gk., but the words of this group represent a number of different Heb. terms. The girdle (zōnē), made of linen or leather, served to tuck in the long skirts of the robe, in order to give greater freedom of movement. Hence the putting on of a girdle acquired the particular meaning of making oneself ready to go (2 Ki. 4:29), and to lay aside one's girdle meant correspondingly to rest. A person in authority wore it as part of his finery (Isa. 22:21), an officer as his badge of rank. A richly embroidered girdle (Heb. 'abnēt) formed part of the vestments of the high priest (Exod. 28:4, 39[35], 40[36]; 29:9; 39:29[36:37]; Lev. 8:7, 13; 16:4). Several other Heb. nouns are also found including h'gōr (1 Sam. 18:4 v.l.) and h'gōrāh (1 Ki. 2:5; 2 Ki. 3:21; Isa. 3:24). The most frequent Heb. vb. meaning to gird is hāgar (Exod. 29:9; Lev. 8:7, 13; 16:4; Jud. 18:11 v.l.; 1 Sam. 17:39; 25:13; Ps. 109[108]:19; Ezek. 23:15).

A golden girdle, worn around the breast, is regarded as an angel's mark of distinction (Dan. 10:5; cf. Rev. 15:6). For mourning, a hair shirt or a rope is worn (Isa. 3:24; cf. 2 Sam. 3:31). A broad leather girdle was used as armour, to protect the lower part of the body (1 Sam. 25:13), and so the expression “everyone who wears the girdle” means “the men fit for war”.

A metaphorical use occurs in e.g. Ps. 65(64):6 (Yahweh is “girded with might”); Ps. 18(17):32, 39 (Yahweh girds the righteous “with strength”); and Ps. 30(29):11 (girded “with gladness”). Isaiah (11:5) looks forward to the new → David as an ideal king, the messiah, of whom it is said that “Righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins.”

NT In the NT the words are used in the same way as in classical Gk. and the LXX:

(a) They occur in a direct sense without any specialized meaning in, e.g., Jn. 21:7 (Peter girds himself with his outer garment because he does not wish to meet the Lord improperly dressed), and Lk. 17:8 (the servant girds himself in order to serve his master). Jn. 13:4 f. records how Jesus, the Master, changed his clothes in preparation for performing the task of a slave, a loving service which at the same time demonstrates the new order of life, which belongs to the age which is dawning.

(b) In some passages “to gird” has, as in the LXX, the special meaning of making oneself ready to depart, i.e. to get moving, stand in readiness. Thus in Acts 12:8 Peter is commanded to prepare himself for leaving the prison; and in Jn. 21:18 this same vigorous Peter who is well able to gird himself and make himself ready to go, is told that when he is old another will make him ready for a journey, and so determine the direction and destination of his life (probably an allusion to Peter’s martyrdom). In this sense, too, Lk. 12:35 (echoing Exod. 12:11) is to be understood as a challenge to the church to live unfettered by the world, in expectation of the Lord’s coming, in readiness to depart (cf. 1 Cor. 7:29–31). Matt. 10:9 par. Mk. 6:8 further add to the picture of the disciples’ way of life as they live in expectation of the end, by telling them not to secure themselves financially, but to leave everything to God’s provision.

(c) According to Mk. 1:6, John the Baptist did not wear over his clothing the linen girdle customary among nomads, but a leather one (cf. 2 Ki. 1:8). His appearance is to be seen (following Mal. 3:1; 4:5) as that of → Elijah redivivus, the eschatological forerunner of the messiah. His clothing does not indicate hostility to culture, or especial asceticism, but is to be explained, like the location of his ministry, in terms of wilderness typology. The rough mantle of camel’s hair was the recognizable garb of a prophet going back to Elijah and Elisha (1 Ki. 19:19; 2 Ki. 2:13 f.; cf. Zech. 13:4). John’s garb proclaimed his conscious prophetic calling (cf. C. H. H. Scobie, John the Baptist, 1964, 128).

In the vision of Rev. 1:13 the golden girdle marks the exalted Christ as the true high → priest, as does his long robe (Exod. 28:4; see OT above).

In Acts 21:11 Agabus (like the prophets of the OT; cf. Isa. 20:2; Jer. 13:1 ff.) carried out a symbolic action with Paul’s girdle (a long cloth worn about the waist), to indicate the coming arrest of Paul. “The accompanying word of interpretation ‘Thus says the Holy Spirit!’ corresponds to the OT ‘Thus says Yahweh!’” (E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 602).

(d) perizōnnyimi is used in a metaphorical sense, with en of the instrument, in Eph. 6:14, which echoes Isa. 11:5 LXX. The believers are to put on God’s → “truth” like a military girdle, which can protect them against the attacks of the evil one.

F. Selzer

→ Clothe

Reason, Mind, Understanding

Since Kant reason (Lat. ratio) has meant the whole range of man's intellectual powers, bringing together into a single whole the individual faculties of thought, knowledge and understanding. It presupposes positive data, objects or facts which it perceives. The Gk. term nous is capable of embracing all the instruments of sensual and conceptual perception, and depending on the context it can mean sense, understanding, thoughts, or reason. dianoia and synesis, by contrast, belong more to the narrower, intellectual category of discursive thought. synesis contains in addition the existential components of mature and experience-based insight. The vb. epistamai, to understand, know, is not given separate consideration here; it expresses the result of a process of perception, i.e. knowledge, cognizance (in the NT it is only used with any frequency in Acts). In the NT the relation of faith to knowledge is thought out and discussed chiefly by Paul.

νοῦς

νοῦς (nous), mind, intellect, understanding, reason, thought; νοέω (noeō), apprehend, perceive, understand, gain insight into; νοῦμα (noēma), thought, mind; ἀνόητος (anoētos), unintelligent, foolish; ἄνοια (anoia), folly; διανόημα (dianoēma), thought; διάνοια (dianoia), understanding, intelligence, mind, thought; δυσνόητος (dysnoētos), hard to understand; ἐννοια (ennoia), thought, knowledge, insight; κατανοέω (katanoēō), notice, observe, consider, contemplate.

CL 1. (a) The Gk. word nous, attested since Linear B, probably goes back etymologically to the root snu* (cf. Ger. schnaufen, to pant; schnuppern, to sniff). Originally it refers to the inner sense, directed at an object; then, disposition, understanding, insight, reason, mind. Along with feeling and will, understanding belongs, as the ability to think, to the inner powers of man (e.g. Parmenides, 16, 2). Plutarch (On the Education of Children 8) puts logos, → word, and nous in a definite relationship to one another: the understanding rules the word, the word serves the understanding. nous is also, however, the moral attitude, disposition, which is determined by the reflection of the mind (e.g. Hdt., 7, 150; Soph., OT 600). It also means resolve and intention (e.g. Homer, Il. 9, 104 f.; Hdt., 1, 27).

(b) In Gk. philosophy and religion the concept is developed further in theory. Here it comes to mean reason or mind as the organ of thought, which comprehends the world and existence. Early Gk. philosophy describes the meaning of understanding: it perceives, orders and controls everything (e.g. Anaxagoras, Fragment 12).

In Plato nous does not mean the whole realm of thought, but the highest of the three parts of the → soul. nous is here called the logistikōn, the ruling principle of pure thought (Phaedr. 247c). This true and divine reason rules in man and in the universe; in the microcosm as well as in the macrocosm (Tim. 30a b, 46c ff.). Reason comprehends truth (Rep. 6, 490b). Reason and truth, begotten by Philomathes along with the ōn, being, lead to knowledge. In man's reason lies his awareness of God.

Aristotle set understanding above the powers of the soul. He distinguished a nous theōrētikos, theoretical reason, from nous praktikos, practical reason (An. 3, 9, p. 432b, 27 ff.; 3, 101, p. 433a, 14 ff.; Eth.Nic. 6, 2, p. 1139a, 17 ff.). This reason is immortal and divine. The nous is both the most important part of the human mind and the embodiment of the divine (Eth.Nic. 10, 7, p. 1177a, 14 f.).

This linking of nous and the divine is also characteristic of Stoicism. According to Epictetus, reason is the essence of God (Dissertationes 2, 8, 1 f.).

In the Corpus Hermeticum, nous is thought of in the most strictly abstract way, as the original divine principle (e.g. 1, 6; 1, 12; 5, 11). Man too has a share in this nous, even if not in its original fiery form. This nous is the eye of reason, through which alone man can comprehend God (5, 10a). The nous enters the soul and leads it to knowledge (10, 21). All in all, this is a typically gnostic, syncretistic doctrine of salvation, for which the Gk. concept of nous is pressed into service.

2. (a) With nous, mind, there goes a whole group of words, derived from the same root, including the noun dianoia (Hdt. onwards), the act or faculty of thinking and reflection. Aristotle (Met. 5, 1, p. 1025b, 25) divides this into praktikē, poiētikē and theōrētikē, practical, creative and reflective thinking. It is the special philosophical power of thought, theoretical understanding as opposed to sensory perceptions and feelings (Democritus, Fragment 11). dianoia also means way of thinking, disposition, intention (e.g. Plato, Laws 10, 888a) or purpose, design (Hdt., 1, 90, 3; 8, 97, 3). Like nous, dianoia can also be used of the sense and meaning of a word (e.g. Plato, Critias 113a).

(b) ennoia (Eur. onwards) meant originally the act of thought (Pseudo-Plato, Definitions 414a), then the result: thought, realization, insight, disposition, even the disposition of the gods (e.g. Xen., Cyr. 1, 1, 1). In philosophy ennoia means idea, concept (e.g. concept of time, Plato, Timaeus 47a; the idea of the beautiful, Aristotle, Eth.Nic. 10, 10, p. 1179b, 15). ennoia is conceptual thought, without which things cannot be perceived (Diogenes Laertius, 7, 42). According to Stoic doctrine, these concepts are derived from experience and are reproduced from one's understanding of the nature of things (e.g. Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 17, 7).

(c) noēma (Homer onwards) is that which is thought, a thought. Like ennoia, it can mean concept (Aristotle, An. 3, 6, p. 430a, 27 f.). It can, however, also mean plan (Plato, Politicus 260d).

(d) The meaning of dianoēma (Xen. onwards) is not much different: thought, notion, resolve, plan (e.g. Plato, Sym. 210d). Thus it can be contrasted with → work (ergon) (Isocrates, 3, 9). It can also mean ulterior motive (P.Lond. 5, 1724, 15). This term is also found in the sense of illusions and the confused thoughts of those sick with fever (Hippocrates, Epidemiai 1, 23).

(e) Similarly anoia (Theognis onwards) means folly, want of understanding. Plato (Timaeus 86b) distinguishes two kinds of lack of understanding: that resulting from madness and that resulting from lack of teaching.

3. Corresponding to these nouns is a group of verbs which give expression to the process of thinking, and to thought itself:

(a) noeō (Homer onwards) originally meant to perceive with understanding including both sensory and mental impressions (Homer, Il. 11, 599). In the philosophy of Parmenides, thought and being are made almost identical (Parmenides, Fragment 3). A theme which is significant for Gk. thought is homoion homoio noeitai, "Like is known by like.” Deity is known to itself. The Roman poet, Manilius, expressed the same idea in this way: quis caelum possit nisi caeli munere nosse et reperire deum nisi qui pars ipse deorum est, “Who would be able to know heaven except by the gift of heaven, and who would be able to find a god unless he be a part of the gods himself?” (Astronomica 2, 115).

(b) A strengthened form of noeō is katanoēō (Hdt. onwards), to direct one’s mind and interest towards something, to notice and perceive it (e.g. Xen., Cyr. 2, 2, 28). Thus katanoēō can mean to observe, test, comprehend, understand, in the latter sense being almost synonymous with syniēmi, to understand.

4. (a) In addition to noeō the verbal adj. noētos is attested from the time of Parmenides and means intelligible. The opposite is expressed by anoētos (from the Pre-Socratics), unintelligible, unimaginable. Plato (Parmenides 132c) speaks of noēmata . . . anoēta, unintelligible, unthinkable thoughts. anoētos also means senseless, foolish, indicating a lack of understanding and judgment (Plato, Grg. 464d). The plur. anoētoi is used as the contrary of phronountes, senseless and sensible respectively (Anaxippus, Fragment 4). The anoētoi are not far removed from the kakoi and ponēroi, the bad.

(b) dysnoētos is the equivalent of hard to understand (e.g. Aristotle, De Plantis 1, 1 p. 816a, 3). This is how Lucian (Alexander 54) describes the oracular utterances. Along with this goes dysexēgētos, hard to interpret (Diogenes Laertius, 9, 13).

OT 1. In comparison with the central rôle played by the nous in the world of Gk.

literature, it is surprising how little use is made of this group of words in the LXX. The most common of the terms is dianoia, which appears 75 times, whereas nous and noeō are each attested only about 35 times, and the other derivatives even less. This sparing use of the words in the LXX is connected with the fact that the Heb. has no term equivalent to the Gk. nous. lēb or lēbāb, which is rendered in the LXX 6 times by nous and 38 times by dianoia, is otherwise nearly always translated kardia, → heart. Nevertheless, this variation in translation does indicate that in OT thought the heart is the seat of intellectual processes. But OT anthropology knows nothing of the Gk. division of the soul into three parts, so that human understanding does not become pushed into the foreground in such a one-sided and isolated way as is the case, at least to some extent, in the Gk. world. In the OT the understanding belongs together with the will, and aims less at theoretical contemplation than at right conduct. The intellectual sphere is thus anchored more firmly in the whole person, both body and soul, than it is in Gk. thought (cf. W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, II, 1967, 147 ff.). The intellectual element is displayed more clearly in the use of the vb. noeō than it is with the noun nous, for it goes back to the Heb. bîn, to understand, perceive. Insight and understanding also mean in the OT the process of judging and exploring the relation of things to one another. The difference is that this insight is not regarded as an independent achievement of man using his critical faculty, but as a gift of Yahweh. The most important statement of the OT theory of knowledge is that all true knowledge comes from God (cf. L. Koehler, Hebrew Man, 1956, 115–48; Old Testament Theology, 1957, 99–126).

In general, these words are seldom found in the earlier parts of the OT. They are more frequent in the Wisdom literature; but they come into their own in the Gk. writings of the LXX (especially Macc.). This fact indicates that the specifically Gk.

concept of nous did not enter the OT tradition until the post-canonical, apocryphal era. The process reaches a kind of climax in Philo.

2. (a) The fact that nous 6 times (out of a total of 31) stands in the LXX for lēb and lēbāb, heart, inner being, suggests that the texts have undergone a certain Hellenizing process (Exod. 7:23; Isa. 10:7b, etc.); but it also shows that nous is to be understood in a sense more associated with the will. Other expressions pointing in the same direction are to keep in mind (2 Macc. 15:8), to give attention to something (1 Esd. 9:41); and phrases like an understanding mind (4 Macc. 1:35; 2:16), a pure mind (Test. Ben. 8:3), an innocent mind (Wis. 4:12), or in Josephus, a healthy mind (Ant. 8, 23). But at the same time, the use of nous to translate lēb also includes the element of deliberation, sometimes almost philosophical reflection, with the aim of making a practical decision (e.g. Isa. 10:7; 41:22). An unusual use of nous is to translate rūah, spirit (Isa. 40:13; cf. Jud. 8:14). But the use of nous for 'ōzen, ear, may be due to a scribal error – nous instead of ous, ear (Job 33:16; 12:11).

(b) dianoia (c. 75 times) is also used in the LXX to translate heart. It can be used to express the idea of to oneself, in one's heart, in one's mind, and so comes to be used to express emotions and acts of will (Isa. 35:4; Exod. 35:22). It can also express the whole of one's inner life (Gen. 8:21). Occasionally it renders the Heb. maḥ^ašābōt, plots, plans (Dan. 11:25), and also bīnāh, understanding (Dan. 9:22).

In the apocryphal writings dianoia means spirit, mind, consciousness, disposition, especially in a moral sense. God is the guide of the dianoia (Aristeas 238). The good, moral, pure mind can be beguiled (Test. Ben. 8:2; Test. Jud. 11:1). Philo is able to write of the dianoia in the same way as he does of the nous, that it is the divine element in man (Det. Pot. Ins. 29), the organ by which God is perceived (Virt. 57), and that which makes man immortal (Op. Mund. 135).

(c) ennoia (13 times) is used to render various Heb. words, especially in Prov. (1:4; 2:11; 3:21; 4:1; 5:2; 8:12; 16:22; 18:15; 19:7; 23:4, 19; 24:7; Wis. 2:14). All the Heb. equivalents mean understanding, wisdom, knowledge, and so ennoia retains its sense of reflection, insight, perception, wisdom, though not the theoretical meaning of concept. This latter sense is not found before Philo (Leg. All. 3, 234). Test. Naph. 2:5 uses it for thought; as does Philo (the ennoia of God, Det. Pot. Ins. 86).

(d) noēma (3 times) appears in the LXX in the sense of evil intention, plot; not as in classical Gk., concept (Sir. 21:11; Bar. 2:8; 3 Macc. 5:30).

dianoēma, on the other hand, usually in the LXX means wise thought, insight (Prov. 14:14; 15:24; Isa. 55:9; Ezek. 14:3 f.; Sir. 25:5; 32[35]:18).

(e) anoia (13 times) means lack of understanding, folly, especially in a moral sense (Prov. 14:8; 22:15, for iwwelet; it is found again in 2 Macc. 4:6, 40; 14:5; 15:33, where it always means wickedness, and in Josephus (Ant. 8, 318) coupled with baseness (cf. also Job 33:23; Ps. 22[21]:2; Eccl. 11:10; Wis. 15:18; 19:3; 3 Macc. 3:16, 20).

3. (a) noeō (35 times) renders, along with synīemi and ginōskō, the various forms of the Heb. bīn, to observe, notice, understand (e.g. Prov. 20:24; Jer. 2:10), or the Heb. sākal, understand, have insight (e.g. Prov. 1:3; Jer. 10:21).

The typical organ of understanding in the OT is the → heart (Prov. 16:23; Isa. 6:10). This implies that this understanding lies within the realm of moral decisions. In Isa. 47:7 ("you did not lay these things to heart") the LXX translates freely, and yet without changing the meaning, "you did not understand this in your heart." In Philo noeō means to think, losing its association with sense perception (Leg. All. 2, 70; Abr. 44).

(b) katanoēō (30 times) is used in the LXX in the sense of to notice, regard, for the Heb. rā'âh, to see (Isa. 5:12; Exod. 19:21); for nābaṭ hiph., to look (e.g. Pss. 10:14[9:35]; 22[21]:17; synonymous to blepō, to look, Dan. 7:21; so also in Philo, Vit. Mos. 1, 158). The LXX translates ṣāpâh, to spy, watch, by katanoēō (e.g. Ps. 37[36]:32), and Josephus uses the vb. in the same way (Ant. 5, 5). Philo uses it in the sense of meditative reflection, in referring to the beauty of an idea (Ebr. 137).

(c) anoētos (9 times) appears in the LXX for the Heb. 'eṣl (Prov. 17:28) and 'iwwelet (Prov. 15:21), foolish, without sense. Otherwise it is without Heb. equivalent (Deut. 32:31; Ps. 49[48]:12; Sir. 21:19; 42:8; 4 Macc. 5:8 f.; 8:17). It occurs alongside mōros (Sir. 21:19; 42:8) in a moral and religious sense: senseless, foolish.

4. (a) In Philo's writings we find all the elements of the Gk. concept of nous. The mysterious element of thought and understanding comes in, however, for stronger emphasis here than in classical Gk. God is the reason behind all things, the perfect world-reason. Because reason is inspired by God, it leads to the knowledge of God (Deus Imm. 143; Spec. Leg. 1, 18; Migr. Abr. 192). Whereas the Greeks defined reason, and looked for its origin in human powers, thus placing their emphasis upon reasoned consideration of the world, Philo was more interested in the significance of reason as a means to gain knowledge of God. More important for him than any knowledge of God gained by reason is an ecstatic knowledge of God, conveyed by God's Spirit. So long as ecstasy continues, reason must take second place (Rer. Div. Her. 265; Leg. All. 2, 31).

(b) It can be established that in intertestamental Judaism the words of this group are used with a bias towards the moral side. A religious element may be detected more clearly than in Gentile writings. At the same time Gk. anthropology exercised an influence in translation and use of terms. nous generally means mind, moral nature (e.g. Test. Ben. 8:3; Test. Jud. 14:2 f.).

(c) For the Qumran community understanding and insight belong only to God and his children of light. The dualistic tract 1QS 3:13–4:26 praises the mysteries of the insight and wisdom of God, which will bring to an end at the appointed time the existence of wickedness (1QS 4:18). Those who would join the community must first be tested for their insight (CD 13:11). The Hymns praise God, who has lent to his own the insight to recognize his wonders and mighty deeds (1QH 11:28; 12:13; 13:13). In the writings of the sect we find the (gnostic?) version of the Aaronic blessing: "May he lighten your heart with life-giving wisdom and grant you eternal knowledge" (1QS 2:3).

NT 1. If we consider first and foremost the frequency of the nous group of words in the NT, we find the same situation as in the LXX: namely, that the group does not have a central part to play in the NT as a whole. nous is found only 24 times, noeō and katanoēō 14 times each, and the other associated terms even less often. This statistical survey gives, however, a false impression. It is true that the concept of nous has only a peripheral place in the Gospels (with the partial exception later of Lk., who uses katanoēō 8 times) and in the later letters. On the other hand, we find that this Hellenistic terminology occurs relatively more frequently in Paul (21 of the 24 occurrences of nous itself are in the so-called Pauline corpus). It was Paul who not only acted as the historical link between the early church and its Hellenistic environment, but also thought out, in his dealings with the church at Corinth, the fundamental theological relationship between faith and knowledge. Although he adopted concepts and ways of formulating problems from Hellenism, he rejected the Gk. attempts at solving them, and relegated reason to its proper and inalienable place, both limiting and freeing it by means of the Christian faith.

All in all, it may be said that the NT gives to this group of words its own interpretation. The contrast between understanding and lack of understanding becomes clearer. The whole group of words is associated more firmly with the will, and the understanding spoken of is an understanding of God and his will in salvation, an understanding of the word in scripture and preaching. Understanding itself becomes a disposition, an attitude, and thus a standpoint of faith.

2. (a) The noun nous, which is found in the Pauline corpus, including Eph., Col., and the Pastorals, has the meaning mind, faculty of judgment, insight (e.g. 2 Thess. 2:12). But this understanding is a religious understanding, a religious faculty of judgment, and is set along side the → conscience (Tit. 1:15). nous is a term parallel to → faith, which in the Pastorals means the same thing as religion: the false teachers are corrupt in their religious discernment, and not to be trusted in matters of Christian religion (2 Tim. 3:8; also 1 Tim. 6:5).

In Rom. 7:23 Paul writes, "I see in my members another law at war with the law of my nous". Then in v. 25 he goes on, "So I serve the law of God with my nous [i.e. with my understanding], but with my flesh [i.e. as flesh] I serve the law of sin." This nous is the same thing as the esō anthrōpos, the inner man, or the egō, the real self, which can distinguish between good and bad. The self agrees with the law, that it is good; the self wishes to fulfil the law. But against this law which the nous recognizes, the law of religious understanding, there fights the other law of → sin. nous is here the religious knowledge and insight which honours and recognizes the law of God.

The understanding, namely, the faculty of religious discernment, is what is meant in Eph. 4:18 by dianoia. Here we read of the darkening of the understanding – parallel, incidentally, to the futility of the nous. On the positive side we read of the gift of understanding, the ability to recognize religious truth: by this gift from the hand of Christ, Christians are enabled to discern him who is true, namely God (1 Jn. 5:20).

(b) dianoia comes very near in meaning to nous, and means, ability to think, faculty of knowledge, understanding, the organ of noein; then, mind, and particularly disposition. NT usage is quite different from that of Gk. philosophy, but correspondingly near to that of the LXX. This is shown by citations of the OT in which dianoia stands in parallelism to kardia, heart (Heb. 8:10; 10:16; from Jer. 31:33 LXX). The same combination is seen in Lk. 1:51, hyperēphanoi dianoias kardias, "proud in the imagination [or way of thinking] of their hearts" (cf. NEB "arrogant of heart and mind"). In the sense of understanding or mind, dianoia is counted among the inward powers of man (Matt. 22:36 par. Mk. 12:30; Lk. 10:27; → Command, art. entolē NT 1; → Hear, art. akouō NT 3). On the other hand, dianoia can in some contexts mean the power of the disposition or the will, and thus acquire a religious flavour. It is the spiritual consciousness, the disposition, the attitude of faith. This consciousness can be sincere (2 Pet. 3:1). It can also be hostile (Col. 1:21). It can be figuratively girded up, like the loins, i.e. when a person begins to think actively (1 Pet. 1:13).

(c) Similarly, ennoia is used in the NT neither in a gnostic nor in a philosophical sense, e.g. in the sense of concept. In the sense of thought, it is found alongside enthymēsis, consideration, again in biblical fashion with the gen. tēs kardias, of the heart (Heb. 4:12). The Christians are exhorted to arm themselves with the same thought, with which Christ was filled when he suffered (1 Pet. 4:1).

(d) noēma is found only in Paul (5 times in 2 Cor., once in Phil.). Even here we find a religious sense: the understanding of the divine will concerning salvation, the thinking concerned with this. This thinking can be corrupted, so that it no longer concerns itself simply with Christ (2 Cor. 11:3). It can be hardened and made inaccessible to God's word and the understanding of scripture (2 Cor. 3:14). It can become blind, so that it no longer perceives the illumination which comes from the gospel of the glory of Christ, and leads only to unbelief (2 Cor. 4:4). The → apostle, in the authority of his position and his commission, makes it his business to take every thought captive, so that it will submit, not to the apostle, but to Christ (2 Cor. 10:5). noēma is thus the general faculty of judgment, which can take decisions and pronounce verdicts right or wrong, depending on the influences to which it is exposed. In 2 Cor. 2:11 the plur. refers to the designs of Satan. At the climax of Phil. Paul urges his readers to continual rejoicing, forbearance and freedom from anxiety by committing everything to God in prayer. He then adds: "And the peace of God, which passes all understanding, will keep your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:7).

(e) dianoēma appears only in Lk. 11:17, where it refers to hostile thoughts. The par. in Matt. 12:25 uses enthymēseis, thoughts, considerations, and refers to the → Pharisees (cf. 11:24).

(f) anoia is lack of understanding, non-recognition, the absence of nous and dianoia. Those without understanding have no comprehension of Jesus' action towards a sick man on the → Sabbath (Lk. 6:11). They are without understanding of the saving work of God in Christ. The folly of false teachers will come to light (2 Tim. 3:9).

3. (a) noeō means to perceive, recognize in a religious sense, with especial reference to God, his acts and his will. The juxtaposition of noeō and kardia, heart, in the quotation from Isa. 6:9–10, shows that noeō is regarded as an activity of the heart, a spiritual recognition (Jn. 12:40). The invisible is perceived, but not in a mystic vision: rather the visible expression of the invisible is thought through, in a kind of process of reflexion leading from the creation to the Creator. "Ever since the creation of the world his invisible nature [ta . . . aorata autou], namely, his eternal power and deity, has been clearly perceived [nooumena kathoratai] in the things that have been made. So they are without excuse" (Rom. 1:20; → God, art. theos NT 4(b)). The invisible is seen as something recognized. Knowledge of the infinite God is reached through the finite order. Similarly, Wis. 13:4 calls on men to reflect on the beauty and power of nature: "But if men were amazed at their power and working, let them perceive from them how more powerful is he who formed them." Ultimately this recognition is dependent upon → faith. That the world was created by the word of God, only faith can perceive (Heb. 11:3).

The parenthetical expression, "let the reader understand", Matt. 24:15, calling the reader of the synoptic apocalypse to understand the text aright, uses noeō in the sense of an understanding of the divine plan of salvation. The church has the spiritual understanding (synesis) of the divine, secret plan, which the apostle proclaims in his writings (Eph. 3:4).

(b) The use of katanoēō, to see and perceive, inspect, follows a similar pattern (Lk. 6:41 par. Matt. 7:3). The speck in the brother's eye is seen, but the log in one's own eye has to be noticed and observed. Lk. 20:23 shows that katanoein includes what goes on behind the scenes. In the same way, Heb. 3:1 means that it is not the outward figure of Jesus that we should look to, but what he really is, as the emissary of God, as the real High Priest, and as the proper object of Christian faith. Christians are exhorted to pay attention to one another, i.e. to focus their attention on their standing as Christians, working itself out in love, good works and mutual fellowship (Heb. 10:24).

(c) The anoētos is the man who is lacking in understanding, knowledge, instruction, spiritual insight, the foolish man (Rom. 1:14), the opposite to the sophos, wise. The Galatians, who do not understand the freedom which their salvation has given them, are anoētoi, foolish (Gal. 3:1, 3), as are the disciples who do not understand God's plan of salvation, embracing as it does the death of Jesus. Their lack of understanding is in connection with the OT and its promises (Lk. 24:25). Foolishness here consists in deficient spiritual understanding of the good will of God.

(d) dysnoētos, hard to understand, occurs only once in the NT (2 Pet. 3:16), where it refers to difficult passages in the letters of Paul.

4. (a) The understanding of the nous has particular reference to the OT scriptures. The risen Christ opened the minds of the disciples that they might understand the scriptures (Lk. 24:45). The man with understanding is the one who knows the real meaning of the scriptures and the ways in which God manifests himself there; in other words, the one who knows the → secrets of the divine plan (Rev. 13:18; 17:9). Here nous and sophia, understanding and → wisdom, are interchangeable terms. It is the divine wisdom which has been given to the spiritual.

(b) nous theou is God's plan of salvation itself, which it is so important to know. Rom. 11:34 speaks of the nous of God, of his plan of salvation, the divine intention: "Who has known the mind of the Lord?" (cf. Isa. 40:13 f.). Again, in 1 Cor. 2:16 we read of the nous of the Lord, of his intention to save, his thoughts and plans, also quoting Isa. 40:13 (→ Council, art. symbolouō). After the quotation Paul continues: noun Christou echomen, "we have the mind of Christ". This is in keeping with the thought in 1 Cor. 2:12, that Christians have received the Spirit from God, in order that they may know what God has given them. In this context we should also consider Paul's remarks about speaking in tongues, which are reminiscent of Philo. The one who speaks in tongues is filled with the Spirit. The Spirit prays but the mind "is unfruitful" (1 Cor. 14:14). In the same passage Paul contrasts speaking with the mind and speaking in tongues (14:19). It must not be overlooked that speaking with the mind is also the gift and work of the Spirit. Even where the Spirit and the mind are separated (14:14), it is only a matter of two different modes of operation of the Spirit. In v. 14 pneuma is used in a narrower sense, of → ecstasy brought on by the Spirit, which is contrasted with the mind, in which the Spirit is also at work. What is described in v. 24, the conviction of the outsider when he comes into the Christian assembly, is a conscious experience, the result of the comprehensible prophetic charisma. On the intercession of the Spirit and tongues → Prayer, art. entynchanō.

(c) nous in the sense of right understanding leads to a right attitude of mind. The heathen have a foolish attitude of mind because they lack right knowledge (Eph. 4:17). Christians, on the other hand, must be renewed in the spirit of their mind (Eph. 4:23). The Spirit upholds and fills the mind of the Christian. The hortatory part of the epistle to the Romans begins with the command to be transformed by the renewing of the mind (Rom. 12:2). Everyone is to be convinced in his decisions and his knowledge (Rom. 14:5). Paul appeals to the Corinthians, beset by divisions, to continue in one mind and opinion (1 Cor. 1:10). G. Harder σύνεσις	σύνεσις (synesis), faculty of comprehension, understanding, insight; συνίημι (syniēmi), perceive, comprehend, understand; συνετός (synetos), quick at apprehending, understanding, intelligent; ἀσύνητος (asynetos), senseless, foolish.

---------	--

CL This group of words is common in classical Gk. literature, the vb. and noun being attested since Homer, the adj. synetos and its opposite asynetos since Theognis and Hdt. The vb. syniēmi originally meant to bring together (Homer, Il. 1, 8); this simple meaning is not found in the NT. Figuratively, syniēmi means to perceive, take notice of, understand, see into, comprehend. The word thus signifies, first, perception, then, taking note of, and finally, grasping, in the sense of understanding – though the latter meaning does not occur before Heraclitus.

The noun synesis means, first, a joining (of rivers, Homer Od. 10, 515); then, in a transferred sense, the faculty of apprehension, understanding, judgment, insight, comprehension. The term is distinguished from other related terms in Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 6, 11; but neither the vb. nor the noun acquired any great philosophical importance.

The adj. synetos means quick at apprehending, understanding, clever; passively, intelligible; and the opposite is asynetos, stupid or unintelligible.

OT In the LXX the words of this group occur frequently, the noun and the vb. being found about 100 times each, the adj. 53 times, though the negative adj. is much rarer (11 times). As one might expect, they are found most frequently in the Wisdom literature. The most important Heb. equivalents are bîn, to observe, notice, understand, and its derivatives.

It is a characteristic of the meaning of this group of words that they are used mostly in connexion with sayings about → Wisdom. synesis, understanding, insight (Gk. translation of Heb. bînâh or tʿbûnâh in the same sense), and sophia, wisdom (for Heb. hokmâh in the same sense), are used together (e.g. Isa. 11:2; 29:14; Job 12:13; Sir. 1:19 f.; and especially in the programmatic texts Prov. 1:7 par. Ps. 111[110]:10; Prov. 2:1 ff.; 9:10). Other words used synonymously or in parallelism complete the picture: in Isa. 43:10 we find “know” and “believe” next to “understand”. The object of this knowledge is the fact that God is God (e.g. Jer. 9:24; note the contrast with human wisdom in v. 23, cf. also the LXX text of 1 Sam. 2:10). “Fear of the LORD”, “justice and righteousness”, “good and evil” are named as the objects of insight (Prov. 2:5, 9; 9:10; 1 Ki. 3:9, 11). From this it may be concluded that in later wisdom teaching insight is not understood as a faculty open to every man. This was how the older proverbial wisdom thought of wisdom and understanding (G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel, 1972, 53–73). But when they became linked closely to the objects of knowledge just mentioned, the terms became more narrowly defined. Since the knowledge of God is always associated with God's revelatory activity, insight can ultimately be understood only as a gift of God which he imparts in response to man's request (1 Ki. 3:9; Dan. 2:21; Ps. 119[118]:34, 73, 125), but can also withdraw because of men's disobedience (Isa. 29:14). Under the influence of OT ideas, the definition of the term can change in the world of Hel. Judaism: e.g. asynetos can mean a lack of apprehension but also of moral insight (Sir. 15:7; Josephus, War 6, 170).

NT In the NT these words are found less frequently than in the LXX. The vb. occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, in quotations from the LXX at Rom. 3:11 and 15:21, and otherwise 2 Cor. 10:12 and Eph. 5:17; the noun only 7 times altogether (once in a quotation); and the adj. and its opposite only very occasionally in the Synoptic Gospels, and only in quotations in Paul. The words are not present in John's Gospel or the Johannine Epistles (though the ideas are present in Jn. 12:37–41). The OT idea that insight is a gift of God and is linked with his revelation reappears in the NT usage. This is clear from the fact that the terms we are discussing appear in important passages in quotations from the OT, or in loose connection with such quotations (Isa. 6:9 f. in Matt. 13:13 par. Mk. 4:12; Lk. 9:10; cf. Matt. 13:15; Mk. 8:17 f., 21; Acts 28:26 f.; Deut. 6:5 in Mk. 12:33; Ps. 14:2 in Rom. 3:11; Deut. 32:21 in Rom. 10:19; Isa. 52:15 in Rom. 15:21; Isa. 29:14 in 1 Cor. 1:19).

1. In the Synoptic Gospels the most important passages are those which are concerned with the theme of the so-called "messianic secret" (→ Secret).

(a) Mark records the disciples' lack of understanding regarding the words and actions of Jesus (6:52; 7:18; 8:17, 21; in 8:18 with direct reference to Isa. 6:9 f. or Jer. 5:21; and the same idea expressed with other vbs. in Mk. 4:40 f.; 9:10, 32). This gives expression to the thought that the biographical nearness of the disciples to Jesus is not alone sufficient to guarantee understanding. Jesus' work is understood in retrospect in the light of Easter. It is the → faith which the gospel stimulates and which God gives that leads the church into insight.

The so-called "parable theory" of Mk. 4:10–12 serves to press home the same point. Here the conflict between Jesus' teaching by parables, with its aim of illumination and understanding, and Mk's concept of the secret messiahship of Jesus, is solved by the assertion that the works of Jesus become revelation to those who believe. Therefore they are given the secret of the kingdom of God. To "those who are without" everything is said in parables. Because they do not understand these, they are unable to turn and be saved (→ Parable, art. parabolē NT 7). Here again Isa. 6:9 f. is cited (v. 12).

(b) A comparison of the Matthean parallels with the passages in Mk. indicates that Matt. adopts a somewhat different emphasis. This is true not only of the so-called "parable theory" but also of the disciples' lack of understanding.

The failure of the disciples to understand the parables is not for Matt. paramount.

At the end of the parabolic discourse reports Jesus asks the disciples, "Have you understood all this?" Matt. reports the answer "Yes" (Matt. 13:51). The statement of Mk. 6:52, which attributes their lack of insight to hardness of heart, is passed over in the Matthean version and replaced by an exclamation of worship, praising Jesus as the Son of God (Matt. 14:33). The discussion of → leaven (Mk. 8:14–21, par. Matt. 16:5–12), which ends in Mk. with the accusing question, "Do you not yet understand?", leads in Matt. to the final understanding of the disciples. H. Conzelmann sees a "psychologising trend" in Matt. (TDNT VII 895) which displays a greater interest in the disciples' understanding than Mk. Mk. presents the material as a problem; Matt. presents the problem and at the same time shows how the disciples came to understand. But he does not minimize the fact that understanding is a divine gift (cf. Matt. 16:16 ff.; 17:5 ff.).

(c) In Luke many of the passages under discussion are missing, or have been greatly shortened (e.g. the parable theory in Lk. 8:9 f.). In Lk. 18:34 the disciples' lack of understanding is emphasized particularly in regard to the passion prediction of Jesus. In Lk. 2:47 the insight of Jesus at twelve years of age is the subject of amazement, and there is no doubt that insight is here regarded as a gift of God – just as in Lk. 2:50 his parents' failure to understand must be seen as the exact opposite. On the other hand, it is the risen Christ who enables the downcast disciples on the Emmaus road to understand the scriptures and to grasp the fact that his sufferings were foreordained by God (Lk. 24:45).

Finally, in Acts 28:26 f., Isa. 6:9 f. is cited as the explanation for the unwillingness and inability of the Jews in Rome to understand (cf. Jn. 12:40, where noeō is used instead of synīēmi). Along with the LXX, the writer of Acts has changed the imperative "harden" of the prophetic word into the indicative "hardened", simply describing the refusal of the people. It is thus indicated that, although insight is a gift of God, lack of insight must be regarded as culpable (→ Hard; → Blind).

2. In Paul the use of these words is again affected by OT concepts, especially since in the majority of cases it is in quotations from the OT or allusions to OT phrases (Rom. 3:11 = Ps. 14:2; Rom. 10:19 = Deut. 32:21; Rom. 15:21 = Isa. 52:15; 1 Cor. 1:19 = Isa. 29:14). Whether lack of insight is being condemned (Rom. 3:11), or God's wrath pronounced over the arrogance of those who believe themselves to be wise (1 Cor. 1:19), or whether the subject is the universality of the message of salvation (Rom. 10:19; 15:21), insight is always seen as a gift of God and lack of insight as not merely a chance lack of knowledge. The latter is a sign that a man in his deepest being rejects God ("their senseless minds were darkened", Rom. 1:21). Thus in the Pauline passages the context emphasizes more strongly than in the Synoptic Gospels that lack of insight must be regarded as culpable behaviour. asynetos, having no insight, "foolish" (RSV), appears among the list of evils in Rom. 1:31. Similarly the connexion between understanding and knowledge is more obvious than in the Synoptic Gospels (e.g. 1 Cor. 1:19; Rom. 1:21 f.).

3. In the later Pauline literature we find not only the familiar ideas (insight as a gift, 2 Tim. 2:7), but also a new emphasis arising because of the connexion of these words with the concept of mystery. Fullness of understanding is given in the revelation of the → secret of God in Christ, in whom all the treasures of → wisdom and → knowledge lie hidden (Col. 2:2 f.). We may compare Eph. 3:4, where the content of the mystery of Christ is, in keeping with the wider context of the thought in Eph., associated with the church. In these epistles the nearness of this group of words to the concept of wisdom is again obvious (Col. 1:9; 2:2; Eph. 5:17; cf. v. 15).

J. Goetzmann

→ Conscience, → Faith, → Knowledge, → Man, → Mind, → Secret, → Think, → Truth, → Wisdom

(a). G. Barth, "Matthew's Understanding of the Law", in G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, 58–164; K. Barth, Anselm: Fides Quaerens Intellectum; Anselm's Proof of the Existence of God in the Context of his Theological Scheme, 1960; J. Behm and E. Würthwein, noēō etc., TDNT IV 948–1022; B. Blanshard, Reason and Analysis, 1962; and Reason and Belief, Based on Gifford Lectures at St Andrews and Noble Lectures at Harvard, 1974; G. Bornkamm, "Faith and Reason in Paul's Epistles", NTS 4, 1957–58, 93–100; and "The Revelation of God's Wrath (Romans 1–3)", in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 47–70; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 211–20; and "Romans 7 and the Anthropology of Paul", in Existence and Faith, (1961) 1964, 173–85; H. Conzelmann, syniēmi etc., TDNT VII 888–96; and An Outline Theology of the New Testament, 1969, 180 f.; A. C. Ewing, Reason and Intuition, 1942; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, II, 1967, 118–50; N. S. F. Ferré, Reason in Religion, 1963; S. Freud, The Future of an Illusion, 1928; K. von Fritz, "Noos and noein in the Homeric Poems", Classical Philology 38, 1943, 79 ff.; and "Nous, noein and their Derivatives in Pre-Socratic Philosophy (excluding Anaxagoras)", Part I, From the Beginning to Parmenides", Classical Philology 40, 1945, 223 ff.; H.-G. Gadamer, "The Power of Reason", Man and World 3, 1970, 5–15; W. K. C. Guthrie, A History of Greek Philosophy, I The Earlier Presocratics and the Pythagoreans, 1962; II The Presocratic Tradition from Parmenides to Democritus, 1965; III The Fifth-Century Enlightenment, 1969 (see indexes under nous); R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of their Use in Conflict Settings, Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Christentums 10, 1971, 358–90; D. W. Kemmler, Faith and Human Reason: A Study of Paul's Method of Preaching as Illustrated by 1–2 Thessalonians and Acts 17, 2–4, Supplements to NovT 40, 1975; L. Koehler, Hebrew Man, 1956, 115–48; and Old Testament Theology, 1957, 99–126; J. L. Martyn, "Epistemology at the Turn of the Ages: 2 Cor. 5:16", in W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr, eds., Christian History and Interpretation. Studies Presented to John Knox, 1967, 269–87; A. E. Murphy, The Uses of Reason, 1943; E. Nagel, Sovereign Reason, 1954; W. Pannenberg, "Faith and Reason", in Basic Questions in Theology, II, 1971, 46–64; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel, 1972; N. H. G. Robinson, "Reason and Religion", SJT 23, 1970, 338–48; B. Russell, Skeptical Essays, 1928; G. Santayana, The Life of Reason, 1954; B. Snell, The Discovery of the Mind: The Greek Origins of European Thought, 1953 (the Ger. translation Die Entdeckung des Geistes, 1955³ contains additional material); W. H. Walsh, Reason and Experience, 1947; G. J. Warnock, "Reason", in P. Edwards, ed., The Encyclopedia of Philosophy, VII, 1967, 83 ff.; A. N. Whitehead, The Function of Reason, 1929; R. N. Whybray, The Intellectual Tradition in the Old Testament, BZAW 135, 1974; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974, 46–55.

(b). P. Bonnard, "L'Intelligence chez Saint Paul", in L'Évangile Hier et Aujourd'hui, Festschrift F. J. Leenhardt, 1968, 13 ff.; A. Fridrichsen, "Zur Auslegung von Römer 1.19 f.", ZNW 17, 1916, 159 ff.; H.-J. Iwand, Glauben und Wissen, Nachgelassene Werke, I, ed. H. Gollwitzer, 1962, 17 ff.; H. J. Krämer, Der Ursprung der Geistesmetaphysik, 1964; W. G. Kümmel, Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des Paulus, Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 17, 1929; J. Kürzinger, "Der Schlüssel zum Verständnis von Römer 7", BZ Neue Folge 7, 1963, 270–74; B. Lohse, "Vernunft", EKL III 1649 ff.; H. Lüdemann, Die Anthropologie des Apostels Paulus und ihre Stellung innerhalb seiner Heilslehre. Nach den vier Hauptbriefen, 1873; O. Moe, "Vernunft and Geist im Neuen Testament", ZSTh 11, 1934, 351 ff.; K. Oehler, "Vernunft und Verstand", *RGG*³ VI 1364 ff.; and Die Lehre vom noetischen und dianoetischen Denken bei Platon und Aristoteles, 1962; H. Ott, "Glaube und Vernunft", TLZ 92, 1967, 401 ff.; O. Sander, "Leib-Seele Dualismus im Alten Testament?", ZAW 77, 1965, 329 ff.; R. Schottlaender, "Nous als Terminus", Hermes 64, 1929, 239 ff.; G. Schrenk, "Geist und Enthusiasmus", in Wort und Geist. Festschrift K. Heim, 1934, 75 ff. (reprinted in Studien zu Paulus, ATHANT 26, 1954, 107 ff.); T. Simon, Die Psychologie des Apostels Paulus, 1897; B. Snell, "Wie die Griechen lernten, was geistige Tätigkeit ist", Journal of Hellenic Studies 93, 1973, 172–84; J. Stenzel, "Zur Entwicklung des Geistesbegriffes in der griechischen Philosophie", Antike 1, 1925, 244 ff.; P. Stuhlmacher, "Glauben und Verstehen bei Paulus", EvTh 26, 1966, 337 ff.; G. Teichmüller, Neue Studien zur Geschichte der Begriffe, I–III (1876–79) 1965 (see index under nous); E. Weber, "Die Beziehungen von Römer 1–3 zur Missionspraxis des Paulus”, BFCTh, 9, 1905, 86 ff.; H. H. Wendt, Die Begriffe Fleisch und Geist im biblischen Sprachgebrauch, 1878.

Recompense, Reward, Gain, Wages

The following article brings together several Gk. words. The group associated with apodidōmi conveys the idea of recompense. The word misthos is taken from commercial life and originally denoted the payment made to a worker, but since Hellenistic times it was also used in religious contexts. opsōnion, on the other hand, is a term drawn from military circles, meaning the soldier’s rations, then payment for military service, and finally the salary of a government official. kerdos is the word with the widest meaning. It suggests the consequences of payment: profit, advantage, gain. Since advantage and disadvantage and profit and loss belong together as opposites, zēmia (loss) is discussed together with kerdos.

ἀποδίδωμι	ἀποδίδωμι (apodidōmi), give away, give up, give back, sell, give back what is due, recompense; ἀνταποδίδωμι (antapodidōmi), give back, repay, return, requite, pay back in his own coin; ἀνταπόδοσις (antapodosis), repaying, reward, recompense; ἀνταπόδομα (antapodoma), repayment, requital, recompense.
------------------	---

CL apodidōmi, attested in general Gk. usage from the time of Homer, means primarily to give up, render (Diod. Sic. 14, 84, 2), or, to give back (Xen., Hell. 2, 2, 9). In the mid. it means accordingly to sell. Hence it acquired the specific meaning of giving something up which one must give up because of some kind of obligation (thus to pay out a wage, Xen., Anab. 1, 2, 12; to pay one’s vow, Xen., Mem. 2, 2, 10). This gives the word the technical sense to render, requite, in both good and bad senses (Dion. Hal., 6, 73). The compound form antapodidōmi and its derivatives express this meaning of the word still more definitely in the Hellenistic period. In the article which follows we shall concentrate on the idea of recompense, since it is here that the term has relevance theologically.

OT 1. In the OT act and consequence are firmly linked like cause and effect. The reward arises out of the action done, like the harvest from the act of sowing (e.g. Job 8:7; Prov. 22:8; cf. Gal. 6:7 ff.). The concept of a personal judge and recompenser is present here in so far as God is the one who maintains this order and allows the action to return upon the doer (Heb. hēšīb, hiph. of Heb. šūb, return, i.e. cause to return, requite, 1 Sam. 26:23 f; 2 Sam. 16:8). As such, he avenges wrongdoing (nāqam, Jer. 15:15). Man’s responsibility before God is expressed clearly by the root pāqad, to visit (→ Bishop, art. episkopos OT): God keeps a watch over his servants, recognizing right actions and inflicting punishment upon the wicked (Hos. 1:4; 4:9, 14; 8:13; 9:7; Amos 3:14). The most important term for recompense is, however, šālēm in the piel, which means to restore, repay, pay damages (cf. Exod. 22). In legal, judicial usage it comes to mean to requite, because the judge so to speak repays a claim which a person has earned by his action either on the good side (reward) or on the bad (punishment). This is especially clear in Prov. 19:17. Reward and → punishment correspond to the action of the one being judged (cf. Jdg. 1:7; 2 Sam. 3:39; Ps. 62:12; Jer. 25:14; 50:29).

2. The idea of recompense is found first and foremost as a concept characteristic of the theology of the OT, in the negative sense of God’s punishment for the disobedience of Israel. God punishes the people as a whole. Ezekiel was the first to declare that no man will die on account of another's sin (Ezek. 18). God requites his people for their unfaithfulness. This is not despite his → election of them; rather they are responsible to him because they have been "known" by God (Amos 3:2). It is their faithlessness to the → covenant between God and his people which is the cause of their punishment. Deut. is the first book to speak of a "reward" for the faithful (Deut. 28). The Deuteronomic history (Jdg.-2 Ki.) finds in the recompense of God the key to understanding the history of Israel. This is set out programmatically in Jdg. 2:6 ff.

3. In the intertestamental period the idea of recompense came to be related exclusively to the → law. The latter is no longer anchored in the historic event of the old covenant; it is no longer a set of instructions on how to remain within the grace of the covenant. It becomes an absolute norm, according to which each person's actions are assessed and by means of which one hopes to attain to salvation (which is seen as altogether other-worldly and in the future). Recompense is now no longer simply the punishment of faithlessness and apostasy; it also determines who has succeeded in reaching the height of fellowship with God by means of his good → works. The OT by contrast regarded → fellowship with God as a free gift, which had come to the people by grace in the deliverance from Egypt and the bestowal of the land of Canaan. Now judgment, recompense, and salvation or condemnation are transferred completely into the future. The present state of salvation, which for the OT consisted in living in the promised land, became lost in the hardships of the people from the time of the Babylonian captivity. This legalistic understanding of recompense leads the LXX to translate the Heb. equivalents into the legal terms antapodidōmi, to requite, and antapodoma, requital.

NT 1. In the NT apodidōmi occurs 43 times, predominantly in Matt. (18 times), Lk. (12 times) and Paul (8 times). As with the Hellenistic writers, the whole wide range of the word is represented: to hand over (Matt. 27:58); to give back (Lk. 4:20); to sell (Acts 5:8, mid.); to pay what has been agreed or to fulfil an agreed obligation (Matt. 20:8); to pay a debt (Matt. 18:23 ff.); to perform what one has sworn to do (Matt. 5:33); and then especially, to forgive. The vb. is not found in Jn. In the sense of to recompense, it occurs chiefly in Matt. and Paul, but also in Rev.; in the sense of to restore, in Lk.

antapodidōmi (7 times; of which 4 are in Paul, 2 in Lk.) fits into the same pattern. It emphasizes the character of what is given in return. antapodoma and antapodosis are used in reference to the divine recompense (Lk. 14:12; Rom. 11:9) at the final judgment (Col. 3:24).

2. Theologically apodidōmi has its home in the NT expectation of → judgment and → punishment. Jesus proclaimed the final judgment as being at hand and summoned men to repentance. The NT concept of recompense can best be illustrated from a passage like Mk. 8:38: "For whoever is ashamed of me and my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him will the Son of man also be ashamed, when he comes in the glory of his Father with the holy angels" (par. Lk. 9:26). As in the OT, it is a person's attitude to the Lord (in the NT Jesus Christ), our faithfulness towards him, that determines our fate on the last day. This is the meaning of the parable of the last judgment in Matt. 25:31-46. Here the ultimate criterion is the behaviour of men towards Christ, even though this attitude is expressed also in their relationships with their neighbours. In the same way John can identify the → work which will be approved at the judgment with faith (Jn. 6:29), and conversely describe unbelief simply as sin (Jn. 16:9; cf. 12:48). Recompense, then, is not a matter of the reckoning up and weighing against each other of individual works; the decisive factor is whether we are true to Jesus and his word, whether we confess him or reject him. This is corroborated by Heb. 10:26–30, with its insistent warning against apostasy and leaving the new covenant, for fear of recompense. “For we know him who said, ‘Vengeance is mine, I will repay [emoi ekdikēsis, egō antapodōsō].’ And again, ‘The Lord will judge his people’” (quoting Deut. 32:35 f.). The NT, like the OT, thinks in terms of a covenant already established, fellowship already firmly fixed, and expects recompense to operate against those who withdraw from Jesus Christ.

3. This gives us the background of the NT use of apodidōmi. Man is responsible to his heavenly Judge, whether he is a Christian or an unbeliever (Rom. 2:6; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13 ff.; 2 Cor. 5:10). apodidōmi does not imply an evaluation of human works on the basis of some inherent moral worth in the works themselves, even where reference is made to an apodidōmi according to works (Matt. 16:27; Rom. 2:6; 2 Tim. 4:14; Rev. 22:12). The works are rather the expression either of opposition to Christ, or of agreement and faith; in them is manifested either allegiance to the new covenant, which causes the Christian to be obedient to his Lord and to be his disciple, or the unbeliever’s state of rejection.

A passage which is particularly instructive in this context is Rev. 20:11–15 on the final judgment. All men are judged according to their works, which are recorded in books which have been opened (v. 12). When it comes, however, to the book of life (vv. 12, 15), the pattern of recompense is no longer carried through consistently. The believers are withdrawn from the judgment. Through → election they have a → righteousness which leads to life. For them the recompense consists of the “inheritance” which God gives (cf. Col. 3:24). Since recompense comes with the final judgment, Christians are forbidden to wreak their own vengeance in the present age (Rom. 12:17; 1 Thess. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:9). On the question of human merit → misthos below.

P. C. Böttger

κέρδος	κέρδος (kerdos), gain; κερδαίνω (kerdainō), to gain; ζημία (zēmia), damage, disadvantage, forfeit, loss; ζημιόομαι (zēmioomai), suffer damage, loss, forfeit.
--------	---

CL kerdos, gain, profit, advantage; more rarely used in Gk. for clever advice, cunning attacks; and in the plur. deceit, a frequent meaning from Homer onwards. The vb. kerdainō means to make to profit or gain an advantage, gain something or somebody for something; it can also mean to spare or avoid (e.g. in Acts 27:21), since avoiding loss brings a gain.

The opposite of kerdos is zēmia, disadvantage, loss, and (occasionally) punishment. The opposite of kerdainō is accordingly zēmioomai, suffer loss, attested only after Homer. These contrasting pairs are brought together in Matt. 16:26 and Phil. 3:7.

OT Although neither kerdos nor kerdainō (which can be traced back to Hesiod) is used in the LXX, the OT and LXX both use careful periphrases for profit, making the following distinctions.

1. Gains which are unjustly acquired or striven for are termed Heb. beša', unjust gain, robbery, booty, profit (Gen. 37:26; Exod. 18:21; Jdg. 5:19; Ps. 119:36; Isa. 33:15; 56:11; 57:17; Jer. 22:17; 51:13; Ezek. 22:13; 33:31). The corresponding vb. bāša' means to cut to pieces, plunder, make a profit (cf. Ps. 10:3; Prov. 1:19; Jer. 6:13; 8:10). The LXX, keeping the general sense, translates the idea by anomia, lawlessness, adikia, unrighteousness, anoma, lawless things (cf. Prov. 1:19; 28:16; Isa. 33:15; Jer. 6:13 "everybody is out for gain").

2. Gain as a yitron, advantage or profit = LXX perisseia, surplus, abundance (→ Fullness, art. perisseuō). The Preacher is the only one to enquire about profit in life and to deny it critically (Eccl. 2:11); there is nothing of any profit under the sun (cf. Eccl. 1:3; 3:9; 5:15 with 2:13; 3:19; 5:8, 15; 6:8; 7:11 f. [12 f.]; 10:10 f.).

3. To gain, as a translation of yā'al (hiph.), means to have an advantage or bring a profit: "What advantage have I?" (Job 35:3; cf. 21:15). The LXX translates gain, advantage by opheleia.

NT In the NT kerdos is found only 3 times, all in Paul. kerdainō occurs 16 times, of which the following are particularly important theologically: Matt. 16: 26 par. Mk. 8:36, Lk. 9:25; Matt. 25:16 ff.; Phil. 3:8; 1 Cor. 9:19 ff.

1. The NT is critically opposed to the normal economic orientation of profit in so far as profit is looked for out of selfish motives. Tit. 1:11 is directed against teachers of false doctrine from Crete who were spreading abroad ideas with an eye to their own advantage. They teach "for base gain" (cf. also the warnings to the leaders and deacons of the congregation in 1 Tim. 3:8; Tit. 1:17; 1 Pet. 5:2). Anyone who is out for gain and whose view of life is dominated by the profit-motive falls into an arrogant self-centredness, and thus into sin (Jas. 4:13). Matt. 16:26 par. Mk. 8:36, Lk. 9:25 give a similar warning against finding a basis for one's life by means of self-preservation. It is no use securing the lordship of the world and all its powers, if one's life is forfeited. The most important thing that a man has is his life; but paradoxically he must lose it in order to gain it.

2. Paul develops a positive understanding of gain in Phil. 1:21, and in Phil. 2:5 ff. distinguishes it from the values that men put on life. He recounts his own privileges, both inherited and acquired, such as his circumcision and membership of the chosen people, his conduct in life and his faithful adherence to the law. The historical and moral advantages of this sort, which had been his "gain" (kerdos), had become, for the sake of Christ, total loss (zēmia), because they were bound by the law of reputation and achievement, and conferred none of the "righteousness from God" (Phil. 3:9). Paul, therefore, regards human gains as losses, in order to gain Christ and be found in him. The gain of Christ is the ultimate good. Death itself is therefore a "gain" (Phil. 1:21), since it marks the end of the life of martyrdom and leads to life with Christ. Simply to come to Christ and to be with him is gain.

3. Allied with this is the particular meaning that gaining takes on in the language of mission. Paul conceives of his missionary commission as a "gaining". In 1 Cor. 9:19 he declares: "For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a slave to all, that I may win [kerdēsō] the more." Winning or gaining here corresponds with "saving" in 1 Cor. 9:22; this is the goal of missionary work.

Matt. 18:15 exhorts people to encourage, and so “gain”, the brother who has fallen into sin, through their pastoral care and concern. In 1 Pet. 3:1 wives are to “win” their husbands who do not obey the word simply by their behaviour.

4. By contrast with reward (→ misthos), which is paid out or earned as recompense for work done or for certain human behaviour, gain comes from the hidden work of Christ. In order to gain “talents” (Matt. 25:16 ff.), whether they be understood as men or Christ, one needs his gifts and his commissioning. Only through him does life reach its goal: only in him is the perisseia which the Preacher searched for in vain – the full measure of God’s grace and his gift of righteousness (Rom. 5:17).

B. Siede

μισθός

μισθός (misthos), pay, wages, reward; μισθῶ (misthōō), hire; μισθωτός (misthōtos), hired servant; μίσθωμα (misthōma), contract price, rent; μίσθιος (misthios), hired servant; μισθαποδοσία (misthapodosia), recompense; μισθαποδότης (misthapodotēs), one who pays wages, a rewarder.

CL The noun misthos can be traced from Homer onwards in the sense of reward for work. But as well as workers, soldiers (Thuc.), orators, doctors or actors (Xen., Plato) may also receive misthos. The word occurs mainly in industrial or commercial contexts. More rarely, pictorial examples can be found of good fortune being given to men as a reward for their ethical endeavours (Pindar, Isoc., Plato). In the religious sphere, misthos was not used, since Gk. religion did not rest on the basis of rewards. In general, too, it was not reward that was the goal of ethical endeavour, but → honour (→ Glory, art. timē). Happiness (eudaimonia, a word not found in the NT, originally referring to the presence of good spirits), was not something one received as a gift; one gained it through aretē, → virtue. Striving for righteousness or justice was only a part of the total endeavour to find aretē, as Socrates first pointedly expounded. Socrates also delineated the concept of “the Good” (agathos), in which the → good man is one whose life is directed towards the Good (agathon), and who considers the reward or → punishment which awaits him in the next life (cf. the Gorgias myth). Plato rarely used the term in ethical contexts, and even when he used the idea he thought more in terms of living according to the immanent laws of being (Rep. 10, 612d ff.).

From Hellenistic times onwards, the idea of reward penetrated into religious thought. As before, in the Orphic and Eleusinian Mysteries, so now the belief in rewards and punishments in the next life begins to play a decisive rôle in the Hellenistic religions of Serapis-Isis and of Mithras. In Roman religion the commercial conception of payment and of reward expanded to include the relationship of men to gods, illustrated by the basic phrase do ut des, I give (to you) so that you can give (to me); in Roman religion people carried out their stipulated obligations expecting help in return. The concept of reward is linked here, clearly, with the language of sacrifice (cf. H. Preisker, TDNT IV 705 f.).

OT 1. The noun misthos stands chiefly for Heb. šākār, hire, wages, reward, depending on context (Gen. 15:1; 30:18, 28, 32 f.; 31:8a; Exod. 2:9; 22:14[15];

Num. 18:31; Deut. 15:18; 24:15; 1 Ki. 5:20[6]; 2 Chr. 15:7; Ps. 127[126]:3; Eccl. 4:9; 9:5; Zech. 8:10; 11:12; Mal. 3:5; Isa. 40:10; 62:11; Jer. 31[33]:16; Ezek. 29:18 f.). The LXX also uses misthos for the following Heb. cognates: maskōret, wages, reward (Gen. 29:15; 31:7, 41; Ruth 2:12); śākîr, adj. hired (Deut. 24:16; Job 7:1); śeker, hire, wages (Prov. 11:18); and for the hithp. of the vb. śakar, hire (Hag. 1:6). The LXX uses misthos to translate the following other Heb. words: 'eškār, gift (Ezek. 27:15; 'etnan, hire (of a harlot) (Isa. 23:18); m'êhîr, price, hire (Mic. 3:11); 'izzabôn, wares (Ezek. 27:27, 33); pō'al, wages of work (Job 7:2; Jer. 22:13); and p'e'ullâh, work, recompense (Lev. 19:13). There is no Heb. equivalent in Gen. 31:8b; Tob. 2:12, 14; 4:14; 5:3, 7, 9, 14 f.; 12:1 ff., 5; Prov. 11:21; 17:8; Eccl. 9:6; Wis. 2:22; 5:15; 10:17; Sir. 2:8; 11:18, 22; 34[31]:22; 36:18[21]; 51:22, 30; 2 Macc. 8:33.

The vb. misthoō normally translates various verbal forms derived from śakar, to hire (Gen. 30:16; Deut. 23:5[4]; Jdg. 9:4; 18:4; 2 Sam. 10:6; 2 Ki. 7:6; 1 Chr. 19:6 f.; 2 Chr. 24:12; 25:6; Neh. 6:12; 13:2; Isa. 7:20; 46:6). The sole exceptions are Hos. 3:2 (kārâh, get by trade, buy); 2 Esd. 4:5 (śakar, hire); and 1 Macc. 5:39, where there is no Heb. text.

Other cognate words in the LXX are: misthios for śākîr, a hired servant (Lev. 19:13; 25:50; Job 7:1; and without Heb. equivalent in Sir. 7:20; 34[31]:22; 37:11); misthoma for 'etnân and 'etnan, hire (Deut. 23:19[18]; Mic. 1:7; Ezek. 16:31, 34, 41), for 'etnâh, hire of a harlot (Hos. 2:14[12]), for nādân, bribe of a harlot (Ezek. 16:33) and without Heb. equivalent (Prov. 19:13; Ezek. 16:32). misthōtēs, mercenary, occurs in 1 Macc. 6:29. misthōtos, usually translates śākîr, hired servant (Exod. 12:45; 22:14[15]; Lev. 19:13; 22:10; 25:6, 40; Deut. 15:18; Job 7:2; 14:6; Mal. 3:5; Isa. 16:14; 21:16; Jer. 46[26]:21; though it is without Heb. equivalent at Lev. 25:53; Jdg. 4:10; 6:2, 5; Isa. 28:1, 3; 1 Macc. 6:29).

2.(a) Reward in the OT is primarily used in its secular sense summoning Israelites to social action. Daily labourers are to be paid their wages daily in order to avoid possible want or starvation (Jer. 22:13; Deut. 24:14; cf. also the wage disagreements between Laban and Jacob in Gen. 31:25 ff.).

(b) Semitic and Israelite thought is largely determined by the connexion between the dealings and fortunes of men. Earthly rewards and → punishments are part of the obvious make-up of OT faith. Leah receives her son Issachar as a reward from God (Gen. 30:18; cf. Ps. 127:3), while Yahweh punishes the Amalekite crimes by putting them under a ban and destroying them (1 Sam. 15:2 f.). In earlier days, the negative aspect of punishment and retribution stood in the foreground. Amos 1:3–16, in particular, sets out the connexion between the bleak fate of Israel and the other nations and God's judgment. Ezekiel replaced the concept of wholesale recompense by that of punishment which takes note of more individual offences: "The soul that sins shall die. The son shall not suffer for the iniquity of the father, nor the father suffer for the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon himself, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon himself" (Ezek. 18:20). Deut. unfolds a positive understanding of reward, for the first time linking together obedience (→ Hear) and → blessing (cf. Deut. 28:1–15), and their antithesis disobedience and → curse (cf. Deut. 28:15–68). But it is in the Wisdom literature that the concept of reward receives its distinctive stamp. Here for the first time a systematized pattern is developed, possessing authority for the whole of life; the consequence of which is the expectation of reward for the righteous, and punishment for the godless (cf. E. Würthwein, TDNT IV 711). Prov. 11:21 (LXX) reads “Depend upon it! A man who is evil does not remain unpunished; a man who sows righteousness will receive a just reward” (cf. 11:18 and 31). Job’s attack on the theology of his friends (Job 8:4–6) is a protest against this theory of retribution for good and bad, because it does not do justice to the real suffering of the godly man (Job 27:51 f). The Preacher’s resignation in Eccl. 8:14 also reveals his dissatisfaction with an overneat correlation of rewards and punishments: “There is a vanity which takes place on earth, that there are righteous men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the wicked, and there are wicked men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the righteous. I said that this also is vanity.”

(c) But it is important to note how very different the conception of divine reward is from our own human concepts. God is a sovereign Lord who rules his servants – and so could be compared to an oriental king – but who is not in the slightest respect obliged or compelled by the amount of work they have done. It is a gift that he gives, a royal bounty, which far exceeds in value any service from his subjects. Ps. 127:3 is a good example of this. Here the two words naḥ^ʿlâh, a possession that has been donated, and sâkâr, reward, are both used in parallel with similar meanings: “Lo, sons are a heritage of the LORD [naḥ^ʿlaʿ YHWH], the fruit of the womb a reward [sâkâr].” The reward that man receives from God, is not payment for services, or a remuneration for some achievement worthy of, or appropriate for God; it is something conceivable only against the background of ancient social relationships – a free gift from a generous king. Similarly Gen. 15:1: “After these things the word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision, ‘Fear not, Abram, I am your shield; your reward shall be very great.’” Dan. 11:39 provides a secular or possibly anti-Jewish analogy where the king who is opposing God gives a reward of land to those who acknowledge him. The blessings of salvation in the OT and the reward of God are always understood in earthly terms (cf. Deut. 28:3 ff., where Deut. speaks of “life”, which anyone receives who obeys the commandments). Even in passages like Deut. 30:15, “life” is to be understood first and foremost in this-worldly terms: “See, I have set before you this day life and good, death and evil.”

3. It was essentially in later Judaism, when the concept of a final judgment had been accepted, that a reward from God was considered as having significance beyond this life. But hand in hand with this development went a fateful modification in the understanding of reward. Since the Israelite prophets had branded unbelief as the source of all corruption, it was not a great step to draw the opposite conclusion that one could earn God’s grace in the judgment through good behaviour. Good → works become the means of attaining the grace which has as yet not been received, and become the pre-condition of the expected reward. The law ceases to be the fence which holds Israelites inside the saving boundaries of the covenant, and becomes a ladder and a means of acquiring salvation, now thought of in purely futuristic terms. “R. Hananiah b. Abashya says: The Holy One, blessed is he, was minded to grant merit to Israel; therefore hath he multiplied for them the law and commandments, as it is written, It pleased the Lord for his righteousness’ sake to magnify the law and make it honourable” (Makkoth 3:16; cf. Isa. 42:21; Pirqe Aboth 2:16; 3:16; 6:11). Yahweh’s covenant has now become a starting-position for self-justification, instead of something one aims to fulfil in its own right. One reckons up the precise value of some suitable work and sets it off against the appropriate reward; yet one can never be quite certain whether this is credited to one's account or not. Eschatological expectation could never become a matter of certain hope, where a conception of reward had been perverted into a system of merit and achievement.

NT 1. In the NT misthos appears noticeably and frequently in Matt. (10 times, as against once in Mk. and 3 times in Lk.). The concept is only in the background in Paul (5 times) and John (twice). Two surprising compound words are found in Heb. which occur nowhere else in the NT: misthapodosia, rewards or recompense (3 times), and misthapodoiēs, one who rewards or recompenses (once).

(a) misthos is a basic part of Jesus' preaching concerning the coming → kingdom of God. Many references give the impression that Jesus took over the prevalent Jewish conception of reward; if one sells all one's possessions, one wins a treasure in heaven (Matt. 19:21 par. Mk. 10:21, Lk. 18:22). God will not withhold the reward for godliness if it is directed to him and not always concerned with one's own reputation in society (Matt. 6:1). Jesus very definitely placed all human action and existence under the coming judgment; but this raises the question all the more forcefully, as to whether this does not open the flood-gates to "works-righteousness".

The parable of the workers in the vineyard (Matt. 20:1–16) gives an answer to this. First, it should be noticed that the landowner is entirely free and under no external constraint (v. 15), a characteristic which is made even clearer in the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:24). The reason why those who had worked only an hour were paid the same wage as the others who "had borne the burden and heat of the day" (v. 12) is not that their work was of a higher quality (as in the case in the similar Jewish parable about Rabbi Bun bar Hiyya [died c. A.D. 325], reproduced in J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 1963², 138 f.; cf. T. J. Ber. 2:3c). Nor was it that God had reckoned their small efforts worth the same pay (as some Catholic interpreters understand it, cf. G. Bornkamm, "Der Lohngedanke im Neuen Testament", Gesammelte Aufsätze, II, 1963², 84). Rather, payment is made by the householder purely on grounds of freedom and generosity; all thought of balancing effort and reward is eliminated.

God does not only repay far beyond any merit (cf. Lk. 19:17, 19); payment of reward is simply independent of the worker's achievements. Its sole root lies in God's sovereign generosity: "Am I not allowed to do what I choose with what belongs to me? Or do you begrudge my generosity?" (Matt. 20:15). Every claim to one's deserts must fall silent in the face of the demand for total obedience: "So you also, when you have done all that is commanded you, say, 'We are unworthy servants; we have only done what was our duty'" (Lk. 17:10). Nevertheless, even the smallest act of service in the kingdom of God will not go unrewarded: "And whoever gives to one of these little ones even a cup of cold water because he is a disciple, truly, I say to you, he shall not lose his reward" (Matt. 10:42; cf. Mk. 9:41).

(b) A closer examination of the service to be performed and its reward completes the picture. Jesus' polemic against the false piety of the → Pharisees is instructive (Matt. 6:1 ff.). A Pharisee who is putting his piety on show is not looking for God's acceptance and honour but for men's. If men admire him and his virtues, his reward has already been paid out to him – literally so (Matt. 6:2, 5, 16). It is paid out by the masters he has chosen for himself – men. A truly pious man, however, does everything for God's sake; hence God will reward him in his judgment. This antithesis of men and God is the essential one in Matt. 6:3, 15, 18, not that of "in secret" and openly. True worship should be offered for God's sake, not man's. The faith which stands on the side of God, ready to → suffer for Jesus' sake, does not have to wait for its reward (Matt. 5:11 ff.). Profession of faith in the Lord is not only verbal; it also means acceptance of "the least of these my brethren" in his name (Matt. 25:40; cf. 25:45; 10:42). Such an attitude is rewarded because and in so far as a person occupies the place in the kingdom of God which has been prepared for him. Our works have no intrinsic moral value which can accrue merit with God. Nor are they to be thought of as isolated achievements that might be taken into consideration in the judgment. Rather, they are integral parts of faith and of our confession of Christ. Only as such are they rewarded, but even this is not dependent on a fixed value-scale with quantitative demarcations; the sole basis is our total acceptance by the eschatological judge (Matt. 10:32), which includes full salvation and eternal life (Mk. 8:36; 10:30). God rewards confession of faith "a hundredfold" in this age and then in the age to come (Mk. 10:30; cf. Matt. 19:29; Lk. 18:30). In making the concept of reward subsidiary to the prior category of the coming kingdom of God, Jesus makes a clean break with the calculating approach of Judaism.

2. (a) Paul was well acquainted with the thought of judgment based on works (cf. Rom. 2:6; 2 Cor. 5:10). But with him the rabbinic Jewish concept of merit is replaced by his radical doctrine of justification. How is this to be understood? The nature of misthos is explained by the use of other concepts: the righteous man receives "praise" (Rom. 2:29), "honour" (Rom. 2:7), and the "prize of the high calling" (Phil. 3:14) from God in the judgment. As with Jesus, so with Paul; the reward is what the Romans called a praemium (a reward bestowed or a gift), not pretium (the price or value set on something) (cf. G. Bornkamm, op. cit., 91). What we have earned is → death; → life is what God gives us in his grace (Rom. 6:23). God does not owe us this reward; he gives it to us as grace (Rom. 4:4). The doctrine of justification thus gives its own particular stamp to the understanding of reward (→ Righteousness).

(b) This does not mean that the misthos has no place in a Christian's activity. There is the prize that beckons the victor in the race (1 Cor. 9:24; cf. Phil. 3:14). There is the acknowledgment that awaits the wise master-builder of the community (1 Cor. 3:14). There can, however, only be any question of reward, when it is given for something that one is not obliged to do. Paul was under obligation to preach the gospel: "For if I preach the gospel, that gives me no ground for boasting. For necessity is laid upon me. Woe to me if I do not preach the gospel!" (1 Cor. 9:16). But Paul freely waived the church's obligation to maintain his upkeep, lest he be regarded as under obligation to men (1 Cor. 9:15; → Boast). A reward is given for something done voluntarily. But although Paul speaks to the Corinthians of his reward, his understanding of it is paradoxical. For it turns out that the reward he seeks is not something that he covets for himself, but to make the gospel free of charge. "For if I do this of my own will [i.e. preach the gospel], I have a reward; but if not of my own will, I am entrusted with a commission. What then is my reward? Just this: that in my preaching I may make the gospel free of charge, not making full use of my right in the gospel" (1 Cor. 9:17 f.). His motive is to avoid putting any obstacle in the way of the gospel (1 Cor. 9:12). It is a further aspect of his conduct as a skilled master-builder (1 Cor. 3:10) and an apostle who is content to suffer (1 Cor. 4:9 ff.). As such, it stands in marked contrast with those who are already filled and rich, and who reign like kings (1 Cor. 4:8).

(c) misthos, then, may be thought of as God's reply to a Christian's action, although there is no strict causal connexion between the two. Paul's doctrine of justification is carried through to all aspects of Christian living. It is instructive, in this respect, to see how Paul, in one particular case, distinguishes between the builder and his work which, because it is unserviceable is burned up in the → fire of → judgment, while he himself is saved, albeit "only as through fire" (1 Cor. 3:15). Nevertheless, God's grace does not allow him to be lost. The ultimate validity of grace in pronouncing the verdict of righteous in the last judgment lies in the fact that not only our Christian faith but also our good works are just as much the gift of God (Eph. 2:10). It is God who "is at work in you, both to will and to work for his good pleasure" (Phil. 2:13). All personal vainglory is excluded.

3. Hebrews reveals by its choice of vocabulary that reward can be spoken of only in terms of the sovereign act of God. Heb. 10:35 ff. says that it is the blessing of the promise that brings us God's reward (misthapodosia, recompense, and epangelia, promise, are in parallel). What is at issue here is not so much reward for individual actions; misthapodosia means, rather, the bestowal of eternal life, the summation of the Christian hope (Heb. 11:6). No human action can in any way counterbalance this in value. On the contrary, this gift is intended for those who seek God with a bold faith: "Therefore do not throw away your confidence [parrhêsian], which has great reward [megalên misthapodosian]" (Heb. 10:35; → Openness). "And without faith it is impossible to please him. For whoever would draw near to God must believe that he exists and that he rewards [misthapodotês ginetai] those who seek him" (Heb. 11:6). Faith is indeed bound up with → patience and "not neglecting to meet together" (Heb. 10:25); but there is never any mention of merit which would deserve salvation. Heb. contains repeated warnings against despising the grace of God and the day of opportunity (e.g. Heb. 2:7–19; 4:1–13; 6:4–8; 10:35 ff.; 12:3 ff., 15 ff.; 25 ff.). These references show that there comes a point in sinning which is a point of no return. But the believer has not come to Mount Sinai with all its terrors of judgment, but "to Mount Zion, to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to innumerable angels in festal gathering, and to the assembly of the first-born who are enrolled in heaven, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus, the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood that speaks more graciously than the blood of Abel" (Heb. 12:12 ff.). The prospect of judgment for the faithful is not a petty reckoning up of human values and achievements, but a joyful hopefulness (Heb. 10:35). In this respect → Moses is an example of faith, for "he considered abuse suffered for the Christ greater wealth than the treasures of Egypt, for he looked to the reward [misthapodosian]" (Heb. 11:26, on the meaning of this verse → Possessions, art. thêsauros, NT 3).

4. In Jn. 4 Jesus' discourse with the disciples following the conversation with the Samaritan woman shows that the "harvest", the eschatological age of salvation, has already broken in (→ Seed, Harvest; → Black, White, Red, art. leukos). Indeed, the "reaper" is already drawing his pay. "He who reaps receives wages [misthon], and gathers fruit for eternal life, so that sower and reaper may rejoice together. For here the saying holds true, 'One sows and another reaps.' I sent you to reap that for which you did not labour; others have laboured, and you have entered into their labour” (Jn. 4:36 ff.). For related imagery, see Lev. 26:5; Deut. 28:33; Jdg. 6:3; Ps. 126:5 f.; Amos 9:13; Mic. 6:15; Matt. 9:37 f. par. Lk. 10:1 f.; and T. Peah 4:18 (“My fathers have gathered treasures in this age; I have gathered treasures in the age to come”). The thought of wages is not a matter of merit. Rather, the fact that the reaper is receiving his wages underlines the presence of the eschatological hour. The “work of God” which has eternal life as its consequence is faith (Jn. 6:29). It is in this sense that 2 Jn. 8 speaks of the misthos of faith: “Look to yourselves, that you may not lose what you have worked for, but may win a full reward.”

5. According to the witness of the OT and the NT, the fulfilment of life’s meaning is not something that lies within our capacity. It is a gift that comes from outside ourselves. It comes from God himself who, as our judge, pronounces us righteous despite ourselves. All rewards lie in God’s gift. This excludes the idea of God having to bestow an equivalent reward for our meritorious action. And yet there is a connection between the anticipated reward and our conduct. But the relationship is not one of direct cause and effect. We see it, when we realize that all goodness comes from God and that the reward is yet one further token of the free grace of God which enabled us to act in the first place. The NT statements about rewards are thus opposed to the diametrically opposite ideas that man can deserve salvation and that justification by faith makes unimportant what we do with our lives.

P. C. Böttger

ὄψωνιον

ὄψωνιον (opsōnion), wages, payment.

CL & OT opsōnion is a combination (from Menander’s time) from opson, any kind of sustenance prepared on a fire (as distinct from → bread and other accompaniments to a meal, such as wine) and ōneomai, buy. It refers actually to the cash one needs to buy such additional foods (1 Esd. 4:56); then (in the plur. and also in LXX) particularly to a soldier’s maintenance allowances, which he received above and beyond natural provisions, such as cereal and oil. Finally, it means wages in general (1 Macc. 3:28; 14:32), and occasionally the salary of government officials. opsōnion can thus be seen to be a regular term used with strict reference to payment which one is entitled to receive daily or monthly, etc., and for which one could eventually sue, if need be. It is a minimum subsistence wage rather than an appropriate reward for work carried out (→ misthos; and cf. Lat. stipendium).

NT opsōnion occurs 4 times in the NT. Apart from the Baptist’s advice to the soldiers to be satisfied with their wages (Lk. 3:14), it occurs only in Paul (1 Cor. 9:7; 2 Cor. 11:8; Rom. 6:23).

1. In 1 Cor. 9:7 Paul uses the term opsōnia (plur.) to refer to the support to which he was entitled from the various congregations as remuneration for his missionary work (cf. 2 Cor. 11:8). This is not only an allusion to soldiers’ pay, comparing his missionary work with military service; it also implies the legal claim of the apostle on the congregations. Hence, for Paul to waive his opsōnion is to underline that God’s gift of grace costs nothing, just as it is offered to all men in the apostolic preaching without any conditions (→ misthos, NT).

2. Rom. 6:23 is not a pronouncement about the nature of → death. The point of the verse is to state that sin pays out wages. thanatos is a predicative noun, not the subject of the sentence. The wages of sin and the gift of God are set over against one another in antithesis. ta opsōnia are the provisions which sin pays out to those who do military service for it, and these provisions for life consist in – death! Sin promises life and gives death; but this death does not just begin at the end of our temporal life, it is the current payment which we already receive. That is the only right which we can lay claim to, as sinners (v. 23a). But over against this right stands God's gift of → grace which we receive in service under him (v. 23b). This is not a relationship which insists on its rights but one which is based on grace. No one in God's service can claim anything as of right; he receives eternal life as a free gift from God.

O. Becker

→ Judgment, → Poor, → Possessions, → Punishment, → Righteousness, → Work

(a). F. Büchsel, apodidōmi, TDNT II 169; C. Caragounis, NovT 16, 1974, 35 ff.; K. P. Donfried, "Justification and Last Judgment in Paul", Interpretation 30, 1976, 140–52; F. V. Filson, St. Paul's Conception of Recompense, 1931; H. W. Heidland, opsōnion, TDNT V 591 f.; A. Marmorstein, The Doctrine of Merits in Old Rabbinical Literature, I–II, (1920) 1968; H. Preisker and E. Würthwein, misthos etc., TDNT IV 695–728; P. S. Minear, "And great shall be your reward", Yale Studies in Religion 12, 1941; L. Morris, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment, 1960; G. de Ru, "The Conception of Reward in the Teaching of Jesus", NovT 8, 1966, 202 ff.; H. Schlier, kerdos etc., TDNT III 672 f.; W. S. Towner, "Retributional Theology in the Apocalyptic Setting", Union Seminary Quarterly Review 26, 1917, 203–14.

(b). A. Alt, "Zur Talionsformel", ZAW 52 (Neue Folge 11), 1934, 303 ff. (reprinted in Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, I, 1968⁴, 341 ff.); W. Bienart, Die Arbeit nach der Lehre der Bibel, 1956², 88–96; G. Bornkamm, "Der Lohngedanke im Neuen Testament", EvTh 6, 1946, 143 ff. (reprinted in Studien zu Antike und Christentum. Gesammelte Aufsätze, II, 1963², 69 ff.); H. Braun, Gerichtsgedanke und Rechtfertigungslehre bei Paulus, Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 19, 1930; H. Gomperz, Die Lebensauffassungen der griechischen Philosophie und das Ideal der inneren Freiheit, 1927; F. Horst, "Recht und Religion im Bereich des Alten Testaments", EvTh 16, 1956, 49 ff. (reprinted in Gottes Recht, ThB 12, 1961, 286 ff.); L. Ihmels, Der Lohngedanke in der Ethik Jesu, 1908; E. Jünger, Paulus und Jesus, Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie 2, 1962, 66–70; F. K. Karner, Die Bedeutung des Vergeltungsgedankens für die Ethik Jesu (Dissertation, Leipzig, 1927); V. Kirchner, Der Lohn in der alten Philosophie, im bürgerlichen Recht, besonders im Neuen Testament, 1908; K. Koch, "Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im Alten Testament?", ZTK 52, 1955, 1–42; K. Koch, W. Bienert and P. Jacobs, "Vergeltung und Vergebung", EKL III 1636 ff.; G. Lanczkowski et al., "Vergeltung", *RGG*³ VI 1341 ff.; E. Lohmeyer, Die Briefe an die Philipper, an die Kolosser und an Philemon, KEK 9, 1964¹³, 57 ff., 131 ff.; L. Mattern, Das Verständnis des Gerichts bei Paulus, 1966; O. Merk, Handeln aus Glauben. Die Motivierungen der paulinischen Ethik, 1968; O. Michel, "Der Lohngedanke in der Verkündigung Jesu", ZStH 9, 1932, 47 ff.; W. Pesch, Der Lohngedanke in der Lehre Jesu verglichen mit der religiösen Lehre des Spätjudentums, Münchener theologische Studien 7, 1955; W. Preiser, "Vergeltung und Sühne im deutschen Strafrecht", in Festschrift E. Schmidt, 1961, 7 ff.; K. H. Rengstorff, "Die Frage des gerechten Lohnes in der Verkündigung Jesu", Festschrift Karl Arnold, 1955, 141–155; O. Schulthess, misthos, Pauly-Wissowa XV 2078 ff.; M. Wagner, "Der Lohngedanke im Evangelium", Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 43, 1932, 106–12; K. Weiss, Die Frohbotschaft Jesu über Lohn und Vollkommenheit, NTAbh 12, 4/5, 1927.

Reconciliation, Restoration, Propitiation, Atonement

Reconciliation means the restoration of a good relationship between enemies. In order to achieve this good relationship in the confrontation of God and man, it is necessary that the factors which produce the enmity be removed. This is achieved by atonement. These various aspects involve the use of the three groups of words dealt with in this article. (ex-)hilaskomai and its derivatives belong to the cultic realm and chiefly denote actions which are supposed originally to make the gods favourably disposed and, later, to expiate → sin. The group of words around katallassō, on the other hand, comes from the secular world and indicates the improvement (allassō, to change) of a negative relationship. apokatastasis is a technical term in politics and eschatology, meaning a partial or universal restoration. In the NT the cultic term hilasmos, the political term apokatastasis and the ordinary term katallagē are all comparatively rare, but they occur in crucial passages.

ἀποκατάστασις

ἀποκαθίστημι (apokathistēmi) and ἀποκαθιστάνω (apokathistanō), re-establish, restore; ἀποκατάστασις (apokatastasis), restoration.

CL 1. The vb. apokathistēmi (Xen. onwards) meant originally to restore to a previous state, and then generally to restore. It is found at first in a literal and non-religious context: of the giving back of what has been lent (Xen., Respublica Lacedaemionorum 6, 3), of the renovation of a canal (W. Dittenberger, Orientalis Graecae Inscriptiones, I–II, 1903–5, 672), of the restoration of a sick person (Dioscorides, De Materia Medica 1, 64, 4); later, more generally, of the renewal of the world (Lactantius, Divinae Institutiones 7, 18).

2. A derivative of the vb. is the later noun apokatastasis (e.g. Aristotle, Magna Moralia 1204b, 36) with the basic meaning of re-establishment of a former state, restoration. Here again we find it chiefly in secular contexts to begin with: the bringing back of hostages (Polybius, 3, 99, 6), the improvement of a road (Dittenberger, op. cit., 483, 8), the reconstitution of a city's affairs (Polybius, 4, 23, 1).

3. These words have a specialized use in connexion with astronomical and cosmological speculation in the Hellenistic and late classical age. Thus apokatastasis became a “technical term for the restitution of the cosmic cycle” of the constellations (A. Oepke, TDNT I 390). Ancient, and particularly Stoic, thought imagined the course of the universe in terms of an infinite series of cyclical cosmic periods (H. von Arnim, Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta, II, 190), of which the apokatastasis is always the final stage of the old period and the point where the new one begins. In Stoicism and the Hermetic literature the concept of apokatastasis is occasionally associated with political expectations (cf. Corp. Herm. 11, 2); and in the neo-Platonism of the post-Christian era we find an anthropological application to the → soul of the individual (Iamblichus, De Mysteriis 1, 10; Proclus, Institutio Theologica 199). Here the apokatastasis designates the repeated entry of the immortal soul into the mortal body through reincarnation, with the object of thus being cleansed from matter and reattaining its original condition, which is itself also sometimes called apokatastasis (e.g. Corp. Herm. 8, 4).

OT 1. Only the vb. is found in the LXX, usually to translate the root šûb, in the qal meaning to turn back, return; in the piel to bring back; and most frequently hiph. to bring back, restore. In non-religious contexts apokathistēmi can take on a wide range of meanings, especially in the early strands of the Pentateuch: e.g., Abraham paying money to Ephron (Gen. 23:16); a stone being rolled from the mouth of a well

(Gen. 29:3); a man being reinstated in his office (Gen. 41:13); water flowing back (Exod. 14:26 ff.).

2. More important is the use of the word in the message of the prophets. While apokathistēmi is found but rarely in the preaching of the early prophets (e.g., Amos 5:15; Hos. 2:5[3]; 11:11), it has a special theological significance in the announcement of eschatological salvation in exilic and post-exilic prophecy. Yahweh will bring Israel back from exile into his own land (Jer. 16:15; 23:8; 24:6). Ezekiel draws a parallel between the eschatological restoration of Israel and his beginnings (Ezek. 16:55), and Mal. 4:6 (3:24) prophesies of the → Elijah redivivus who will turn the hearts of fathers and sons towards each other again. Thus in the LXX apokathistēmi becomes more and more the term for the eschatological, and in part messianic, hopes of Israel for restoration of her former state.

3. This tendency is stronger still in the intertestamental writings, in which apokathistēmi is used for Aram. tûb, to return. Here the word acquires at times a specifically political character. In Dan. 4:33 f. it is used of Nebuchadnezzar's recovery of power and dominion; while 1 Macc. 15:3 speaks of the plans of Antiochus VII to regain control of "the kingdom of our fathers" and re-establish the former state of affairs. Josephus used apokatastasis in describing the return of the Jews from exile (Ant. 11, 63), but Philo linked this idea with the mystical one of the restoration of the soul (Rev.Div.Her. 293).

4. In this connexion mention should also be made of the political, messianic hope of the → Samaritans, which centred upon an eschatological figure known as the Taheb, the returner, the restorer (cf. Josephus, Ant. 18, 85; cf. A. Merx, Der Messias oder Taëb der Samaritaner, 1909; J. Macdonald, The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964, 362–71).

NT In the NT the vb. is found 8 times (mostly in the Synoptic Gospels), and the noun only once (Acts 3:21).

1. (a) In Mk. 3:5 par. Matt. 12:13, Lk. 6:10 and Mk. 8:25 the original non-religious meaning of apokathistēmi is found in connexion with the healing of the sick: a hand or a blind man is restored, i.e. healed. Heb. 13:19 ("that I may be restored to you the sooner", i.e. that I may come to you sooner) likewise goes back to ordinary Gk. usage.

(b) Mk. 9:12 par. Matt. 17:11 is an allusion to Mal. 4:5 f. (3:23 f.). In the debate about the messiah, the political messianic hopes, which centred upon the figure of → Elijah redivivus "who will restore all things", are countered by reference to the fate of the Son of man, who "will suffer many things and be despised". In the NT the Jewish political concept of the messiah associated with apokathistēmi is transformed into the doctrine of the suffering Son of man, with the consequence that this usage of the vb. noticeably recedes (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos; → Son of God, art. hyios tou anthrōpou; → War).

A similar tendency may be seen in Acts 1:6 ff. To the question of the disciples, still conceived in terms of a political messiah, "Will you at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?", a reply is given which forbids reckoning and calculation, and points to the promised gift of the → Spirit. Luke thus raises the question to a different level: in the era of the church it is not political control that matters, but the interim kingdom of the Spirit and of power.

2. (a) The passage from Peter's sermon at the temple portico, which is the only place in the NT where the noun apokatastasis is found, reads: "Repent therefore and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out, that times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord, and that he may send the Christ appointed for you, Jesus, whom heaven must receive until the time for establishing all [achri chronōn apokatastaseōs pantōn] that God spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets from of old" (Acts 3:19 ff.). This sentence accords with the eschatological messianic hope of OT prophecy and Judaism (see above OT 2). The apokatastasis pantōn does not mean the conversion of all mankind, but the restoration of all things and circumstances which the OT prophets proclaimed, i.e. the universal renewal of the earth. While the kairoi anapsyxeōs, "times of refreshing", mean the coming in of the change and the subjective effects of this event, the chronoi apokatastaseōs, "times of restoration" [or "establishing" RSV], emphasize the objective side and the permanent condition of the world renewed (cf. A. Oepke, TDNT I 392).

(b) In the early church Origen used Acts 3:21 as the basis for a theory of the Apokatastasis, i.e. the doctrine of the restoration of all created things. Central to this is the view that God's work of salvation has as its aim the removal of all the disorder in creation which has resulted from sin, and so the medical, political and cosmic restoration of all created things to the harmony of one all-embracing order of being (Origen, De Prin. 1, 6, 1-4; 2, 3, 1-5; 3, 6, 1-9). This doctrine of universal Apokatastasis, which includes elements of late classical and Jewish ideas of Apokatastasis, was taken up in the East by Gregory of Nyssa, and in the West by Scotus Erigena, Hans Denck, J. A. Bengel, F. C. Oetinger, F. D. E. Schleiermacher and others, and in some cases developed with reference to man into the doctrine of universalism. (Cf. TDNT I 392 f.; B. Altaner, Patrology, 1960, 233, 324, 353, 356, 455, 632.) Although he rejected Origen's teaching, Karl Barth came close to the idea (CD II, 2, 172 f., 295, 352 f., 417, 422, 476; cf. C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 1967, 130-33). From an exegetical point of view there is less justification for this doctrine in Acts 3:21 than in 1 Cor. 15:27 f. From the point of view of systematic theology, the doctrine of Apokatastasis or of universalism should be considered less in the context of Jewish political hopes and classical cosmology than in that of the universal significance of the Christ event. H.-G. Link

ἰλάσκομαι	ἰλεως (hileōs), gracious, merciful; ἰλάσκομαι (hilaskomai), propitiate, expiate, conciliate, make gracious, be gracious; ἰλασμός (hilasmos), propitiation, propitiatory sacrifice; ἰλαστήριον (hilastērion), that which expiates or propitiates, means of propitiation, mercy-seat.
------------------	---

CL 1. (a) The adj. hileōs, -ōn, is the Attic form of hilaos or hileos, kindly, gracious, and a parallel word to hilaros, cheerful (cf. Lat. hilaris). It meant originally cheerful, joyous (Plato, Laws 1, 649a); later, kindly, gracious, benevolent (e.g. Xen., Cyr. 1, 6, 2). hileōs is chiefly used of rulers or gods; in connexion with gods the phrase hileō poiein, to make gracious, is found (Plato, Laws 10, 910a).

(b) The mid. deponent hilaskomai (Homer onwards), is etymologically connected with hilaos and hileos, friendly, gracious, and hilemi, to be gracious. Like the intensive form exhilaskomai (Hdt. onwards), it has a causative meaning: to make gracious, appease (e.g. Homer, Od. 3, 419; Hdt. 7, 141). The passive aor. hilasthēnai should be translated in an intrans. middle sense: to let oneself be appeased, to have mercy (especially common is the imperative hilasthēti, be merciful). Generally the subject is a man, and the object a deity; the setting is usually a cultic action by which the deity is to be appeased (Hdt. 5, 47; 6, 105; Xen., Cyr. 7, 2, 19). Sometimes a man (e.g. the emperor) is the object of hilaskesthai, which can then be rendered to conciliate (Plutarch, Antonius 67, 3), or bribe (Hdt., 8, 112, 2).

(c) The noun hilasmos, which is derived from hilaskomai, is rare and found mainly in late writings. It denotes the action by which a deity is to be propitiated (e.g. Plutarch, Solon 12).

(d) to hilastērion is the neut. adjectival noun from hilastērios. On Gk. inscriptions it means a propitiatory gift for the gods (W. R. Paton and E. L. Hicks, eds., The Inscriptions of Cos, 1891, nos. 81, 347).

2. The basic idea behind the Gk. hilasmos is man's effort to dispose in his favour the awful and frequently calamitous power of the dead, the demons and the gods, and to strengthen his own actions by the assistance of supernatural forces. This presupposes some elementary knowledge of the threat posed to human existence by the envy, punishment, wrath and baseless anger of the all-powerful gods. The propitiation of deities is done by means of cultic acts, including human or animal sacrifice, purificatory rites, prayers, and also dances and games (cf. F. Büchsel, TDNT III 311 f.). In Rhodes and Massilia criminals were sacrificed until a late period in order that the city might be absolved. Human sacrifice, offered without scruple in Homeric times, did however become less frequent as civilization progressed, and was replaced by symbolic acts. In cases of extreme need a ver sacrum was sometimes vowed, which meant that the animals born in the following spring had to be sacrificed, and the humans when they had grown up must go into exile.

In later, more enlightened times the power of the gods lost some of its terrors, and so the significance of propitiatory rites diminished. In Stoicism the cultic rites are replaced by the moral person, who lives in keeping with the will of the deity by means of ethical behaviour.

OT 1. (a) In contrast to the usage of classical Gk. (cf. CL 1(a) hileō poiein), the terms used in the LXX are hileōs einai or genesthai, to be or become gracious, translating the Heb. sālah, to forgive (15 times), and niham, to be sorry, be moved to pity, etc. The adj. hileōs occurs in the LXX only as a predicate of God.

(b) The vb. hilaskomai is found relatively seldom (12 times) in the LXX, and only in a mid. or pass. sense: to have mercy (with Yahweh as subject), usually (7 times) in translation of the Heb. sālah, to forgive. The compound form exhilaskomai is found considerably more often (about 100 times), and in by far the majority of cases (about 80) its Heb. equivalent is kipper, to cover, propitiate. Accordingly, exhilaskomai is used predominantly in the active sense, to propitiate, and refers to the cultic activity of the → priest (the majority of places where it is used occur in the priestly writing of Exod.-Num.). Occasionally exhilaskomai has the sense of purify (of objects; Heb. ḥittē', e.g. Ezek. 43:20, 22, 23), or entreat the favour of (a person, Heb. ḥillāh, e.g. Zech. 7:2; 8:22; Mal. 1:9). The important point to note is that with exhilaskomai the grammatical subject is usually a man (the priest) and the object God. In Sir., however, sin is the object (e.g. Sir. 20:28), and the subject is either God (Sir. 5:6; 34:19[31:23]) or man (Sir. 3:3, 30; 20:28) (see further F. Büchsel, TDNT III 315).

(c) The LXX generally uses hilasmos (about 100 times) or exhilasis (twice) and exhilasmos (about 15 times) to translate derivatives of the Heb. vb. kipper (piel), to cover over, pacify, propitiate, which describe the process of propitiation (sacrificial propitiation in the cult, e.g. Lev. 23:27 f.; 25:9).

2.(a) Sacrificial rites are widespread throughout the ancient world, and there is nothing originally or specifically Israelite about them (see above, OT). Some scholars hold with G. von Rad that sacrifice and its attendant rites were not the creation of original Yahwism. "It was only in Canaan that Israel entered into an old and widespread sacral practice, into which she later poured her own ideas" (Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 252). In pre-exilic writings we find the common concept of sacrifice, i.e. that of propitiating an angry deity: "If it is the LORD who has stirred you [Saul] up against me [David], may he accept an offering" (1 Sam. 26:19; cf. also Gen. 8:20 ff.; 2 Sam. 24:17–25).

(b) According to some critical views cultic rites and forgiveness of sins were of little importance in pre-exilic Israel. But for the exilic and post-exilic community they took up a central place in the worship of Yahweh (cf. K. Koch, "Sühne und Sündenvergebung um die Wende von der exilischen zur nachexilischen Zeit", EvTh 26, Neue Folge 21, 1966, 217 ff.). Even from a statistical survey of the occurrence of these words, it is clear that exhilaskomai, hilasmos and hilastērion, like their Heb. equivalents, are found almost exclusively in passages attributed to the priestly writings. ([Ed.] This point appears to be a tautology: if the passages designated as belonging to the priestly writings are defined in terms of their interest in the cult, it is inevitable that cultic terms will predominate in them.) At the same time there took place a general reinterpretation of the concept of propitiation widely held in the ancient world and taken over by Israel. This may be seen in the Pentateuch and passages like Isa. 43:22–25. The emphasis changed from the attempt to change the deity's mind by man-made sacrifice, to the specifically Israelite idea of propitiation, according to which Yahweh makes atonement for his people (cf. Deut. 21:8). Up till now OT scholarship has not been able to explain adequately what caused this transformation in the concept of propitiation to take place (cf. K. Koch, op. cit., 224 f.).

(c) The characteristic Israelite concept of propitiation can only be understood against the background of the OT doctrine of sin (→ Sin, art. adikia, OT 2). An offence (even if unconscious) against Yahweh's covenant laws gives rise to objective guilt (cf. 1 Sam. 14:2 ff.), which sets in motion a destructive force whose disastrous effects fall of necessity as punishment on the miscreant and his affairs (cf. G. von Rad, op. cit., I, 265–79). This chain of sin and disaster can be halted only by Yahweh, inasmuch as he diverts the evil effect of a misdeed from the doer and his affairs to a beast, which dies in his place, the classic example being the ritual of the scapegoat given to Azazel on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:20 ff.). In this act of atonement the subject, who brings about the atonement, is thus Yahweh. The → priests function merely as his representatives in the cultic action (cf. Exod. 28:38; Num. 18:22 f.), while the wrongdoer or the sinful people are the recipients of the atonement. According to the Israelite view, life is actually carried in the → blood, and therefore blood acts as the means of atonement (Lev. 17:11; cf. 17:14; Gen. 9:4; Deut. 12:23). Sin can be transferred, because the animal, being a possession, has “a part in the personality of the man or human community” (K. Koch, op. cit., 229). Yahweh has given the → sacrifices to his people in order to take away “the iniquity of the congregation” (Lev. 10:17).

H.-G. Link

3. In discussing reconciliation and atonement it has become customary to draw a distinction between propitiation and expiation. In propitiation the action is directed towards God or some other offended person. The underlying purpose is to change God’s attitude from one of wrath to one of good-will and favour. In the case of expiation, on the other hand, the action is directed towards that which has caused the breakdown in the relationship. It is sometimes held that, while God is not personally angry with the sinner, the act of sin has initiated a train of events which can only be broken by some compensatory rite or act of reparation for the offence. In short, propitiation is directed towards the offended person, whereas expiation is concerned with nullifying the offensive act.

(a) G. von Rad is not untypical of a broad segment of biblical scholars who maintain that sacrifice in the Bible is concerned with expiation rather than with propitiation. Commenting on Lev. 17:11 (“For the life of the flesh is the blood; and I have given it for you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement, by reason of the life”), von Rad writes: “But it is not the blood in itself that effects expiation, but the blood in so far as the life is contained in it. Expiation therefore does not depend upon the blood, but upon the life, whose bearer the blood is” (op. cit., I, 270; cf. J. Herrmann, Die Idee der Sühne im Alten Testament, 1905, 67). Further support for this idea of expiation is found in the provisions made by Deut. 21:1–9 for purging “the guilt of innocent blood in the midst of thy people Israel” (v. 8). “As a rule . . . expiation is effected through the vicarious death of an animal. But what is of special importance in this connexion is that appeal is made to Jahweh himself actively to effect the expiation. Accordingly the one who receives expiation is not Jahweh, but Israel: Jahweh is rather the one who acts, in averting the calamitous curse which burdens the community” (op. cit., I, 270). Similarly, von Rad interprets the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. 16): “What was effected in expiation was that in both cases, with persons and objects alike, Jahweh removed the baneful influence of an act. He broke the nexus of sin and calamity; and this was as a rule effected by way of channelling the baneful influence of the evil into an animal which died vicariously for the man (or the cultic object). Expiation was thus not a penalty, but a saving event” (op. cit., I, 271). Von Rad’s position essentially reiterates that of G. F. Oehler: “The law nowhere indicates that in sacrifice . . . an act of punitive punishment is executed; it in no way asks us to look on the altar as a place of punishment” (Theology of the Old Testament, 1874, 431).

(b) The case for expiation rather than propitiation has been further supported on linguistic grounds by C. H. Dodd in his article on “hilaskesthai, its Cognates, Derivatives and Synonyms in the Septuagint” (JTS 32, 1931, 352–60; reprinted with minor alterations in “Atonement”, The Bible and the Greeks, 1935, 82–95; quotations are from the latter). Dodd’s argument is based upon an analysis of the meaning of the Greek words used in the LXX to translate the OT Heb. kipper. He points out that “The stock rendering is hilaskesthai, or exhilaskesthai, with the corresponding substantives hilasmos, exhilasis, exhilasma. In classical Greek and in the Koine hilaskesthai, exhilaskesthai, have regularly the meaning ‘placate’, ‘propitiate’, with a personal object. As a secondary meaning exhilaskesthai also bears the sense ‘expiate’, with an impersonal object; e.g. Plato, Laws, 862c, to apoinois exhilasthen, Ditt. *Syll.*³ 1042, hos d’ an polypragmonēsē ta tou theou ē periergasētai, hamartian opheiletō Mēni Tyrannō ēn ou mē dynētai exhilasasthai. Thus the words are in themselves ambiguous, and a close study of LXX usage is necessary to determine which sense predominated in Hellenistic Judaism” (op. cit., 82).

Before proceeding to examine Dodd’s case in detail, it may be noted with Leon Morris that the quotation from Plato is concerned with the legislator who must endeavour to restore good relations by payment of indemnity for injury. The context suggests that it is the appeasement of a person that is in mind rather than the expiation of a crime (The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, 1963³, 146; cf. also F. Büchsel, TDNT III 316). The probable date of the Men Tyrannus inscription, referred to by Dodd, is in the 2nd or 3rd century A.D., and can hardly be decisive for the determination of the translation of the LXX.

Dodd’s article was basically a schematic analysis of the words used in the LXX to translate the Heb. kipper. He began by noting words used other than hilaskomai etc., such as hagiazō, sanctify (Exod. 29:33, 36), katharizō, cleanse (Exod. 29:37; cf. v. 36; Deut. 32:43; Isa. 47:11), and athōōō, pronounce free from guilt (Jer. 18:23). Other passages that Dodd examined were Dan. 9:24 and Exod. 30:10. Dodd concluded that, “where the LXX translators do not render kipper and its derivatives by words of the hilaskesthai class, they render it by words which give the meaning ‘to sanctify’, ‘purify’ persons or objects of ritual, or ‘to cancel’, ‘purge away’, ‘forgive’ sins. We should therefore expect to find that they regard the hilaskesthai class as conveying similar ideas” (op. cit., 84).

Dodd then turned to passages where the hilaskesthai word-group translates words other than kipper and its derivatives. He instances: exhilaskesthai, in the middle voice with a human subject, for hittē, cleanse from defilement (2 Chr. 29:24; 30:18; Ezek. 43:26; cf. v. 23; 45:15, 17, 20; cf. v. 19; Hab. 1:11; Amos 8:14; hilaskesthai, in the middle with divine subject, for sālah, to forgive (2 Ki. 5:18; Ps. 25[24]:11; 2 Chr. 6:30; cf. exhilasmos in Dan. 9:9 Theodotion; Sir. 5:5 f.); hilaskesthai in the passive, hileōs einai or gignesthai, euhilateuein, all with divine subject, for sālah, forgive (Deut. 29:20; 2 Sam. 24:4; Amos 7:2 and various unspecified instances in 1 Ki., 2 Chr. and Jer.); hileōs gignesthai, euhilatos gignesthai, with divine subject for nāsā’ (l’), lit. lift up, i.e. pardon (Num. 14:19; Ps. 109[108]:8; Sir. 16:7); hilaskesthai in the passive, hileōs gignesthai, with divine subject, for nīham (niphāl) and riham (piel), have compassion (Exod. 32:12, 14; Isa. 54:10); exhilaskesthai in the middle with a human subject and God as the object, for hīllāh, appease, pacify, propitiate (Zech. 7:2; 8:22; Mal. 1:9, the first clear examples which Dodd allows of this meaning); exhilaskesthai in the middle with a human subject, for pillēl, pray, intercede (Ps. 106[105]:30; cf. Num. 25:11, where Dodd allows an element of propitiation). Dodd concludes that, “where words of the hilaskesthai class do not render kipper and its derivatives, everywhere, except in the four cases last considered, they render words which fall into one or other of two classes: (i) with human subject, ‘to cleanse from sin or defilement’, ‘to expiate’; (ii) with divine subject, ‘to be gracious’, ‘to have mercy’, ‘to forgive’” (op. cit., 88).

Finally, Dodd examined those passages where the hilaskesthai group translates kipper and its derivatives. Dodd noted the following types of usage. hilaskesthai and exhilaskesthai in the middle voice with a direct object mean to cleanse, purge, sanctify, cancel sin etc., as in the Men Tyrannus inscription (Lev. 16:16, 33; Ezek. 45:20 and other unspecified passages in Lev. and Ezek.; Dan. 9:24 Theodotion; Sir. 3:30). It has the same meaning in the passive, as in Plato's Laws (Num. 35:33; Deut. 21:8; 1 Sam. 3:14), where as before, the subject is human. Only in Ps. 65:3 (64:4) is the subject God. In view of this, Dodd gives the meaning of expiation to exhilasmos (Heb. kippurîm, Exod. 30:10 A; Lev. 23:27 f.; Num. 5:8; Heb. kappōret, 1 Chr. 28:11), exhilasis (Heb. kippurîm, Num. 29:11; cf. Hab. 3:17), and hilastērion (Heb. kappōret, Exod. 25:17–22[16–21]; 31:7; 35:12; 37:6[38:5]; 37:6, 8 f. [38:5, 7 f.]; Lev. 16:2, 13 ff.; Num. 7:89). hilaskesthai and exhilaskesthai in the middle with prepositional phrases (epi, peri, hyper), with a human subject, is the most frequent use (e.g. Exod. 30:15 f.; 32:30; Ezek. 45:17; and frequently in Ezek. and the Pentateuch). This usage corresponds to the Heb. kipper with the acc. or the prepositions 'al, b' 'ad. Dodd takes the meaning here to be: to make expiation for, to expiate or cleanse. Where hilaskesthai and exhilaskesthai occur in the middle with a dat. and a divine subject (Ps. 78[77]: 38; Ezek. 16:63) the vb. means to forgive. The same vbs. in the passive (Ps. 89[88]:9; 2 Chr. 30:18 f.) and also hileōs gignesthai (Deut. 21:8) mean to be propitious or gracious towards, and so to forgive (but not, according to Dodd, to be propitiated). exhilaskesthai in the middle with the acc. direct object and with a human subject means to appease, or placate (Gen. 32:20[21]; Prov. 16:14). exhilasma occurs only twice for kōper, equivalent, compensation, equivalent of a life, ransom (1 Sam. 12:3; Ps. 49[48]:8). Dodd drew from all this the conclusion "that the LXX translators did not regard kipper (when used as a religious term) as conveying the sense of propitiating the Deity, but the sense of performing an act whereby guilt or defilement is removed, and accordingly rendered it by hilaskesthai in this sense" (op. cit., 93). He went on to draw the further conclusion that this was the meaning that the NT writers assumed when they used this word group (op. cit., 93 ff.).

(c) Dodd's case has been subjected to minute criticism from various angles. An immediately apparent weakness is that Dodd limited his discussion to questions of grammar and equivalent translations in the LXX without looking at the wider context of ideas and motivation (cf. D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 24). Dodd did not inquire at all into the background of what the OT says about the character of Yahweh and man's relationship with him. Even so, as Roger R. Nicole has pointed out, Dodd failed to take into account a large group of words which translate kipper and its cognates, e.g. aphaireō, take away (Isa. 27:9), antallagma, that which is given in exchange (Isa. 43:3). Nicole maintains that "in his first line of investigation Dodd's conclusions are based on less than 40 per cent of the relevant evidence, and this in a case where the uniformity of the usage is a major factor in the argumentation" ("C. H. Dodd and the Doctrine of Propitiation", WTJ 17, 1955, 129). In the light of his own detailed examination of the various translations of kipper in the LXX, Nicole claims that Dodd's findings should be rewritten as follows: "Where the LXX translators do not render kipper and its cognates by words of the hilaskesthai class, they render it by words which give the meaning 'to sanctify', 'to forgive', 'to remove', 'to cover with pitch', 'to ransom', 'to contribute', 'to give', 'to veil', 'to anoint', 'the village', 'the myrrh', or they have failed to render it altogether. We should therefore expect to find that they regard the hilaskesthai class as conveying similar ideas" (ibid.; cf. Dodd, op. cit., 84, quoted above). The point of the observation is to draw attention to Dodd's arbitrary selectivity in concentrating on one particular meaning to the exclusion of other attested meanings. Moreover, as D. Hill points out, the range of meanings which Dodd himself allows to this group of words (from 'sanctify' to 'cancel') is so wide that it cannot offer a precise guide to the meaning of the hilaskomai group (op. cit., 25 f.). Even where there is a single theme of meaning, the actual meaning must be determined by the way in which words are used in context."

This last point has bearing on the debate concerning the etymology of kipper. The two main alternative meanings proposed for the root are "to cover" and "to wipe away". But as Hill again points out, this debate is indecisive for determining the biblical uses of the word-group (op. cit. 30 f.). On the one hand, the meaning of words change in the course of time. The root meaning of a word is at best only a general guide. The more exact determination of meaning must depend on the way words are used in particular contexts (cf. J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961, 107–60). On the other hand, the difference between the two suggested meanings is not great, and both lend themselves to propitiatory and expiatory interpretations.

kipper in the Heb. OT is normally translated by exhilaskomai. The latter vb. does not occur at all in the NT which prefers hilaskomai. Nevertheless, exhilaskomai is important, as it occurs 105 times (83 of which to translate kipper). It is the normal vb. used when OT writers speak of making atonement. Their usage falls into two main groups, according to whether the atonement is brought about by some cultic action (the majority of cases) or by some other non-cultic means. Dodd was inclined to dismiss instances like Gen. 32:20(21) and Prov. 16:14, where he admitted that the meaning was to appease or placate, since the usage here was not strictly religious and thus belonged to the non-cultic use (Dodd, op. cit., 92). But Hill (op. cit., 31) and Morris (op. cit., 161–67) argue that the non-cultic use is fundamental, since it enables us to ascertain the general, basic meaning of exhilaskomai (cf. also S. H. Langdon, ExpT 22, 1910–11, 323; J. Herrmann, TDNT III 302 f.).

Morris examines the following passages in some detail, all of which contain exhilaskomai in a non-cultic sense: Exod. 30:12–16; Num. 31:50; Isa. 47:11 (where some form of payment averts wrath); Exod. 32:30 (where Moses offers his life to make atonement); 2 Sam. 21:1–14 (where the hanging of seven descendants of Saul reconciles the Gibeonites); Num. 35:33 ("You shall not thus pollute the land in which you live; for blood pollutes the land and no expiation can be made for the land, for the blood that is shed in it, except by the blood of him who shed it"); Deut. 32:41 ff. (Yahweh "avenges the blood of his servants, and takes vengeance on his adversaries, and makes kipper [LXX ekkathariei, will cleanse out] for the land of his people"); Deut. 21:1–9 (the killing of a heifer to avert the guilt of innocent blood from a community); Prov. 16:14 (a wise man will appease the wrath of a king); Isa. 27:9 (forgiveness brought about by the destruction of idolatrous altars); Ezek. 16:63, cf. vv. 38, 42 (forgiveness through satisfaction); Pss. 65:3; 78:38; 79:9; Dan. 9:24; Jer. 18:23 ("Forgive not their iniquity . . . deal with them in the time of thine anger"); Num. 25:1–18 (by offering up the lives of evil-doers the zealous priest makes atonement and averts divine wrath); 2 Chr. 30:18 and Isa. 6:7 (both passages concerned with the purging away of uncleanness). Morris concludes that in 7 of these passages atonement is made through offering a kōper of life, and in 9 the kōper is money, goods or a metaphorical price (op. cit., 166 f.). Clearly, some cases are less clear-cut than others, since not all of these passages explicitly refer to the person who is propitiated. However, in those cases where the propitiated party is mentioned, it is evident that the offence is not dealt with in an impersonal way as if the mere performance of an act is sufficient to bring about the desired consequences. It may be stated that those passages which can be construed in an expiatory sense can also be construed in a propitiatory sense. On the other hand, those passages which require a propitiatory sense cannot be reduced to a simple expiatory sense.

Turning to the cultic use of kipper, Morris points out that the vb. acquired a technical meaning which completely overshadowed other meanings. Hence, in most places it means “to accomplish reconciliation between God and man”, without indicating how that reconciliation is obtained (op. cit., 167). Num. 16:41–50 provides a link between the cultic and non-cultic uses. The means of averting Yahweh’s wrath is by Aaron’s making an offering of → incense (vv. 46 f.). Various passages speak of gifts in which there is an element of atonement (Num. 15:25; cf. 7:25; 31:1–54; Deut. 16:16; Jdg. 6:18 f.; Isa. 18:7; Zeph. 3:10). 1 Sam. 3:14 is an early cultic passage in which Yahweh’s personal enmity to the house of Eli is so great that “the iniquity of Eli’s house shall not be atoned [yīṭkappēr] with sacrifice or offering for ever.” Lev. 5:16 refers to a guilt offering for an unwitting trespass: “He shall also make restitution for what he has done amiss in the holy thing, and shall add a fifth to it and give it to the priest; and the priest shall make atonement [y^ʿkappēr] for him with the ram of the guilt offering, and he shall be forgiven [w^ʿnistah^h lô].” Morris suggests that the extra fifth looks remarkably like a sort of kōper, and that the same may be said for other examples of the guilt offering (op. cit., 169). Even in cases where restitution could not be paid to the offended party because of his death, the restitution plus one fifth still had to be paid to Yahweh (Num. 5:8). Although the prophets denounced popular ideas of sacrifice which assumed that Yahweh would be satisfied with a gift without a corresponding change of heart (Isa. 1:1 ff.; Mic. 6:6 ff.), they did not put forward an alternative theory of sacrifice.

Morris holds that the remaining cases of exhilaskomai which translate a vb. other than kipper, which have already been noted in discussing Dodd’s case, are also compatible with the idea of propitiation. Indeed, as Dodd himself recognized, the element of propitiation is positively required by Zech. 7:2; 8:22; Mal. 1:9; cf. also Ps. 106(105):30; Num. 25:11.

The vb. hilaskomai which is used in the NT occurs only 11 times in the OT, always in the middle or passive and always with Yahweh as subject. In general, it means to forgive. But in 6 of these passages there is explicit mention of divine wrath. In view of this Morris claims that “it is manifestly impossible to maintain that the vb. has been emptied of its force” (op. cit., 158). Thus, in Exod. 32:14 it translates nāham (in the niphal): “And the LORD repented [wayyinnāhem YHWH] of the evil which he thought to do to his people.” But it must be noted that vv. 11 f. refer to the wrath of Yahweh which is averted by the intercession of Moses. In Lam. 3:42 hilaskomai translates sālah which means to forgive: “We have transgressed and rebelled, and thou hast not forgiven.” But the forgiveness in question here is of the kind which involves the turning away of divine wrath. The same may be said of Dan.

9:19 (Theodotion): “O Lord, forgive”; which may be compared with v. 16: “O Lord, according to all thy righteous acts, let thy anger and thy wrath turn away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy hill; because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people have become a byword among all who are round about us.” The personal wrath of Yahweh is present in 2 Ki. 24:3 f.: “Surely this came upon Judah at the command of the LORD, to remove them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasseh, according to all that he had done, and also for the innocent blood that he had shed; for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood, and the LORD would not pardon.” The idea of forgiveness in Ps. 78(77):38 is practically identical with the averting of divine wrath: “Yet he, being compassionate, forgave their iniquity, and did not destroy them; he restrained his anger often, and did not stir up all his wrath.” The same is true of Ps. 79(78):8: “Do not remember against us the iniquities of our forefathers; let thy compassion come speedily to meet us, for we are brought very low.” There is a clear link between the pardoning of guilt and Yahweh’s character in Ps. 25(24):11: “For thy name’s sake, O LORD, pardon my guilt, for it is great” (cf. vv. 16 ff.). In Ps. 65(64):3 the notion of forgiveness is uppermost, but the context makes it clear that it is no mere impersonal matter but something which concerns Yahweh personally: “When our transgressions prevail over us, thou dost forgive them.” Est. 13:17 (Addition C v. 10) is concerned with the forgiveness of the people under sentence of death. In 2 Ki. 5:18 the former → leper and convert to Yahwism, Naaman, asks for pardon for bowing down in the house of Rimmon, an action prohibited by the Second Commandment on the grounds that Yahweh is a jealous God (Exod. 20:5; Deut. 5:9): “In this matter may the LORD pardon your servant: when my master goes into the house of Rimmon to worship there, leaning on my arm, and I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, when I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, the LORD pardon your servant in this matter.”

The noun hilasmos occurs 10 times in a variety of contexts. In Lev. 25:9 and Num. 5:8 it translates kippurîm and may be translated as atonement. The former is concerned with the Day of Atonement and the latter with the ram of atonement, offered to Yahweh in restitution for wrong committed against a fellow Israelite. In Ps. 130(129):4 and Dan. 9:9 (Theodotion) it translates s’liḥâh, forgiveness. In Amos 8:14 it translates ’ašmâh, wrong doing, guilt. In Ezek. 44:27 it is the equivalent of ḥattā’î, sin offering. There is no Heb. equivalent in 1 Chr. 28:20 and 2 Macc. 3:33, where it is applied to the sacrifice offered by Onias to deliver Heliodorus from further punishment.

The LXX uses hilasterion 22 times for the Heb. kappōret which may be rendered “propitiatory” (BDB, 498) or “mercy seat” (RSV). The older translation “cover” (cf. RSV mg) has no justification in usage. It occurs in Exod. 25:17–22 (16–21); 31:7; 35:12; 38:6, 8 f. (5, 7 f.); Lev. 16:2, 13 ff.; Num. 7:89). It designates the slab of → gold $2\frac{1}{2}$ cubits by $1\frac{1}{2}$ cubits placed on top of the ark of testimony (→ Tent, Tabernacle; → Temple). On it and as part of it were the two → cherubim, whose outstretched wings came together and formed the throne of Yahweh. When the high → priest entered the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16), this holiest place had to be enveloped in a cloud of → incense. The → blood of the sin-offering of atonement was sprinkled on it and before it. In 1 Chr. 28:11 the temple proper, as distinct from the porch etc., was called the bēt hakkapporet, “the room [lit. house] for the mercy seat” (RSV). In Ezek. 43:14, 17, 20 hilasterion stands for ’azārâh, a ledge surrounding Ezekiel's altar. It occurs without Heb. equivalent in Amos 9:1, and also in 4 Macc. 17:22 where it may be an adj. qualifying the noun death or a noun in apposition: "they having as it were become a ransom [antipsychon] for our nation's sin; and through the blood of these righteous men and the propitiation of their death [tou hilastēriou thanatou], the divine Providence delivered [diesōsen] Israel that before was evil entreated" (cf. also 2 Macc. 7:37; 4 Macc. 6:28).

hileōs occurs 35 times in the LXX particularly in the phrase hileōs einai, be propitious, for Heb. sālah, forgive. It features in the prayer of → Solomon at the dedication of the → temple (1 Ki. 8:30, 34, 36, 39, 50; 2 Chr. 6:21, 25, 27, 39; cf. also Num. 14:20; 2 Chr. 7:14; Jer. 5:1, 7; 50[27]:20; 31[38]:34; 36[43]:3). It renders no less than 7 other Heb. expressions chiefly connected with forgiveness in Gen. 43:23; Exod. 32:12; Num. 14:19; Deut. 21:8; 1 Sam. 14:45; 2 Sam. 20:20; 23:17; 1 Chr. 11:19; and has no corresponding Heb. in 1 Macc. 2:21; 2 Macc. 2:7, 22; 7:37; 10:26; 4 Macc. 6:28; 8:14; 9:24; 12:18.

In the intertestamental period human expressions of piety may have atoning power as well as cultic acts. This is anticipated by Prov. 16:6: "By loyalty and faithfulness iniquity is atoned for, and by the fear of the LORD a man avoids evil." According to Sir. 3:30, "A flaming fire doth quench water; so doth almsgiving atone for sin." In later Judaism good deeds, the study of the Torah, suffering, and one's own death may have atoning value (T. Yoma 5:6 ff.; cf. E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, 1963², 35 ff.). The death of the martyrs has a special atoning worth, as may be seen in the quotation above from 4 Macc. 17:22 (cf. 2 Macc. 7:37; SB II 275 ff.; Lohse, op. cit., 66 ff.).

To sum up the discussion so far, it is clear that the authors of the Heb. OT and the LXX translators are far removed from the crude pagan idea of propitiating a capricious and malevolent deity. On the other hand, the evidence that we have examined does not suggest that these writers shared a common quasi-mechanistic view of life in which the effects of sin could be nullified by resorting to the appropriate rite as an antidote. There is a personal dimension which affects both the offending and the offended parties which means that, even where an offence has to be expiated, the action has to be taken because the personal relationship between the parties requires it. What C. K. Barrett says of Paul's teaching in Romans might also be applied to those passages in the OT concerning the expiation of man's sin: "It would be wrong to neglect the fact that expiation has, as it were, the effect of propitiation: the sin that might have excited God's wrath is expiated (at God's will) and therefore no longer does so" (The Epistle to the Romans, BNTC, 1957, 78).

(d) The element of propitiation is further supported by a closer examination of the significance of → blood in the OT. The view that → life is in the blood has already been noted (see above, OT 2 (c)). This has been taken by an influential body of theologians to mean that sacrifice is a way of releasing life. Thus Vincent Taylor writes: "The victim is slain in order that its life, in the form of blood, may be released, and its flesh is burnt in order that it may be transformed or etherialized; and in both cases the aim is to make it possible for life to be presented as an offering to the Deity" (Jesus and His Sacrifice, 1937, 54 f.). Similarly, E. L. Mascall writes: "The slaying was merely an indispensable preliminary by which the life was set free to be offered" (Corpus Christi, 1955, 89; cf. F. C. N. Hicks, The Fullness of Sacrifice, 1930). With Mascall, Hicks and other Catholic writers, this interpretation laid the OT foundation for a view of the eucharist which saw the sacrament as the means of communicating the life of Christ to the faithful, on whose behalf it was released in the sacrifice of Calvary and renewed in the eucharist.

The chief grounds for adopting this interpretation of the OT lie in the way passages like Lev. 17:11 are understood: "For the life [Heb. nēpēš; LXX psychē] of the flesh is in the blood [Heb. dām; LXX haima]; and I have given it for you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that makes atonement, by reason of the life." This may be coupled with the prohibition in Lev. 17:14: "For the life of every creature is the blood of it [so Gk., Syr., cf. Vulg.; the Heb. reads: for the life of all flesh, its blood is in its life]; therefore I have said to the people of Israel, You shall not eat the blood of any creature, for the life of every creature is its blood; whoever eats it shall be cut off." A similar prohibition is contained in Deut. 12:23: "Only be sure that you do not eat the blood; for the blood is the life, and you shall not eat the life with the flesh." The same command is given to → Noah which is contained in the so-called "Noachian decrees": "Only you shall not eat flesh with its life, that is, its blood" (Gen. 9:4). The eating of flesh with blood in it is further prohibited in (e.g.) Lev. 3:17; 7:26 f.; 17:10, 12; 19:26; Deut. 12:16, 23; 15:23. Various other passages link blood and life. Thus → David refused to drink the water brought to him from the well of → Bethlehem: "He poured it out to the LORD, and said, 'Far be it from me, O LORD, that I should do this. Shall I drink the blood of the men who went at the risk of their lives?'" (2 Sam. 23:16 f.). The taking of human life is also prohibited in the "Noachian decrees": "For your lifeblood I will surely require a reckoning; of every beast I will require it and of man; of every man's brother I will require the life of man" (Gen. 9:5). Blood is used as a synonym for life or soul by the Psalmist: "From oppression and violence he redeems their life [Heb. napšām; LXX psychas]; and precious is their blood in his sight" (Ps. 72[71]:14).

The view represented by Taylor has, however, been strongly challenged by a number of scholars (L. Morris, op. cit., 112–28; A. M. Stibbs, The Meaning of the Word "Blood" in Scripture, 1954²; J. Behm, haima, haimatekchysia, TDNT I 172–77; J. A. Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, 1904, 29; G. F. Moore, Encyclopaedia Biblica, 1899–1903, column 4221; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Salvation, 1946, 233; cf. also H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974, 60 ff., whose study of blood makes no reference to the theory of the shedding of blood as the release of life). On closer examination it becomes clear that "blood" in many of the passages quoted means death rather than life. So long as the blood circulates in the animal or human being, there is life. When it no longer circulates, death ensues. This, of course, is prior to the modern theory of the circulation of the blood, discovered by William Harvey in the seventeenth century. Rather, it was recognized that, while blood flowed, there was life. Behind the prohibition of eating flesh with blood in it, there may also have been sound hygienic reasons. Gen. 9:5 (like Gen. 42:22) is concerned with the destruction of life. Alongside Ps. 72[71]:14 may be set Ps. 116:15: "Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints."

Similarly, David's question about drinking the blood of his brave followers can only be a metaphorical one in which blood signifies life surrendered in death. Of the 362 instances of the word dām, blood, in the Heb. OT, Leon Morris claims that no less than 203 associate blood with violent death (op. cit., 112). Among these are some 165 general instances like “Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed” (Gen. 9:6), “the avenger of blood” (Num. 35:19), “he who avenges blood is mindful of them” (Ps. 9:12). The expression “innocent blood” occurs 21 times (e.g. Deut. 19:10, 13; 21:8 f.; cf. 27:25; 1 Sam. 19:5; 1 Ki. 2:31; Prov. 6:17; Isa. 59:7). The idea of one’s blood being upon oneself is found 12 times (e.g. Lev. 20:9, 11 ff., 16, 27; 2 Sam. 16:8; 1 Ki. 2:32 ff.). On blood-guiltiness see Gen. 9:4 ff.; Lev. 17:4; Deut. 19:10; Prov. 1:18; 28:17; Isa. 1:15; Hos. 1:4; 4:2; Nah. 3:1; Ezek. 22:2; 24:6, 9. There are some 5 references to the death of animals (e.g. Lev. 17:3 f.) in addition to 103 references to sacrificial blood (e.g. Exod. 23:18). In passages like Gen. 37:26; 1 Ki. 2:5; Ps. 58[57]:10, blood clearly signifies death.

Taken in isolation, it is possible to construe certain passages which deal with atonement (e.g. Exod. 30:10; Lev. 16:27; 17:11) as offering the life of the victim. But it is equally possible to understand them as offering the death of the victim whose life has been taken away. However, in Num. 35:33 which deals with the execution of a murderer, there can be no question of the presentation of his life before God. And in various passages where atonement is effected by some means other than the cultus it is the termination of life which brings about the atonement. Thus Moses sought atonement for the sin of the people by asking Yahweh to blot him out of the book which he had written (Exod. 32:30 ff.). Phinehas made atonement by slaying Zimri and Cozbi (Num. 25:13). David made atonement by delivering seven descendants of Saul to be hanged by the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21:3 f.). In the case of a murder committed by an unknown person atonement is made by breaking the neck of a heifer (Deut. 21:1–9).

In the case of sacrifice within the cultus, atonement is generally effected not simply by offering the blood but by the offering of the whole sacrifice (Ezek. 45:17; for the various types of offering → Sacrifice). Moreover, different parts of the animal were associated with atonement: e.g. the head (Lev. 1:4; cf. Yoma 3:8; 4:2; 6:2); the burning of the fat (Lev. 4:26; cf. 3:16 f.; Isa. 1:11; 34:6; 2 Sam. 1:22). In some cases where atonement is spoken of, the blood appears to be excluded altogether. Thus Aaron and his sons were instructed to “eat those things with which atonement was made” (Exod. 29:33). Similarly, Moses rebuked the sons of Aaron by asking: “Why have you not eaten the sin offering in the place of the sanctuary, since it is a thing most holy and has been given to you that you may bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the LORD? Behold, its blood was not brought into the inner part of the sanctuary. You certainly ought to have eaten it in the sanctuary, as I commanded” (Lev. 10:17 f.). In other places atonement is connected with ceremonies like the → pouring of → oil on the head of a cleansed → leper (Lev. 14:18, 29), the offering of → incense (Num. 16:46), and the scapegoat (Lev. 16:10). In the Passover ritual blood is the means of averting destruction. “The blood shall be a sign for you, upon the houses where you are; and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and no plague shall fall upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt” (Exod. 12:13). Morris comments: “The obvious symbolism is that a death has taken place, and this death substitutes for the death of the firstborn” (op. cit., 121).

Finally, attention may be drawn to certain prophetic passages in which the slaughter of nations is compared with sacrifice. Thus Jeremiah spoke of the destruction of Egypt and her allies: “The sword shall devour and be sated, and drink its fill of their blood. For the LORD God of hosts holds a sacrifice in the north country by the river Euphrates” (Jer. 46:10b). In similar vein Zephaniah also spoke of the day of the Lord: “Be silent before the LORD God! For the day of the LORD is at hand; the LORD has prepared a sacrifice and consecrated his guests. And on the day of the LORD’s sacrifice – ‘I will punish the officials and the king’s sons and all who array themselves in foreign attire’ ” (Zeph. 1:7 f.). Here too there can be no question of sacrifice being a means of releasing life; the essential idea is the taking away of life in death.

In view of these considerations, the conclusion may be drawn that, where blood is mentioned in the OT, the thought that is uppermost is the shedding of blood (whether literally or in some other way of terminating life), and where blood is linked with sacrifice or atonement the thought is that of the death of the victim rather than the release of his life. As in our study of kipper and the hilaskomai word-group, there lies in the background the thought that such acts are not arbitrary or unethical. In the last analysis they are required because Yahweh is who he is. The biblical writers see no tension with righteousness at this point. Indeed, these things are seen as part and parcel of the moral structure of life which in turn derives from Yahweh.

C. Brown

4. The ideas of atonement acquired a particular form in the Qumran community. The community on the one hand held firmly to the OT view that God is the subject of atonement (e.g. 1QH 4:37; 1QS 11:1–14; CD 4:6 ff.; 20:34). At the same time, however, there was the idea that the Essene community as the true → Israel makes atonement for the whole land (l’kapper b’ad hā-’āreṣ) by its obedience to the Torah (1QS 8:6, 10; cf. 2:8; 5:6; 8:3; 1QSa 1:3; Lev. 18:27 f.; Num. 35:33; Jôel 3:17[4:17]; Jub. 50:5; Sib. 5:264; Syr. Bar. 66:2; see further A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and Its Meaning, 1966, 217).

NT In view of the relatively frequent and quite familiar occurrence of cultic terms in the LXX, it comes as a surprise to find how rarely the NT makes use of these words. Each of the four terms is used only twice, so that the whole group of words appears only 8 times in the NT (of which 3 are in Heb.).

1. (a) hileōs appears in Matt. 16:22 as a negative exclamation in Peter’s rebuke of Jesus when Jesus told him of his impending death at Jerusalem: “God forbid, Lord! This shall never happen to you.” The Gk. is hileōs soi, kyrie (lit. “gracious to you, Lord”). The words eīē ho theos (“may God be”) are understood. For biblical parallels see Gen. 43:23; 2 Sam. 20:20; 1 Chr. 11:19 (cf. also hileōs soi, Alypi “May [Serapis] help you”, quoted by Arndt, 376; cf. Funk § 128, 5; Moulton-Milligan, 303).

(b) Heb. 8:12 comes at the end of a quotation from Jer. 31:31–34: “for I will be merciful toward their iniquities, and I will remember their sins no more.” It concludes an argument that the new covenant has been inaugurated by Christ, that this is the covenant foretold by Jeremiah, and therefore that, “In speaking of a new covenant he treats the first as obsolete. And what is becoming obsolete and growing old is ready to vanish away” (Heb. 8:12).

2. (a) Strikingly enough, exhilaskomai which is the regular vb. in the LXX does not occur in the NT at all. The aor. passive of hilaskomai is used in Lk. 18:13 in the tax collector’s prayer in the temple: “God, be merciful to me a sinner! [ho theos, hilasthēti moi tō hamartōlō].” The thought is similar to that of Ps. 79(78):9 LXX: “and forgive our sins for thy name’s sake [kai hilasthēti tais hamartiais hēmōn heneka tou onomatos sou].” The same vb. is used in both cases. It can be rendered as both “be propitious” and “be merciful” (Moulton-Milligan, 303; Arndt, 376). Whether one sees here overtones of the need for propitiation, as in cl. Gk., or whether one sees a more general cry for mercy, depends on the weight one gives to Dodd’s argument that the passive meaning of “be propitiated” has been evaporated in the LXX (op. cit., 93 f.; cf. above OT 3 (b)). However, it must be pointed out that the tax collector certainly felt the need for a forgiveness that only God himself could bestow. Otherwise, he would not have uttered the prayer.

Jesus’ comment is contained in Lk. 18:14: “I tell you, this man went down to his house justified [dedikaiōmenos] rather than the other; for every one who exalts himself will be humbled, but he who humbles himself will be exalted.” On justification → Righteousness, art. dikaiosynē. Commenting on the parable, E. E. Ellis sees the → Pharisee’s attitude as not untypical of attitudes within Judaism (The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966, 215). In the Talmud one rabbi was said to be confident that his righteousness was sufficient to exempt his whole generation from judgment. If the saved numbered only “a hundred, I and my son are among them; and if only two, they are I and my son” (Suk. 45b). In terms of performing those acts which were currently understood as comprising righteousness, Paul declared himself “as to the righteousness under the law, blameless” (Phil. 3:6). Even at Qumran, amidst the profound consciousness that the community was the elect and righteous Sons of Light, there was a sense that righteousness was a gift of God. “As for me, my justification is with God. In His Hand are the perfection of my way and the uprightness of my heart. He will wipe out my transgression through His righteousness. . . . From the source of His righteousness is my justification” (1QS 11:2 f., 5). Thus justification here might be said to be by grace alone, but it was not, as with Paul, by faith related to the saving act of Christ (Rom. 3:20–27) or related to the law (Rom. 8:4; cf. 7:1–25; Gal. 3:10 ff.). The development of these aspects of reconciliation and justification belong to the post-Pentecost church.

The parable in Lk. 18 focuses on two aspects: on man’s side what matters is a heartfelt turning to God which simply casts oneself on God’s mercy; on God’s side human self-righteousness is of no avail, but God has mercy on the ungodly who turn to him for mercy. The final statement about → humility and exaltation (→ Height, art. hypsōō) is regarded by some as possibly an originally independent saying (Ellis, op. cit., 214). It does, however, fit the context and train of thought remarkably well. For it picks up OT teaching about God, righteousness and humility (e.g. Prov. 3:34; Isa. 55:15; 58:3 ff.; cf. also 1 Pet. 5:5 f.). It says in effect to those to whom the parable was addressed (“who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and despised others”, Lk. 18:9), that this teaching is nothing new. If they (and the Pharisee in the parable) had really understood the Scriptures, they would have understood this truth about God and man.

(b) Heb. 2:17 takes up the cultic ritual of the Day of Atonement: “Therefore he had to be made like his brethren in every respect, so that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God, to make expiation for the sins of the people [eis to hilaskesthai tas hamartias tou laou]” (cf. Lev. 16:14 ff.). The RSV here follows Dodd’s line of interpretation (see above, OT 3 (b)). “Christ is represented as performing an act whereby men are delivered from the guilt of their sin, not whereby God is propitiated" (C. H. Dodd, op. cit., 94). Jesus is portrayed as the faithful high priest (cf. 1 Sam. 2:35) who atones for the → sins of the people. The death and exaltation of Jesus are interpreted in terms of the annual Day of Atonement ritual which is seen as a type of Jesus' reconciling work and which is thus rendered obsolete by the fulfilment which comes with Jesus.

Jesus stands in the service of God. In the phrase "a merciful and faithful high priest in the service of God [elēēmōn . . . kai pistos archiereus ta pros ton theon]" the ta is an acc. of respect (Funk § 160). This has been taken to imply that God is not the recipient of the reconciliation. Rather, Jesus is appointed and authorized by God "to fulfil that which neither the propitiatory acts of the OT nor those of other religions have been able to accomplish" (O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹², 169). Comparison with cultic atonement exhibits the radical nature of the sacrifice of Jesus' life for the sin of others (cf. Heb. 7:27; 9:12, 26; 10:12). The outcome of Jesus' atonement (hilaskesthai) is the wiping out of the guilt of sins (hamartias) and the offer of → forgiveness to the new people of God. Clearly, this is an action by God through his high priest Jesus for the salvation of men. But while there is no thought of appeasement of an angry deity in the pagan sense, and God is not said explicitly to be the recipient of the hilaskesthai, it may be asked whether Dodd's conclusion is not too simplistic. For whether we look at it against the wider background of personal relations with Yahweh in the OT or the more specific background of the Day of Atonement ritual (see above, OT 3 (c)), the reason why guilt has to be expiated lies in the character of God himself. The Day of Atonement ritual is required not because of some mechanistic view of the universe which requires the appropriate ritual as an antidote to nullify the effects of sin. It is because God himself is who he is and what he is. He is both the provider and the recipient of the reconciliation.

3. The noun hilasmos occurs only in 1 Jn. "And he is the expiation for our sins [hilasmos . . . peri tōn hamartiōn hēmōn], and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world" (1 Jn. 2:2 RSV). "In this is love, not that we loved God but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the expiation for our sins [hilasmon peri tōn hamartiōn hēmōn]" (1 Jn. 4:10 RSV). The decision whether to translate hilasmos by "expiation" or "propitiation" must be decided against the background of the considerations already discussed (see above, OT 3 (b) and (c)). However, it must be said that, as with other passages in the OT and NT concerning reconciliation, it is not a matter of applying some impersonal antidote. The question at issue is our personal relationship with God, and that which hinders this relationship needs to be dealt with for God's part just as much as for ours (cf. 1 Jn. 1:5–10; 4:7 ff., 13–21).

1 Jn. 2:2 and 4:10 are parallel statements to 1 Jn. 2:1 and 1 Jn. 4:9: "My little children, I am writing this to you so that you may not sin; but if any one does sin, we have an advocate with the Father [paraklēton . . . pros ton patera], Jesus Christ the righteous"; "In this the love of God was made manifest among us, that God sent his only Son into the world, so that we might live through him." In view of this parallelism and the fact that cultic language is not in general characteristic of 1 Jn., it has been suggested that 1 Jn. 2:2 and 4:10 were later additions due to the redactional influence of the community (cf. R. Bultmann, The Johannine Epistles, Hermeneia, 1973, 23, 68). But in fact, words of the hilaskomai word-ground fit in naturally with the terminology of blood, cleansing and sin (1 Jn. 1:7 ff.) and would come naturally to anyone familiar with this area of the thought-world of the LXX.

In 1 Jn. 2:1 Jesus is described by use of the personal term → advocate (paraklētos). But now, as B. F. Westcott pointed out, he is not said to be the propitiator but the propitiation (The Epistles of St John, 1892³, 44). This is parallel to him being “our life” (Col. 3:4), “our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30). He does not simply guide, teach, quicken; he is “the way, the truth, and the life” (Jn. 14:6). The action is clearly linked with his death: “But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus his Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn. 1:7). Christ’s death is the ground on which we may be cleansed, when we confess our sins: “If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, and will forgive our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness” (1 Jn. 1:9). “The hilasmos is not one-sidedly linked with the single achievement of the death, but with the total person and work of Jesus, of which His death is, of course, an indissoluble part, 5:6; cf. 3:16; 1:7” (F. Büchsel, TDNT III 318). Jn. does not set out the need for a hilasmos. For him it is self-evident in the light of the character of God and the coming → judgment (1 Jn. 4:17). But once again atonement is not regarded as something that man does to God, but rather as the expression of God’s love to men (1 Jn. 4:10).

4. (a) In the description of the sanctuary in the → tent in Heb. 9:1–5 hilastērion means mercy seat: “above it were the cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy seat” (Heb. 9:5a; cf. Exod. 25:18–22; 37:7 ff. LXX; see above, OT 3 (c)).

(b) The interpretation of Rom. 3:25 has been the subject of much discussion. It stands at the centre of Paul’s statement of God’s → righteousness in the face of man’s sin. The Gentile stands condemned apart from the law (Rom. 1:18–32; cf. 2:12) and the Jew is condemned by the law (Rom. 2:1–3:20). “But now the righteousness of God has been manifested apart from the law, although the law and the prophets bear witness to it, the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ for all who believe. For there is no distinction; since all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, they are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, whom God put forward as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith [hon proetheto ho theos hilastērion dia pisteōs]. This was to show God’s righteousness, because in his divine forbearance he had passed over former sins; it was to prove at the present time that he himself is righteous and that he justifies him who has faith in Jesus” (Rom. 3:21–26).

E. Käsemann sees Rom. 3:25 as a quotation taken up by Paul from Jewish Christian sources to which Paul has added his characteristic emphasis on faith in the words dia pisteōs (“Zum Verständnis von Römer 3, 24–26”, ZNW 43, 1950–51, 150 ff.; reprinted in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, I, 1968⁵, 96 ff.; cf. also R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 46 f.).

Several older exegetes connect the hilastērion here with the mercy seat, as in Heb. 9:5 (see above, 4 (a)). Thus, F. Büchsel, who points out that Paul’s writings are saturated with allusions to the LXX, writes: “The indisputable centre of the earlier expiations of the Law is the Day of Atonement, when the hilastērion, or kappōret, must be sprinkled with blood to mediate the remission of all sins. Paul obviously assumes that the church to which he writes is acquainted with the Mosaic Law, 7:1. Hence it is natural that he should depict Jesus in this context as a higher kappōret” which is efficacious through faith rather than through purely external observance" (TDNT III 321; cf. Rom. 2:28; 1 Cor. 3:6). Similarly, T. W. Manson interpreted hilastērion against the background of the Day of Atonement rites and took it to mean either "an expiatory place or object", or more probably in the context of Jewish-Christian usage "the place where God shows mercy to man" ("HILASTERION", JTS 46, 1945, 1–10).

This attractive interpretation has, however, failed to find general assent. Among those who have contested it is E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht. Untersuchungen zur urchristlichen Verkündigung vom Sühntod Jesu Christi, FRLANT 46, 1955, 1963², 151 f.). Leon Morris has also questioned it on the following grounds ("The Meaning of hilastērion in Rom. iii. 25", NTS 2, 1955–56, 33–43). When hilastērion means mercy seat it always has the definite article (as in Heb. 9:5). The only exception is Exod. 25:17, where epithema removes it from the general to the particular. Not all the instances of hilastērion which Manson regards as referring to places are certain: they also refer to the propitiatory nature and purpose of the object. Generally speaking, Rom. does not move in the sphere of Levitical symbolism (in the way that, e.g., Heb. does). The question has to be asked how readily the readers of the Jewish Christian community at Rome would have grasped the significance of hilastērion as a single unexplained reference to the tabernacle furnishings. Manson regarded Rom. 1–3 as an "elaborate confession of sin for all mankind". This could be compared with Aaron's confession of the iniquities of Israel over the live goat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:21) but for the fact that these chapters are not a confession of sin to God but a demonstration of God's condemnation of sin before men. Morris regards it as harsh to make Christ, at one and the same time, the priest, victim and place of sprinkling. On the other hand, this latter point is not an insuperable objection, for Paul evidently regards Jesus Christ as the one who made the offering, the victim whose blood actually does take away sins, and therefore he himself was the locus in which all this was effected.

An alternative model for Paul's thought might be 4 Macc. 17:22 (quoted above, OT 3 (c)). H. Rashdall went so far as to think it "highly probable" that "this was the source of St. Paul's thought and expression" (The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology, 1919, 132). Leon Morris is more cautious and prefers to think of a community of thought to which both Paul and 4 Macc. belong. Among the ideas common to both passages are the following which are listed by D. Hill (op. cit., 42): (1) Both contexts speak of the active wrath of God; (2) Both refer to the shedding of blood and the surrender of life; (3) The death in both cases deals with sin; (4) In both cases death brings about deliverance, although with Paul it is not political but moral and theological; (5) In both passages the death is vicarious; (6) In both places it is God who provides the means of atonement.

Hill goes on to suggest that Paul was directly influenced by 4 Macc. (op. cit., 43–46). He follows M. Hadas in dating 4 Macc. in the middle or end of the reign of Caligula (A.D. 37–41) (The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees, 1953). Paul probably wrote Rom. during his three-month stay in Greece mentioned at Acts 20:2 f. some time between late A.D. 55 and early 59. He therefore regards it as chronologically probable that 4 Macc. was written before Rom. Moreover, he does not think that the Alexandrian origin of 4 Macc. and its use of Gk. philosophical ideas militate against the theory that Paul knew the work and was influenced by it.

The work itself celebrates the glory and worth of martyrdom, with its emphasis on supreme obedience to the demands of God, its atoning worth, and the merit which avails for others. Similar ideas were current in Judaism (Ass.Mos.; Pss.Sol. 10:2; Test.Ben. 3:8; cf. W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, 1965, 31–68; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 1955², 265–73; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, 1961, 128–33; and E. Lohse, op. cit.). There are clear traces of a martyr-theology in Paul (Rom. 5:13–18; Phil. 2:8). Moreover, Hill thinks it not too fanciful to suggest that Paul's writing of Rom. coincided with the Feast of the Dedication (Hanukkah) which began on 25 Chisleu and which was a winter festival. The feast commemorated the rededication of the temple in 165 B.C. This point has particular significance if 4 Macc. was or contained "a Memorial Address" composed for the feast (cf. B. W. Bacon, "The Festival of Lives given for the Nation in Jewish and Christian Faith", Hibbert Journal 15, 1917, 256–78).

Hill admits that a good deal of this is an undemonstrable hypothesis. But the point must be stressed that, if Paul has 4 Macc. in mind in writing Rom. 3, he was not saying that Jesus was just one of a long line of Jewish martyrs whose deaths had atoning value. Rather, his stress on the uniqueness of Christ's death and efficacy make it clear that the deaths of the Jewish martyrs do not possess the atoning value ascribed to them. This point is reinforced by Rom. 3:25b which declares that God had passed over former sins, i.e. he had not punished them, but that now he shows his righteousness in visiting sin and justifying those who have faith in Jesus (v. 26; → Patience, art. anechomai NT 2; cf. M. Black, Romans, New Century Bible, 1973, 70; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975, 211 ff.).

If the objection be made that to think of hilastērion in Rom. 3:35 in terms of the mercy seat involves an abrupt introduction of the idea without explanatory reference to the context, the same objection could be made to linking it to the thought-world of 4 Macc. And yet the word and its associated ideas are common factors in all three contexts. Must we choose between them? It might seem that it would make Paul's thought impossibly complicated, if we suggest that Paul was thinking of both the Day of Atonement with all its tabernacle symbolism and the Jewish tradition of the atoning death of the martyrs. But to put the matter this way might be to put it the wrong way round. There are a number of common factors in the Day of Atonement ritual and the Jewish beliefs: the need for atonement, that this is brought about by death, and that of an innocent victim, that this benefits the people. Such beliefs were not exclusively associated with either the Day of Atonement or the death of the martyrs. It may well be that Paul deliberately chose a term which was common to both to show that Christ's death is the ultimately valid means of atonement by which both the OT rites and contemporary Jewish beliefs about the deaths of the martyrs were once and for all superseded.

If this is so, it might well explain the grammatical problems posed by supposing that Paul was drawing on either context; i.e. his anarthrous use of hilastērion, whereas it normally has the definite article when it means mercy seat; the fact that hilastēriou in the best reading of 4 Macc. 17:22 appears to be adjectival. Thus Paul is using the word in a way which corresponds grammatically to neither set of passages exactly; but the substance of the idea is common to both.

At the same time Paul emphasizes once more the importance of → faith in the words “by faith [dia pisteōs]”. The words “by his blood [en tō autou haimati]” recall the Last Supper, the tradition of the → Lord’s Supper (Matt. 26:28 par. Mk. 14:24, Lk. 22:20; 1 Cor. 10:16; 11:25), the primitive → proclamation of the kērygma (1 Cor. 15:3), and the references to blood elsewhere in NT teaching (Rom. 5:9; Acts 20:28; Eph. 1:7; 2:13; Col. 1:20; Heb. 9:11 ff.; 10:19, 29; 13:12, 20; 1 Pet. 1:2, 19; 1 Jn. 1:7; 5:6; Rev. 1:5; 5:9; 7:14; 12:11 (cf. C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975, 210 f.). It re-establishes the broken covenant through God’s covenant faithfulness, his dikaiosynē, → righteousness (cf. E. Käsemann, op. cit., 99; and “The Saving Significance of the Death of Jesus in Paul”, Perspectives on Paul, 1971, 32–59).

H.-G. Link, C. Brown

καταλλάσσω	καταλλάσσω (katallassō), reconcile; καταλλαγή (katallagē), reconciliation; ἀπαλλάσσω (apallassō), set free, release; διαλλάσσομαι (diallassomai), become reconciled; ἀποκαταλλάσσω (apokatallassō), reconcile; μεταλλάσσω (metallassō), to exchange; ἀντάλλαγμα (antallagma), what is given or taken in exchange.
------------	--

CL katallassō is a compound of allassō, to alter, exchange (derived from allos, another; → Other). Its original meaning is to change, exchange, etc.; transferred, it means to reconcile (Hdt. onwards; e.g. Hdt. 5, 95; 7, 145). The corresponding noun is katallagē, reconciliation (Aesch., Sept. 767; Dem. 1, 4). Other compounds of allassō found in the NT are: apallassō, set free, release; diallassō, change (someone’s mind), reconcile (found in passive); metallassō, change, exchange; apokatallassō (only in Christian literature), to reconcile. From the same root is derived the noun antallagma, what is given in exchange, price of purchase (e.g. Eur., Orestes 1157).

katallassō (like diallassō, and katallagē, with its corresponding meaning) generally denotes in classical Gk. the restoration of the original understanding between people after hostility or displeasure (Xen., Anab. 1, 6, 1; Eur., Helena 1235; Aristotle, Oeconomica 1348b, 9). katallassō is rarely found in the sense of reconciliation in a religious setting (it occurs once in Soph., Ajax 744). It is not a term that can be used of propitiatory rites: in general the thought of a personal relationship to God is far removed from Gk. thought, as is also any forensic concept of a relationship with God.

OT The words of this group are rare in the LXX. In the canonical books they appear in their original sense, or in one closely associated therewith. katallassō is found only at Jer. 48(31):39, for ḥātāh, to be shattered, dismayed; and without Heb. equivalent at 2 Macc. 1:5; 7:33; 8:29; katallagē only at Isa. 9:4(5) where it deviates from the Heb. text and is hard to understand, and at 2 Macc. 5:20. diallassō stands for various vbs. in Job (12:20, 24, sūr hiph., to remove; pārār hiph. break, frustrate, 5:20; similarly apallassō for various vbs. in 9:34; 5:12, to destroy; cf. 7:15; 9:12; 10:19; 27:5; 34:5). See also Exod. 19:22; 1 Sam. 14:29; 22:1; Jer. 32(39):31; 3 Macc. 6:30; 4 Macc. 9:16. antallagma means price (m^eḥr̄, 1 Ki. 21(20):2; Job 28:15; Jer. 15:13); a change (ḥ^alīpāh, Ps. 55[54]:19); ransom price (kōper, Amos 5:12); exchange (t^emūrāh, Ruth 4:7). There is no corresponding Heb. in Ps.

89(88):57; Sir. 6:15; 26:14; 44:17. Later rabbinic usage is anticipated in 1 Sam. 29:4, where diallassomai deviates from its original sense to mean to make oneself acceptable. In translating the language of atonement taken from the technical priestly vocabulary, the LXX prefers similar cultic terms like ekkathairō, purify (→ Pure, art. katharos), frequently exhilaskomai, atone, expiate, or propitiate (→ hilaskomai for atonement and reconciliation in the OT). katallassō and its derivatives are not found at all in cultic and priestly contexts.

2. Judaism has a mood of repentance all its own (cf. the large number of penitential prayers). Confession of sins and repentance are means by which reconciliation with God is sought, i.e. the restoration of his favour. Thus katallassō appears with reference to God in 2 Macc. 1:5; 7:33; 8:29. Often the OT proclamation of the grace of God is here foreshortened (cf. e.g. Ps. 62[61]:12 with Prov. 24:12; Sir. 16:12). When the fulfilment of the → law becomes a means to the end of achieving → righteousness before God, the thought of reconciliation can find itself in close proximity with that of reward. katallassō and cognates are not unfamiliar, but are not very frequently found.

NT In the NT katallassō occurs only in the sense of to reconcile, or (passive) to be reconciled. It is used of the reconciliation of men with one another (1 Cor. 7:11; in the same sense diallassomai in Matt. 5:24), and of their relationship with God (only in Paul: Rom. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:18–20; in Col. 1:20, 22 and Eph. 2:16 apokatallassō in the same sense). katallagē is also found in the sense of reconciliation (only in Paul: Rom. 5:11; 11:15; 2 Cor. 5:18, 19).

apallassō occurs in the act., meaning to free (Heb. 2:15), and in the passive or middle to get free, be released, settle with (Lk. 12:58; Acts 19:12). Similarly we find in their original sense metallassō (Rom. 1:25, 26) and the simple form allassō (Acts 6:14; Gal. 4:20; Heb. 1:12; Rom. 1:23; on 1 Cor. 15:51 f. → Resurrection, art. anastasis). antallagma, ransom money, is found only at Mk. 8:37 par. Matt. 16:26.

1. katallassō and katallagē occur only rarely in the NT even in Paul who is the sole NT writer to use these terms. Nevertheless, these words are among the basic concepts of Pauline theology. They serve to give greater theological and christological precision to Christ and his work than such soteriological concepts generally found in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts like → forgiveness (Gk. aphiēmi).

2. The subject of the reconciliation is God (2 Cor. 5:18 f.). This is the theological novelty in comparison with non-Christian religious thought, which knows the deity only as the object of the reconciling work of man. At the same time it is consistent with the OT message of God as the “merciful” and “gracious” one, who reveals “steadfast love” and “faithfulness” as belonging to his very being (Exod. 34:6 f.; cf. Ps. 103[102]:8 ff.), and who promises forgiveness and restoration of the → covenant as his sovereign work (Isa. 43:25; 54:7 ff.; Jer. 31:31 ff.). The katallagē created by God is thus a completed act which precedes all human action. “For if while we were enemies we were reconciled [katēllagēmen] to God by the death of his Son, much more now that we are reconciled [katallagentes], shall we be saved by his life” (Rom. 5:10). Man was thus an → enemy before the reconciliation took place. A fortiori the resurrection of Jesus is the guarantee of salvation. Human action, including even repentance and confession of sins, is not a work of man to bring about and initiate reconciliation, to which God reacts. Rather is it the reaction of man, and as such necessary and demanded. That this is the state of affairs is confirmed further by Paul's characteristic order of indicative followed by imperative, which starts out from the act of God as the matter of primary importance, the good news which must be proclaimed as already complete. It is the ground of the believer's → joy in God: "Not only so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received our reconciliation [tēn katallagēn]" (Rom. 5:11).

3. The reconciliation has been effected by the work of Christ. As we have already seen, Rom. 5:10 f. speak of its connexion with his death and with his resurrection. As the effect of this work, reconciliation is an expression of the new situation which this work has brought about, and which Paul usually indicates in terms like dikaioō, justify, dikaioōsynē, righteousness, which are judicial terms (→ Righteousness). The fact that katallassō and katallagē can be used in parallel with these terms (cf. Rom. 5:9 with 5:10; and 2 Cor. 5:19 with Rom. 4:3 ff.) indicates the central place that they have in the preaching and theology of Paul. The katallagē is the expression of the transformation of the relationship (of enmity) between God and man, which has been brought about by the new → Adam (Rom. 5:12 ff.), Jesus Christ.

Perhaps the central theme of Rom. is the place of the Jewish nation in the divine economy of salvation. This explains why Paul is anxious to demonstrate from the OT scriptures that salvation has always been by grace through faith (cf. chs. 3 f.) and to show that the rôle of the → law was never intended to be a means of self-salvation (cf. chs. 2 f. with 7 f.). In chs. 9–11 Paul returns to the question whether God has forsaken Israel for ever in view of their rejection of Christ. In Rom. 11:15 he gives his answer in terms of reconciliation: "For if their rejection means the reconciliation of the world [katallagē kosmou], what will their acceptance mean but life from the dead?" The world here means the Gentiles (cf. M. Black, Romans, New Century Bible, 1973, 144). Black suggests that resurrection here is of the kind envisaged by the Targum on Hos. 6:2 ff. which included the resurrection of the faithful elect, both Jew and Gentile. The argument proceeds a fortiori from the Jewish rejection of Jesus; the unuttered premise is the unsearchable wisdom and love of God who will in his good time bring about his own purposes (cf. Rom. 11:33–36).

4. As God's unilateral act in Christ, reconciliation is his → gift, and the ministry of reconciliation is spoken of in these terms in 2 Cor. 5:18. Having depicted the act of new creation which takes place when a man is "in Christ" (→ New, art. kainos NT 2 (c)), Paul writes: "All this is from God, who through Christ reconciled us to himself [katallaxantos hēmas heautō] and gave us the ministry of reconciliation [dontos hēmin tēn diakonian tēs katallagēs]; that is, God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself [kosmon katallassōn heautō], not counting their trespasses against them [mē logizomenos autois ta paraptōmata auton], and entrusting to us the message of reconciliation [kai themenos en hēmin ton logon tēs katallagēs]. So we are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us. We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God [katallagēte tō theō]. For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin [ton mē gnonta hamartian hyper hēmōn hamartian epoiesen], so that in him we might become the righteousness of God [hina hēmeis genōmetha dikaiosynē theou en autō]" (2 Cor. 5:18–21).

Commenting on the reconciliation mentioned in v. 18, C. K. Barrett points out that reconciliation "is closely related to justification, and thus leads directly to the mention of God's righteousness in verse 21. To reconcile is to end a relation of enmity, and to substitute for it one of peace and goodwill. It is not necessarily implied that the enmity existed on one side only, but it is plainly stated that in this case the initiative to reconciliation was God's who found in the death of his Son (Rom. iii. 25 f.) a way in which his love for the sinner and his wrath against sin could be accommodated, so that he might both be righteous himself, and justify the man – the sinful man – who relies on faith in Jesus" (The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 175),

The ministry of reconciliation might be contrasted with that of the Qumran community which believed that by its obedience to the Torah it made atonement for the whole land (1QS 8:5–10; → hilaskomai or 4). There is at least a triple contrast: in the case of the Qumran community, the atonement affects only the land of Israel, whereas that brought about by Christ affects mankind; in the case of Qumran, it was the obedience of men, whereas with God it is nothing less than the death of his Son in the place of sinful man; in the case of Qumran it is something that man does, whereas the reconciliation wrought by Christ is the work of God himself. But the ministry of reconciliation does not end there. It has to be proclaimed and received. Elsewhere Paul defined his task in terms of preaching the word of the → cross (1 Cor. 1:8). It is the message of God's love for sinners and reconciliation (Rom. 5:8 ff.). What Paul calls "the message of reconciliation" (2 Cor. 5:19) is the → gospel itself. And the proclamation of the gospel is laid on the whole church. At the same time, it may be noted that the appeal to "be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20b) is addressed to the → church. The church, no less than the world (v. 19), needs to enter into this reconciliation and live it out.

On the grammatical questions raised by 2 Cor. 5:19 see C. K. Barrett, op. cit., 176 f., who points out that, "The only new thought (as we move from verse 18 to 19) is that us is expanded into the world; this says no more than verse 14, he died on behalf of all. The absence of the article (kosmon katallassōn) has the effect of emphasizing the nature rather than the particularity of the object of the verb – it was the whole world he reconciled – including perhaps the rebellious powers of Col. i. 19 f."

In 2 Cor. 5:19 reconciliation is understood as justification. It is expressed first of all negatively ("not counting their trespasses against them"). There may be a play on words between the participle used here logizomenos and the word translated by the RSV as "message" (logos; cf. 1 Cor. 1:18; → Word). The same vb. is used in Rom. 4:3–8 in the context of justification, where Paul argues from OT passages that justification comes about when God does not reckon iniquities to man, but reckons him righteous by faith (cf. Rom. 4:3 with Gen. 15:6; Gal. 3:6; Jas. 2:23; and Rom. 4:7 with Ps. 32[31]:1 f.). It is expressed positively in v. 21, where Christ is said to have assumed our sin so that "we might become the righteousness of God." This is no legal fiction. For in Christ the believer actually assumes his righteousness, just as Christ assumed the believer's sin. "Since transgressions no longer counted against men (cf. Exod. xxix. 10) the way was open for reconciliation; nothing remained but for men to take it. This however they could not do unless they were informed of the possibility now open to them" (Barrett, op. cit., 177).

The word translated as "ambassadors" in v. 20 is actually the 1st person plur. of the vb., and C. K. Barrett appropriately translates the phrase "We therefore act as ambassadors [presbeuomen]." The same vb. is found at Eph. 6:20, where having asked for prayer to proclaim boldly the mystery of the gospel Paul adds "for which I am an ambassador [presbeuō] in chains; that I may declare it boldly, as I ought to speak" (→ Bishop, art. presbyteros). In Phlm. 9 the noun presbytēs is used: "yet for love's sake I prefer to appeal to you – I, Paul, an ambassador and now a prisoner also for Christ Jesus." Elsewhere Paul thinks of himself as a kēryx, herald (1 Tim. 2:7; 2 Tim. 1:11; cf. also 2 Pet. 2:5; → Proclamation, art. kēryssō). The loftier concept of ambassador presents an even more marked contrast with Paul's outward circumstances (cf. 2 Cor. 2:14 ff.; 11:1–12:10). But it is particularly appropriate in the present context. For Paul and his colleagues are acting "on behalf of Christ [hyper Christou]", in his interest, virtually in his stead, for Christ is no longer physically present with his church. It is "as if [hōs]" God were exhorting the readers through Paul (on parakaleō → Exhort). The substance of this exhortation ("be reconciled to God") draws attention to the fact that reconciliation is incomplete until it is accepted by both sides. Moreover, it needs to be realized by those who are already in the church and who presumably have made some form of profession of faith. These verses throw light on Paul's concept of his → apostleship, both in terms of the content of his message and in terms of his activity both within and without the church.

The content of Paul's apostolic message of reconciliation is definitively expressed in v. 21 which sets it out in a parallelism which exhibits chiasmus (Barrett, op. cit., 179; cf. J. Jeremias, Abba, 1966, 278):

a	b	c	d
ton̄ mē gnonta hamartian "him who knew not sin"	hyper hēmōn "for our sake"	hamartian "sin"	epoiēsen "he made"

hina
"that"

a	d	c	b
hēmeis "we"	genōmetha "might become"	dikaiosynē theou "the righteousness of God"	en autō "in him"

On the sinlessness of Christ and the messiah see Rom. 8:3; Jn. 8:46; cf. Pss.Sol. 17:40 f.; Test.Jud. 24:1; Test.Lev. 18:9. It is further implied in the narratives of Jesus' baptism (Matt. 3:13–17, especially 14 f. par. Mk. 1:9 ff., Lk. 3:21; Jn. 1:29–34). Yoma 22b speaks of a one-year-old child that has not tasted sin. "It is only as sinless that Christ can, in Paul's view, bear the sins of others. . . . Paul does not say, for by definition it would not have been true, that Christ became a sinner, transgressing God's law; neither does he say, for it would have contradicted all experience (not least in Corinth) that every believer becomes immediately and automatically morally righteous, good as God is good. He says rather that Christ became sin; that is, he came to stand in that relation with God which normally is the result of sin, estranged from God and the object of his wrath" (Barrett, op. cit., 180).

2 Cor. 5:21 occupies the same theological place in 2 Cor. as Rom. 3:25 does in Rom. The term hilastērion in the latter may be compared with the hamartia here, although Barrett rejects the suggestion that it might be translated "sin offering". O. Cullmann refers the verse to Isa. 53:6: "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the LORD has laid on him the iniquity of us all [LXX: kai kyrios paredōken auton tais hamartiais hēmōn]” (cf. O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963², 76). It may be too specific to say that Paul is thinking here of Christ as a “sin offering”. The normal LXX expression for “sin offering” is peri hamartias (e.g. Lev. 14:31 for ἁττᾶ’τ; Ps. 40:6[39:7] for ἡ’τᾶ’ᾗ; Isa. 53:10 for ’āsām; Lev. 9:2 for l’ḥattā’ṭ, “for a sin offering”). The term peri hamartias is actually found at Rom. 8:3, but commentators generally prefer to take it in the wider sense of “for sin” rather than the narrower one of a particular OT type of sacrifice (cf. C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975, 382). Nevertheless, the thought of both 2 Cor. 5:21 and Rom. 8:3 requires us to say that what Christ did on the cross comprehends and supersedes the OT sin offerings. In Gal. 3:13 f. Paul did not use the concept of reconciliation but expressed the atoning work of Christ on the cross in terms of the removal of the curse. The fact that Jesus died on the cross is itself proof that he bore the curse of God: “Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us – for it is written, ‘Cursed be every one who hangs on a tree’ – that in Christ Jesus the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith” (Gal. 3:13 f.; cf. Deut. 21:23 → Curse, art. anathema). Here again there is the thought of the benefit to others achieved by Christ in his death on their behalf. Although some scholars wish to see Christ’s action as that of a representative rather than of a substitute (cf. M. D. Hooker, “Interchange in Christ”, JTS New Series 22, 1971, 349–61), these verses make it impossible to see his work as representative without at the same time being vicarious.

5. The substance of the reconciliation lies in the ending of the enmity between God and man (Rom. 5:10), in that God “did not count their trespasses against them” (2 Cor. 5:19). Reconciliation consists therefore in the fact that “we have peace with God”, a phrase which is used in Rom. 5:1 to indicate the effect of justification (→ Peace, art. eirēnē). In this sense reconciliation is the precondition of our → salvation (Rom. 5:10b) and the basis for the all-embracing “new creation” (2 Cor. 5:17 ff.), which is clarified in Rom. 5:1 ff., “because God’s love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given to us” (v. 5b).

6. The “message of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5:19) is matched by the “ministry of reconciliation” (2 Cor. 5:18, 20; → Serve, art. diakoneō), in which the apostle himself is engaged. This cannot, after all that has gone before, mean any longer a cultic ministry designed to bring about reconciliation or to re-enact it, but rather reconciling activity in the everyday world and the call to accept the reconciliation as it is preached, i.e. a call to faith (v. 20).

7. Col. 1:20, 22 and Eph. 2:16 have instead of katallassō the otherwise unknown vb. apokatallassō; but this ties up with the above-mentioned Pauline use of katallassō and has, basically, the same meaning. “For in him all the fullness of God was pleased to dwell, and through him to reconcile to himself all things [di’ autou apokatallaxai ta panta eis auton], whether on earth or in heaven, making peace by the blood of his cross. And you, who once were estranged and hostile in mind, doing evil deeds, he has now reconciled in his body of flesh by his death [apokatellagēte en tō sōmati tēs sarkos autou dia tou thanatou], to present you holy and blameless and irreproachable before him” (Col. 1:19–22). There are here many of the features of reconciliation which we have seen in the earlier Pauline literature: the need for reconciliation; the fact that it is effected from God's side; the fact that it is not only that man needs to be reconciled to God, but that there is the estrangement caused by sin which has to be dealt with before God can be reconciled with man; that fact that it is the death of Christ referred to in terms of his "blood" and "cross"; and the purpose in presenting man as righteous before God. The ground of this victory in cancelling the debt of the law on the cross, thus depriving the principalities and powers of their hold on man, is further explained in Col. 2:13 ff. But to the thought that "God was in Christ" (2 Cor. 5:19) is added the thought that "in him all the fullness of God was pleased to dwell" (Col. 1:19; cf. 2:9; → Fullness, art. pleroō NT 5 (b)). Moreover, the scope of reconciliation is given a cosmic dimension. The passage may well be Paul's adaptation of a christological hymn, reflecting Jewish beliefs about angels and cosmic powers (cf. E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971, 59; R. P. Martin, "Reconciliation and Forgiveness in the Letter to the Colossians", in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 104–25). The passage presupposes a cosmic catastrophe caused by the powers of evil. He, who is the creator and sustainer of all, is he who has triumphed over the powers of evil on the cross and is therefore the reconciler of all (Col. 1:16 ff.; cf. 2:15). Within this cosmic context is set the reconciliation of believers (Col. 1:21 f.). But it should be noted that the reconciliation is conditional upon continuing in the faith (Col. 1:23).

Eph. 2:16 sees the reconciliation in the context of its effect on the relationship of Jews and Gentiles before God. The Gentiles were at one time "separated from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). But they have been "brought near in the blood of Christ" (Eph. 2:13). His death has, however, not only reconciled the Gentiles; it has also reconciled the Jews, providing a way of salvation to them which they did not have before. At the same time the act of reconciling Jew and Gentile to God reconciles them to each other and makes a new humanity. "For he is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility, by abolishing in his flesh the law of commandments and ordinances, that he might create in himself one new man in place of the two, so making peace, and might reconcile us both to God in one body through the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end [kai apokatallaxē tous amphoteros en henī sōmati tō theō dia tou staurou, apokteinas tēn echthran en autō]. And he came and preached peace to you who were far off and peace to those who were near; for through him we both have access in one Spirit to the Father" (Eph. 2: 14–18).

8. Reconciliation on a human level is discussed in two important passages. In 1 Cor. 7:10 f. Paul discusses the question of → divorce: "To the married I give charge, not I but the Lord, that the wife should not separate from her husband (but if she does, let her remain single or else be reconciled to her husband [ē tō andri katallagētō]) – and that the husband should not divorce his wife." The teaching is in line with Jesus' interpretation of the OT on this matter (Matt. 19:3–12, par. Mk. 10:2–12, Lk. 16:18; cf. Matt. 5:27–32; Deut. 24:1–4), and hence may properly be said to be a charge from the Lord. The use of two separate vbs. (chōrīsthē, of the wife, and aphienai of the husband, which was the normal term for divorce) might reflect the fact that in Judaism only the husband had the right to divorce (but on this see D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 362–65). In contrast with 1 Cor. 7:13–16, where Paul deals with the question of whether divorce should take place on the grounds that one party is a believer and the other is not, Paul's judgment here seems to refer to the question of divorce in general. His answer is that separation and divorce do not put the former partners outside the church. In the first instance, the two courses open are either to separate and remain single or to be reconciled. In the former case, it would seem that Paul recognizes that there are cases where there is no real alternative but for the break-up of a marriage. It may even be that both former partners remain in the church. The fact that a believer may find himself or herself married to an unbeliever is no grounds for separation, as the believing partner consecrates the other partner and provides the possibility of saving him or her (vv. 12–16). It is thus not a case for Paul of the believer having to separate himself from the unbeliever. Remarriage with a believer is a possibility that can certainly be contemplated after the death of the former partner (cf. v. 39). On the other hand, it is not a sin to marry, when one is "free" from a marriage partner (cf. vv. 27 f.; → Redemption, art. lyō NT 6 (f); → Separate, art. chōrizō).

The unique vb. diallassomai occurs in Matt. 5:24: "So if you are offering your gift at the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar and go; first be reconciled [diallagēthi] to your brother, and then come and offer your gift" (Matt. 5:23 f.). According to the Mishnah tractate Yoma, "For transgressions that are between man and God the Day of Atonement effects atonement; but for transgressions that are between a man and his fellow the Day of Atonement effects atonement only if he has appeased his fellow" (Yoma 8:9). But D. Hill claims that in contemporary Judaism this idea of reconciliation "was overshadowed by the desire to avoid desecrating the Temple or defiling one's self (cf. CD vi. 14–vii. 4)" (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 122). Jesus' teaching here is of a piece with his teaching on the two great commandments and the parable of the Good Samaritan which lay down man's vocation to love God with the whole of his being and at the same time to love his neighbour as himself (Matt. 22:34–40 par. Mk. 12:28–34; cf. Lk. 10:25–37; Deut. 6:4; Lev. 19:18; → Brother, art. plesion; → Command, art. entolē NT 1; → Hear, art. akouō NT 3; → Love, art. agapaō). The teaching of Matt. 5:23 f. clearly shows that no sacrifice is acceptable to God without repentance and reconciliation.

The following saying (Matt. 5:25 f.) is paralleled in Lk. 12:58 f.: "As you go with your accuser before the magistrate, make an effort to settle with him on the way [dos ergasian apēllachthai ap' autou; cf. Matt. isthi eunoon to antidiko sou tachy. "Make friends quickly with your accuser"], lest he drag you to the judge, and the judge hand you over to the officer, and the officer put you in prison. I tell you, you will never get out till you have paid the very last copper." The need for human reconciliation is parabolic of man's need of reconciliation with God (cf. also the parable of the unforgiving servant in Matt. 18:23–35). The context of Lk. brings this out even more clearly. The saying is preceded by Jesus' denunciation of those who pretend to be able to discern the weather but are unable to discern the times (Lk. 12:54 ff.). It is followed by the discussion of the Galileans butchered by Pilate and those killed by the fall of the tower of Siloam. Jesus draws the conclusion that they were no worse sinners than the rest on whom judgment had not yet fallen; "I tell you, No; but unless you repent you will all likewise perish" (Lk. 13: 3, 5). This is then followed by the parable of the fig tree which has failed to bear fruit, and is given just one more chance (Lk. 13: 6–9; → Fruit, art. sykē; cf. also Lk. 13:22–30). All this reinforces the point of Lk. 12:58 f. which is to come to terms with the accuser (Jesus with his message of repentance in view of the coming of the impending judgment), for when → judgment falls it will be irrevocable and relentless.

apallassō is found in the active transitive sense of free, release, deliver in Heb. 2:15 of the incarnation: “Since therefore the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise partook of the same nature, that through death he might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver [apallaxē] all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong bondage” (Heb. 2:14 f.). It also occurs in Lk. 9:40 D of release from an evil spirit. In Acts 19:12 it has a similar connotation and is used in the intransitive of diseases mentioned in parallel with evil spirits, which left people.

antallagma, that which is given in exchange, occurs only in Mk. 8:37: “For what can a man give in return for his life? [ti gar doi anthrōpos antallagma tēs psychēs autou]” (cf. par. Matt. 16:26). For what does it profit a man, to gain the whole world and forfeit his life?” The par. in Lk. 9:25 employs a circumlocution. The synoptic context is that of the call for complete renunciation as the pre-condition of discipleship and acceptance with the Father. “For whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake and the gospel’s will save it” (Mk. 8:35 f.; cf. par. Matt. 16:25 f.; Lk. 9:24 f.; Jn. 12:25). There is the implication that man can give nothing in exchange for his life, and therefore even to take up the → cross in utter self-abandonment is far more important than to gain the whole world. The Pharisaic work written shortly after A.D. 70, Syr. Bar., contains a similar saying: “For what, then, have men lost their life, and for what have those who were on earth exchanged their souls?” (51:15). But the saying also recalls Ps. 49:7 f., 15 (48:8 f., 16): “Truly no man can ransom [lytrōsetai] himself [v.l. “no man can ransom his brother], or give to God the price of his life [exhilasma], for the ransom of his life is costly [kai tēn timēn tēs lytrōseōs tēs psychēs autou], and can never suffice. . . . But God will ransom my soul [lytrōsetai tēn psychēn mou] from the power of Sheol, for he will receive me” (→ Redemption, arts. lyō and lytron). Like the other sayings in the Synoptic Gospels, the saying here does not offer a theology of reconciliation in the Pauline sense. Rather, it states in the sharpest possible terms man’s need for reconciliation, whilst implying at the same time that reconciliation is available to those who are concerned enough to seek it.

H. Vorländer, C. Brown

→ Anger, → Cross, → Forgiveness, → Holy, → Judgment, → Redemption, → Sacrifice, → Sin

(a). G. Aulén, Christus Victor: An Historical Study of the Three Main Types of the Idea of Atonement, 1931; B. W. Bacon, “The Festival of Lives given for the Nation in Jewish and Christian Faith”, Hibbert Journal 15, 1917, 256–78; D. M. Baillie, God Was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement, 1961²; C. K. Barrett, The Epistle to the Romans, BNTC, 1957; “The Background of Mark 10:45”, in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1959, 1–18; and The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973; K. Barth, CD IV, 1–3, The Doctrine of Reconciliation; G. C. Berkouwer, The Work of Christ, 1970; H. D. Betz, Galatians, Hermeneia, 1978; G. Bornkamm, “The Revelation of God’s Wrath (Romans 1–3)”, in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 47–70; and “The Revelation of Christ to Paul on the Damascus Road and Paul’s Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation”, in R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 90–103; F. F. Bruce, “Paul and Paulinism”, Vox Evangelica 7, 1971, 5–16; and Paul and Jesus, 1977; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; F. Büchsel, allassō etc., TDNT I 251–59; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 285 ff., 292–305; and “Adam and Christ according to Romans 5”, in W. Klassen and G. F. Snyder, eds., Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation: Essays in Honor of Otto A. Piper, 1962, 143–65; S. Cave, The Doctrine of the Work of Christ, 1937; L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, 1959; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, I, ICC, 1975; R. G. Crawford, “Is the Penal Theory of Atonement Scriptural?”, SJT 23, 1970, 257–72; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963²; R. W. Dale, The Atonement: The Congregational Union Lecture for 1875, 1896¹⁸; E. R. Dalglish, Psalms Fifty-One in the Light of Ancient and Near Eastern Patternism, 1962; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 1955²; J. Denney, The Death of Christ, 1902, revised by R. V. G. Tasker, 1950; The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation: The Cunningham Lectures for 1917, (1917) 1959; and The Atonement and the Modern Mind, 1903; F. W. Dillstone, The Significance of the Cross, 1945; Jesus and His Cross: Studies on the Saving Work of Christ, 1953; and The Christian Understanding of Atonement, 1965; N. Dimock, The Doctrine of the Death of Christ; in Relation to the Sin of Man, the Condemnation of the Law, and the Dominion of Satan, 1903²; C. H. Dodd, “hilaskesthai, its Cognates, Derivatives and Synonyms in the Septuagint”, JTS 32, 1931, 352–60 (reprinted with minor alterations in “Atonement”, The Bible and the Greeks, 1935, 82–95); The Epistle to the Romans, 1932; The Johannine Epistles, 1946; J. Downing, “Jesus and Martyrdom”, JTS New Series 14, 1963, 279–93; J. D. G. Dunn, “Paul’s Understanding of the Death of Jesus”, in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 125–41; E. E. Ellis, “Christ Crucified”, in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 69–75; P. T. Forsyth, The Cruciality of the Cross, 1909; and The Work of Christ, (1910) 1965; R. S. Franks, The Work of Christ; A Historical Study of Christian Doctrine, (1918) 1962; and The Atonement: The Dale Lectures for 1933, 1934; B. Gerhardsson, “Sacrificial Service and Atonement in the Gospel of Matthew”, in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 25–35; L. W. Grensted, A Short History of the Doctrine of the Atonement, 1920; L. W. Grensted, ed., The Atonement in History and in Life: A Volume of Essays, 1929; A. T. Hanson, “The Reproach and Vindication of the Messiah”, in Studies in Paul’s Technique and Theology, 1974, 13–66; M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross, 1977; J. Herrmann and F. Büchsel, hileōs etc., TDNT III 300–23; W. Herrmann, The Communion of the Christian with God, 1971; F. C. N. Hicks, The Fullness of Sacrifice: An Essay in Reconciliation, 1946³; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 23–48; H. A. Hodges, The Pattern of Atonement, 1955; L. Hodgson, The Doctrine of Atonement: The Hale Lectures, 1950, 1951; M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant, 1959; and “Interchange in Christ”, JTS New Series 22, 1971, 349–61; T. H. Hughes, The Atonement: Modern Theories of the Doctrine, 1949; J. Jeremias, The Central Message of the New Testament, 1965; R. J. Johnson, Sacrifice and Penitence in Israel, 1965; E. Käsemann, “The Saving Significance of the Death of Jesus in Paul”, Perspectives on Paul, 1971, 32–59; and “Some Thoughts on ‘The Doctrine of Reconciliation in the New Testament’”, in J. M. Robinson, ed., The Future of our Religious Past: Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, 1971, 49–64; O. Kaiser and R. Pesch, “Reconciliation”, EBT II 730–38; G. W. H. Lampe, Reconciliation in Christ, 1956; S. H. Langdon, “The Hebrew Word for ‘Atone’”, ExpT 22, 1910–11, 320–27; E. Lohse, History of the Suffering and Death of Jesus Christ, 1967; and Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971; W. R. Maltby, Christ and His Cross, 1935; T. W. Manson, “HILASTERION”, JTS 46, 1945, 1–10; I. H. Marshall, “The Development of the Concept of Redemption in the New Testament”, in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 153–69; and The Work of Christ, 1971; R. P. Martin, “Reconciliation and Forgiveness in Colossians”, in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 104–24; Colossians: The Church’s Lord and the Christian’s Liberty, 1972; and Colossians and Philemon, New Century Bible, 1974; J. Macdonald, The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964; R. C. Moberly, Atonement and Personality, 1901; J. Moltmann, The Crucified God, 1974; L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, (1955) 1965³; “The Meaning of hilasterion in Romans iii. 25”, NTS 2, 1955–56, 33–43; and The Cross in the New Testament, 1967; J. K. Mozley, The Doctrine of Atonement, 1915; J. Murray, Redemption – Accomplished and Applied, 1955; and The Epistle to the Romans, NLC, I–II, 1960–65; R. R. Nicole, “C. H. Dodd and the Doctrine of Propitiation”, WTJ 17, 1955, 117–57; A. Oepke, apokathistēmi, apokatastasis, TDNT I 387–93; J. I. Packer, “What Did the Cross Achieve? The Logic of Penal Substitution”, TB 25, 1974, 3–45; R. S. Paul, The Atonement and the Sacraments: The Relationship of the Atonement to the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, 1961; S. Perubčan, Sin in the Old Testament, 1963; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; H. Rashdall, The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology, Being the Bampton Lectures for 1915, 1919; H. N. Ridderbos, “The Earliest Confession of the Atonement in Paul”, in R. J.

Banks, ed., op. cit., 76–89; A. B. Ritschl, A Critical History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, 1872; and The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, (1900) 1966; H. W. Robinson, The Cross of the Servant, 1926; and The Cross in the Old Testament, 1955; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion, 1977; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, 1961, 126–67; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Salvation: A Study of the Atonement, 1971; D. Sölle, Christ the Representative: An Essay in Theology after "The Death of God", 1967; E. Speiser, "Ritual Expiation in Mari and Israel", BASOR 149, 1958, 17–25; K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles, and Other Essays, 1977; G. B. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 1905; A. M. Stibbs, The Meaning of the Word "Blood" in Scripture, 1954²; V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice: A Study of the Passion Sayings in the Gospels, 1937; Forgiveness and Reconciliation: A Study of New Testament Theology, 1941; and The Atonement in New Testament Teaching, (1940) 1958³; S. H. Travis, Divine Retribution in the Thought of Paul (Dissertation, Cambridge), 1970; H. E. W. Turner, The Meaning of the Cross, 1959; B. B. Warfield, "The New Testament Terminology of Redemption", Princeton Theological Review 15, 1917, 201–49; M. Warren, Interpreting the Cross, 1966; J. S. Whale, Victor and Victim: The Christian Doctrine of Redemption, 1960; D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul, 1974² 130–54; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974, 60 ff.; B. G. Worrall, "Substitutionary Atonement in the Theology of James Denney", SJT 28, 1975, 341–57; F. M. Young, "Sacrifice", ExpT 86, 1974–75, 305–9; and Sacrifice and the Death of Christ, 1975.

(b). D. von Allmen, "Réconciliation du Monde et Christologie cosmique, de II Cor. 5:14–21 à Col. 1:15–23", Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 48, 1968, 32–45; P. Althaus, Die letzten Dinge, 1949⁹; C. Andresen and P. Althaus, "Wiederbringung Aller", *RGG*³ VI 1693 ff.; E. Bammel, "Zum jüdischen Märtyrerkult", TLZ 78, 1953, 119–26; H. Beintker, "Versöhnung", EKL III 1652 ff.; H. Braun, Gerichtsgedanke und Rechtfertigungslehre bei Paulus, Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament 19, 1930; J. Clavier, "Notes sur un Mot-clef du Johannisme et de la Sotériologie biblique: Hilasmos", NovT 10, 1968, 287 ff.; P. Cornehl, Die Zukunft der Versöhnung, 1971; J. Dupont, La Réconciliation dans la Théologie de Saint Paul, 1953; G. Fitzner, "Der Ort der Versöhnungslehre nach Paulus", TLZ 22, 1966, 161 ff.; J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann and P. Stuhlmacher, eds., Rechtfertigung. Festschrift für Ernst Käsemann zum siebzigsten Geburtstag, 1976; W. Fürst, "2 Kor. 5, 11–21. Auslegung und Meditation", EvTh 28, 1968, 221 ff.; H. Gollwitzer, Von der Stellvertretung Gottes. Zum Gespräch mit D. Sölle, (1967) 1968²; L. Goppelt, "Versöhnung durch Christus", Lutherische Monatshefte 6, 1967, 263 ff.; J. Herrmann, Die Idee der Sühne im Alten Testament, 1905; S. Herner, Sühne und Vergebung in Israel, 1942; H. J. Iwand, "Zur Versöhnungslehre", in Das tat Gott. 50 Jahre Bahnau, 1956, 208 ff. (reprinted in Um den rechten Glauben, ThB 9, 1965, 214 ff.); and Predigtmeditationen, 1963, 547 ff. (on 2 Cor. 5:19 ff.); M. Kähler, Zur Lehre von der Versöhnung, (1898) 1937; E. Käsemann, "Zur Verständnis von Römer 3, 24–26", ZNW 43, 1950–51, 150 ff. (reprinted in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, I, 1968⁵, 96 ff.); K. Koch, "Sühne und Sündenvergebung um die Wende von der exilischen zur nachexilischen Zeit", EvTh 26 (Neue Folge 21), 1966, 217 ff.; W. Kreck, Die Zukunft des Gekommenen, (1961) 1966², 139 ff.; G. Lanczkowski et al., "Versöhnung", *RGG*³ VI 1367 ff.; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht. Untersuchungen zur urchristlichen Verkündigung vom Sühntod Jesu Christi, FRLANT 46, 1955; S. Lyonnet, "De Notione Expiationis", Verbum Domini 36, 1958, 129–48; ibid. 37, 1959, 336–52; ibid. 38, 1960, 65–75, 241–61; and "L'Hymne christologique de l'Épître aux Colossiens et la Fête juive du Nouvel An", RSR 48, 1960, 92–100; F. Maas, kāpar, THAT I 842–58; Die Mauer ist abgebrochen. Zur Predigt der Versöhnung. Hirtenbrief der niederländisch-reformierten Kirche, 1968; A. Merx, Der Messias oder Taëb der Samaritaner, 1909; W. Michaelis, Die Versöhnung des Alls, 1950; J. Michl, "Die 'Versöhnung' (Kol. 1, 20)", ThQ 128, 1948, 442–62; J. Moltmann, "Gott versöhnt und macht frei", EvKomm 3, 1970, 515 ff.; L. Moraldi, Espiazione sacrificiale e riti espiatori nell' ambiente biblico e nell' AT, 1956; F. Mussner, Christus, das All und die Kirche. Studien zur Theologie des Epheserbriefes, Trierer Theologische Studien 5, 1955; A. Nygren, Die Versöhnung als Gottestat, 1932; J. J. Stamm, Erlösen und Vergeben im Alten Testament, 1940; Versöhnung. Das deutsch-russische Gespräch über das christliche Verständnis der Versöhnung, Herausgegeben vom Aussenamt der Evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands, Studienheft 5, 1967; B. N. Wambacq, "'per eum reconciliare . . . quae in caelis sunt' (Col. 1, 20)", RB 55, 1948, 35–42; O. Weber, "Das dogmatische Problem der Versöhnungslehre", EvTh 26 (Neue Folge 21), 1966, 258 ff. (reprinted in Die Treue Gottes und die Kontinuität der menschlichen Existenz, 1967, 82 ff.).

Redemption, Loose, Ransom, Deliverance, Release, Salvation, Saviour

Whenever men by their own fault or through some superior power have come under the control of someone else, and have lost their freedom to implement their will and decisions, and when their own resources are inadequate to deal with that other power, they can regain their freedom only by the intervention of a third party. In the NT, depending on the aspect envisaged, the Gk word-groups associated with lyō, sōzō, rhyomai, are used to express such intervention. lyō, to free (42 times in the NT) is used to express liberation from bonds or by payment of a ransom (lytron), but it has other shades of meaning which are also discussed here. sōzō (106 times in the NT) is the commonest term and has the widest range of meaning. Predominantly it means to save, preserve and rescue. The least used, rhyomai (16 times), has the narrowest range of meaning, i.e. to rescue, deliver, and thus save from a threatening or acute danger. sōter, derived from sōzō, means deliverer, saviour, and was in general use to denote someone who so acted. Hence it is used in the NT as a title of honour for God and Christ. In the NT these terms are used pre-eminently of the redemptive work of Christ.

λύω	λύω (lyō), to loose, untie, set free, release, annul, abolish; λύσις (lysis), release, divorce; καταλύω (katalyō), destroy, demolish, abolish; κατάλυμα (katalyma), lodging, guest room; ἀκατάλυτος (akatalytos), indestructible; ἐκλύω (eklyō), become loose, become weary, become weak; ἀπολύω (apolyō), set free, release, discharge, pardon, let go, send away, dismiss, divorce.
-----	--

CL lyō (from Homer onwards) means to loose, make free. When used with a personal object it means to set free, ransom, both literally and metaphorically. The meaning to dissolve gives the further sense of to destroy. Already in Homer (Od. 5, 397; 13, 321) it was used of the salvation which the gods give to men, e.g. from difficulties and need, but without any recognizable link with → sin. Numerous compound forms are found in cl. Gk. W. Mundle

OT The LXX uses lyō to translate 7 different Heb. vbs. The most common is pātah (7 times in the qal, niphil and piel) which is the regular vb. for to open (Gen. 42:27; Job 39:5; Ps. 102[101]:20; Isa. 5:27; 14:17; 58:6; Jer. 40[47]:4). It stands twice for nātar in the hiphil, meaning to free, loose those in bondage (Pss. 105[104]:20; 146[145]:7); and twice for nāšal, draw off sandals (Exod. 3:5; Jos. 5:15). In the Arām. section of Daniel it stands for š^erā', as a past participle meaning loosed (Dan. 3:92[25] LXX and Theod.), and fig. to loosen knots, i.e. solve difficulties (Dan. 5:12). It stands for rāšāh in the niphil which means to be pleased with, accept favourably, in Isa. 40:2, in the message to Jerusalem that her iniquity is pardoned. It also occurs once each for nāšā', lift up, take away, of the Lord taking away sins because of Job (Job 42:9); and š^etar, of the destruction of the house of God (Ezr. 5:12; the other reading has katelysen). It has no Heb. equivalent in 1 Esd. 1:55; 9:13, 46; Tob. 3:17; Jud. 6:14; 9:2; Job 39:2; Sir. 28:2; 3 Macc. 1:4; 6:27, 29; 4 Macc. 3:11; 7:13; 12:8 f.

katalyō is used 39 times for 14 Heb. equivalents but is generally without particular theological significance. It frequently stands for lûn and lîn, lodge, pass the night, especially in historical narratives (e.g. Gen. 19:2; 24:23; Num. 22:8; Ruth 4:14; 2 Sam. 17:8). It is seldom used with the meaning to pull down (Ezr. 5:12 v.l., see above; 2 Ki. 25:10 for nāṭas), or to dissolve, abolish (2 Macc. 2:22).

eklyō stands for 19 different Heb. vbs. It commonly has the meaning of losing one's strength, letting one's heart faint, of relaxing one's hands or allowing them to become feeble (e.g. Deut. 20:3; Jos. 10:6; 18:3; 2 Sam. 4:1; 2 Chr. 15:7; Isa. 13:7; 29:9; Jer. 4:31; Lam. 2:12, 19; Ezek. 7:17). However, in Job 19:25 it stands for gā'al, redeem, act as a kinsman, in a participial form used as a noun, i.e. redeemer: "For I know that my Redeemer [MT gō'ālī; LXX ho eklyein me mellōn] lives, and at last he will stand upon the earth [lit. "dust" as RSV mg.; MT 'al-'apar; but LXX epi gēs, as RSV]." The gō'el in Heb. was the kinsman redeemer, who as the closest relation was the avenger of blood, the one who had to redeem the blood of the murdered victim, buy back family possessions, redeem from bondage, and take a kinsman's widow (→ lytron OT 1(c)). The translation of Job 19:25 f. is notoriously difficult (for a review of interpretations see J. Speer, ZAW 25, 1905, 47 ff.; and H. H. Rowley, From Moses to Qumran, 1963, 179 ff.). Rowley thinks that the term "vindicator" is more appropriate than "redeemer" here. For the context is not concerned with deliverance from Sheol but with the vindication of Job's name before men (Job, New Century Bible, 1970, 172). The verse may take up the thought of Job 16:19: "Even now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and he that vouches for me is on high." Job is thinking of God himself as his gō'el. The same Heb. word is used of God in Ps. 19:14 (MT v. 15; LXX 18:15): "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my rock and my redeemer [MT šûrī w'gō'ālī; LXX boēthe mou kai lytrōta mou]." In both cases the main emphasis is on vindication and help. Whether there is also an element of buying back will depend on the degree to which it is possible to speak of this factor in the general idea of the gō'el. However, there is the implication in the idea that the gō'el rescues that which was forfeited and restores justice to those who are not in a position to help themselves.

There has been considerable debate as to whether Job 19:25 f. looks to a life after death and even some form of → resurrection. V. 26 reads: "and after my skin has thus been destroyed [MT w'ahar 'ōrī niqq'pū zō't; LXX anastēsai to derma mou to anatlōn tauta] then from my flesh I shall see God [MT ûmibb 'šarī 'eh 'zeh 'elōah; LXX para gar kyriou tauta moi synētelesthē]" (RSV mg.). The difficulties of the Heb. are reflected in the LXX translation which gives quite a different rendering: "For I know that he is eternal, who is about to dissolve me on earth, to raise this skin of mine which draweth up these things" (Job 19:25 f. LXX).

In the first half of the verse the vb. translated as "destroyed" is the Heb. nāqāp in the niphal, and means lit. "they have struck off". This could be a reference to the ravages of disease. There is no justification in the text for the AV's insertion of "worms" as the subject of the vb. The meaning of ûmibb'šarī is equally disputed. The prep. min which is incorporated in the word means "from". This is taken by the RSV tx. to mean "without". But "in" (AV) is also possible. Thus the second half of the v. could mean either that Job expected to see God, his redeemer, in his flesh, i.e. in his lifetime, or that Job expected to see God without his flesh, i.e. in an after-life. The allusion to an after-life is questioned by those who claim that man in the OT had no firm expectations of → life after → death. The idea of some kind of incorporeal existence is also questioned by those who claim that it is unthinkable for OT man to conceive of a bodiless existence. Therefore, some form of resurrection life is envisaged here. (On this question generally see H. H. Rowley, "Death and Beyond", in The Faith of Israel, 1956, 150–76.)

In view of the difficulties of the verse, Rowley thinks it unlikely that we shall be able to achieve any convincing reconstruction within the limits of our present knowledge. "That it is in its original form is very improbable. To remove any trace of the thought of resurrection is as improper as it is to strengthen it. Two things seem to be clear. Job is assured that his Vindicator will arise to vindicate his innocence, and that he himself will see God. If, as seems probable, the Vindicator is God, this means that he will be aware of his vindication. That this vindication is not expected until after Job's death is likely, since he has cried for his blood to demand satisfaction. But in what form Job will be conscious of vindication must remain obscure" (Job, 174). Perhaps two further points may be added. On the one hand, although Job was vindicated by God (cf. Job 41), he did not actually → see God in any literal sense. On the other hand, seeing God is not something that man can do in this life according to the OT (cf. Exod. 33:20, 23).

NT 1. In the NT lyō is used in the lit. sense of untying the thong of a sandal (Mk. 1:7 par. Lk. 3:16; Jn. 1:27; Acts 13:25, John the Baptist speaking of Jesus; cf. Acts 7:33 with Exod. 3:5, of Moses by the burning bush), untying the ass's colt (Matt. 21:2 par. Mk. 11: 2, 4, 5; Lk. 19:30 f., 33), and of removing Paul's bonds (Acts 22:30). In Jn. 11:44 it is used of the unbinding of Lazarus from his grave-clothes. It is found in a weakened sense in Acts 13:43 of being released from the synagogue; cf. RSV "when the meeting of the synagogue broke up" (this rendering may be related to 4 below).

2. The sense of setting free, untying and thus loosing is applied to → angels (Rev. 9:14 f.) and → Satan (Rev. 20:3, 7). In the former case the context is the vision of the sixth angel with a trumpet who is commanded: "Release the four angels who are bound at the great river Euphrates.' So the four angels were released, who had been held ready for the hour, the day, the month, and the year, to kill a third of mankind." This causes a great, terrible army to be released. The river represents the boundary of Assyria and Babylon, the area from which the catastrophic invasions came in OT times. But in Rev. → Babylon represents the wicked world in its ongoing manifestations (cf. chs. 17 f.). The number four probably represents completeness. Possibly the angels are the same as in Rev. 7:1 who restrain the forces of nature. But this appears unlikely in view of the evil character of the angels here. As the angels are released, so too are the evil forces of destruction. The precise significance of the vision depends upon the way in which Rev. as a whole is interpreted. Some exegetes treat the visions as consecutive, in which case the vision refers to some specific event. But according to the parallelistic interpretation of Rev., the numerous series of visions relate to different aspects of ongoing history (→ Number, art. hepta NT 4). In this case the vision is that of God permitting war to afflict mankind down the ages with great destruction and loss of life. Nevertheless, the effect is not wholly negative. For it gives occasion for repentance, even though many do not take it (Rev. 9:20 f.). On the binding and loosing of Satan and the question of the millennium → Number, art. chilias NT 4.

3. Satan is mentioned in connexion with binding and loosing in Lk. 13:16 in the description of the woman bent with a spirit of infirmity for eighteen years. There is probably a play on words here which underlines the hypocrisy of those who complained that Jesus had healed on the → sabbath. For the same word is used of those who untie their oxen and asses to lead them to water on the sabbath (v. 15). Jesus put the question to them: “And ought not this woman, a daughter of Abraham whom Satan bound for eighteen years, be loosed from this bond on the sabbath day?”

The same vb. is used in the case of the healing of the deaf man with an impediment in his speech: “And his ears were opened, his tongue was released, and he spoke plainly” (Mk. 7:35; → Heal; → Deaf, Dumb; → Magic, art. mageia NT 5). V. Taylor sees in Mk.’s language no more than a figurative description of the cure (The Gospel according to St. Mark, 1955, 355). But A. Deissmann maintains that ho desmos tēs glōssēs, “the bond of the tongue”, was a technical expression illustrating the idea that such impediment of the speech was the work of demonic influences (Light from the Ancient East, 1927⁴, 304–8).

4. lyō has the sense of break, break up and thus destroy, in a number of passages. In Rev. 5:2 the scroll of ongoing history, held by God who is seated on his throne, is sealed with seven seals which no one is worthy to open and break (→ Number, art. hepta). However, “the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, has conquered, so that he can open the scroll and its seven seals” (Rev. 5:5; cf. chs. 6 f. for the opening of the seals).

Acts 27:41 tells of the breaking up of the stern of the ship on which Paul was bound for Rome, whereas Acts 13:43 refers to the breaking up of a meeting of the synagogue at Antioch in Pisidia. On Jn. 2:19 and Eph. 2:14 see 6 (b) below.

On 2 Pet. 3:10–12 which describes the final conflagration see J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and of Jude, BNTC, 1969, 363–68. Kelly suggests that the present passive participle in v. 11 (which he translates as “are disintegrating”) either “has a future force suggested by the context, or (more probably) the writer deliberately chooses it so as to highlight, by its suggestion that the process of dissolution has already started, the immediacy of his summons” (op. cit., 366). For the idea of the “elements” (stoicheia) melting cf. Isa. 34:4; 43:19; Test. Lev. 4:1; 2 Clem. 16:3. The proclamation of a → new → heaven and → earth goes back to Jesus himself (Matt. 19:28; cf. Mk. 14:25; Lk. 22:30). Paul saw the present creation as groaning in travail in expectation of a new order (Rom. 8:19–22). The new heaven and earth are pictured in Rev. 21 f. The vision of a new heaven and earth is proclaimed by Isa. 65:17; 66:22.

5. lyō in the sense of loosing or freeing from → death and → sin is found in Acts 2:24 and Rev. 1:5 respectively. In the former case it is applied to the resurrection of Jesus: “But God raised him up, having loosed the pangs of death [lysas tas ōdinas tou thanatou], because it was not possible for him to be held by it” (Acts 2:24). On the imagery of the cords of Sheol and death cf. 2 Sam. 22:6; Pss. 18:4 ff.; 116(114):3; Job 39:2 LXX.

Rev. 1:5 relates remission of sin to the death of Jesus in the phrase “and has freed us from our sins by his blood [kai lysanti hēmas ek tōn hamartiōn hēmōn en tō haimati autou]” (→ Blood; → Reconciliation). The AV follows the TR v.l. elousen (“washed us”) instead of the better attested elysen. This may have arisen through a failure to understand the Hebraic use of en (lit. “in” but here meaning “by”) to denote a price (Metzger, 731). Both ideas are paralleled elsewhere in the book:

washing robes in the blood of the → Lamb (Rev. 7:14); ransoming men by his blood (Rev. 5:9). But the context fits “the conception of redemption as a new exodus of the people of God. The beatitude of verse 4 itself expounds the name of God made known to Moses before the exodus. The doxology celebrates the greater redemption of which the first exodus is an anticipation. The sacrifice of the Lamb of God introduces an emancipation from the slavery of sin such as the sacrifice of the passover-lamb could only foreshadow” (G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 57).

6. lyō is found in a variety of senses in connexion with the institutions of Judaism. In each case the divine origin of the institution is recognized either explicitly or implicitly. But the coming of Jesus demands a fresh understanding in the form either of a renewed attitude to what still stands or the realization that what was formerly regarded as valid and binding is now superseded.

(a) The Sermon on the Mount contains the statement: “Think not that I have come to abolish the law and the prophets [mē nomisēte hoti ēlthon katalysai ton nomon ē tous prophētas]; I have come not to abolish them but to fulfil them [ouk ēlthon katalysai alla plērōsai]. For truly, I say to you, till heaven and earth pass away [parelthē], not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law until all is accomplished [iōta hen ē mia keraia ou mē parelthē apo tou nomou heōs an panta genētai]. Whoever then relaxes one of the least of these commandments and teaches men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven [hos ean oun lysē mian tōn entolōn toutōn tōn elachistōn kai didaxē houtōs tous anthrōpous elachistos klēthēsetai en tē basileia tōn ouranōn]; but he who does them and teaches them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I tell you, unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven” (Matt. 5:17–20).

T. W. Manson represents an older critical position on this passage. He sees no reason “why Jesus should not have uttered” the saying in v. 17 (which in form is paralleled by Matt. 10:34) (The Sayings of Jesus as Recorded in the Gospels according to St. Matthew and St. Luke, [1937] 1949, 153 f.). The passage is included in the Gospel because Palestinian Jewish Christians were sensitive to the Jewish attitude to the → law which was fundamental to the national heritage. “The difference between the teaching of Jesus and orthodox Jewish doctrine must be shown to be due not to heresy on the part of Jesus but to His deeper and fuller understanding of the Law. His pronouncements, so far from upsetting the Law, bring out its true meaning and purpose” (op. cit., 153). Manson shows that the attitude of Jesus here is essentially the same as that in Mk. 7:6–13; 10:1–12; 11:15–19; Lk. 11:45–52, in which Jesus upholds the intention and spirit of the law in contrast with the scribal interpretations which stultify its demands.

However, Manson thinks that the passage in its present form makes Jesus too sympathetic towards orthodox Judaism. He thinks that v. 18 cannot be attributed to Jesus in the light of such a passage as Mk. 10:1–12 (op. cit., 154). In reply, it may be pointed out that the latter passage which concerns → divorce is not critical of Moses in allowing divorce even though it implies violating the creation ordinance of marriage (Deut. 24:1–4; cf. Gen. 1:27; 2:24). Rather, the Mosaic law caters for a contingency brought about by man but which is contrary to the divine purpose in instituting marriage: "For the hardness of your heart he wrote you this commandment" (Mk. 10:5). Hence, Mk. 10:1–12 is not a proof of an attitude to the law on the part of Jesus different from the one attributed to him in this whole passage. His teaching on divorce upheld precisely the creation ordinance on marriage and Mosaic provision for divorce.

A parallel to Matt. 5:18 occurs in another context in Lk. 16:17, both of which passages Manson attributes to Q: "But it is easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than for one dot [keraiān] of the law to become void." The preceding verses in Lk. concern the law and the prophets being preached until John the Baptist, and the following verse pronounces as adultery any marriage contracted after divorce. Manson thinks that the Lucan form was nearer the original and that it was intended to be ironic, referring to the attitude of the scribes. He claims that the keraiā (EVV "tittle", "dot") was not in fact part of the law itself, but stood "most probably" for scribal ornaments added to certain Heb. letters (op. cit., 135; cf. SB I 248 f.). The rabbis gave them the terms qôṣṣâh or qôṣ, thorn, tāgā' or keter, crown, and n'qûddâh, point. The term "crown" would thus give added point to the idea of falling from the law. However, these strokes formed part of the actual consonantal letter and served to distinguish the one from the other. The iōta (EVV "jot", "dot", "iota") was the Heb. letter Yôḏ (y) which was the smallest letter of the Heb. alphabet (cf. SB I 247 f. for rabbinic pronouncements on the letter). The letter was often omitted in Heb. and Aram. texts. Another possibility for the keraiā is that it denotes the "hook (letter)", i.e. Wāw (w) which was also sometimes dispensed with (A. H. McNeile, The Gospel according to St. Matthew, 1915, 59). The Wāw, when placed in front of a word means "and". Both letters could also be used as vowels (Yôḏ = y; Wāw = ū, or = ô), but unlike other vowels they would be written in the unpointed text (i.e. the normal text of the time which was written with consonants only). How such a text is read (i.e. whatever vowels are read into the text) obviously can make a considerable difference to the meaning. Whatever particular ideas may lie behind these terms, Manson would seem to be wrong in his interpretation of the evidence presented by SB in thinking that the keraiā was a purely ornamental stroke which had no bearing on what the letter was actually meant to be. Although the stroke was a small one, it made a significant difference to the meaning of the text. And in view of what we know from elsewhere of Jesus' attitude to the law, the verse is best interpreted as an affirmation of the abiding significance of the law.

This last point is supported by the final statement of the verse about the necessity of fulfilment which is a recurrent theme especially in Matt. (→ Fullness, art. plērōō NT). The precise significance of this statement has been variously interpreted. The NEB gives the paraphrase: "till all that must happen has happened." W. D. Davies gives it an eschatological interpretation ("Matthew 5:17, 18", in Mélanges Bibliques en l'honneur d'A. Robert, 1957, 428–56; reprinted in Christian Origins and Judaism, 1962, 31–66, from which quotations are taken). Davies holds that the phrase heōs an panta genētai "in its present Matthaean form may well go back to Jesus" (op. cit., 65), and that it was not the Jewish-Gentile conflict of the early church which was responsible for this passage but the actual ministry and purpose of Jesus. Davies suggests that the phrase means: "that while this present order endures (ho ouranos kai hē gē) the old Law remains in force (although signs that it is to pass are already given during the Ministry and, indeed, for the new Messianic community it was already in process of passing), but once the obedience of Jesus has finally issued in death and the New Covenant has thus been fully inaugurated (because the Ministry itself is its partial inauguration) then the old Law ceases to have authority" (op. cit., 60 f.). The difficulty with this view is the strain it puts on the clause "till heaven and earth pass away" which it identifies with the period of time up to the death of Jesus. The phrase does indeed imply the continued validity of the law for the duration of the present order until whatever is in the law is accomplished. But it implies that the present order will continue until the end of time and not the death of Jesus which is not mentioned in the passage (cf. A. M. Honeyman, "Matthew v. 18 and the Validity of the Law", NTS 1, 1954–55, 141 f.). The comment of R. Banks on Matt. 5:17 appears to fit the context much better: "This 'fulfilment' takes place not in the first instance through his suffering and death as some have sought to maintain, but in his teaching and practice, though these, of course, ultimately culminated in the Cross. It is to that ministry that the Law 'prophetically' pointed, and it is only in so far as it has been taken up into that teaching and completely transformed that it lives on" (Jesus and the Law in the Synoptic Tradition, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 28, 1975, 242).

Manson suggests that lysē ("relaxes", i.e. "one of the least of these commandments", v. 19) represents the hiphil of nātar which means to free, untie, loose in the OT and also to permit, declare permitted (Shabb. 4a), and to free, surrender, outlaw, proscribe (San. 40b) in rabbinic Heb. The context suggests that the commandments referred to are those of the law (v. 18; cf. D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 118) rather than those of Jesus which follow (v. 41; cf. G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, 1946, 25f.). The Gk. text of Matt. contains a play on words between katalyō, destroy, demolish, do away with, abolish, and lyō, relax, which Hill paraphrases as "to show by example and teaching that a commandment was obsolete" (op. cit., 119). In v. 17 Jesus emphatically states that he has not come to katalysai the law and the prophets; in v. 19 he gives dire warning to anyone who would lysē the least of these commandments. V. 20 relates this to the scribes and Pharisees, and the Sermon proceeds to give examples of how commandments have been relaxed: murder and anger (Matt. 5:21 ff.; cf. Exod. 20:13; Deut. 5:17; 16:8); adultery and lust (Matt. 5:27 ff.; cf. Exod. 20:14; Deut. 5:18); divorce and adultery (Matt. 5:31 ff.; cf. Deut. 24:1–4; Matt. 19:9; Lk. 16:18; Mk. 10:11 f.; 1 Cor. 7:10 f.); swearing (Matt. 5:33–37; cf. Lev. 19:12; Num. 30:3; Deut. 23:21; Matt. 23:16–22; Jas. 5:12); justice and revenge (Matt. 5:38–42; cf. Exod. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21; Prov. 24:29; Lk. 6:29 f.; Rom. 12:17; 1 Pet. 2:19; 3:9); loving one's neighbour (Matt. 5:43 ff.; cf. Lev. 19:18; Prov. 25:21 f.; Lk. 6:27 f., 32–36 – the OT did not enjoin hating one's enemy, which was a mark of sectarian Judaism perhaps taught by a Targum, M. Smith, "Matt. v. 43: 'Hate Thine Enemy'", HTR 45, 1952, 71 ff.; W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount, 1964, 245 ff.). In all these points Jesus, far from relaxing the law, ratifies it and applies it to man's inner attitudes as well as his outward acts. For Jesus' teaching on the law elsewhere in Matt. see also 7:12; 11:13; 22:40. For his denunciation of those who make a mockery of the law by their hypocrisy see Matt. 15:1–11; 23:1–39.

A redaction-critical approach to this whole subject is given by G. Barth in "Matthew's Understanding of the Law", in G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, 58–164. Barth claims that Matt. 5:17 ff. “obviously stem from the Jewish-Christian congregation and are directed against a tendency to abandon the law, a representative place and a programmatic meaning. Along with the unabridged validity of the Torah the interpretation of the scribes is also axiomatically binding for him. This is seen in the antitheses that follow, where, above all, there is no question of setting Torah and scribal interpretation over against each other, but what was said ‘to them of old time’ is at times quoted in the form which was self-evident to the Jew, namely that which tradition gave to the word of Scripture. In fact, Matt. 23.2 grants to the scribes and Pharisees that they sit on the kathedra of Moses; their teaching is not attacked but declared to be binding (23.3). What is attacked is the discrepancy between what they teach and what they do, their hypocrisy (23.4 ff.; 6.1 ff.)” (op. cit., 24).

The difficulty with this view is that it is too wholesale. Although Barth goes on to take note of the criticism of tradition in Matt. 15:3–9 (par. Mk. 7:6–13, Lk. 11:39 ff.) which condemned the scribes and Pharisees not for failing to keep their tradition, but “for the sake of your tradition, you have made void the word of God” (Matt. 15:6, cf. 9 quoting Isa. 29:13 and par.), he fails to see the bearing of this for Matt.’s presentation of Jesus’ attitude to the law. Similarly he fails to appreciate the significance of Jesus’ denunciation of the → blind leaders of the blind (Matt. 15:14), and the warning against the → leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees (Matt. 16:6, 11) which he admits to be their teaching. If we study these later passages alongside Matt. 5, a consistent picture emerges. Jesus is presented not only as one who upholds the law, but as one who insists that the law must be rightly interpreted and applied. To that extent the true disciple is also a grammateus, scribe (Matt. 23:34), but one who has to be “trained for the kingdom of heaven”, so that he might bring out of his treasure things old and new (Matt. 13:52; → Possessions, art. thēsauros NT 1 (f); → Scribe, art. grammateus). The point is that not all interpretation and application are wrong. Jesus and the disciples engage in it. It is wrong, however, where it fails to bring out the true meaning of the law and when it substitutes human tradition for the word of God. Barth is clearly wrong in claiming that, according to Matt., scribal interpretation is “axiomatically binding”. The antitheses of Matt. 5 distinguish sharply between the intention of Scripture and accepted interpretations. The root difference between the two is formulated in Matt. 5:19 f. which focuses on two concepts. On the one hand, misguided interpretation is seen as relaxing (l̄ysē) the commandments. On the other hand, this is in the last analysis a question of → righteousness (dikaïosynē). A man’s attitude to the commandments determines his place in the kingdom; because of their attitude, which involves a fundamental lack of righteousness, the scribes and the Pharisees are excluded from the kingdom. Moreover, the disciple is not exempt from the same danger.

The phrase “least in the kingdom of heaven” may be compared with Paul’s description of himself as “the least of the apostles” (1 Cor. 15:9), but it is impossible to establish any literary interdependence. In any case, the underlying Aram. in Matt. could mean “little” (cf. also Matt. 11:11). Later rabbinic thought distinguished between “heavy” and “light” commandments (Sifre Deut. 187, 108b), but the more rigid school of Shammai refused to draw such a distinction (D. Hill, op. cit., 119; cf. Jas. 2:10). It is sometimes suggested that Matt.’s presentation of Jesus’ attitude to the law is designed to be an anti-Pauline counterbalance to Paul’s denigration of the law, whether the latter be real or apparent (on Paul's teaching → Law, art. nomos NT 2). But in fact there is an affinity between the two positions (cf. Matt. 5:17 f., 48; 22:40; with Rom. 3:31; 1 Cor. 2:6; Gal. 5:14; cf. A. W. Argyle, "M' and Paul", ExpT 81, 1969–70, 340 ff.). Moreover, Matt.'s presentation of Jesus' understanding of the law does not differ essentially from that presented by the other Gospels, as may be seen from the parallels already noted. Clearly, of all the evangelists, Matt. is the one most concerned to articulate Jesus' position on the law. But, as Banks concludes, "Matthew is not imposing upon the tradition a weight that it cannot bear, but merely drawing out the specific consequences of that which is present in it" (op. cit., 251).

(b) lyō is twice used in connexion with the → temple. In Jn.'s account of the cleansing of the temple the Jews ask for a sign of Jesus' authority. "Jesus answered them, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up [lysate ton naon touton kai en trisin hēmerais egerō auton]' " (Jn. 2:19). Commenting on the Jews' remark that the temple took forty-six years to build, Jn. points out that Jesus was referring to "the temple of his body" (v. 21), which the disciples understood after the resurrection and which in turn caused them to believe "the scripture and the word which Jesus had spoken" (v. 22). At his trial before the chief priests, elders and scribes, false witnesses claimed: "We heard him say this, 'I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another, not made with hands [egō katalysō ton naon touton ton cheiropoiēton kai dia triōn hēmerōn allon acheiropoiēton oikodomēsō]' " (Mk. 14:58; cf. the abbreviated par. Matt. 26:61 which also has katalysō). The destruction of the temple itself is foretold in Mk. 13:2 par. Matt. 24:2, Lk. 21:6. Dodd suggests that Jn.'s use of the imperative vb. with a conditional sense (i.e. "If you destroy . . .") and the unliterary en trisin hēmerais point to a primitive Semitic form of the saying (The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, 1953, 302). Bultmann points out that lyō and katalyō are often used for the destruction of buildings (Matt. 27:40; Mk. 13:2; 14:58; 15:29; Acts 6:14, referring to the false witnesses and the onlookers at the crucifixion) as is egerō for constructing them (The Gospel of John, 1971, 125). He suggests that there is more than just a conditional clause implied here; it is "cast in the ironic imperative of the prophetic style" (cf. Amos 4:4; Isa. 8:9 f.). The saying implies that Jesus' own person has already replaced the temple as the divinely appointed place of meeting between God and man. It further implies that Jewish disobedience is directly responsible for the destruction of this temple, just as it was for the destruction of the first one (2 Ki. 25:9, 13–17). It may be noted that it was the false witnesses who accused Jesus of threatening to destroy the temple. The theme of misunderstanding is a motif in Jn. (cf. 2:20; 3:3 f.; 4:10 ff., 32 f.; 6:32 ff.; 7:34 ff.; 14:4 f., 7 ff., 22 ff.; 16:17 f.).

Eph. 2:14 uses lyō to make a rather different point: "For he is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility [kai to mesotoichon tou phragmou lysas]." The term mesotoichon occurs only here in the NT. It is rare in secular Gk. and is not found at all in the LXX. It means a partition or dividing wall, and evidently refers to the stone wall in the temple with pillars "declaring the law of purity, some in Greek, and some in Roman letters, That no foreigner should go within that sanctuary" (Josephus, War 5, 5 [194]). The context of Eph. 2 evidently presupposes some knowledge of Jewish practices among the Gentiles of Asia Minor, and the climax of the chapter is reached in the assertion that the Gentile Christians now grow “into a holy temple in the Lord” (v. 21). V. 14 points out that there is no longer a dividing wall between Jewish and Gentile believers before God. The reason is given in the following verses: “by abolishing in his flesh the law of commandments and ordinances, that he might create in himself one new man in place of the two, so making peace, and might reconcile us both to God in one body through the cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end” (Eph. 2:15 f.; → Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 7). The idea of the law as a protecting wall against the Gentiles is expressed in Aristeas 139: “Now our Lawgiver being a wise man and specially endowed by God to understand all things, took a comprehensive view of particular detail, and fenced us round with impregnable ramparts and walls of iron, that we might not mingle at all with any of the other nations, but remain pure in body and soul, free from all vain imaginations, worshipping the one Almighty God above the whole creation.” In contrast with the Gospels where Jesus never actually says that he will destroy the temple, in Eph. 2:14 he is in fact the subject of the vb. The destruction of the dividing wall between Jewish and Gentile believers is the result of his reconciling death.

(c) In Jn. 5:18 lyō is used of breaking the → sabbath: “This was why the Jews sought all the more to kill him, because he not only broke the sabbath [hoti ou monon elyen to sabbaton] but also called God his Father, making himself equal with God.” The occasion was the healing of the paralytic by the pool of Bethzatha. Jesus defended his action by claiming: “My Father is working still, and I am working” (Jn. 5:17). To the Jews the reply sounded like Adam’s sinful attempt to be like God (Gen. 3:5 f.). But the answer is intended to show that there is a sense in which God is working on the sabbath both in general in sustaining the world and in particular in the case of this healing, in which Jesus is co-operating with the Father.

(d) The same incident is taken up again, but this time with reference to the law, in Jn. 7:23: “If on the sabbath a man receives circumcision, so that the law of Moses may not be broken [hina mē lythē ho nomos Moÿseōs], are you angry with me because on the sabbath I made a man’s whole body well?” There is an irony between the rite of circumcision performed on the male sexual organ which inevitably causes some pain and suffering and the healing of the whole body which banishes suffering. Jesus’ stance implies that, just as in healing he was not breaking the sabbath, he is also not breaking the law.

The point is extended to scripture in Jn. 10:35 f.: “If he called them gods to whom the word of God came (and scripture cannot be broken [kai ou dynatai lythēnai hē graphē]), do you say of him whom the Father consecrated and sent into the world, ‘You are blaspheming,’ because I said, ‘I am the Son of God’?” The statement about “gods” is an allusion to the previous v. which contains a quotation from Ps. 82(81):6, “You are gods,” which agrees with both the MT and the LXX. The passage has been the subject of considerable discussion (cf. L. Morris, The Biblical Doctrine of Judgment, 1960, 34 ff.; and The Gospel according to John, NLC, 1971, 525 f.). J. A. Emerton has suggested that the “gods” in the Ps. “were regarded as angels by the Jews, but as gods by the gentiles”, and that the passage is not conclusive evidence that in the OT men could be called “god” (“Some New Testament Notes”, JTS New Series 11, 1960, 329–32). But Morris objects that this interpretation does less than justice to the context of the Ps. A. T. Hanson takes seriously the rabbinic view that the Ps. was spoken to Israel by God at Sinai (“John’s Citation of Psalm lxxxii”, NTS

11, 1964–65, 158–62). He thinks that Jn. believed that the Ps. was uttered by the pre-existent Word: “if to be addressed by the pre-existent Word justifies men in being called gods, indirect and mediated though that address was (coming perhaps through Moses, certainly written down only through David), far more are we justified in applying the title Son of God to the human bearer of the pre-existent Word, sanctified and sent by the Father as he was, in unmediated and direct presence” (op. cit., 161). Disagreement with this view has come from M. de Jonge and A. S. van der Woude who draw attention to the Qumran scroll 11Q Melchizedek in which → Melchizedek is regarded as the speaker of Ps. 82 and evil angels as addressees (“11Q Melchizedek and the New Testament”, NTS 12, 1965–66, 301–26), and also from Emerton who claims the scroll as support for his view (“Melchizedek and the Gods: Fresh Evidence for the Jewish Background of John x. 34–36”, JTS New Series 17, 1966, 393–401). But Hanson has replied to these criticisms and claims that his own position is vindicated (“John’s Citation of Psalm lxxxii Reconsidered” (NTS 13, 1966–67, 363–67).

The RSV takes kai ou dynatai lythēnai hē graphē as a parenthesis, but Morris thinks it better to see it as dependent upon the previous ei (“if”) which would then introduce two certainties as premises for the conclusion: if the passage calls men “gods” and if Scripture cannot be broken, then a fortiori is it proper for Jesus to claim to be “the Son of God” (v. 36). This is in fact confirmed by his → works “that you may know and understand that the Father is in me and I am in the Father” (v. 37; cf. v. 32). The works justify the title, pointing to the relationship with the Father. Morris suggests that the idea of Scripture being broken means that it “cannot be emptied of its force by being shown to be erroneous” (The Gospel according to John, 527). He cites in support Jn. 5:18; 7:23; Matt. 5:19. R. E. Brown follows R. Jungkuntz in holding that lyō is to be contrasted with plēroō, i.e. to keep from being fulfilled as opposed to being fulfilled (The Gospel according to John, I, Anchor Bible, 1966, 404; cf. R. Jungkuntz, “An Approach to the Exegesis of John 10:34–36”, Concordia Theological Monthly 35, 1964, 556–65). In rabbinic usage battēl, nullify, render futile, appears to be the Aram. equivalent of lyō. Thus in Jn. 7:23 it means that a man receives circumcision on the sabbath, so that the fulfilment of the law will not be frustrated. The reason why judges are called “gods” in Ps. 82 is that they have the office of administering God’s judgment as “sons of the Most High”. In the context of the Ps. the men in question have failed to do this, and the Ps. ends by calling on God himself to arise and judge the earth. Perhaps the use of the quotation in Jn. 10 implies that this is now what is happening in the person of Jesus in his confrontation with the Jews. If this is so, then the breaking of Scripture in Jn. 10:34 is not simply a matter of showing Scripture to be erroneous. It is a claim that the Ps. finds fulfilment in Jesus. Whereas the Jews were accusing Jesus of blasphemy (vv. 33, 36), they were in fact committing it themselves. In trying to arrest him (v. 39) and in disregarding the testimony of his works (vv. 32, 38), they were judging unjustly like the judges in Ps. 82:2. In failing to appreciate how these works benefited the weak and needy and in not attempting to do anything about it, they were acting like the unjust judges of the Ps. (Ps. 82:4; cf. 3). In so doing, they showed that they had “neither knowledge nor understanding”, and were walking about “in darkness”, as the Psalmist had said (Ps. 82:5). On the other hand, Jesus fulfilled the rôle of a true judge as a “god” and “son of the Most High”, which in the Ps., as in the OT, was not simply a matter of delivering judgment in court, but included the wider aspect of administering the community in righteousness.

It is sometimes suggested that the reference to Scripture in Jn. 10:35 is an argumentum ad hominem which did not represent Jesus' own view of Scripture, but was a premise that Jesus knew the Jews accepted. It was therefore an adroit way of winning an argument by turning the tables on his opponents. But, as B. B. Warfield contends, the argument is not ad hominem but e concessu: "Scripture was the common ground with Jesus and His opponents" (The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 140). This appeal to the authority of Scripture and its fulfilment is in line with other appeals testified to in various strata of the Gospels (cf. Jn. 5:39; 12:14; 13:18; 17:12; Matt. 26:31, 54; Mk. 9:12 f.; 14:27; Lk. 20:17; 24:25; see Warfield, op. cit., 141–65, for discussion of these and other passages). Moreover, if the above interpretation of lythēnai in relation to Ps. 82 is correct, then the point of the quotation is to show not only that the Ps. offers formal precedent for speaking of a man as a "god", but that there is a material fulfilment of the whole Ps. in the person of Jesus in his confrontation with his unrighteous opponents who were presuming to judge him.

(e) The binding and loosing with which Peter was authorized in Matt. 16:19 and which was given to the disciples and the church at large in Matt. 18:18 stands in contrast with rabbinic usage (cf. deō = Aram., 'asar, bind; lyō = Aram. š'ra', loose). The authority of the rabbis as teachers was shown by their being able to forbid or allow certain things. They were able to excommunicate, i.e. exclude a person from the synagogue, though this is relatively seldom mentioned in rabbinic writings. Their decisions claimed to have validity in heaven, i.e. with God (SB I 738 ff.; 702 f.). On the nature of the authority entrusted to the church → Bind; → Open, art. k leis NT 3. Clearly it is an authority which is quite independent of any Jewish institutions, but which has its own God-given power.

(f) lyō and the unique noun lysis occur in 1 Cor. 7:27 in connexion with → divorce: "Are you bound to a wife? Do not seek to be free [dedesai gynaikei; mē zetei lysin]. Are you free from a wife? Do not seek marriage [lleysai apo gynaikos; mē zētei gynaikei]." D. Daube points out that lysis, "release", is a somewhat untechnical word for divorce (The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 363), as compared with Paul's use of chōrizesthai of the wife who "separates" from her husband and aphienai of the husband who "dismisses" his wife, which corresponds to Jewish usage (cf. 1 Cor. 7:10 f.; → Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 8). Perhaps Paul was using a more general term which would cover not only formal divorce but separation and even the death of the marriage partner. However, apolyō is used of divorce (Matt. 5:31 f. par. Lk. 16:18; Matt. 19:3–9 par. Mk. 10:2–12). C. K. Barrett claims that 1 Cor. 7:27 "contains Paul's advice on what, in the present circumstances, it is a good thing for a man to do; but it is in no sense a strict ruling which all must obey" (The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 175). On the other hand, the ruling is in line with the charge from the Lord, not to separate but to seek reconciliation within marriage, and with OT teaching (1 Cor. 7:10 f.; cf. the Gospel passages quoted above; → Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 8). And whilst Paul's teaching on the whole range of marriage questions in 1 Cor. 7 is clearly conditioned by circumstances (cf. vv. 29 ff.), it may be asked whether Paul envisaged those circumstances ever being altered except by the parousia. Nevertheless, it is not a sin for those who find themselves thus "free from a wife [lleysai apo gynaikos]" (v. 27) to marry (v. 28). And this may, indeed, be right in view of the considerations discussed in vv. 2–7. For each has his or her particular gift. For fuller discussion → Separate, art. chōrizō.

7. Compounds of lyō are not infrequent in the NT.

(a) apolyō (which occurs in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards) means: (i) to set free, release, pardon a prisoner (Matt. 27:15–26; Mk. 15:6–15; Lk. 23:16–25; Jn. 18:39; 19:10, 12; Acts 3:13; 5:40; 16:35 f.; 26:32; 28:18); release a debtor (Matt. 18:27; cf. Lk. 6:37); be freed of diseases (Lk. 13:12); (ii) let go, send away, dismiss one’s wife or betrothed, divorce (Matt. 1:19; 5:31 f.; 19:3, 7 ff.; Mk. 10:2, 4, 11; Lk. 16:18; cf. Deut. 24:1 ff.); of a woman divorcing her husband (Mk. 10:12 which accords with Greco-Roman custom, but not with Jewish, cf. Josephus, Ant. 15, 259); (iii) dismiss, send away crowds (Matt. 14:15, 22; 15:32, 39; Mk. 6:36, 45; 8:9), an assembly (Acts 19:40), and individuals (Matt. 15:23; Lk. 8:38; 14:4; cf. also Mk. 8:3; Acts 4:23; 15:30, 33); and as a euphemism for let die (Lk. 2:29).

(b) katalyō (in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards) means: (i) throw down, detach a stone from a building (Matt. 24:2; Mk. 13:2; Lk. 21:6), destroy, demolish, dismantle, of the temple (Matt. 26:61; cf. 27:40; Mk. 14:58; 15:29; Acts 6:14; see above 6 (b)), metaphorically of Paul demolishing the Jewish understanding of salvation and way of life (Gal. 2:18), of “the earthly tent”, i.e. the human body at death which nevertheless leaves the believer with “a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens” (2 Cor. 5:1), tearing down “the work of God”, i.e. the church (Rom. 14:20; cf. v. 19) over questions of eating what is unclean; akatalytos (from 1st cent. B.C. onwards) is found in the NT only at Heb. 7:16, meaning indestructible hence endless, referring to the life of Jesus, the eternal high priest, for Jesus was not appointed by the carnal law which is “a system of earth-bound rules” (NEB) but after the order of → Melchizedek; (ii) do away with, abolish, annul, make invalid, of the law (Matt. 5:17; see above 6 (a)), of the church which Gamaliel said would fail, if it was of men, but which could not be overthrown if it was of God’s plan (Acts 5:38 f.); (iii) halt (i.e. unharness the pack animals), hence to rest, find lodging (Lk. 9:12; 19:7). katalyma (2nd cent. B.C. onwards) means generally lodging, but more particularly a guest room or dining room (Mk. 15:14; Lk. 2:7; 22:11).

(c) eklyō (Homer onwards) means to become loose, become weary, become weak, of the hungry crowds in the desert (Matt. 15:32; Mk. 8:3), of the Christian’s certainty of reaping the harvest of well-doing if he does not grow weary (Gal. 6:9), of not losing courage in adversity, for discipline is a sign of sonship (Heb. 12:5 quoting Prov. 3:11; cf. also Heb. 12:3).

C. Brown

λύτρον

λύτρον (lytron), price of release, ransom, ransom price; ἀντίλυτρον (antilytron), ransom, ransom price; λυτρόω (lytroō), to ransom, redeem; λύτρωσις, ἀπολύτρωσις (lytrōsis, apolytrōsis), redemption, deliverance, release; λυτρωτής (lytrōtēs), redeemer.

CL lytron (from 5th cent. B.C. on) and antilytron (only post-biblical in secular Gk.) denote the means or money for a ransom. The suffix -tron denotes the instrument or means by which the action of the vb. is accomplished, i.e. means of releasing, or the payment, i.e. price of releasing (D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings:

Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 49). The plur. lytra is common. We find also the meaning of recompense. Among the Gks. a ransom was often paid to free slaves, but the word is seldom found in cultic contexts. lytroō (from Plato on) means to free by a ransom, redeem. It is used only in act. in secular Gk., but is always mid. or pass. in biblical Gk. lytrōsis and apolytrōsis, synonyms meaning freeing, redeeming, are rare and found first in 1st cent. B.C. lytrōtes, redeemer, is found only in biblical Gk.

W. Mundle

OT 1 (a). In the LXX the sing. lytron is found only in Lev. 27:31; Prov. 6:35; 13:8; otherwise it is always in plur. In addition to the passages mentioned, lytron translates Heb. kōper, covering, also in Exod. 21:30; 30:12; Num. 35:31, 32; Prov. 6:35; 13:8. kōper means the gift in exchange for a life, which according to the sacred law is forfeit or has come under the punishment of God. Normally it is not clear whether God, or men representing him, i.e. priests, are to be the recipients of the ransom money. A ransom was not to be paid for the murderer (Num. 35:31 f.). (On the important related vb. kipper → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3.)

(b) lytron is used also to render pidyōn, pidyōm, pēdyūim, ransom (from pādāh, ransom, redeem; cf. Num. 3:46–51). In addition it is found in Lev. 19:20 and Num. 18:15 to strengthen the vb. pādāh, stressing the action of redeeming and its price. This has to be paid for those, like the first-born of man or animal, which by sacred law belong to God (→ First). It can be paid by animal sacrifice (Exod. 13:13, 15; 34:20) or sometimes by a money payment (Exod. 30:13–16; Num. 3:46–51; 18:15 f.). The suggestion that 1 Sam. 14:45 implies the ransoming of Jonathan's life by the life of another is highly improbable (cf. H. W. Hertzberg, I & II Samuel, 1964, 117 f.). Lev. 19:20 uses lytra for the ransoming of a slave girl.

(c) lytra also renders the noun g'ullāh, redemption (from the vb. gā'al, redeem, act as kinsman) in the case of the relative who was both entitled and under obligation to act (Lev. 25:24, 26, 51 f.). The redeemer (gō'el) was originally the closest relative who, as the avenger of → blood, had to redeem the blood of the murdered victim (Num. 35:19, 21, 24, 25, 27; Jos. 20:3, 5) and also the family possession that had been sold (Lev. 27:13, 15, 19 f., 31; cf. Jer. 32:7 where the LXX does not use lytra), and even the person whose economic plight had caused him to sell himself to a non-Jew (Lev. 25:48 f.). In Lev. 25:26, 51 f. the g'ullāh is the price of redemption. In Lev. 25:24 it means redemption, and in Lev. 25:29, 31 f., 48; Ruth 4:6; Jer. 32:8 it signifies the right of redemption. In Ezek. 11:15 "your fellow exiles" (RSV), "men of your kindred" (RSV mg.) are lit. "men of your redemption (MT 'anšē g'ullāteḳāl)". In Isa. 45:13 lytra renders m'hîr, purchase price.

(d) D. A. Leggett points out that the duties prescribed by the OT laws are only understandable against the background of the covenant which made Israel Yahweh's unique possession (Exod. 19:5) among whom he dwelt (Exod. 25:8) (The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament with Special Attention to the Book of Ruth, 1974, 292). The land was Yahweh's and given to Israel through Yahweh's saving intervention as Lord of history. Therefore the land was not to be sold in perpetuity (Lev. 25:23), but rather to be redeemed (Lev. 25:24). Yahweh had redeemed Israel out of → Egypt, by which act they had become his servants (Lev. 25:37, 55; cf. Deut. 15:15). Accordingly the impoverished Israelite who had sold himself into slavery was to be redeemed (Lev. 25:55). If he was not redeemed by the appointed means, he was to be released in the year of jubilee (Lev. 25:50, 55).

The latter institution was part of the system of sabbatical years described in Lev. 25, which decreed that the land should be left fallow every seventh year (cf. Lev. 26:34–43; 2 Chr. 36:21; Neh. 10:31; Jer. 34:14–22; 1 Macc. 6:49, 53; Josephus, Ant. 12, 378; 14, 202). Unattended growth could be gathered by the poor or eaten by the beasts (Exod. 23:11; Deut. 15:2–18). Every fiftieth year (i.e. after 7 x 7 sabbath years) was a jubilee (so called from the Heb. yôbêl, ram, thence the ram's horn trumpet which heralded the year, cf. Exod. 19:13). The LXX uses aphesis, release. Then the sanctions of the sabbatical year were enforced, and debts were remitted and slaves released. The institution brought together not only sound ecological and humanitarian principles in a primitive society; it grounded them in faith in a God who acts for salvation in history. (For critical discussion see J. Lilley, "Jubilee Year", ZPEB III 715 f.; R. North, Sociology of the Biblical Jubilee, 1954; H. Cazelles, VT 5, 1955, 321–24; W. Hallo, BA 23, 1960, 48 f.; N. Avigad, BASOR 163, 1961, 18–22.)

(e) Leggett sees the figure of the gô'el reflecting that of Yahweh in his relationship with Israel which is grounded in the covenant (op. cit., 293 f.). The vb. gā'al and the figure of the gô'el have particular prominence in the book of Ruth in which Ruth, the Moabitess and widowed daughter-in-law of Naomi, accompanies the latter to her home town of → Bethlehem. The two are destitute, but Ruth gleans in the field of Boaz who is a kinsman (Ruth 3:3). Naomi counsels Ruth to go to Boaz at the threshing floor at night. Boaz does not take Ruth at once. There is a nearer kinsman: "Remain this night, and in the morning, if he will do the part of the next of kin for you, well; let him do it; but if he is not willing to do the part of the next of kin for you, then, as the LORD lives, I will do the part of the next of kin for you. Lie down until the morning" (3:13). But upon the latter's refusal before the elders to take Ruth, Boaz does so by buying a field from the hand of Naomi (4:5). The background to this is the concept of the levirate marriage, according to which it was the duty of a kinsman to marry a widow "in order to restore the name of the dead to his inheritance" (4:5; → Marriage, art. gameō OT 5).

It should be noted that the LXX tones down the concept of redemption by avoiding lytron and cognates in the book of Ruth. Instead, it uses the noun anchisteus, kinsman (Ruth 3:9, 12; 4:1, 3, 6, 8, 14) and the vb. anchisteuō, be next of kin, act as next of kin, do a kinsman's office (Ruth 2:20; 3:13; 4:4; 6 f.). Nevertheless, the act of buying the field and the deliverance of Ruth and Naomi from destitution are integral features of the concept of redemption. The purpose of the book of Ruth has been widely debated (cf. O. Eissfeldt, The Old Testament: An Introduction, 1965, 477–83; R. K. Harrison, Introduction to the Old Testament, 1969, 1059–64; L. Morris in A. E. Cundall and L. Morris, Judges, Ruth, TC, 1968, 239–43). It is widely held to be a tract against Jewish exclusivism. The book closes with a brief genealogy tracing → David's descent from Boaz (Ruth 4:18 ff.). Leggett sees in the book the theme of redemptive, messianic typology. "In the actions of Boaz as goel we see foreshadowed the saving work of Jesus Christ, his later descendant. As Boaz had the right of redemption and yet clearly was under no obligation to intervene on Ruth's behalf, so it was with Christ. As Boaz, seeing the plight of the poor widows, came to their rescue because his life was governed by Yahweh and his laws, so also of the Messiah it is prophesied that his life would be governed by the law of God and that he would deal justly and equitably with the poor and with those who were oppressed (Ps. 72:2, 4, 12, 13; Isa. 11:4)" (op. cit. 298).

(f) In the cases discussed so far there is the idea of release through buying back either through some act or by an appropriate payment. The plur. lytra denotes what is given in replacement which results in release. The thought that something has to be done or paid implies the need to come to terms. But the idea of reconciliation is particularly prominent in those passages where lytra translates kōper, price of a life, ransom (Exod. 21:30; 30:12; Num. 35:31 f.; Prov. 6:35; 13:8). This Heb. noun is a cognate of the vb. kipper; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3. kōper occurs in the MT as the price for ransom of a life (Exod. 21:30; cf. 30:16; Job 33:24; 36:18; Prov. 13:8), a ransom (Num. 35:31 f.; Prov. 6:25; Ps. 49[48]:8, LXX exhilasma, guilt of offering; Isa. 43:3). It means a bribe (1 Sam. 12:3, LXX exhilasma; Amos 5:12), where it is perhaps connected with the root idea of covering, i.e. that which covers the eyes. In Exod. 30:12 it is the half shekel of the sanctuary paid by all males above the age of twenty at the census to avert the plague (→ Tax). But the word is not found in the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. 16). For the concept of reconciliation in later Judaism → Reconciliation, arts. apokatastasis OT 3 f.; hilaskomai OT 1 (b), 3 (c), 4; cf. H. Herrmann and F. Büchsel, hileōs, hilaskomai etc. TDNT III 301 ff.

2. The vb. lytrousthai is found more frequently in the LXX than the noun lytron. In the majority of cases Yahweh is the subject. It renders pādāh, ransom, 42 times: Exod. 13:13, 15; 34:20; Lev. 19:20; 27:29; Num. 18:15, 17; Deut. 7:8; 9:26; 13:5(6); 15:15; 21:8; 24:18; 2 Sam. 4:9; 7:23; 1 Ki. 1:29; 1 Chr. 17:21; Neh. 1:10; Pss. 25(24):22; 26(25):11; 31(30):5; 34(33):22; 44(43):26; 49(48):7, 15; 55(54):18; 71(70):23; 78(77):42; 119(118):134; 130(129):8; Hos. 7:13; Mic. 6:4; Zech. 10:8; Isa. 51:11; Jer. 15:21; 31(38):11 (in several of these passages it occurs more than once). lytrousthai translates gā'al, redeem, act as a kinsman, 45 times: Exod. 6:6; 15:13; Lev. 25:25, 30, 33, 48 f., 54; 27:13, 15, 19 f., 27–31, 33; Pss. 69(68):18; 72(71):14; 74(73):2; 77(76):15; 103(102):4; 106(105):10; 107(106):2; 119(118):154; Prov. 23:11; Hos. 13:14; Mic. 4:10; Zech. 3:1; Isa. 35:9; 41:14; 43:1, 14; 44:22 ff.; 52:3; 62:12; 63:9; Jer. 50(27):34; Lam. 3:58 (again in some verses more than once). It is also used to translate 7 other words: arāp, break the neck of an animal (Exod. 13:13?); pallēt, deliverance (Ps. 32[31]:1); pāṣāh, part, open, snatch away (Ps. 144[143]:10); pāraq, tear away a yoke (Lam. 5:8) and the Aram. p^eraq (Dan. 4:24); qānāh, get, acquire (Exod. 15:16 v.l.); sāgab, rise up (Ps. 59[58]:1); Aram. šēzib, deliver (Dan. 6:28[27]). There is no corresponding Heb. in Sir. 48:20; 49:10; 50:24; 51:2 f.; 1 Macc. 4:11.

The basic idea of making free by a ransom can be seen in Exod. 34:20; Lev. 19:20; 25:25; but already in Deut. 7:8; 9:26; 13:5(6), etc. lytrousthai (pādāh) no longer refers to a material price paid, but means the redeeming activity of God, which freed Israel from → Egypt, the house of bondage. It is the use of his power in the service of his love and faithfulness which redeems from bondage. In Isa. the work of God as the Redeemer is stressed (gō'el, lytroumenos or rhyssamenos, deliverer; Isa. 41:14; 47:4). Here the deliverance is in the first place the freeing of Israel from Babylonian captivity and the return of the people. The foreign nations are to receive no ransom for them; in fact God gives them as ransom for Israel (Isa. 43:3 f.; 45:13).

The thought of deliverance rather than the ransom paid is often uppermost (cf. D. Hill, op. cit., 54). lytrousthai is used interchangeably in the Pss. for gā'al and pādāh (Pss. 25[24]:22; 72[71]:14; 119[118]:134, 154).

D. Hill points out that while the deliverance from Egypt is often described in terms of redemption (2 Sam. 7:23; Deut. 7:8; 9:26; 13:5; 15:15; 24:18; 1 Chr. 17:21; Ps. 78[77]:42), the “redeeming” from exile is not often described by pādāh (Isa. 35:10; 51:11). Moreover, the specific idea of a ransom tends to fall into the background. “To stress the costliness of the deliverance in terms of Yahweh’s strength and activity in order to keep alive the notion of ransom price (cf. Neh. 1:10 and 2 Sam. 7:23) would be to place an undue strain on the evidence: wherever there is need to emphasise the exercise of Yahweh’s power in saving his people, it is stated explicitly in the context. We have no right to read it into every occurrence of the verb in order to make the word retain a presumed original and single unchanging sense. The meanings of words are seldom static and semantic development is often influenced by the events of history. It seems probable that the words gā'al and pādāh which had a close association with the idea of releasing slaves and of reclaiming persons and things, were taken up into the vocabulary of Israel’s writers as the most suitable terms to describe the liberation from slavery of those whom Egypt and Babylon had conquered, and the reclaiming by Yahweh into his rightful ownership of ‘the people of his possession’. This semantic development does no more than extend and emphasise what was already the essential theme of gā'al and pādāh in their specialised use, namely that of bringing persons into freedom” (op. cit., 55 f.).

3. In the intertestamental period the expectation of redemption continued (Sir. 50:24). Since the dominion of the foreigners over Israel continued, the term received a political and nationalistic connotation (Pss.Sol. 9:1; 12:6). The Qumran texts also stress this aspect (1QM 1:12 f.; 14:5 f.). Redemption was often conceived of in a wider sense. Especially in the Pss. the thought is of the individual: God redeems him from oppression and wrong (Pss. 31[30]:5[6]; 72[71]:14; 119[118]:134), and also from destruction (Ps. 103[102]:4; Sir. 51:2) and sin (Ps. 130:8).

4. lytrōsis renders g'ullāh in Lev. 25:29, 48, and g'ūlīm in Isa. 63:4. Otherwise it translates pādāh and its derivatives. In Lev. 25:29, 48 it means the right of redemption of property that has been sold. Ps. 49(48):8 states that there is no ransom from death. In Isa. 63:4 the judgment on the heathen appears to Israel as a “year of redemption”. Ps. 111(110):9 thinks of Israel’s redemption in general, and Ps. 130(129):7 of redemption from sin. apolytrōsis is used in the LXX only in Dan. 4:34(31) of the freeing of Nebuchadnezzar from his madness. God is twice called lytrōtēs, Redeemer, in the Pss. (19[18]:14; 78[77]:35). lytrōtos, redeemable (for Heb. g'ullāh) occurs only in Lev. 25:31 f.

5. Judaism reflected much on the OT statements about ransom money. Above all, the good deeds of the martyrs appeared as a ransom with atoning power (4 Macc. 6:28 f.; 17:22; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3 (c), NT 4 (b)). On the other hand, it is stressed that there is no ransom for the Gentiles in the final judgment (Eth. Enoch 98:10; cf. SB I 750; III 644).

gā'al is used only once in the Qumran texts as kinsman or protector (CD 14:16); pādāh is more important. In 1QH the author praises God for delivering him from his enemies (1QH 2:32, 35) and from destruction (1QH 3:19). 1QM calls the community “the people of the divine redemption” (1QM 1:12; 14:5) and “the poor of his redemption" (IQM 11:9). Cf. also 1QH 17:20; Fragment 45 1:2; 4QpPs37; CD 16:8; IQM 11:9; 13:14; 14:10; 15:1; 17:6; 18:11; Fragment 22 4:2; 4QM 8. The same semantic development which Hill observed in the OT appears to have taken place in the Dead Sea Scrolls, viz. that padāh means primarily to release, save or deliver (D. Hill, op. cit., 56).

Although gā'al was avoided in the Qumran writings, it is often used of the exodus deliverance in rabbinic literature. Both vbs. are frequent in the Mishnah in cases of legal and cultic redemption: gā'al of the redemption of property (Arakhin 9:1–4, dealing with the sabbath year and year of jubilee) and of things dedicated to the Lord (Arakhin 7:3 ff.); pādāh of the redemption of standing corn (Peah 4:7), dough (Hallah 3:3), dedicated produce (Terumoth 6:5; Pesahim 2:5), captive slaves (Ketuboth 1:2, 4; 3:1), persons from Gentile ownership (Gittin 4:9). Hill points out that in these passages the ideas which belong to the use of the words in the Pentateuch are dominant (op. cit., 57). But the tractate Pesahim (Feast of Passover) contains, as might be expected, examples of gā'al used of the exodus deliverance (10:5 f.), though none suggest the notion of ransom price in terms of the exertion of Yahweh's power. In rabbinic literature gā'al is applied to Israel's future deliverance when all afflictions will be ended. This is exemplified in the seventh of the Eighteen Benedictions which may well date from the Maccabean period: "Look upon our afflictions and defend our cause, and redeem us [ūg'ālēnū] for thy name's sake. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the Redeemer [gō'el] of Israel" (→ Prayer, art. proseuchomai от 6). The thought here that is uppermost appears to be that of deliverance, perhaps with overtones of the avenger of blood. The rabbis used gō'el for the coming messiah, the redeemer of the glorious future (Hill, op. cit., 58; cf. H. Cazelles et al., Moïse: L'Homme de l'Alliance, 1955, for the messiah as a Moses-like deliverer).

The emphasis on deliverance rather than the ransom price of the later biblical writings outside the Pentateuch appears to be continued in the Palestinian Apocryphal writings (Sir. 48:20; 49:10; 50:24; 51:2 f.; 1 Macc. 4:11; cf. also Eth. Enoch 98:10 where "ransom" could mean "[way of] deliverance"). In the case of Philo, Hill detects the following procedure: "he finds the words in his biblical texts and quotes them in his work with the ransom significance which their contexts in legal codes required. When he explains the meaning of the passages, the strict ransom sense is missing and the idea of freedom is dominant" (op. cit., 60; Sacr. 114, 117 ff.; Rer.Div.Her. 44, 124, 186; Spec.Leg. 1, 77; 1, 135; 2, 95; 2, 116, 121 f.; 3, 145; Omn.Prob.Lib. 114; Congr. 109; Leg.All. 3, 21).

Apart from the lytron word-group, attention may be drawn to Jewish beliefs about the atoning value of suffering and martyrdom in the immediate pre-Christian era (cf. Hill, op. cit., 65 f.; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; 175–89; Moore, Judaism, I, 546–52; S. Schechter, Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology, 1909, 307–11). Traditionally atonement was achieved through the sacrifices of the cult and the Day of Atonement, but after the destruction of the temple and the cessation of sacrifice, it came to be thought of in terms of obedience and suffering, especially death. Hill claims that the idea of a man's death atoning for his own sins is not traceable in pre-Christian Judaism, but the idea of representative atonement is pre-Christian. Thus Jacob is said to have addressed Benjamin: "In thee shall be fulfilled the prophecy of heaven, which says that the blameless one shall be defiled for lawless men, the sinless one shall die for ungodly men” (Test. Ben. 3:8, cf. Isa. 53; the longer v.l. is even more explicit). The representative value of suffering is expressed in the old Jewish tradition concerning the binding of Isaac (Akedah) which may have influenced Paul’s doctrine of atonement (H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, 1961, 141–49; G. Vermes, Scripture and Tradition in Judaism, 1961, 193–227). The deaths of Saul and Jonathan caused God to be entreated for the land (Pes. 27, 174b). The atoning value of the deaths of the martyrs features in 2 Macc. 7:37; 4 Macc. 6:28; 17:21 f. (on this → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai or 3 (c), NT 4 (b)). Both 4 Macc. 6:28 and 17:21 use the rare word antipsychon, life given as a substitute.

NT 1. In the NT lytron is found only in the saying of Jesus which, apart from the introductory conjunctions, is found with identical wording in Matt. 20:28 and Mk. 10:45: “even as [hōsper, Matt.; “for”, Mk. kai gar] the Son of man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many [ho hyios tou anthrōpou ouk ēlthen diakonēthēnai alla diakonēsai kai dounai tēn psychēn autou lytron anti pollōn].” Lk. does not have the saying, but in his narrative of the Last Supper he gives the saying: “For which is the greater, one who sits at table, or one who serves? Is it not the one who sits at table? But I am among you as one who serves [egō de en mesō hymōn eimi hōs ho diakonōn]” (Lk. 22:27).

The conclusion has been drawn that the Lucan saying is more original than the Marcan. R. Bultmann, for example, sees the Marcan versions as a product of the early church in the form of an utterance attributed to the exalted Christ (The History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1963, 149). In particular, it “has formed its conception of Jesus from the redemption theories of Hellenistic Christianity” (op. cit., 144; cf. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos, [1913], ET 1970, 39). But the theory is indemonstrable, and the ascription of prophetic utterances in the early church to the historical Jesus is open to serious objections (→ Prophet, art. prophētēs NT 4). Other exegetes have demonstrated the probability of a Palestinian background (cf. J. Jeremias, “Das Lösegeld für viele”, Judaica 3, 1948, 249 ff.; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht, 1955). This is indicated by the designation of Jesus as → Son of man (cf. Dan. 7:13) and the Semitic form of expression (e.g. the use of “many”, Heb. rabbîm, instead of “all”; cf. the use of “all” in 1 Tim. 2:6 which speaks of Jesus giving himself “as a ransom for all [antilytron hyper pantōn]”; → All, art. polloî).

Mk. 10:45 has often been interpreted in the light of the Suffering Servant of Isa. 53, especially vv. 10–12: “Yet it was the will of the LORD to bruise him; he has put him to grief; when he makes himself an offering for sin, he shall see his offspring, he shall prolong his days; the will of the LORD shall prosper in his hand; he shall see the fruit of his soul and be satisfied; by his knowledge shall the righteous one, my servant, make many to be accounted righteous; and he shall bear their iniquities. Therefore I will divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he poured out his soul to death, and was numbered with the transgressors; yet he bore the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors.”

W. L. Lane notes that “The sacrifice of the one is contrasted with those for whom it is made, in allusion to Isa. 53:11 f.” (The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 384). Here too “many” are referred to. This would further underline the Jewish background of the thought. But Lane also draws attention to the fact that at Qumran “the many” is “a technical term for the elect community, the eschatological people of God” (ibid.; cf. R. Marcus, “Mebaqquer and Rabbim in the Manual of Discipline vi, 11–13”, JBL 75, 1956, 298–302; H. Huppenbauer, “rbym, rwb, rb in der Sektenregel (1QS)”, ThZ 13, 1957, 136 f.). The thought of Mk. 10:45 seems to combine the substitutionary redemption of Isa. 53 by the one on behalf of many with the idea that the many are the elect community.

The link with Isa. 53 has been disputed by some scholars (cf. M. D. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant: The Influence of the Servant Concept of Deutero-Isaiah in the New Testament, 1959, 74–9; C. K. Barrett, “The Background of Mark 10:45”, in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1959, 1–18). It is argued, for example, that Isa. 52:13 and 53:11 speak of “my servant” and not the Son of man which recalls rather Dan. 7 and 12:3. The reminiscence of the Isaianic Servant in Eth. Enoch 37–71 which refer to the Son of man do not make a link with suffering. Isa. 53:10 speaks of an “offering for sin” rather than a “ransom”. On the other hand, the idea of a ransom suggested by lytron and its cognates is found in Exod. 21:30; 30:12; cf. 21:23; 2 Ki. 10:24; 49[48]:8; Isa. 52:3; cf. Josephus, Ant. 14, 107. But what this shows is that there are certain verbal dissimilarities when Mk. 10:45 and Isa. 53 are compared, and that the NT passage is not based exclusively on any single OT passage. The idea of a guilt offering is found in Lev. 5:14–6:7; Num. 5:5–8. The reconciling significance of Jesus’ passion which in Mk. 10:45 is designated by the word lytron corresponds to what in Heb. was expressed by the kipper word-group (→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). In the earliest form of NT proclamation it was expressed in the formula that “Christ died for our sins in accordance with the scriptures” (1 Cor. 15:3). Whereas the atoning value of the sufferings of the Jewish martyrs is celebrated in 2 Macc. 7:37; 4 Macc. 6:28; 17:21 f., the present passage offers a parallel and a stark contrast. It affirms that atonement is made by suffering, but it implicitly denies that such atonement was made by the Jewish martyrs. It insists that it is brought about by Jesus alone. “With the preposition anti [for] Jesus contrasts what he surrenders with what he gains. He surrenders his life and obtains the many who are liberated. The thought is also in the background that by his death Jesus stands in the place of those who are in bondage to sin and death, and suffers in their stead that which sets them free” (A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, 1963⁶, 603 f.). “The genuineness of the saying has been much discussed . . . but no argument has yet been advanced which is so strong as to make it impossible for us to believe that Jesus could have spoken of his death in the kind of terms reproduced here – of vicarious and representative suffering for his people, in the terms of the old Jewish martyr theology” (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 289).

As Schlatter observes above, the ransom has not only an atoning but also a liberating aspect. The many are set free not only from → guilt, but also at the same time from its consequences, → death and → judgment. “Deliverance from guilt and deliverance from death is the same process” (Schlatter, op. cit., 603). In Mk. 8:37 Jesus puts the question: “For what can a man give in return for his life?” (→ Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 8). The question finds its answer here in Mk. 10:45. This answer stands in sharp contrast to Eth. Enoch 98:10: “And now, know ye that ye are prepared for the day of destruction: wherefore do not hope to live, ye sinners, but ye shall depart and die; for ye know no ransom; for ye are prepared for the day of the great judgment, for the day of tribulation and great shame for your spirits." The same Jesus who completes his service in giving up his life is the Son of man who will come in glory (Matt. 25:31). Jesus does not say who will receive the ransom. Since Mk. 8:33 pictures Satan as endeavouring to prevent Jesus' path of suffering, we can think only of God in this context.

2. The rare word antilytron, ransom, which is not found at all in the LXX occurs in the NT only at 1 Tim. 2:6 in the context of an exhortation to prayer for all men, including kings and those in high positions. For "God our Saviour . . . desires all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. For there is one God and there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all [ho dous heauton antilytron hyper pantōn], the testimony to which was borne at the proper time" (1 Tim. 2:4 ff.). The saying points back to Mk. 10:45. J. Jeremias has shown that the saying differs from the words of Jesus only in that it has been stripped of its Semitic linguistic form of expression ("Das Lösegeld für viele", Judaica 3, 1948, 260). C. Spicq points out that the first motive for intercessory prayer for all men lies in the character of God. The second is based on the mission of Jesus Christ (Les Épîtres Pastorales, 1947, 59). He points out that whereas Mk. 10:45 par. Matt. 20:28 speak of a lytron anti ("a ransom for") Paul uses a noun which combines the noun and preposition in a single word, which thus appears stronger than the simple lytron, suggesting a ransom which has been completely paid, an atonement that has been effected. The use of anti as a prefix may even accentuate the notion of exchange (cf. antimisthia, reward, return, in Rom. 1:27; 2 Cor. 6:13). D. Guthrie comments: "The addition of the preposition anti, 'instead of', is significant in view of the preposition huper, 'on behalf of', used after it. Christ is conceived of as an 'exchange price' on behalf of and in the place of all, on the grounds of which freedom may be granted. Yet not all enjoy that freedom. The ransom, it is true, has infinite value, but the benefits require appropriation. The apostle is implying here that since the ransom is adequate for all, God must desire the salvation of all" (The Pastoral Epistles, TC, 1957, 72).

However, the alternative interpretation may be noted which takes the word → all (pas) to denote not all, in an absolute and inclusive sense, but all kinds of. On this view, Paul is saying that he does not exclude any class of men from salvation (and thus from the sphere of intercessory prayer). For he desires all kinds of men (including pagan rulers, whom some Christians might deem to be beyond the pale) to be saved. In NT literature pas is used for pantodapos and pantoiōs which are absent from the NT. Other instances of pas in this sense include Matt. 4:23; 23:27; Lk. 11:42; Acts 2:5; 7:22; 13:10; Rom. 1:18, 29; 7:8; 1 Cor. 1:5; 6:18; 2 Cor. 7:1; 9:8; 10:5; Eph. 1:3, 8, 21; 4:19; 5:3; Phil. 1:9; 2 Thess. 2:17; Tit. 1:16; 3:1; Heb. 13:21. The question may be asked whether the use of the word pas ("all") here in the context of the Gentile mission significantly extends that of the polloi ("many") in Mk. 10:45 par. which occurs in a Jewish Palestinian setting. On the one hand, polloi can have a more inclusive sense, but the Qumran background suggests that the "many" may refer to the elect eschatological community. On the other hand, the "all" in 1 Tim. 2:6 may mean that Christ gave himself for all men absolutely or for all kinds of men. What is clear in 2 Tim. 2:6 is that Paul extends the "many" of the Gospels to include not only the Gentiles who have actually responded to the gospel but to pagan rulers who at the time might even be hostile.

Similar thoughts on Christ's death as a ransom given in love may be found elsewhere in Paul. His self-giving in death is grounded in love (Gal. 2:20; Eph. 5:2). Believers are bought with a price (timē, 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23), paid to atone from sin and its consequences (Gal. 1:4; Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14). Christ's death is a propitiation (Rom. 3:25) which brings about → reconciliation (2 Cor. 5:18–21).

The final clause in 1 Tim. 2:6 (“the testimony to which was borne at the proper time”) is not immediately clear. If to martyrion is taken in apposition to the preceding statement, it could be understood as referring to the gospel of salvation. The noun would thus be a metonymy in which the abstract stands for the concrete, the testimony for the thing testified. But the proper meaning of martyrion is not the thing testified but the testimony (cf. Heb. 3:5). Spicq, therefore, prefers to see to martyrion in apposition to the entire train of thought in vv. 4–6 and “to understand that the great expiatory sacrifice of Christ for all is itself the attestation, the great sign, the most manifest proof which is as indisputable as a fact, of the will of God to save all men” (op. cit., 61). This is the sense of the word in 1 Tim. 6:13. This revelation and proof of God's redeeming love was manifested in God's own appointed time (cf. Tit. 1:3; 1 Tim. 6:15; Rom. 5:6; Gal. 4:4).

3. lytrōsis, deliverance, release, redemption, occurs twice in the birth and infancy narratives of Lk. and once in Heb. Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, “was filled with the Holy Spirit, and prophesied” at the birth of his son in a psalm which begins: “Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he has visited and redeemed his people” (Lk. 1:68). V. 69 develops this theme in speaking of “the horn of salvation [keras sōtērias] which God has raised up for us in the house of his servant David”, and vv. 71 and 73 celebrate this in terms of being “saved [sōtērian]” and “delivered [rhysthentas]” from our enemies. Similarly, the prophetess Anna gave thanks to God on seeing the infant Jesus in the temple “and spoke of him to all who were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem” (Lk. 2:38). D. Hill comments: “the word is being used in the sense of the long-awaited intervention by God to save and deliver his people into freedom and blessing. This applies also to the remark by the Emmaus-road pilgrims (Luke 24:21), ‘We had hoped that he was the one to deliver Israel (ho mellōn lytrōsthai Israēl)’ ” (Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 67). Hill thinks that the idea of ransoming or purchasing has here completely receded, and that the emphasis is entirely on God's deliverance of his people. Even though Zechariah's psalm goes on to relate this deliverance to the rôle of John in preparing the ways of the Lord “to give knowledge of salvation to his people in the forgiveness of sins” (Lk. 1:77), the deliverance that Zechariah and Anna appear to envisage is one which sees it in terms of the promised restoration of the fortunes of → Israel in terms of OT prophecy concerning the historic people of God (cf. Lk. 1:76 with Mal. 4:5; Lk. 1:78 with Mal. 4:2; Lk. 1:79 with Isa. 9:2).

It is questionable how far the idea of ransoming is present in Heb. 9:12, though clearly atonement is here made by → blood. The death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus is here understood in terms of the Day of Atonement ritual of Lev. 16: “But when Christ appeared as a high priest of the good things that have come, then through the greater and more perfect tent (not made with hands, that is, not of this creation) he entered once for all into the Holy Place, taking not the blood of goats and calves but his own blood, thus securing an eternal redemption [aiōnīan lytrōsin heuramenos]” (Heb. 9:11 f.). The sacrifices of the Day of Atonement were not strictly speaking a ransom, although the shedding of blood made propitiation (Lev. 17:11; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). In the light of Heb. 9:22, 25 f., 28, Hill concludes: “As the blood of bulls and goats in the Day of Atonement ceremony cleansed and freed the assembly of Israel from sin for one year, the blood of the great High Priest himself is the means (not the price) of bringing deliverance from sin and a renewed relationship with God (v. 14) to all men for ever” (op. cit., 69).

4. lytrōtēs occurs only in Stephen’s speech where it is applied to → Moses: “This Moses whom they refused, saying ‘Who made you a ruler and a judge?’ God sent as both ruler and deliverer [archonta kai lytrōtēn] by the hand of the angel that appeared to him in the bush” (Acts 7:35; cf. Exod. 2:14). The point of the argument is to show that the Jews’ treatment of Jesus is consistent with the Jews’ attitude to the divinely appointed leaders and deliverers down the ages. But, in fact, Moses whom the Jews regard as the leader and deliverer par excellence is in this double aspect a type of Christ: he is a ruler and deliverer on the one hand, and he was rejected by the Jews on the other hand (cf. v. 52). E. Haenchen also points out that “archonta matches archēgos in 3.15 and 5.31, and lytrōtēn has its counterpart in Luke 24:21” (The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 282).

5. apolytrōsis occurs 10 times in the NT. The sole instance in the Gospels is in Lk. 21:28. Otherwise it is found 7 times in the Pauline writings and twice in Heb. These occurrences attest the Hellenistic preference for the compound form over the simple lytrōsis. In the Pauline writings it figures largely to designate the deliverance from sin and its penalty brought about by the propitiatory death of Christ. In this sense it is a present reality grounded exclusively in Christ: “they are justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus” (Rom. 3:24; cf. v. 25 → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai); “In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace” (Eph. 1:7); “in whom we have redemption, the forgiveness of sins” (Col. 1:14); “He is the source of your life in Christ Jesus, whom God made our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30).

But it also has a future aspect, for the full realization of redemption will only come with the parousia: “and not only the creation, but we ourselves, who have the first fruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait for adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies” (Rom. 8:23; cf. Phil. 3:21). The context there is probably that of a charismatic enthusiasm which Paul counters by drawing attention to present imperfection (→ Prayer, art. entynchanō; on this verse see also P. Benoit, “Nous gémissons, attendant la délivrance de notre corps”, RSR 39, 1951, 267–80). Similarly, Eph. 1:14 sees the present sealing by the → Spirit as the guarantee of our inheritance until we acquire possession of it [eis apolytrōsin; lit. “unto redemption”], to the praise of his glory.” The sole instance in the Gospels has also a future reference: “Now when these things begin to take place, look up and raise your heads, because your redemption is drawing near” (Lk. 21:28; cf. also 18:7 f.; → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT).

In Heb. 9:15 the thought combines the Pauline association of redemption and the death of Christ with the characteristic theme in Heb. of the comparison of the new covenant with the old: "Therefore he is the mediator of a new covenant, so that those who are called may receive the promised eternal inheritance, since a death has occurred which redeems them from the transgressions under the first covenant." In Heb. 11:35 apolytrōsis is used in the secular sense of "release" (cf. Dan. 4:32 LXX): "Some were tortured, refusing to accept release, that they might rise again to a better life." The allusion appears to be the story in 2 Macc. of the mother and her seven sons who prefer torture and death to denying the law, expressing their hope in a resurrection life (2 Macc. 7:9, 11, 14; for other instances of torture see F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 337 ff.).

6. The vb. lytrousthai (middle and passive) is found only in three passages. Lk. 24:21 is noted above (see under 3 above). Tit. 2:14 interprets christologically the thought of Ps. 130:8 (cf. also Ezek. 37:23; Deut. 14:2). The passage describes the Christian life as renouncing irreligion and worldly passions and living in a godly way, awaiting the appearing of Christ, "who gave himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity and to purify for himself a people of his own who are zealous for good deeds." 1 Pet. 1:18 f. refers both to that from which the believer is ransomed and to the means of the ransom: "You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ like that of a lamb without blemish or spot." The words "futile" and "vain" are used of idolatry (Lev. 17:7 LXX; Jer. 8:19; Acts 14:15; cf. Rom. 1:21), and in a general sense life without God is one of futility and emptiness (→ Empty, art. mataios). The allusion to silver and gold recalls Isa. 52:3: "You were sold for nothing, and you shall be redeemed without money" (→ Gold). On → blood as the means of redemption see Eph. 1:7; Heb. 9:12, 22; Rev. 1:5; cf. 5:9. The image of the → lamb recalls Isa. 53:7. The passover lamb and animal sacrifices were expected to be without blemish (Exod. 12:5; 29:1; Lev. 22:17–25; Ezek. 43:22 f.; cf. Heb. 9:14).

Other ways of expressing the idea of ransom include that of being bought with a price (1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23; → Buy, art. agorazō; → glory, art. timē). C. Brown ῥύομαι (rhyomai), rescue, deliver, preserve, save.

ῥύομαι

CL rhyomai is a middle deponent vb. found in cl. Gk. from Homer onwards and also in inscriptions and papyri. It is used of deliverance and keeping by both the gods and men.

1. Ajax prayed to "Father Zeus" to save the Achaians from the dark night (Homer, Il. 17, 645). "Only Zeus and the other gods saved thee", cried Achilles to Aeneas (Il. 20, 194). Such deliverance extends not only to individuals in battle, but to various dangers, afflictions and also the protection of property (Il. 15, 257, 290; Hdt. 1, 87 ek tou kakou, "from evil"; 5, 49; 9, 76; 4, 187; 6, 7; 7, 217; other instances in W. Kasch, rhyomai, TDNT VI 1000).

2. On the human level the vb. is applied to the action of princes in delivering cities and countries (Homer, Il. 9, 396), women and children (Il. 17, 224), the outcast (Soph., OC 285). Moreover, it can be used of inanimate objects. Thus, walls (Il. 18, 515), helmets (Il. 10, 259), and armour (Il. 23, 819) are said to protect. On the other hand, Odysseus cannot save his comrades who have destroyed themselves by sin (Od. 1, 6f.), and there are cases where not even the gods can save (Il., 15, 141; Od. 12, 107; Aesch., Sept. 91; cf. W. Kasch, ibid.).

OT In the LXX rhyomai mostly renders the hiphil form of nāṣal in the sense of rescue, deliver (84 times), the niphil form in the sense of to save oneself (4 times), and the hophal form twice. The Gk. vb. → sōzō, save, translates nāṣal only 23 times. rhyomai is used 11 times in the later passages of Isa. and also in Gen. 48:16 to translate gā'al, redeem, buy back, deliver (→ lyō OT). It also translates several other vbs.: pālaṭ in the piel, bring to safety, save (10 times); yāša' in the hiphil, save, deliver, set free (7 times; yāša' is translated by sōzō 138 times); pādāh, redeem (5 times); hālaṣ, save (5 times); nāṣar, watch, keep guard (twice); pāṣāh, snatch from deliver (once), and the Aram. šēziḅ (once). W. Kasch sees two main groups of passages. In the first, rhyomai is used in a way corresponding to cl. Gk. usage, except that Yahweh fulfils the rôle which in Gk. literature is ascribed to the gods. In the second, a distinctive OT usage may be seen. (On the Heb. terms see further J. F. A. Sawyer, Semantics in Biblical Research: New Methods of Defining Hebrew Words for Salvation, SBT Second Series 24, 1972.)

1. The following group of passages exhibits marked similarities with Gk. usage, except that the deliverance is seen as the work of Yahweh and not of the gods. The Psalmists sing of deliverance from persecutors (Ps. 7:2[1]), wicked neighbours (Ps. 34[33]:4), false and evil men (Ps. 43[42]:1; cf. Isa. 25:4), those who hate the innocent (Ps. 69[68]:14), from murder (Ps. 18[17]:29), → blood (Ps. 51[50]:14), the sword (Ps. 22[21]:20), the snares of the fowler (Ps. 91[90]:3), death and famine (Ps. 33[32]:19; cf. Pss. 56[55]:13; 57 [56]:4; 86[85]:13; 89[88]:48; Job 5:20), Sheol (Ps. 86[85]:13; cf. 56[55]:13; Hos. 13:14; → Hell), the ungodly (Ps. 17[16]:13; cf. 59[58]:3; 71[70]:4; 97[96]:10), tribulations (Ps. 34[33]:17, 19), and from sins and their consequences (Pss. 39[38]:8; 40[39]:13; 79[78]:9). Dan. 3:88 LXX speaks of deliverance from destruction (cf. Job 33:17), and Ezek. 13:21, 23 of deliverance from false divination.

But the prophetic, historical and wisdom writings, as well as the Torah, celebrate the deliverance by Yahweh of his people both as a whole (Exod. 6:6; 14:30; Jdg. 6:9 B; 8:34; 2 Ki. 18:32; 2 Esd. 8:31; Mic. 4:10; 5:5; Isa. 36:15; 44:6; 48:17; 49:7, 25; 54:5, 8; Ezek. 13:21, 23; 1 Macc. 16:2) and as individuals (2 Sam. 12:7; 22:18, 44, 49; Job 5:20; 22:30; 33:17; Pss. 6:4; 7:1; 17[16]:13; 25[24]:20). Sometimes this is related to the specific historical context of the great saving acts of God, especially the exodus (Exod. 6:6; 14:30) and the settlement in Canaan (Jdg. 6:9 B; 8:34). Other instances are 2 Ki. 18:32; Isa. 36:15; Mic. 4:10; 5:5; 2 Sam. 12:7; 22:18; 2 Ki. 18:32; 3 Macc. 6:10.

The OT, like secular Gk. literature, knows of human deliverers. But there is always the implication that these act in the name of Yahweh and in his power. Thus, Moses saved the daughters of the priest of Midian (Exod. 2:17, 19). Gideon is called a saviour of Israel (Jdg. 9:17 B). The king saves Israel (2 Sam. 19:9). The king is appealed to as a deliverer (2 Sam. 14:16). It is the task of the judge to deliver (Ps. 82[81]:4; on this Ps. → lyō NT 6(d)). In Sir. 40:24 the brother or companion may be a saviour. A thief will be willing to give up all his goods in order to save himself (Prov. 6:31 LXX), and a man can save himself by giving money (3 Macc. 2:32).

2. W. Kasch holds that there is a distinctive OT emphasis in those passages where a theocentric understanding replaces the anthropocentric understanding of secular Gk. Deliverance is no longer determined by the laws of being which obtain for both gods and men but by “the creating and sustaining word of Yahweh for whom the salvation of the people and the individual is part of His creative action in the salvation history commenced by Him” (op. cit., 1001). He delivers according to his mercies (Neh. 9:28; cf. Ps. 33[32]:18f.), for his name’s sake (Ps. 79[78]:19). In Theodotion’s text of Dan. 3:96, Nebuchadnezzar confesses that “There is no god who can save thus” (but cf. 2 Ki. 18:33, where the Rabshakeh taunts Hezekiah with the question: “Has any of the gods of the nations ever delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?”; and similarly Isa. 36:19). But in the later chapters of Isa. Yahweh is celebrated as the one who delivers his people from bondage: “Thou, O LORD, art our Father, our Redeemer from of old is thy name” (Isa. 63:16; cf. 44:6; 47:4; 48:17, 20; 49:7; 51:10; 52:9; 54:5, 8; 59:20; 63:16). In all these passages of Isa. rhyomai translates gā’al. This usage is confined to Isa., apart from Gen. 48:16, though Isa. 49:25 f. and 63:5 use it for yāša’ and Isa. 50:2 has it for pāḏāh.

Deliverance in the OT has nothing magical about it. Because it has to do with historical situations, it occurs in history. On one occasion, Moses could even reproach Yahweh for failing to deliver the people (Exod. 5:23; cf. 3 Macc. 6:11). However, the deliverance came in Yahweh’s good time.

Kasch draws attention to the faith which corresponds to Yahweh’s deliverance and to which Yahweh responds: “In thee our fathers trusted; they trusted, and thou didst deliver them” (Ps. 22[21]:4; cf. v. 8; Pss. 33[32]:18f.; 34[33]:7). Unbelief amounts to the denial that Yahweh can save (Isa. 36:14–20; Wis. 2:18ff.). On the other hand, Yahweh delivers those who fear him and hope in his steadfast love (Ps. 33[32]: 18f.; Ezek. 14:20; cf. Job 22:30; 1 Macc. 2:60), and those who consider the → poor (Ps. 41; cf. Sir. 40:24). Israel so easily forget their God who rescued them from all their enemies on every side (Jdg. 8:34). But the Pss. contain the deepest expression of individual awareness of guilt and the heartfelt cry for deliverance from transgression (Pss. 39[38]:8; 40[39]:13; 79[78]:9). In the last analysis, salvation is grounded in Yahweh’s mercy (Pss. 31[30]:1; 71[70]:2; 86[85]:13).

NT The vb. is found relatively seldom in the NT – only 15 times compared with 106 instances of → sōzō. Moreover, seven of these occur in quotations or allusions to the OT; in each case God is the deliverer.

(a) The taunt of the bystanders at the crucifixion echoes Ps. 22:8 (21:9): “He trusts in God; let God deliver him now, if he desires him; for he said, ‘I am the Son of God’” (Matt. 24:43). The mockers evidently took the sufferings of Jesus and the failure of God to deliver him as conclusive disproof of his claims. The allusion to the Ps. is seen by Matt. as proof of a deeper working of God. Although God does not deliver Jesus from death in the way that might have been expected, he delivers him in a deeper sense in the resurrection. (On the use of Ps. 22 in Matt.’s passion narrative → God, art. theos, NT 6 (d).) The psalm of Zechariah at the birth of John the Baptist sees the promised deliverance from the hand of Israel’s enemies to serve God without fear as a fulfilment of the promise to Abraham (cf. Gen. 22:16f.). The psalm sees this as now imminent and the child is the promised herald of salvation.

In dealing with the question of whether God has finally rejected Israel, Paul argues (Rom. 11:26) that the present hardening is merely a temporary part of God’s purpose and that Isa. 59:20f. has yet to be fulfilled: "and so all Israel will be saved; as it is written, 'The Deliverer will come from Zion, he will banish ungodliness from Jacob.'" The quotation may also take up the thought of Ps. 14:7: "O that deliverance for Israel would come out of Zion! When the LORD restores the fortunes of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, Israel shall be glad." Isa. 27:9 speaks of the expiation of the guilt of Jacob, and the forgiveness of Israel's iniquity is a feature of the new → covenant (Jer. 31:34). (On the name Jacob → Israel, art. Iakōb.) Zion was originally the City of David but is here understood eschatologically in a way comparable to the "heavenly Jerusalem" (Gal. 4:26; → Jerusalem). The LXX reads "on account of Zion" and the MT "to Zion". The Pauline variant may be indebted to Pss. 14:7 and 52:7 LXX. What Paul gives is evidently a reinterpretation of Isa. 59:20, combined with the other passages mentioned, showing how OT prophecy has been fulfilled and will be fulfilled. (For a comparable adaptation and interpretation of the OT in the case of Eph. 4:8 [cf. Ps. 68:18] → Heaven, art. anabainō NT 5.)

Paul's account of his afflictions in Asia is expressed in language which recalls the Psalmist's praise of Yahweh's deliverance from death: "he delivered us from so deadly a peril, and he will deliver us; on whom we have set our hope that he will deliver us again" (2 Cor. 1:10). The allusion may be to the riots in Ephesus, the capital of the Roman province of Asia, which may have been more serious than might appear at first sight from Acts 19:23–40. But Paul may also be speaking of a serious illness (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7; → Fruit, art. skolops; cf. C. K. Barrett, The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 64). The request for prayer to be "delivered from wicked and evil men; for not all have faith" (2 Thess. 3:2) also recalls OT language (cf. Isa. 24:4 LXX, Ps. 140 [139]:1). In view of 1 Thess. 2:15f., this may be a reference to the Jews, especially if the letter was written from Corinth at a time when Paul was experiencing opposition there from the Jews (cf. Acts 18:5ff.). OT language is again found in 2 Tim. 3:11 in reference to Paul's sufferings at Antioch, Iconium and Lystra (cf. Acts 13:14–52; 14:1–20; 16:1–5); "yet from them all the Lord rescued me." 2 Tim. 4:17f. evidently describes a preliminary hearing of Paul's case at Rome. Although it was the custom for friends of the defendant to appear with him to give him support, no one stood by Paul. "But the Lord stood by me and gave me strength to proclaim the word fully, that all the Gentiles might hear it. So I was rescued from the lion's mouth. The Lord will rescue me from evil and save me for his heavenly kingdom. To him be glory for ever and ever. Amen." The situation recalls Dan. 6:20 and Ps. 22:21 (21:22), but doubtless refers also to the Roman practice of exposing criminals to wild beasts in the arena. It is doubtful whether this could have been the Colosseum in this case, as it was formally inaugurated by Titus only in A.D. 70. D. Guthrie, however, supposes that the lion here is metaphorical for Nero (The Pastoral Epistles, TC, 1957, 177). The absence of any further explanation makes it unlikely to be a symbolic reference to Satan (as in 1 Pet. 5:8). The expectation of future deliverance in v. 18 looks forward to deliverance through death and whatever terrifying circumstances may attend it (cf. vv. 6ff.; 1:12; 2:11ff.; Phil. 1:20ff.).

In addition to the above passages with their OT allusions, 2 Pet. 2:9 occurs in a hortatory passage which illustrates its point from the OT: "then the Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trial, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment until the day of judgment." The examples cited are → Noah and the flood (v. 5; cf. Gen. 6:1–8:22), the judgment on Sodom and Gomorrah (v.6; cf. Gen. 19:24), and the rescue of Lot (v. 7; cf. Gen. 19:16, 29). In each case the righteous is saved from the judgment which befalls the ungodly, and this is both an encouragement and a warning.

(b) Only once is rhyomai used with a clear reference to the deliverance which believers have already experienced: "He has delivered us from the dominion of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of his beloved Son" (Col. 1:13). A similar thought is expressed in Eph. 2:5–8 where believers are said to have been made alive after having been dead in trespasses and sins, and are now "saved through faith [sesōsmenoi dia pisteōs]." The passage may be understood to refer to → baptism, if this in turn be understood in terms of all that baptism stands for in the light of the cross and Christian experience of life in Christ (cf. Col. 2:12–15; 3:1–4). It could equally be said to be the true meaning of → circumcision (cf. Col. 2:11, 13). Col. 1:14 relates this deliverance to → redemption, and the → forgiveness of sins. The → kingdom in v. 13 is the reign of Christ which is contrasted with the dominion of darkness. E. Lohse points out that the passage does not mean "that those baptized have been taken up into a transcendent realm of light. There is no mention of an enthusiastic anticipation of the consummation. Rather, just as darkness designates those who are lost, light characterizes the rule of Christ, which here and now shapes the life and conduct of those who are baptized" (Colossians and Philemon, Hermeneia, 1971, 38). On the background ideas → Light and → Darkness. In whatever terms this deliverance may be expressed, the common factor of all these passages in Col. and Eph. is that it is entirely the work of Christ.

There has been considerable debate on the interpretation of Rom. 7:24: "Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death?" Man is subject to death because of sin (Rom. 5:12, 21; 6:23; cf. Gal. 6:7f.). On the question whether this passage refers to the cry of the unredeemed or that of the godly man who is all too aware of his sinful nature, so long as he remains in this world, → I Am, art. egō eimi, NT 2 (c). The answer to the question is given in Rom. 7:25: "Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord! So then, I of myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin." It suggests that the believer's life in this world remains one of conflict. The answer is further developed in ch. 8. God has done in his Son what the law was powerless to do; "he condemned sin in the flesh, in order that the just requirement of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not according to the flesh but according to the Spirit" (Rom. 8:3b, 4). The believer is not to set his mind on the flesh, but to live according to the Spirit (Rom. 8:5, cf. 6–17). Even so, the deliverance is not complete in this life. "We know that the whole creation has been groaning in travail together until now; and not only the creation, but we ourselves, who have the first fruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait for adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies" (Rom. 8:22f.). What we have now is only an anticipation of the eschatological fulfilment.

The Lord's Prayer contains the petition: "But deliver us from evil [alla rhysai hēmas apo tou ponērou]" (Matt. 6:13). The petition is omitted from the par. in Lk. 11:2ff. On the interpretation of the petition → Evil, art. ponēros NT 2 (b). Whether this is taken as a reference to being delivered from "the evil one" or from "evil" generally, the disciple is asking to be freed from the power which dominates this age and is constantly threatening him. But there is also an eschatological note. The thought of eternal salvation as the goal of deliverance is also present.

Rom. 11:26 and 1 Thess. 1:10 are also thoroughly eschatological. The former passage has already been noted in connection with its use of the OT. The latter expresses the Christian hope as waiting for God's "Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, Jesus who delivers us from the wrath to come" (→ Anger, art. orgē; → Judgment).
J. Schneider, C. Brown

σώζω	σώζω (sōzō), save, keep from harm, preserve, rescue; σωτηρία (sōtēria), salvation, deliverance, preservation; διασώζω (diasōzō), bring safely through, save, rescue.
------	---

CL 1. In the first instance both the vb. and the noun denote rescue and deliverance in the sense of averting some danger threatening life. This can happen in war (e.g. Homer, Il. 15, 290 f.; Plato, Symp. 220 d) or at sea (Homer, Od. 5; 130; Lucian, Dialogi Deorum 26, 2). But that which one is delivered from may also be an illness (SIG³ II 620, 13 f.; III 1173, 9). Where no immediate danger is mentioned, they can mean to keep or preserve (Homer, Od. 1, 83; 3, 185; 22, 357). The vb. (Homer, Il. 9, 393; Epictetus, Dissertationes 2, 17, 37 f.; Lucian, Dialogi Meretrici 9, 1) and the noun (Plutarch, Lacaenarum Apophthegmata 11) can even mean safe return home. (For further examples see W. Foerster, TDNT VII 966; Liddell-Scott, 1748, 1751.)

2. In religious contexts the gods save men from the various perils of life. They are regarded as saviours (→ sōtēr) and protectors, able to turn away the fate that threatens men.

3. For the gnostics it is knowledge given by divine revelation which frees the soul from the power of death (cf. Corp.Herm. 1, 26; 1, 29; 7, 1 f.; → Knowledge, art. ginōskō CL 2).

4. In the mystery religions deliverance comes through the initiate's sharing in the experience of the dying and rising god through the actions of the mystery cult. The 4th cent. A.D. Latin author, Julius Firmicus Maternus of Syracuse, who was a convert to Christianity from Neo-Platonism and an opponent of the mystery cults, spoke of the "initiates of the saved deity [mystai tou theou sesōsmenou]" (De Errore Profanarum Religionum 22, 1). The initiate participates in the divine being and thus attains a life which extends beyond death (Apul., Met. 11, 21). It is highly unlikely that the NT teaching on baptism was influenced by the mystery religions, not least in view of the fact that these practices considerably postdate the apostolic church (→ Baptism, art. baptizō NT 7). (For a survey of the cults and their rites see G. Wagner, Pauline Baptisms and the Pagan Mysteries: The Problem of the Pauline Doctrine of Baptism in Romans VI. 1–11, in the Light of its Religio–Historical "Parallels", 1967.)

5. In the philosophical and religious spheres, sōzō and sōtēria are used to denote the divine preservation of all things. Plato expressed belief in such an ordering in Leg. 10, 903 b. According to Cornutus of Leptis, Zeus is the one through whom all things come into being and are preserved (sōzetai) (Theologia Graeca 2 [3, 9]). The Stoic philosopher emperor of the 2nd cent. A.D., Marcus Aurelius, comforted his soul with the thought of a higher divine ordering and preservation (sōtēria) of life (Meditations 10, 1, 3). In the Hellenistic–Roman period, when belief in fate replaced that of a divine harmony, the sōzein of the gods came to include their power to save and keep from an inscrutable destiny (TDNT VII 969).

6. In the gnosticism attested by the post-Christian Hermetic literature, it is knowledge (gnōsis) which saves. It is imparted to the gnostic by revelation or by a mediator (Corp.Herm. 1, 26; 1, 29). Its content is the salvation of man from the power of death. The → soul is saved (Corp. Herm. 7, 1). On gnosticism → Knowledge, art. ginōskō CL 2; for texts see W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts, I. Patristic Evidence, 1972, II. Coptic and Mandaic Sources, 1974.

OT In the LXX sōzō translates no less than 15 different Heb. vbs., but the most important are yāša', used in the hiphil for to deliver and save, and mālaṭ, niphal to slip away, escape, piel to deliver, save. The noun sōtēria, which is also common especially in the historical books, Job, the Pss. and Isa., stands for 6 different Heb. formations, but chiefly they are connected with the vb. yāša'. For a linguistic study see J. F. A. Sawyer, Semantics in Biblical Research: New Methods of Defining Hebrew Words for Salvation, SBT Second Series 24, 1972. Sawyer's work is set against the general contentions that an adequate definition of context must precede every semantic statement; that semantic statements must be primarily synchronic, i.e. the exegete must analyse the statement in terms of the relevant point in time; that semantic universals operate in OT Hebrew as in any other language; that a structural approach is required as much for semantic description as for philological and grammatical analysis; and that semantic analysis must be monolingual, i.e. the study of comparative etymology and grammar is often irrelevant to ascertaining the meaning and usage of a word in another language.

1. sōzō and yāša'. (a). Deliverance may come about through men. In some cases it may lack any particular theological significance (e.g. 1 Sam. 23:5; cf. Gen. 47:25, ḥayāh; Jos. 6:25). It may be the relief of a besieged city (1 Sam. 11:3) or help in battle (Jdg. 12:2 f.; 13:5), though human agency does not necessarily exclude Yahweh's ultimate agency, and sometimes men are powerless to save (Jer. 14:9; Hos. 13:10). Judges, Nazirites and especially the kings had the task of delivering Israel (Jdg. 8:22; 13:5; 2 Sam. 3:18; 14:4; 2 Ki. 6:26; Hos. 13:10). The king was not only a deliverer of the nation but the deliverer of the → poor, needy and oppressed within the nation (Ps. 72[71]:4, 13).

On the other hand, the OT gives repeated, sharp reminders about human limitations. Gideon's band was reduced to three hundred men, for "The LORD said to Gideon, 'The people with you are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hand, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, "My own hand has delivered me"'" (Jdg. 7:2; cf. v. 7). It is by the power and name of Yahweh that Israel has won the land and been saved from his enemies (Ps. 44[43]:3, 6 f.). In the last analysis, victory in battle is Yahweh's work (Ps. 33[32]:16 f.; cf. 146[145]:3; Hos. 1:7; 14:4). Therefore, Isa. 30:15 counsels: "For thus said the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel, 'In returning and rest you shall be saved; in quietness and in trust shall be your strength.'" It is important to do Yahweh's work by Yahweh's appointed means. It was only by Yahweh's intervention that David was saved from bloodguilt (1 Sam. 25:26, 31, 33). Moreover, the astrologers are powerless to save (Isa. 47:14; → Magic). So too are the idols (Isa. 45:20; 46:7; Jer. 2:27 f.; 3:23; 11:12; Hos.

14:3a; → Image, art. eidōlon) and the nations (Hos. 14:3b).

(b) While Yahweh employs human agents, the pious Israelite was aware of the fact that deliverance comes ultimately from Yahweh himself. The vb. yāša' is particularly prominent in the Pss., where men look both backwards to past and forward to future deliverance from enemies and trouble. Often the Psalmist cries hōšī'āh, "Save!" or "Help!" (Pss. 12[11]:1; 20[19]:9; 28[27]:9; 60[59]:5; 86[85]:16; 108[107]:6; cf. also the formations with other suffixes in Pss. 3:7; 6:4; 7:2; 22[21]:22; 31[30]:16; 54[53]:1; 59[58]:2; 69[68]:1; 71[70]:2; 106[105]:47; 109[108]:26; 118[117]:25; 119[118]:94). Deliverance or salvation (Heb. yēšū'āh and cognates) is the work of God, but its precise content varies according to context and circumstances (cf. F. F. Bruce, "'Our God and Saviour': A Recurring Biblical Pattern", in S. G. F. Brandon, ed., The Saviour God, 1963, 54–65). In Ps. 74(73):12 sōtēria denotes the victory over the powers of chaos at the → creation (cf. Ps. 65:5–8 [64:6–9]). But it can also denote victory over historical enemies (Pss. 60[59]:11; 144[143]:10). Other senses of the noun and vb. are vindication (Pss. 72[71]:4; 76[75]:9), help (69[68]:14; 119[118]:81), and freedom from troubles and calamities (cf. the various terms used in Pss. 18[17]:19; 85[84]:7; 91[90]:16; Job 30:15). Occasionally, there are eschatological overtones: "May God be gracious to us and bless us and make his face to shine upon us, that thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving power [MT yēšū'ātekā; LXX to sōtērion sou] among all nations" (Ps. 67:1 f. [66:2 f]; cf. on these various points A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I, 1972, 277).

The theme of salvation and deliverance is by no means confined to the Pss., although both in the Pss. and elsewhere salvation has often cultic associations. At the climax of the blessing attributed to Moses reviewing Yahweh's dealings with the several tribes, Israel is seen as a unique nation: "Happy are you, O Israel! Who is like you, a people saved by the LORD, the shield of your help, and the sword of your triumph! Your enemies shall come fawning to you; and you shall tread upon their high places" (Deut. 33:29; cf. Exod. 15:2; 2 Sam. 11:13; 14:23, 39; 2 Sam. 8:6, 14 for other expressions of gratitude for deliverance in battle). Conversely, Israel's failure to trust Yahweh's saving power provokes his wrath (Ps. 78[77]:22; LXX to sōtērion autou; cf. Num. 10:9; Deut. 20:4; Isa. 17:10; Hab. 3:13). The absence of the ark prevents Yahweh from saving (1 Sam. 4:3), as does turning to other gods (Jdg. 10:12 ff.). For in the historical writings and the prophets victory comes from Yahweh (Isa. 33:3; Jer. 14:8; 15:20; 17:14; Zeph. 3:17).

Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple in 2 Chr. 6:41 contains the petition: "And now arise O LORD God, and go to thy resting place, thou and the ark of thy might. Let thy priests, O LORD God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in thy goodness." The par. in Ps. 132[131]:9 → "righteousness" instead of "salvation", but that in v. 16 has "salvation". The thought expresses a heartfelt desire that the priests should be characterized by righteousness (cf. Isa. 11:5; 61:10) and thus be instruments of the divine blessing, which is at once pure and holy and at the same time brings deliverance to the people (cf. 2 Chr. 6:36–39). H.-J. Kraus suggests that there may be an underlying allusion to the function of the priests as the givers of oracles of salvation (Psalmen, BKAT 15, 1960, 886). Something of the sort would fit the context, for the preceding verses deal with the possibility of repentance and restoration after the people have gone astray. It would therefore be appropriate for the priests to lead the people into the ways of righteousness which bring deliverance from trouble. A. A. Anderson rightly rejects the suggestion of W. O. E. Oesterley that the priests must be clothed in “fitting – i.e. festal – garments” (op. cit., II, 883; cf. Oesterley, The Psalms, 1939, 532). For whilst the appropriate cultic dress was the prerequisite of temple worship, the whole context suggests that more than liturgical propriety is at stake here. Correct outer vestments should correspond to an inner righteousness which comes from Yahweh alone. For similar parallelism see Isa. 61:10.

Another expression with cultic overtones is “the cup of salvation” (Ps. 116:13 [115:4]; cf. 16:5). In reply to his own question, “What shall I render to the LORD for all his bounty to me?” (v. 12), the psalmist can only receive with gratitude what Yahweh freely gives him and rededicate himself: “I will lift up the cup of salvation and call on the name of the LORD, I will pay my vows to the LORD in the presence of his people.” Anderson suggests four possible interpretations of the “cup” (op. cit., II, 794): (1) a drink offering of wine which was part of the thank offering (cf. Num. 28:7); (2) a metaphor of deliverance, and the opposite of the cup of Yahweh’s wrath (cf. Isa. 51:17; Jer. 25:15); (3) a cup connected with some particular ordeal (cf. Num. 5:16–28); (4) a cup of wine used at the thanksgiving meal (cf. Ps. 23:5). Anderson prefers the first of these alternatives in view of its association with something rendered to Yahweh. However, the suggestion is attractive that such a cup necessarily stands in contrast with the cup of Yahweh’s wrath, and therefore this idea may also be present. Similarly in Exod. 14:13 man’s rôle is that of trusting response in which the exodus provides a pattern: “And Moses said to the people, ‘Fear not, stand firm, and see the salvation of the LORD, which he will work for you today; for the Egyptians whom you see today, you shall never see again. The LORD will fight for you, and you have only to be still.’”

Here the salvation in question is an earthly and historical one. S. R. Driver suggests that salvation and deliverance “seldom, if ever, express a spiritual state exclusively: their common theological sense in Hebrew is that of a material deliverance attended by spiritual blessings (e.g. Is. 12, 2; 45, 17)” (Notes on the Hebrew Text and Topography of the Books of Samuel, 1913², 119). However, certain passages in the prophets have an eschatological dimension. In the last days Yahweh will bring full salvation for his people (e.g. Isa. 43:5 ff.; Jer. 31:7; 46:27; Zech. 8:7; → Present, art. hēmera OT). Then Israel “will draw water from the wells of salvation” (Isa. 12:3), and the whole world will share in this salvation (Isa. 45:22; 49:6).

Finally, it may be noted that the Heb. vb. yāšaʿ and the divine name are combined in certain proper names which celebrate Yahweh as the deliverer: e.g. Isaiah (Heb. yāša yāhū, Salvation of Yah) which was the name given to the prophet (Isa. 1:1; 2 Ki. 19:2; 2 Chr. 26:22; 32:20, 32 etc.) and various others (1 Chr. 25:3, 15; 26:25); Joshua (Heb. yēhōšuaʿ, yēhōšuaʿ, and later yēšuaʿ, Yah or Yahweh is salvation), the name given to Moses’ successor (Exod. 17:9 ff.; Deut. 1:38; 3:21, 28; 31:3 ff.; Jos. 1:1 etc.) and numerous others (e.g. 1 Sam. 6:14, 18; Hag. 1:12, 14; Ezra 2:6, 40); and cf. Hosea (Heb. hōšeaʿ, salvation), the original name of Joshua (Num. 13:8, 16), the last king of Israel (2 Ki. 15:30; 17:1, 3, 4, 6; 18:1, 9 f.), the prophet (Hos. 1:2) and different chiefs (1 Chr. 27:20; Neh. 10:24). In some cases the person so named was a living testimony to Yahweh’s saving power; in others the life was a denial of the name. The name of Jesus derives from Joshua (→ Jesus Christ, art. Jēsous: → also Name; cf. BDB 221, 447).

2. The vb. mālaṭ means in the niphāl to slip away, slip through (1 Sam. 20:29; 2 Sam. 4:6), and so to escape (e.g. Jdg. 3:29; 1 Sam. 19:10–17; 30:17; 1 Ki. 18:40; 20:20; 2 Ki. 10:24; Isa. 10:6; 49:24 f.; Jer. 46:6; 48:8, 19; Ezek. 17:15, 18; Amos 9:1; Jon. 3:5; Zech. 2:11; Mal. 3:15). In the piel it means to deliver or save (1 Sam. 19:11; 2 Sam. 19:6; 1 Ki. 1:12; Ps. 41:2; Job 22:30; 29:12; Ps. 107|106|:20), and in particular to save life (1 Sam. 19:11; 2 Sam. 19:6; 1 Ki. 1:12; Jer. 48:6; 51:6, 45; Ezek. 33:5; Amos 2:14 f.; Job 20:20; Pss. 89|88|:49; 116|114|:6). It is the testimony of the fathers of Israel that they trusted in God to deliver them: “To thee they cried, and were saved; in thee they trusted, and were not disappointed” (Ps. 22|21|:5; cf. 8, 21). Job’s comforter, Eliphaz the Temanite argued that “God abases the proud, but he saves the lowly. He delivers the innocent man; you will be delivered through the cleanness of your hands” (Job 22:29 f.). The implication was drawn that Job’s sufferings were divine retribution for some sin that he had not put right. But the message of the Book of Job is that suffering is not necessarily the direct effect of such a cause and that God’s ways are more marvellous than man can comprehend (cf. chs. 38–41). In the end God delivered Job and restored to him more than he had at first (Job 42), rebuking the folly of the comforters with their facile explanations.

Numerous passages warn against turning for deliverance to things which, in worldly wisdom, man would naturally expect to save him from calamity: an army or the strength of a war horse (Ps. 33|34|:16 f.), the might of a foreign state (Isa. 20:6), wealth (Job 20:20; Eccl. 8:8, where wickedness is also a possible reading), or one’s own understanding (Prov. 28:26). The true wisdom which saves is different from man’s native understanding (Prov. 28:26; Eccl. 9:15). But there is no escape for the worshippers of Baal (1 Ki. 19:17) or even the whole nation of Israel in its guilt (Amos 2:14 f.; 9:1), the king (Jer. 32:4), and the Babylonian makers of idols (Isa. 46:2). In the coming deliverance prophesied by Isa. 49:24 f., the captives will be delivered from those who held them captive. In the last days those who call on the name of the Lord will be saved (Joel 2:32 [3:5]). In Dan. 12:1 it is they whose names are written in the book of life.

3. In the apocryphal books sōzō is seldom used of one person rescuing another (exceptions are 1 Macc. 6:44; 9:21; 3 Macc. 7:20). It is more often found in the middle and passive of being saved through flight (e.g. 1 Macc. 2:44; 9:9; 10:83; 11:48). It is the theme of 4 Macc. that deliverance cannot be found by abandoning the law (9:4; 15:2, 8, 27; cf. Jud. 10:15; 11:3; for further discussion see W. Foerster, TDNT VII 981). The vb. is always used in the context of dire threat to life. The vast majority of cases have to do with God’s rescuing of the godly (Wis. 9:18; 16:7; 18:5; 1 Macc. 3:18; 4:9, 11; 9:46; 2 Macc. 1:25; 8:27; 4 Macc. 4:14; 17:22; Sir. 48:8). Conversely, the heathen gods cannot save (Ep. Jer. 49). The noun sōtēria is found e.g. in Wis. 5:2; 6:24; 16:6; 18:7; Sir. 4:23; 40:7; 46:1; 1 Macc. 3:6; 4:25; 5:62; 2 Macc. 3:29, 32; 7:25; 11:6; 12:25; 13:3; 14:3; 3 Macc. 6:13, 33, 36; 7:16, 22; 4 Macc. 9:4; 12:6; 15:2, 8, 27). The idea of an eternal salvation which comes from God, as contrasted with an earthly one which comes from man with its attendant compromises, is present in 4 Macc. 15:3; cf. Wis. 5:2; Tob. 14:4, 7 v.l.; Bar. 4:24, 29.

In Eth. En. 106:16 the idea of being saved occurs in reference to the flood. But the idea occurs most frequently in statements to the effect that the ungodly have no salvation or hope of salvation (Eth. En. 5:6; 98:10, 14; 99:1; 102:1; cf. also 5:6; 48:7; 50:3; 62:13). In Test. XII salvation is applied to the individual in both temporal deliverance (Test. Reub. 3:9; Test. Jos. 10:3; Test. Lev. 2:4; Test. Gad 4:7; 5:7; Test. Dan 6:9) and eternal salvation (Test. Ben. 4:1; Test. Ash. 5:2; cf. 6:6; Test. Lev. 4:1; Test. Reub. 5:5; Test. Gad 7:5; Test. Zeb. 10:3). Over against the eternal salvation stands eternal punishment, in which the wicked are cast into the fire. The godly individual attains salvation by his prayers and piety and by God's help. But Test. XII also speak of the eschatological salvation of Israel in which even the nations also participate (Test. Jud. 22:2; Test. Ash. 7:3; Test. Ben. 10:5). In particular the salvation springs from Levi and Judah (Test. Jos. 19:11; Test. Dan 5:10; Test. Lev. 2:10; Test. Naph. 8:2 f.; Test. Sim. 7:1 f.)

Pss. Sol. contain the same two lines of thought of salvation for the godly individual (16: 4f.; 3:5; 6:1; 13:2, 7; 15:6) and the nation (Pss. Sol. 17 and 18; cf. 10:8; 12:6), but there is no unambiguous expression of eternal salvation (W. Foerster, TDNT VII 985). 2 Esd. speaks of the saving intervention of God in the history of Israel (14:29) and in the last days (9:7; 13:23; 14:34). 2 Esd. 5:45 and 14:35 refer to the quickening of the creation. "Many have been created, but few shall be saved" (2 Esd. 8:3; cf. 8:41; 9:13; see further W. Foerster, TDNT VII 985 f.).

5. Josephus generally uses both the noun and the vb. in the sense of rescuing someone from death, a city from an enemy, or the land and the temple from destruction (W. Foerster, TDNT VII 986; cf. War 5, 480; 7, 67; Ant. 8, 115). There are possible eschatological overtones in War 6, 285, though the utterance is attributed to a false prophet, and in general Josephus does not use sōzō and sōtēria in a theologically pregnant manner. Similarly, Philo frequently uses them in the sense of rescuing from danger or preservation in a temporal sense. But his main interest lies in the relationship between God and the godly man (e.g. Sobr. 55; Migr. Abr. 122–125). God is the saviour (→ sōtēr) who not only preserves order but saves and helps in the struggles of the soul against the passions. "If Philo's allegorising entails an importing of alien Gk. thoughts into the text of the Torah, his use of the sōzō group, esp. sōtēria, shows that Gk. thinking was not able to destroy entirely the influence of the OT. For Philo the content of sōtēria is not that man maintains his own humanity but that in Platonic fashion he acquires a share of the divine forces by subduing the passions. The ref. to God's help permits him to speak of a pantelēs sōtēria which God grants: God is boēthos to the contemplative soul hōs charisasthai pantelē sōtērian autē, Ebr. 111; cf. Som. 1, 86; Migr. Abr. 2 and 124; Ebr., 72" (W. Foerster, TDNT VII 989).

6. The Qumran literature frequently refers to God's saving and helping in the history of Israel (1QM 4:13; 10:4 f.; 11:3; 14:4 f.; 18:7; CD 5:19; 1QS 1:18 f.). But God's saving also figures in the personal life of the godly. The Hymns testify to the experiences enjoyed by the one who trusts in the help of God: "Thou hast saved me from the zeal of lying interpreters, and from the congregation of those who seek smooth things" (1QH 2:32). "I will praise Him when distress is unleashed and will magnify Him also because of His salvation" (1QS 10:17; cf.; 1QH 5:11 f.; 11:23 f.). God has created the righteous to "enlarge his straitened soul to eternal salvation" (1QH 15:16). Regarded eschatologically, it is not the individual but God's people as a whole which is the object of salvation. 1QM 1:12 speaks of the "time of [great] tribulation for the people which God shall redeem” (cf. 14:5). God saves his people from the power of darkness with a view to eternal salvation (1QH frag. 18:5; cf. 1QH 15:15). Redemption is eternal (1QM 1:12; 18:11) and correspondingly destruction is certain for the nations of wickedness (1QM 15:1 f.). For further discussion see W. Foerster, TDNT VII 982 f.

7. In rabbinic writings yāša' tends to recede in favour of nāṣal. The helping intervention of God is more prominent than the saving work of men. The most frequent reference is to the bringing of Israel out of → Egypt, which serves as a type of eschatological redemption (SB II 139, 141; cf. TDNT VII 987).

NT The vb. sōzō is found in the NT 106 times and the compound vb. diasōzō 8 times; the noun sōtēria occurs 45 times.

1. The meaning of deliverance from immediate physical danger to life is comparatively rare. It is found, e.g., in the account of Paul's shipwreck (Acts 27:20, 31, 34). It may be noted that 5 out of the 8 instances of diasōzō come in the account of how Paul escaped various dangers including shipwreck on his way to Rome (Acts 23:24; 27:43, 44; 28:1, 4). The remaining three examples of the compound vb. refer to the sick who touched Jesus' garment being made well (Matt. 14:36), the plea of the centurion to heal his slave (Lk. 7:3), and to the eight souls, including → Noah, who were “saved through water” (1 Pet. 3:20). The last instance refers to physical danger but has soteriological overtones and is seen as a parallel to → baptism with its symbolism of cleansing and death and resurrection (v. 21). Otherwise, sōzō occurs in Peter's cry, “Lord, save”, in the stilling of the storm (Matt. 8:25) and “Lord, save me”, in the walking on the water (Matt. 14:30). Some scholars think that the words, which are found only in Matt., have a liturgical ring about them (cf. D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 166). No doubt, they point beyond their immediate narrative context to the condition of the hearer and reader. A number of passages use sōzō in the sense of saving from death, but again there are overtones of divine deliverance. At the crucifixion the bystanders derided Jesus, saying, “‘Aha! You who would destroy the temple and build it in three days, save yourself, and come down from the cross!’ So also the chief priests mocked him to one another with the scribes saying, ‘He saved others; he cannot save himself’” (Mk. 15:29 ff. par. Matt. 27:39 f.; cf. Mk. 13:2; 14:58; Jn. 2:19). In Lk.'s account, “One of the criminals who were hanged railed at him, saying, ‘Are you not the Christ? Save yourself and us!’” (Lk. 23:39). But the other criminal sought salvation in terms of repentance and mercy and was promised by Jesus that he would be with him that day in → paradise (Lk. 23:43). Jesus' cry of dereliction prompted some to say, “Wait, let us see whether Elijah will come to save him” (Matt. 27:49; → Elijah; → God, art. theos NT 6 (d)). In Gethsemane Jesus prayed, “Now is my soul troubled. And what shall I say, ‘Father, save me from this hour’? No, for this purpose I have come to this hour” (Jn. 12:27). Jesus' Gethsemane prayer is reflected upon in Heb. 5:7: “In the days of his flesh, Jesus offered up prayers and supplications, with loud cries and tears, to him who was able to save him from death, and he was heard for his godly fear.” Finally, the saving of → Noah is seen as God's response to Noah's faith: “By faith Noah, being warned by God concerning events yet unseen, took heed and constructed an ark for the saving of his household; by this he condemned the world and became an heir of the righteousness which comes by faith” (Heb. 11:7). In these passages the saving in question is the saving from physical death. The passion narratives show that God has purposes which transcend such saving. The word-group is never found in the NT with the meaning of simply protecting or maintaining life.

2. In the Synoptic accounts of Jesus' → miracles of → healing, the vb. sōzō is used 16 times and diasōzō twice (see 1 above). The noun sōtēria is found in Lk. (1:69, 71, 77; 19:9) and Jn. (4:22), but not in Matt. or Mk. The healing in these stories is always of the whole man. The → faith of the person is of great importance for its achievement. It makes effective Christ's saving power: "Your faith has made you well" (Mk. 10:52; Lk. 8:48; 17:19; 18:42); "Your faith has saved you" (Matt. 9:22 par. Mk. 5:34, Lk. 8:48; Lk. 7:50). Here sōzō has the sense of making well, delivering from the evil, physical affliction. Commenting on the healing of the woman, D. Hill writes: "The faith that made her well is the expectant admission, by reason of her presence and action, that only Jesus can deal with her condition. This confidence is the ground on which Jesus authoritatively banishes her illness. It is the word of Jesus which heals, not the woman's action or faith" (op. cit., 179). Jesus' acts of healing were continued in those of the → apostles. They were carried out in the → name of → Jesus Christ (Acts 4:10) and similarly presupposed the faith necessary for healing (Acts 14:9; cf. Jas. 5:15).

The particular theological and soteriological significance of the word-group is largely latent in the Synoptic tradition. Zechariah's psalm at the birth of his son, John, makes three references to the salvation which the child will herald, but does so in terms of the OT thought-world. He blesses God for raising up "a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David" (Lk. 1:69). "As an animal's strength is in its horn so God is a 'horn' in effecting his mighty act of salvation (Ps. 18:2; cf. Dt. 33:17; 1QH 9:28f.). The ancient title for God is applied to Messiah. In the Old Testament there is an undefined fusion of Yahweh and his 'messenger'. This may be present here. Cf. Jg. 6:11–23; 13:21 f.; Mal. 3:1" (E. E. Ellis, The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966, 76). The salvation is construed as being "saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us" (Lk. 1:71; → rhyomai NT). The child is sent by God "to give knowledge of salvation to his people in the forgiveness of their sins" (Lk. 1:77; cf. Mal. 4:5; Mk. 1:4). Whereas in the OT cleansing from sin was a precondition of physical salvation from one's enemies, this psalm suggests that it is the precondition of light and peace (Lk. 1:78 f.; cf. Mal. 4:2; Isa. 9:2), which are now understood primarily in terms of a personal relationship with God in Christ. Matt. 1:21 explains the name Jesus: "for he shall save his people from their sins."

Jesus is a form of Joshua, but whereas Joshua was God's agent in saving ancient Israel from his enemies, Jesus is God's saviour from sin (see above OT 1 (b); → Jesus Christ, art. Iēsous OT).

Certain passages in the Synoptic Gospels imply eschatological salvation. In a saying following his challenge to take up one's → cross, Jesus declares: "For whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake and the gospel's will save it" (Mk. 8:35 par. Matt. 16:25, Lk. 9:24; cf. Jn. 12:25). "Jesus' words envision men before a court where denial of association with him will bring release while affirmation of 'Jesus and the gospel' issues in martyrdom. He thoroughly appreciates the frailty of human life threatened by death, but warns that the man who seeks to secure his own existence by denial of his Lord brings about his own destruction.

Paradoxically, the man who yields his life in loyalty to Jesus safeguards it in a deeper sense . . . In the second half of Mark 'the gospel' always denotes the message announced by the Church, of which Jesus is the content (Chs. 8:35; 10:29; 13:10; 14:9), precisely as in Ch. 1:1. Mark knew experientially that for the gospel men abandoned their goods (Ch. 10:29) and gave their lives (Ch. 8:35). It is possible that he has preserved an early Christian slogan, 'for Christ and the gospel', for which believers suffered and overcame" (W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 308 f.). Following the saying about the camel and the eye of a needle, the disciples asked "Then who can be saved?" (Mk. 10:26 par. Matt. 19:26, Lk. 18:26; → Animal, art. Animals in the NT; → Possessions). Jesus replied: "With men it is impossible, but not with God; for all things are possible with God" (Mk. 10:27 par.). "Salvation is completely beyond the sphere of human possibilities; every attempt to enter the Kingdom on the basis of achievement or merit is futile. Yet even the rule of the impossibility of entrance into the Kingdom for the rich is limited by the sovereign action of God himself" (W. L. Lane, op. cit., 370).

This salvation has, however, become a present fact through the actions of Jesus which bring forgiveness of sins. It is brought out by Lk. in his account of the change that came over Zacchaeus. "And Jesus said to him, 'Today salvation has come to this house, since he also is a son of Abraham. for the Son of man came to seek and to save the lost'" (Lk. 19:9 f.; cf. Lk. 15:1–32).

3. In the proclamation of the primitive church, sōzō and sōtēria gained a central importance through their application to Christ as the basis, content and goal of the → gospel. They are used to sum up the essential characteristic of his mission. This is clearly expressed in Acts. In Acts 4:12 Peter declares to the assembled religious leaders that "there is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved." E. Haenchen is doubtless correct when he says that here "sōtēria embraces both 'healing' and 'salvation'" (The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 217). The occasion was Peter's defence after being arrested for healing the lame man in the temple in the → name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth (Acts 3:6; cf. 4:9 f.). Peter had taken the opportunity to preach Jesus as the servant foretold by the prophets and whom God had raised up and "sent to you first, to bless you, in turning every one of you from your wickedness" (Acts 3:26). Acts 4:12 makes an absolute and universal claim for the Christian message of salvation. The apostolic kerygma which was addressed first to the Jews (Acts 13:26) and then to the Gentiles (Acts 16:17 etc.) excludes every other way of salvation (Acts 13:38; 15:10 f.), for salvation can be gained only by faith in Christ (Acts 16:31). The salvation given to the one who believes consists in the forgiveness of sins (Acts 10:43; cf. 26:18) and a new relationship with God.

In Acts, statements about salvation focus on the immediate present. The offer of salvation is linked with the demand, "Save yourselves from this crooked generation" (Acts 2:40). A mention of future salvation is found in Acts 2:20, alluding to Joel 2:32 (MT 3:5): "And it shall be that whoever calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved." The Joel prophecy refers to the end-time, and its use implies that the end time has now dawned. It should be noted that "the name" for Joel was that of Yahweh, whereas in Acts it is applied to Jesus. In him God is personally present in a saving way.

C. Brown

4. In his major epistles addressed to specific churches, Paul uses sōzō and sōtēria exclusively for the saving activity of God. The message of saving grace comes to men through the kerygma. The → gospel brings salvation (Eph. 1:13). “It is the power of God for salvation to every one who has faith” and brings deliverance from destruction (Rom. 1:16; cf. 1 Cor. 1:21). The word of the → cross especially is the power of God for those who are being saved (1 Cor. 1:18). In 1 Cor. 15:2 Paul states that Christians have obtained deliverance; they have been saved by the grace of God through faith (Eph. 2:8). In Eph. 1:13 we have a comprehensive picture of the process of salvation; the believers addressed in the epistle have heard the gospel before their deliverance, they came to faith and were sealed with the Holy → Spirit. Paul’s statements about the goal of his missionary activity correspond to this. He was intent on bringing the news of salvation to as many Jews and Gentiles as possible through the preaching of the gospel (Rom. 1:15; 11:14; 1 Cor. 9:22; 10:33; 1 Thess. 2:16; cf. also 1 Cor. 7:16). Those who have been saved through faith are contrasted with those who are perishing (1 Cor. 1:18; 2 Cor. 2:15). The apostle testifies to the fact that salvation is a present reality through the divine means of grace presented and offered to men, when he adds to his quotation of Isa. 49:8 the words “now is the day of salvation” (2 Cor. 6:2).

From Rom. 8:24, “For we have been saved, though only in hope [tē gar elpidi esōthēmen]” (NEB), we can see how strongly Paul was conscious of the inner relationship between present and future salvation. The very fact that we have already been saved makes the expectation of final eschatological salvation the greater reality. Moreover, the final verdict is passed at that time (1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). This future salvation, which is “nearer to us now than when we first believed” (Rom. 13:11), is the goal towards which Christians press. All present warning, discipline and punishment have as their purpose that we should not forfeit this eschatological salvation (cf. 1 Cor. 5:1–13; 9:24–27; 2 Cor. 2:10; → Discipline, art. enkrateia; → Destroy, art. olethros). Accordingly, in Phil. 2:12 those who have been saved by God’s grace are exhorted to work out their future, and therefore final, salvation by a sanctified life in fear and trembling. According to God’s plan of salvation, all Israel will share in the future salvation after the fullness of the Gentiles has come in (into the church of God) (Rom. 11:25 f.). In this final, eschatological salvation (Phil. 2:12; 1 Thess. 5:8 f.; 2 Thess. 2:13) we are concerned firstly with deliverance from the coming wrath of God (Rom. 5:9; 1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5; 1 Thess. 1:10; 5:9; → Anger) and secondly with the granting of the divine → glory (doxa). Then Christians are conformed to the → image of the Son of God, and so God’s activity, begun with his choice of believers for salvation from the beginning, reaches its conclusion (Rom. 8:29; 2 Thess. 2:13 f.).

5. In the Pastoral Epistles there is a whole series of statements about salvation which shows a comprehensive understanding of it.

(a) God desires the salvation of all. He desires all men to be saved and to come to a → knowledge of the truth (1 Tim. 2:4; on the use of “all” in connexion with Christ’s ransom death in 1 Tim. 2:6 → lytron NT 2).

(b) The task of Jesus was to save sinners; that is why he came into the world (1 Tim. 1:15). This confessional statement is strengthened by the apostle’s personal testimony that he himself had experienced the saving power of grace, knowing himself to be the chief of sinners.

(c) The present experience of salvation is testified to in a number of passages. God has saved us and called us with a holy calling (2 Tim. 1:9). In this → call, operative through divine → grace, lies the basis for our appropriation of salvation. We find the thought that God has saved us, not because of the deeds we have done, but in virtue of his own mercy, also in Tit. 3:5. Here salvation is linked with → baptism and renewal of life through the Holy Spirit (→ Birth, art. palingenesia). 2 Tim. 3:14 f. declares that knowledge of the Scriptures can bring to salvation through faith in Jesus Christ (cf. Jn. 5:39; 2 Cor. 3:14; Heb. 4:2).

(d) 2 Tim. 4:18 speaks of the coming salvation. The apostle is confident that the Lord will rescue him into his → Kingdom (here called epouranion, heavenly, i.e. eschatological). In 2 Tim 2:10 Paul affirms that his sufferings are a necessary service for the elect, so “that they also may obtain the salvation which in Christ Jesus goes with eternal glory.” In 1 Tim. 4:16 the future perfection of salvation is promised to Timothy and his hearers, provided he shows discipline and faithfulness in teaching and life. 1 Tim. 2:15 points out that women will obtain it through faith, love and holiness without abandoning their sexual rôle as mothers. This may be aimed at demands for emancipation, or against a despising of the physical. But it may also be designed to counter a misunderstanding of Gen. 2:3, 16, especially in view of the allusion to Eve in vv. 13 f. (For a review of interpretations see D. Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles, TC, 1957, 77 ff.; C. Spicq, Les Épîtres Pastorales, 1947, 72 ff.; M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 47 ff.).

6. In 1 Pet. the apostle uses sōtēria, along with a number of other expressions, to express final salvation. Christians are guarded by God’s power through faith for this salvation, which is already there, but which will be revealed only in the last time (1:5). Christians “grow up” to this salvation through the spiritual food which they receive through preaching and teaching (2:2), so that finally they reach the goal of their faith, i.e. hymōn sōtēria psychōn (“your souls’ salvation”), the glorification which is to be theirs (1:9). Already the prophets had pondered on and prophesied about it (1:10).

In 1 Pet. the vb. sōzō is found only in 4:18 (quoting Prov. 11:31) and 3:21. In the latter passage → baptism expresses the saving power of God; it saves now because of the → resurrection of Jesus Christ from the destruction to which men become subject because of their sins. In this sense it is an antitype of the saving of → Noah and his family “through water” (3:20). It is noteworthy that although 1 Pet. repeatedly mentions present salvation, the apostle seldom uses the word-group we are considering; he employs such terms as elytrōthete (1:18), “you were ransomed”, anagennēsas (1:3), “born anew”.

In 2 Pet. 3:15 the readers are exhorted to take God’s forbearance, the chief reason for the delay in the parousia, as motive to be concerned with their final salvation, which is guaranteed only if they do not give up their efforts for sanctification. Eschatology and ethics are, as with Paul, closely linked.

7. In Hebrews Christ is the pioneer (archēgos), the source (aitios) and intermediary (mesitēs) of the sōtēria, salvation (Heb. 2:10; 5:9; 7:25; → Beginning, art. archē NT 4; → Covenant, art. mesitēs NT 2). At his first coming Jesus laid the foundation for the future saving activity of God by his atoning sacrifice. As the one who lives for ever, he can save those who come to God through him (Heb. 7:25). At his second coming he will appear as the perfecter of salvation (Heb. 9:28). In all aspects salvation is the goal of God's activity with men. The salvation brought by Christ is perfect and eternally valid (Heb. 5:9). Heb. points also to the fact that the saving activity of God in Christ began already with Christ's → proclamation (Heb. 1:1 f.). From him it came to the hearers of his word, who passed it on, while it was confirmed by God by signs, wonders, various miracles and by gifts of the Holy Spirit (Heb. 2:3 f.). The → angels also have been appointed by God to serve in his revelation of salvation; they are instruments in God's will to save (Heb. 1:14). In Heb. 6:9 ta kreissona kai echomena sōtērias means "the better things that belong to salvation". That is the better things to which the writer refers after his earnest exhortation, having left "the elementary doctrines" of vv. 1 f.

8. In James, which uses only the vb. sōzō, deliverance in the final judgment is always meant, except in Jas. 5:15 where it means to heal. The same is true of Jude, where both the noun (v. 3) and the vb. (v. 23) are found. In v. 5 the rescue of Israel from → Egypt is the subject.

9. The word-group is little represented in the Johannine writings. Doubtless this is connected with the fact that in John "eternal life" is the determinative concept of the statements about salvation (→ Life, art. zōē). sōtēria is found only once in the Gospel in the remark to the Samaritan woman: "Salvation is from the Jews" (Jn. 4:22; → Samaritans; → sōtēr NT 1). sōzō in the sense of salvation – bringing action occurs 4 times. In Jn. 3:17 and 12:47 Jesus says that he has come not to judge but to save the world; in Jn. 5:34 the word is applied to the Jews, in Jn. 10:9 to believers. The Son of God is the true and only mediator of salvation. In Jn. 11:12 and 12:27 the vb. has the general meaning of being delivered from physical and emotional need.

In Rev. only the noun is found, in all 3 cases in liturgical passages of worship. In Rev. 7:10 the great multitude attributes salvation to God and the → Lamb; this is heard again in Rev. 12:10 after the fall of the → dragon, and in Rev. 19:1 after the fall of → Babylon. The songs of triumph and victory proclaim that now, after the conquest of all enemies of God, salvation, glory and power belong to God alone.

J. Schneider

σωτήρ

σωτήρ (sōtēr), saviour, deliverer, preserver; σωτήριος (sōtērios), saving, delivering, preserving, bringing salvation, means of deliverance, deliverance.

CL 1. The noun sōtēr, formed from sōzō, includes the connotations of sōzō and sōtēria. It is applied almost exclusively to the gods or men. But there are exceptions, such as when it is applied to a personified river (Hdt., 8, 138, 1).

2. The gods are saviours from the dangers of life and also protectors and preservers of men. In the oldest text attesting sōtēr, Poseidon is addressed as the saviour of men (Hymni Homericī, Ad Neptunum, 22, 5. It could even be applied to a female, Leda (Hymni Homericī, Ad Castores, 33, 6 f.). The title was accorded to numerous gods, but especially to Zeus (Pindar, Ol. 5, 17; Fragment 30, 5; IG II²410, 18; Plato, Rep. 9, 583b; cf. Liddell-Scott, 1751; W. Foerster, TDNT VII 1004 f.). Isis and Serapis were also frequently called saviours (e.g. Artem., Oneirocriticum 2, 39). Also in the Hellenistic-Roman period Asclepius was regarded as a saviour of the sick (Clem. Alex., Protrepticus 2, 26, 8; cf. TDNT VII 1005).

3. Men could also be called saviours, in saving others from trouble and danger, and also in the case of doctors (Soph., OT 302–4). Plato could call the ideal ruler who governed and preserved the state a sōtēr in the sense of a protector (Rep. 5, 463b). The term could also be applied to philosophers, particularly Epicurus (Polystratus, Herc. 346, p. 80, 5). It was widely applied to statesmen and rulers. Thus, Philip of Macedon was hailed by the inhabitants of Thessaly as friend, benefactor and saviour (Dem., Orationes 18, 43). But it is difficult to ascertain what religious overtones such an appellation had (cf. TDNT VII 1008). Use of the term is also found in Cicero (In Verrem 2, 2, 63, 154; Tusculanae Disputationes 1, 14, 32; De Re Republica 1, 7, 12) and various other sources.

In the Hellenistic ruler cult the lord became part of the official title of kings, and divine honours were accorded them. theos sōtēr was regularly incorporated into the Ptolomaic and Seleucid royal titles (for details, see TDNT VII 1009). This development found its strongest expression in the Roman imperial cultus. The term sōtēr tēs oikoumenēs, saviour of the (inhabited) world, was first applied to Caesar (IG 12, 5, 1, 557), and sōtēr tou kosmou, saviour of the world, is attested from the time of Hadrian, but is probably older (TDNT VII 1010; cf. W. Weber, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte des Kaisers Hadrian, 1907). However, sōtēr was not incorporated into the official titles of the Roman rulers. The inscriptions hail Hadrian as sōtēr of a particular city. The appellation “saviour of the world” was a generalization. It was rare for an emperor to allow himself to be called sōtēr on coins. The idea of the emperor as a benefactor was also linked with that of the golden age of peace, order and prosperity inaugurated by his beneficent rule. Thus the decree from Halicarnassus, which probably dates from the later years of Augustus in the 1st century B.C. and may be the copy of a general decree of the province of Asia, proclaims: “Whereas the eternal and immortal nature of the Universe, in its grace to men, has added a thing of the greatest good to the exceeding benefits already given, having brought to us Caesar Augustus, who in the happy life of our time is father of his own country, dea Roma, Zeus the Paternal, Saviour (sōtēr) of the whole race of men, and whose providence has not only fulfilled but even exceeded the prayers of all – for there is peace on land and sea; the cities flourish in obedience to law and in concord (homonoia) and prosperity; and there is a culmination and abundance of all good, of bright hopes for the future and joy in the present, with men filled to overflowing with [delight in] games and offerings and sacrifices and hymns . . .” (E. Barker, ed., From Alexander to Constantine: Passages and Documents Illustrating the History of Social and Political Ideas 336 B.C. – A.D. 337, [1956] 1959, 213). Similarly, the Priene Inscription (c. 9 B.C.) hails Augustus as “a saviour for us” (op. cit., 212; for text → Gospel, art. euangelion CL 2 (c)). Although the emperor is a saviour in a thoroughly this-worldly sense, he has been empowered in this office by the gods or divine providence.

4. The adj. sōtērios, saving, delivering, bringing safety or deliverance to, is found in cl. Gk. applied both to men, e.g. someone who brings safety to the state (Soph., OC 487 codd.), and to the gods (BGU 362, 5, 1 [3rd cent. A.D.]), including Zeus (Soph., El. 281; Fragment 425) (Liddell-Scott, 1751).

OT sōtēr occurs in the LXX some 36 times for the Heb. yēšū’āh, yēša’ or the participle mōšā’a’ of the vb. yāša’ in the hiphil. On yēšū’āh as the proper name Joshua → sōzō OT 1 (b).

1. In Jdg. 3:9, 15 “saviour” might be taken as a technical term for the judges. At the time of the judges, Yahweh raised up such “saviours” for Israel who rescued them from their enemies (cf. 12:3). “Then the LORD raised up judges, who saved [esōsen] them out of the power of those who plundered them” (Jdg. 2:16). Similarly Ezra, reviewing the course of God’s dealings with his people, commented on Israel’s rebellion thus: “Therefore thou didst give them into the hand of their enemies, who made them suffer; and in the time of their suffering they cried unto thee and thou didst hear them from Heaven; and according to thy great mercies thou didst give them saviours who saved them [sōtēras kai esōsas] from the hand of their enemies” (Neh. 9:27). Nevertheless, Jdg. 2:18 stresses that it was Yahweh who is the ultimate source of the saving: “Whenever the LORD raised up judges for them, the LORD was with the judge, and he saved them from the hand of thir enemies all the days of the judge; for the LORD was moved to pity by their groaning because of those who afflicted and oppressed them.” Samuel took the desire for a king as a rejection of “your God who saves you [LXX hos autos estin hymōn sōtēr]” (1 Sam. 10:19), and the term is hardly ever used of the kings (cf. 2 Ki. 13:5).

2. sōtēr is applied above all to Yahweh, though not as a technical term. Isa. 45 contrasts the mysteries of Yahweh’s working with the impotence of the idols. He has anointed the Persian king Cyrus to liberate Israel from captivity in Babylon (Isa. 45:1). He promises the wealth of the nations to the captive Israel. The prophet cries: “Truly, thou art a God who hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour” (Isa. 45:15). Israel is saved by Yahweh “with an everlasting salvation” (v. 17). Turning to those who carry idols, the prophet issues the challenge: “Declare and present your case; let them take counsel together! Who told this long ago? Who declared it of old? Was it not I, the LORD? And there is no other god besides me, a righteous God and a Saviour; there is none besides me. ‘Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth! For I am God, and there is no other’ ” (Isa. 45:21 f.). Whereas v. 15 celebrates the mysterious working of Yahweh in history to liberate his people from exile, v. 21 has a universal, eschatological dimension.

Yahweh is presented as saviour in Deut. 32:15; 1 Chr. 16:35; Pss. 24(23):5; 25(24):5; 27(26):1, 9; 62(61):2, 6; 65(64):5; 79(78):9; 95 (94):1; Prov. 29:25 v.l.; Mic. 7:7; Hab. 3:18; Isa. 12:2; 17:10; 25:9; 62:11. Often the LXX speaks concretely of (e.g.) “God my saviour [ho theos ho sōtēr mou]”, whereas the MT speaks of “the God of my salvation”.

The messiah is not called sōtēr, even though the promised king in Zech. 9:9 is described by the participle sōzōn in the LXX (on this passage → Humility, art. praȳs OT 2). In Isa. 49:6 LXX the Servant of Yahweh is said to be eis sōtērian heōs eschatou tēs gēs “for salvation to the end of the earth” (cf. RSV “that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth”).

In the apocryphal books the title sōtēr is confined to God (Wis. 16:17; Sir. 51:1; Bar. 4:22; 1 Macc. 4:30; 3 Macc. 6:29; 32; 7:16). In the Qumran literature there is nothing corresponding to the Gk. sōtēr concept. Josephus used it only for human saviours, e.g. Jonathan (Ant. 6, 240; cf. TDNT VII 1014), though Philo saw God as the saviour of his people, the sustainer of the race and the cosmos, and the saviour of the soul in its struggle with the passions (TDNT VII 1015; → sōzō OT 5). Apart from one isolated instance in rabbinic writings, the messiah was not called a saviour. Elsewhere, God and the messiah are described by the word gō’ēl, redeemer (→ lytron OT). “There is no evidence that ‘Redeemer’ or ‘Saviour’ was a current Messianic title in the NT period” (W. Foerster, TDNT VII 1014).

NT sōtēr occurs 24 times in the NT, and in 16 of these instances it is applied to Christ. The remaining 8 are applied to God. It is never used of ordinary men. It is thus much less common than either sōzō or sōtēria. The title is used almost exclusively in the relatively late writings of the NT (10 times in the Pastoral Epistles, 5 times in 2 Pet.) which belong to the churches in the Hellenistic world.

1. (a) The angel who announced the birth of Jesus to the shepherds told them not to be afraid, “for to you is born this day in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord” (Lk. 2:11). The use of sōtēr here takes up the descriptions given to the national leaders and to God in the OT and Judaism (E. E. Ellis, The Gospel of Luke, New Century Bible, 1966, 80; cf. P. Winter, StTh 12, 1958, 106). In Lk. the word occurs elsewhere only in the Magnificat, where it is applied to God: “and my spirit rejoices in God my Saviour” (Lk. 1:47). The latter passage echoes Hab. 3:18. It is significant that in Zechariah’s psalm sōtēria is linked with the promised intervention of God (→ sōzō NT 2). Ellis thinks that the use of sōtēr may also reflect the Christian response to the emperor cult (see above CL 3). Whereas in the Halicarnassus inscription Augustus was celebrated as the sōtēr who brought peace, Jesus is the true bringer of peace (Lk. 2:14; on this v. → Please, art. eudokeō NT 3 (c)).

(b) In the proclamation of the primitive church to the Jews, Jesus is presented as the saviour of Israel: “God exalted him at his right hand as Leader and Saviour, to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins” (Acts 5:31); “Of this man’s posterity God has brought to Israel a Saviour, Jesus, as he promised” (Acts 13:23; → David). This preaching clearly draws a distinction between Jesus and God. At the same time, it draws attention to the uniqueness of Jesus as the divinely appointed and empowered one whom God had chosen as the instrument of salvation. It was precisely this that was the point of conflict between the church and the Jews.

(c) In Jn. it is left to the → Samaritans to conclude: “It is no longer because of your [the Samaritan woman’s] words that we believe, for we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world” (Jn. 4:42). This contrasts with Jesus’ reminder to the Samaritan woman: “You worship what you do not know; we worship what we know, for salvation is from the Jews” (Jn. 4:22). In the latter v. Jesus draws attention to the futility of Samaritan worship (→ Prayer, art. proskyneō NT 4), and that salvation is bound up with Judaism and comes from within it. But paradoxically Jn. 4:42 brings out its universal aspect. There is also the further paradox implied by Jn., that the Samaritans have seen this and responded to it in the person of Jesus, whereas the Jews have not.

2. (a) In the Pauline Epistles to churches sōtēr is found only twice. Phil. 3:20 reminds its readers of their eschatological existence and expectation in the midst of the trials of the present life: “But our commonwealth is in heaven, and from it we await a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself” (on “commonwealth” → People, art. polis NT 5).

Eph. 5:21–33 is an exhortation to mutual love and respect within the → marriage relationship which is seen as an image of Christ and the church: “For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its saviour" (Eph. 5:23x; → Head; → Body). Christ is the saviour, because he gave himself up to death for his church and cleansed her by the washing of water and the word, in order to present her for himself pure and glorious, when salvation is perfected (vv. 25 ff.).

(b) In the Pastoral Epistles sōtēr occurs relatively more frequently than in any other NT writings: 6 times for God and 4 times for Christ. This title for God links with the usage of the LXX (e.g. Pss. 25(24):5; 27(26):9; Hab. 3:18; Sir. 51:1).

(i) The statements in the Pastorals about God as Saviour show that God's offer of salvation is universal. They are in contrast to the exclusive attitude of the synagogue and of the gnostics, who promised salvation only to the righteous or to those possessing knowledge. The true and living God is the saviour of all men (1 Tim. 4:10), and he has instituted preaching, that the message of salvation might become known to all men, so that they might come to faith (Tit. 1:3). But God is in particular our saviour, because Christians have accepted salvation and stand in faith (1 Tim. 4:10; cf. Tit. 1:3). They must live a life that adorns the doctrine of God our saviour (Tit. 2:10). But already in the next sentence (v. 11), Paul declares that the grace of God is revealed above all in its power, bringing salvation to all men, by the new life of the church-members, even of the slaves, being seen. The saving plans of God embrace all, and he is concerned to make them a reality in every way possible. In the introduction to 1 Tim. (1:1), God and Christ are called Saviour in the same way.

(ii) The passages which speak of the Saviour Christ are, apart from 2 Tim. 1:10, all in Tit. They furnish an all-embracing picture of God's activity for our salvation.

To the world God has manifested his purpose to save men, made before eternal ages, through the first appearing of Jesus Christ (2 Tim. 1:10). In the Saviour Christ, the goodness and loving kindness of God appeared (Tit. 3:4), which are qualities which were specially praised in Hellenistic rulers, but are here transferred to God. According to 2 Tim 1:10, the saving work of Christ consisted in his abolishing death and bringing immortal → life to light.

Through his free purpose, decided before eternal ages, and through his grace revealed in Christ – and hence not on the basis of their works – believers are already saved. Through cleansing and regeneration God has saved us according to his mercy. The pouring out of the Holy → Spirit has come richly through our Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit. 3:5 f.; → Birth, art. palingenesia).

Believers, as those justified by the grace of God, wait for the perfection of salvation (Tit. 3:7), and for the fulfilment of their hope, which they will receive through the appearing of the great God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit. 2:13, cf. AV, RV mg., RSV mg., NEB mg.). The translation, "Awaiting our blessed hope, the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (cf. RV tx., RSV tx., NEB tx.; Funk § 276 (3); Moule 109 f.), is linguistically possible but contradicts the otherwise rigorously maintained distinction in the Pastorals between God and Christ. The transference to Jesus of the attribute of God, "great God", firmly rooted in late Judaism would be unique in the NT (J. Jeremias in J. Jeremias, Die Briefe an Timotheus und Titus, NTD 9, 1968, 65). In spite of this, the majority of British exegetes prefer the latter rendering. Apart from the fact that it is the natural grammatical rendering, it is pointed out that nowhere else is epiphaneia, appearing, used of God (→ Revelation).

The term "Jesus Christ our Saviour" cannot be derived directly from the OT, for there the messiah is never called saviour (see above OT 2). Jesus never called himself sōtēr. Nor do we find the term so used in the older strata of NT tradition, rooted in Palestinian concepts. The designation of Jesus as sōtēr is found “first hesitatingly, then increasingly in the Hellenistic sphere” (J. Jeremias, NTD 9, 45). From the assumption that expressions from the imperial cultus are repeatedly applied to Christ (e.g. 2 Tim. 1:10; Tit.3:4), the conclusion was drawn that the designation of Jesus as sōtēr was borrowed from this cultus. J. Jeremias considers that this explanation covered only part of the facts. “The roots of this designation of Jesus as Saviour are older.” Matt. 1:21 shows that “the oldest churches, using Aram. or Syr., explained the name Jesus, literally ‘Yahweh is salvation’, as ‘Bringer of salvation’. This explanation of the name of Jesus could be the reason that Jesus was called Saviour (sōtēr) in the Gk.-speaking areas, the oldest extant example being Phil. 3:20” (J. Jeremias). The title Saviour was necessary to help the Greeks understand what the title messiah (→ Anoint) implied for the Jews.

3. 2 Pet. uses sōtēr, generally linked with the title kyrios (→ Lord), comparatively frequently to identify Christ. The letter is addressed “To those who have obtained a faith of equal standing with ours in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ: May grace and peace be multiplied to you in the knowledge of God and of Jesus our Lord” (2 Pet. 1:1 f.). The readers are exhorted to confirm their call and election, “so there will be richly provided for you an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ” (2 Pet. 1:11). 2 Pet. 2:20 contains a warning against being enslaved to the passions: “For if, after they have escaped the defilements of the world through the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled in them and overpowered, the last state has become worse than the first.” 2 Pet. 3:2 seeks to arouse the “sincere mind”, “that you should remember the predictions of the holy prophets and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour through your apostles.” Here Christianity may be seen in terms of a new law (cf. 2:21). The letter closes with a prayer taking up again the theme of knowledge which doubtless includes that of the commandment of Christ: “But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be the glory both now and to the day of eternity. Amen” (2 Pet. 3:18). Similarly, Jude 25 concludes: “to the only God, our Saviour through Jesus Christ our Lord, be glory, majesty, dominion, and authority, before all time and now and for ever. Amen.”

4. sōtērios is used as an adj. in Tit. 2:11 which may be translated: “for the grace of God has appeared, bringing salvation to all men” (Arndt, 809). Elsewhere it is used in the neut. as a noun in the NT and early Christian literature of messianic salvation and the one who mediates it (Lk. 2:30; 3:6 [= Isa. 40:5]; Acts 28:28 [= Ps. 67:2]).

J. Schneider, C. Brown

→ Anger, → Cross, → Faith, → Forgiveness, → Holy, → Judgment, → Present, → Reconciliation, → Sacrifice, → Sin

(a). R. Banks, “Matthew’s Understanding of the Law: Authenticity and Interpretation in Matthew 5:17–20”, JBL 93, 1974, 226–42; and Jesus and the Law in the Synoptic Tradition, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 28, 1975; R. S. Barbour, “Salvation and Cosmology: The Setting of the Epistle to the Colossians”, SJT 20, 1967, 257–71; J. B. Bauer, “Redemption”, EBT II 738–41; T. Boman, Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, 1960; S. G. F. Brandon, ed., The Saviour God: Comparative Studies in the Concept of Salvation presented to Edwin Oliver James, 1963; J. R. Branton, “Paul and Salvation”, Crozier Quarterly 24, 1947, 228–40; F. F. Bruce, “Paul and the Law of Moses”, BJRL 57, 1975, 259–79; and Paul and Jesus, 1977; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the

Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St Paul, 1959; C. E. B. Cranfield, "On Some of the Problems in the Interpretation of Romans 5:12", SJT 22, 1969, 324–41; and The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975; O. Cullmann, "Eschatology and Missions in the New Testament", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1956, 409–21; The Christology of the New Testament, 1963²; Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History, 1951; and Salvation in History, 1967; W. Dantine, "Creation and Redemption: Attempt at a Theological Interpretation in the Light of the Contemporary Understanding of the World", SJT 18, 1965, 129–47; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, Jordan Lectures 1952, 1956, 268–84; R. Davidson, "Universalism in Second Isaiah", SJT 16, 1963, 166–85; W. D. Davies, "Matthew 5:17, 18", in Christian Origins and Judaism, 1962, 31–66; J. D. M. Derrett, "The Trial of Jesus and the Doctrine of Redemption", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 389–460; J. Downing, "Jesus and Martyrdom", JTS New Series 14, 1963, 279–93; D. J. Doughty, "The Presence and Future of Salvation in Corinth", ZNW 66, 1975, 61–90; J. W. Drane, Paul – Libertine or Legalist? A Study in the Theology of the Major Pauline Epistles, 1975; J. C. Fenton, "Destruction and Salvation in the Gospel according to St Mark", JTS New Series 3, 1952, 56 ff.; W. Foerster and G. Fohrer, sōzō etc., TDNT VIII 965–1024; J. G. Gibbs, "Interpretations of the Relation between Creation and Redemption", SJT 21, 1968, 1–12; Creation and Redemption: A Study in Pauline Theology, Supplements to NovT 26, 1971; and "The Cosmic Scope of Redemption according to Paul", Biblica 56, 1975, 13–29; E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation, 1965; G. W. Grogan, "The Experience of Salvation in the Old and New Testaments", Vox Evangelica 5, 1967, 4–26; F. Hahn, The Titles of Jesus in Christology, 1969; M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross, 1977; D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967; A. R. Johnson, "The Primary Meaning of g'", VT Supplements 1, 1953, 67–77; W. Kasch, rhyomai, TDNT VI 998–1003; E. F. Kevan, Salvation, 1963; D. A. Leggett, The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament with Special Attention to the Book of Ruth, 1974; E. Lohse, History of the Suffering and Death of Jesus Christ, 1967; S. Lyonnet and L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice: A Biblical and Patristic Study, Analecta Biblica 48, 1970; M. E. McIver, "The Cosmic Dimensions of Salvation in the Thought of St Paul", Worship 40, 1966, 156–64; I. H. Marshall, "The Development of the Concept of Redemption in the New Testament", in R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 153–69; J. S. Mbiti, "ho sōtēr hēmōn as an African Experience", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 397–414; J. P. Meier, "Salvation–History in Matthew: In Search of a Starting Point", CBQ 37, 1975, 203–15; L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, (1955) 1965³; and The Cross in the New Testament, 1967; W. G. Most, "A Biblical Theology of Redemption in a Covenant Framework", CBQ 29, 1967, 1–19; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind, 1959; J. Murray, Redemption – Accomplished and Applied, 1955; and The Epistle to the Romans, NLC, I–II, 1960–65; S. Neill, Salvation Tomorrow, 1976; R. E. Nixon, The Exodus in the New Testament, 1963; W. Panthenberg, "Redemptive Event and History", in Basic Questions in Theology, I, 1970, 15–80; A. D. Nock, "Sōtēr and Euergetēs", The Joy of Study, Festschrift for F. C. Grant, 1951, 126–48; O. Procksch and F. Büchsel, lyō etc., TDNT IV 328–56; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; H. F. Rall, Religion as Salvation, 1953; H. N. Ridderbos, "The Earliest Confession of the Atonement in Paul", in R. J. Banks, ed., op. cit., 76–89; H. Ringgren, gā'al etc., TDOT II 350–55; J. T. Ross, The Conception of sōtēria in the New Testament, 1947; H. H. Rowley, The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, 1965²; E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion, 1977; J. F. A. Sawyer, Semantics in Biblical Research: New Methods of Defining Hebrew Words for Salvation, SBT Second Series 24, 1972; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, 1961, 126–67; E. G. Selwyn, "Eschatology in I Peter", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., op. cit., 394–401; R. Skiba, "The Redeemer of Israel", CBQ 34, 1972, 14 ff.; C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Salvation, 1946²; K. Stendahl, Paul among Jews and Gentiles, and other essays, 1977; G. B. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 1905; V. Taylor, Jesus and His Sacrifice: A Study of the Passion Sayings in the Gospels, 1937; Forgiveness and Reconciliation: A Study of New Testament Theology, 1941; The Atonement in New Testament Preaching, (1940) 1958³; The Names of Jesus, 1954; W. C. van Unnik, "Dominus vobiscum: The Background of a Liturgical Formula", in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1959, 270–305; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961; B. B. Warfield, The Plan of Salvation, revised edition 1955; D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St Paul, 1974², 130–54; R. McL. Wilson, “SOTERIA”, SJT 6, 1953, 406–16; the World Council of Churches Bangkok Assembly dealt with the theme of Salvation Today (relevant to it are the following: T. Wieser, ed., Biblical Perspectives on Salvation: A Selection of Biblical Texts with Comments, 1972; Salvation Today and Contemporary Experience, 1972; Salvation Today: Bangkok, 29 December 1972 to 8 January 1973, 1972; Bangkok Assembly 1973: Minutes and Report of the Assembly of the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism of the World Council of Churches, December 31, 1972 and January 9–12, 1973, 1973; International Review of Mission 57 and 61, issues for October 1968 on “Salvation Today” and January 1972 on “Salvation Today II”); P. Webb, Salvation Today, 1974; R. Winter, ed., The Evangelical Response to Bangkok, 1973; and P. Beyerhaus, Bangkok 73: The Beginning or End of World Mission?, 1974, containing documents, detailed critique and extensive bibliography; R. Zehnle, “The Salvific Character of Jesus’ Death in Lucan Soteriology”, TS 30, 1969, 420–44.

(b). F. Bammel, H.-J. Kraus, P. Vielhauer, C. Andresen and L. Richter, “Erlösung”, *RGG*³ II 576–99; C. Barth, Die Errettung vom Tode in den individuellen Klage- und Dankliedern des Alten Testaments, 1947; L. Bieler, theos anēr, I, 1935, 120 ff.; M. Carrez, “La Signification actuelle pour ‘Histoire du Salut’ du visible et de l’invisible dans la Pensée Paulinienne”, in F. Christ, ed., Oikonomia. Heilsgeschichte als Thema der Theologie, Oscar Cullmann zum 65. Geburtstag gewidmet, 1967; L. Cerfaux and J. Tondriau, Le Culte des Souverains, 1957; J. B. Colon, “La Conception du Salut d’après les Évangiles synoptiques”, RSR 9, 1929, 472–507; ibid. 10, 1930, 1–38, 189–217, 370–415; ibid. 11, 1931, 27–70, 193–223, 382–412; G. Dautzenberg, “Soteria psychōn (1 Petr. 1, 9)”, BZ 8, 1964, 262 ff.; F. Dorner, sōtēr, Pauly-Wissowa, IIIa 1211–21; W. Elert, “Redemptio ab hostibus”, TLZ 72, 1947, 265 ff.; E. Ellwein, Heilsgegenwart und Heilszukunft im Neuen Testament, ThEH 114, 1964; M. Goguel, “Le Caractère, à la Fois actuel et futur, du Salut dans la Théologie Paulinienne”, in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., op. cit., 322–41; H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit. Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen. 1 und Apoc. Joh. 12, 1895; A. H. Haerens, “Sōtēr et Sōteria”, Studia Hellenica 5, 1948, 57–68; P. Heinisch, Christus der Erlöser, 1955; S. Herrmann, Die prophetische Heilserwartungen im Alten Testament, 1965; A. Jepsen, “Die Begriffe des ‘Erlösendens’ im Alten Testament”, Solange es ‘Heute’ heisst. Festschrift für R. Herrmann, 1957, 153–63; J. Jeremias, “Das Lösegeld für viele”, Judaica 3, 1948, 249 ff.; E. Käsemann, “Zum Verständnis vom Röm. 3, 24–26”, ZNW 43, 1950–51, 150 ff.; A. Kirchgässner, Erlösung und Sünde, 1950; G. Kittel, “Jesu Worte über sein Sterben”, Deutsche Theologie 3, 1936, 166 ff.; G. Ladmer, “Erneuerung”, RAC VI 241 ff.; E. Lohmeyer, Der Begriff Erlösung, 1928; H. Linsenn, “theos sōtēr”, Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 8, 1928, 1–75; E. Lohse, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht. Untersuchungen zur urchristlichen Verkündigung vom Sühntod Jesu Christi, FRLANT 46, 1955; L. De Lorenzi, “Alcuni temi di Salvezza nella letteratura di Qumran”, Riv. Bib. It. 5, 1957, 197–253; S. Lyonnet, De Peccato et Redemptione, 1958; U. Mauser, “Galater iii. 20: die Universalität des Heils”, NTS 13, 1966–67, 258–70; W. Otto, “Sōtēr”, Hermes 45, 1910, 448–60; J. Roloff, “Anfänge der soteriologischen Deutung des Todes Jesu (Mk. x. 45 und Lk. xxii. 27)”, NTS 19, 1972–73, 38–44; K. Prümm, “Herrscherkult und Neues Testament”, Biblica 9, 1928, 3–25, 129–42, 289–301; K. H. Rengstorff, “Die Anfänge der Auseinandersetzung zwischen Christusglaube und Asklepiusfrömmigkeit”, Schriften der Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Westfälischen Landesuniversität zu Münster 30, 1953, 8–19; L. Sabourin, Rédemption Sacrificielle: Une Enquête Exégétique, Studia 11, 1961; A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, 1963⁶, 510 ff., 555 f., 604 ff.; W. Staerk, Sōtēr, I–II, 1933–38; J. J. Stamm, Erlösen und Vergeben im Alten Testament, 1940; and pādāh, THAT II 389–406; F. Stolz, yāša’, THAT I 785–90; W. Wagner, “Über sōzō und seine Derivate im Neuen Testament”, ZNW 6, 1905, 205–35; H. W. Wolff, Jesaja 53 im Urchristentum, 1953³.

Remain

μένω

μένω (menō), remain; ἐμμένω (emmenō), stay or remain in, persevere, abide by; ἐπιμένω (epimenō), stay, remain, continue (in); παραμένω (paramenō), remain, stay on, continue in; προσμένω (prosmenō), remain, stay with, remain longer; περιμένω (perimenō), wait; μονή (monē), staying, tarrying, dwelling (-place), room, abode.

CL menō, found already in Homer, is related to Lat. maneo; intrans. it means to remain in one place, at a given time, with someone. Metaphorically, it can mean to keep an agreement, to remain in a particular sphere of life (with en), to make a stand against difficult circumstances (e.g. illness or death), and changes in general (cf. hoi menontes, the fixed stars (Aristotle, Cael. 290 a, 21)). Hence menō can be used of that which remains valid in law, e.g. a diathēkē, a will (→ Covenant). In religious language, it is used for the gods, or that inspired by them (e.g. nous, mind; ideai, ideas), as having continuing existence. It is only seldom used trans., with the force of waiting for, or expecting someone or something.

OT In the LXX menō translates some 16 Heb. words, the commonest being ʾamad (stand, remain) and qūm (arise, stand). It only seldom means to remain in one place (e.g. Exod. 9:28; Lev. 13:23). Sometimes it means to wait (e.g. Gen. 45:9; Job 36:2). Generally it is concerned with the existence or continuing validity of something. A vow is valid (Num. 30:4 [5]; 30:9 [10]), or invalid (Num. 30:5, 12, [6, 13]). The wealth of the godless does not endure (Job 15:29). The salvation of the righteous endures for ever (Ps. 112[111]:3, 9).

It is, therefore, particularly used of God. His relationship with man (→ Righteousness) is not severed by him (Ps. 112[111]:3, 9), and hence his word (Isa. 40:8) and truth (Ps. 117[116]:2) endure. God waits to have mercy (Isa. 30:18). Especially in the Pss. and Isa. God's constancy is stressed as a characteristic in contrast to the changeability of the gods and the transitory nature of the world. We do not find this as a merely abstract theological statement, but always in the living context of the worship and praise of God. God is the living one who endures for ever (Dan. 6:26; Ps. 102[101]:12; menō represents qūm, arise, and yāšab, dwell, respectively). Humanity, opposed to God, perishes under his → judgment and wrath, but the new → heavens, the new → earth and the people of God will remain (Isa. 66:22). Just as Yahweh abides, so does his → name (Ps. 72[71]:17, though here without menō), his plan or counsel (Ps. 33[32]:11; Isa. 14:24), his → righteousness (Ps. 111[110]:3) and his praise (Ps. 111[110]:10).

NT 1. Of the 118 instances of menō, 40 are found in Jn. and 24 in the Johannine Epistles. Here it is used with a special christological force (see 4, below). The normal secular Gk. uses of the word are also found in the NT.

(a) Intrans., menō means to remain, e.g., to stay in a place (Lk. 19:5), or with someone (Lk. 24:29; Matt. 26:38); to continue to exist for a specific time (Matt. 11:23); to live (Jn. 1:38); or metaphorically to hold fast, or remain steadfast, e.g., in a teaching (2 Tim. 3:14, 2 Jn. 9), in fellowship with (Jn. 14:10), in the unmarried state (1 Cor. 7:40), to stand firm, pass the test, e.g. when one's works are judged (1 Cor. 3:14); to live on, and not to have died (1 Cor. 15:6).

(b) Trans., menō means to wait for (Acts 20:5, 23).

2. The NT continues the thought of the OT and speaks of the unchanging character of God who maintains his word (1 Pet. 1:23; cf. Dan. 6:26; 1 Pet. 1:25, quoting Isa. 40:8) and his counsel, i.e. he continues and carries through his plan of election in human history (Rom. 9:11). In the NT, God's constancy has been made visible in the sending and life of Jesus, the messiah, who continues for ever (Heb. 7:24). Those who have been born anew through the abiding word of God (1 Pet. 1:23) receive from the Holy → Spirit not only ecstatic experiences from time to time, but the power of God abides continually in them (1 Jn. 2:27). He who confesses that Jesus is the Son of God abides in God, i.e. is bound to him by God's love (1 Jn. 4:14 f.). He does not seek for an abiding city here (Heb. 13:14), but has abiding possessions in heaven (Heb. 10:34).

Paul points out that, in contrast to the service by → Moses, which was transitory, the new service of the Spirit and of righteousness is permanent (2 Cor. 3:7–11), and with it faith, hope and love (1 Cor. 13:15), above all love (cf. 13:8) by which he knew himself controlled (cf. 2 Cor. 5:14).

3. Since the final and lasting state which Christ will bring is coming, human effort for change and for self-fulfilment in this transitory life loses its attraction, and man is freed from it. Since there is a new focus for Christians, they can and should give up their personal social advancement as their goal in life and the expectation that → marriage will fulfil every hope. It is best to remain quietly as they are. That is why Paul could advise the Christians in Corinth, "Were you a slave when called? Never mind" (1 Cor. 7:21). The unmarried and widows should remain unmarried unless they cannot exercise self-control, otherwise "it is better to marry than to be aflame with passion" (1 Cor. 7:8 f.). All their energies should be concentrated on the dawning kingdom of God and all their efforts should be given to remaining in love and true faith (1 Tim. 2:15; 2 Tim. 3:14).

4. In Jn. the secular Gk. menō en gained a meaning parallel to the Pauline conception of Christ's dwelling in the believer (Rom. 8:9 ff.) and his dwelling in Christ. It is even expanded and strengthened (cf. F. Hauck, TDNT IV 576).

(a) On the one hand, menō expresses the closest possible relationship between Father and Son: "The Father who dwells in me [en emoi menōn] does his works" (Jn. 14:10). The unbroken fellowship of Jesus with the Father "causes the word of Jesus to be the word of God and his work to be the work of God" (A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Johannes, 1960³, 295). Christ was not called, like a prophet, for a particular task and a limited period; his whole person remains in lasting and special nearness to the Father (Jn. 1:32), just as the son, in contrast to the slave, continues for ever in the father's → house (Jn. 8:35). "His fellowship with men would be powerless and valueless, had he not as recipient of the Spirit acted in oneness with the Father" (A. Schlatter, op. cit., 51, on Jn. 1:32). For further discussion of this relationship → Son of God.

(b) Then there is depicted the closest possible relationship between Christ and the believer; Jesus calls men to remain in this fellowship, and guarantees for the believer that he also will remain in it (Jn. 15:4 f.). Here a distinction is made between Jesus' being with them (menō en, Jn. 15:4 f.) and his being in them after his death and resurrection (menō en, Jn. 15:4 f.). This abiding of Jesus in the believer was proclaimed in the promise that the Holy Spirit would abide in them (Jn. 14:17; 1 Jn. 2:27; → Advocate, art. paraklētos).

The statement that Christ abides in the believer is a statement with an indubitably mystical element; it creates an inner unity, a unio mystica. (One of Paul's ways of expressing this relationship is to use the picture of the body, which is not found in Jn.)

But this does not mean that God is absorbed in man, and so could be found in him by a mystic plumbing of the depths of personality. Rather Christ's abiding in his own is inseparably linked with the abiding of his → word in them (Jn. 15:7; 1 Jn. 2:24; cf. Jn. 8:31) and with the continual acceptance of the reconciling power which flows from the death of Jesus. This is expressed in Jn. above all in the words: "He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him" (Jn. 6:56). This concept expresses the real meaning of the → Lord's Supper for Jn. In this inner fellowship between Christ and the believer "the loyalty that is demanded is not primarily a continued being for, but a being from; it is not the holding of a position, but an allowing oneself to be held, corresponding to the relationship of the klēma [branch] to the ampelos [vine]. In this sense the relationship can be a reciprocal one; indeed it must be" (R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971, 535 f., on Jn. 15:4).

(c) Such an abiding in Christ makes a man Christ's property right down to the depths of his being. It is not confined to spiritual relationship or agreement, but means present experience of salvation and hence → life (Jn. 6:57). Therefore "he who says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked" (1 Jn. 2:6). The indwelling Christ, or life through the word of Christ, demands and forms a life conforming to his spirit and nature, and wills and brings about sanctification. "He who does the will of God abides for ever" (1 Jn. 2:17). Abiding in Christ is the same as bearing → fruit (Jn. 15:5). If there is no fruit, it is a sign that the fellowship has already been interrupted (Jn. 15:6; 1 Jn. 3:6). Where this is true, the wrath of God rests upon the unbeliever (Jn. 3:36). "The relationship of a man to God is finally determined by the way in which he is related to the word of Jesus" (A. Schlatter, op. cit., 112). Jn. makes this clear once more in 15:9–17 which is par. to 15:1–8. "To abide in love, which is what is demanded of the disciple, means continuing in the love he has received, in the state of being loved; it means – and this has already been stated in v. 4 – that his existence is to be based completely on the Revealer's service, as the foot washing had already made clear symbolically" (R. Bultmann, op. cit., 540, on Jn. 15:9; cf. Jn. 13:1–20). Abiding in love becomes a reality in action (Jn. 15:10), in the bearing of continuing fruit (Jn. 15:16), which for example becomes visible in unbounded love of the brethren (1 Jn. 2:10; 3:14 f.). K. Munzer

5. (a) The compound emmenō, stay or remain in, persevere, continue in, is found in secular Gk. It occurs in the LXX for ḥākāh in the sense of the righteous waiting on God (Isa. 30:18; Dan. 12:12), and 8 times for qūm, especially in sayings about abiding by one's word and agreements (Num. 23:19; Deut. 19:15; 27:26; Isa. 7:7; 8:10; 28:18; Jer. 44[51]:25, 28). It is without Heb. equivalent at Sir. 2:10; 6:20; 7:22; 11:21; 28:6; 39:11; 1 Macc. 10:26 f.; Dan. 6:13(12) LXX. In the NT it occurs only 4 times. After their initial missionary work, Paul and Barnabas returned to Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, "strengthening the souls of the disciples, exhorting them to continue in the faith [emmenein tē pistei], and saying that through many tribulations we must enter the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22). The Book of Acts ends with Paul remaining in Rome two whole years at his own expense, welcoming all who came to him, preaching the kingdom of God and teaching openly and unhindered about the Lord Jesus Christ (Acts 28:30 f.). emmenō has the sense of "abide by" in Gal. 3:10, where Paul cites Deut. 27:26 to show the impossibility of keeping the law as a way of salvation: "For all who rely on the law are under a curse: for it is written, "Cursed be every one who does not abide by all things written in the book of the law, and do them." In Heb. 8:9 (alluding to Jer. 31:32) it has the sense of "continue in": "not like the covenant that I made with their fathers on the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; for they did not continue in my covenant, and so I paid no heed to them, says the Lord." In its place, Yahweh promises a new → covenant written on the heart (v. 10), and Heb. argues that this has now been established by Christ (Heb. 8:6–13; 10:14–18).

(b) epimenō, stay, remain, is found in secular Gk. from Homer onwards, but occurs in the LXX only at Exod. 12:39 (for māhah, linger, tarry). It is used in a lit. sense in Acts 10:48; 21:4, 10; 28:12, 14; 1 Cor. 16:7 f.; Gal. 1:18. The reason for the stay is frequently connected with Christian service. In Phil. 1:24 Paul, reflecting on his possible imminent execution, writes: "But to remain in the flesh [to de epimenein [en] tē sarki] is more necessary on your account." Hence, he is convinced that his life will be spared for the sake of continued service. On the other hand, to die is gain (Phil. 1:21) because it brings release from earthly troubles and brings one into the more immediate presence of Christ. Nevertheless, Paul is willing to reject this "gain" for the sake of his pastoral care (cf. D. W. Palmer, "'To Die is Gain' (Philippians 1:21)", NovT 17, 1975, 203–18).

epimenō has the fig. sense of continue, persist (in), persevere, with the dat. Thus, Peter continued knocking on the door after his escape from prison (Acts 12:16). In the pericope concerning the woman taken in adultery, the Jews continued to ask Jesus until he gave the reply: "Let him who is without sin among you be the first to throw a stone at her" (Jn. 8:7; cf. Lev. 20:10; Deut. 13:10; 17:7; 22:2 ff.; Sanhedrin 7:4; 11:1; Sotah 47; on this see further J. D. M. Derrett, "The Woman Taken in Adultery", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 156–88).

The fig. use is found in theological contexts in the sense of continuing in sin (Rom. 6:1), which Paul rejects on the grounds that to desire to do so is utterly incompatible with dying and rising with Christ as represented by baptism. The liberty we have through justification by faith is not a liberty to sin but to live out the life of Christ. Later on in Rom. Paul discusses the status of the Jews as the people of God with regard to the saving purposes of God, using the image of pruning and grafting into the → olive tree. "Note then the kindness and the severity of God: severity toward those who have fallen, but God's kindness to you, provided that you continue in his kindness [ean epimenēs tē chrēstotētī]; otherwise you too will be cut off. And even the others, if they do not persist in their unbelief [ean mē epimenōsin tē apistia], will be grafted in, for God has power to graft them in again" (Rom. 11:22 f.). Thus, Paul envisages the possibility of the Jews being once more incorporated into the people of God through a return to faith. But for the present they are no longer the people of God, and they will never again become the people of God in the sense that they were before. The church is the new people of God, though there is the possibility of the Jews being grafted into this people (perhaps comparable with the way in which Gentiles were grafted into the Jewish nation prior to Christ). However, the continuance of the Gentiles is also conditional upon their continuance in God's kindness (→ Good, art. chrēstos). The warning is comparable with that in Heb. 3:15 ff.; 4:1–13; 6:1–8 (cf. Ps. 95:7 f.).

A similar warning is issued in Col. 1:23. It follows the reminder: "And you, who were once estranged and hostile in mind, doing evil deeds, he has now reconciled in his body of flesh by his death, in order to present you holy and blameless and irreproachable before him, provided that you continue in the faith [ei ge epimene te pistei], stable and steadfast, not shifting from the hope of the gospel which you heard, which has been preached to every creature under heaven, and of which I, Paul, became a minister” (Col. 1:21 ff.). In all these passages, where epimenō is used in connexion with salvation there is a paradox: reconciliation and redemption are the free gifts of God, but they need to be appropriated and lived out. Continuance and perseverance are essential features of the life of faith.

In 1 Tim. 4:16 Timothy is exhorted to “Take heed to yourself and to your teaching: hold to that [epimene autois], for by so doing you will save both yourself and your hearers.” Again there is the same stress on perseverance, but it is now expressly linked with teaching (didaskalia; → Teach, art. didaskō). In Col. and 1 Tim. the perseverance is related to “the faith” (Col. 1:23) and “teaching” (1 Tim. 4:16). These expressions suggest a situation in which it was felt that it was not enough for believers to be exhorted to persevere. In view of the false teaching and dangers of the times it was necessary for them to be guided by a defined body of truth.

(c) paramenō, remain, stay on, continue in, is found from Homer onwards. In the LXX it translated yāšab (dwell, remain) at Gen. 44:33 and ʾamad (stand) at Prov. 12:7 and Dan. 11:17 (Theodotion). It is without Heb. equivalent at Jud. 12:7, 9; Sir. 6:8, 10; 11:17; 38:19. In the NT Paul, faced with the prospect of execution, tells the Philippians that he would prefer to be with Christ, but that it is more necessary to remain in the flesh on their account. “Convinced of this, I know that I shall remain and continue with you all, for your progress and joy in the faith” (Phil. 1:25). This may be compared with the use of menō with para (see above). Heb. 7 argues for the superiority of Christ’s priesthood which is after the order of → Melchizedek. This is shown inter alia by Christ’s permanent and continuing ministry as contrasted with the temporary nature of the Levitical priesthood. “The former priests were many in number, because they were prevented by death from continuing in office; but he holds his priesthood permanently, because he continues for ever” (Heb. 7:23 f.). In the course of his argument that the true believer shows his faith by his works (Jas. 2:22), James argues: “But he who looks into the perfect law, the law of liberty, and perseveres [paremeinas], being no hearer that forgets but a doer that acts, he shall be blessed in his doing” (Jas. 1:23 f.). The vb. also occurs in 1 Cor. 16:6 in the physical sense of “stay” in the discussion of Paul’s future plans.

(d) prosmenō, remain, stay with, stay longer, is found in secular Gk., but occurs in the LXX only at Jdg. 3: 25A; Tob. 2:2; Wis. 3:9; 3 Macc. 7:17. It is used of the crowds who had been with Jesus for three days (Matt. 15:32 par. Mk. 8:2). Similarly, it is used in a physical sense in Acts 18:18 and 1 Tim. 1:3. Barnabas exhorted the believers at Antioch “to remain faithful to the Lord with steadfast purpose” (Acts 11:23), while Paul and Barnabas urged their followers from the Jews and proselytes in the synagogue at Pisidian Antioch “to continue in the grace of God” (Acts 13:43). 1 Tim. 5:5 describes the righteous widow: “She who is a real widow, and is left all alone, has set her hope on God and continues in supplications and prayers night and day” (→ Woman, art. chēra).

(e) perimenō, expect, await, in cl. Gk., occurs in the LXX only twice (Gen. 49:18; Wis. 8:12) and only once in the NT, where it signifies waiting “for the promise of the Father”, i.e. the Holy → Spirit (Acts 1:4). The disciples were not to depart from Jerusalem until they had received it (cf. Lk. 24:49; → Pentecost).

(f) For hypomenō → Patience.

(g) The noun monē is found in secular Gk. with a variety of meanings including abiding, tarrying, persistence, continuance, permanence (cf. Liddell-Scott, 1143; F. Hauck, TDNT IV 579). But perhaps the meanings which come closest to the 2 instances in the NT are a place of halt on a journey, an inn (Pausanias, 10, 31, 7), a watch-house in a police district (E. J. Goodspeed, Greek Papyri from the Cairo Museum, 1902, 15, 19), a hut for watching in a field (J. Maspéro, Papyrus Grecs d'époque Byzantine, 1911 ff., 107, 10). However, these examples are late. monē may represent some form of the Aram. 'wn', meaning a night-stop or resting place on a journey (cf. R. E. Brown, The Gospel according to John, II, Anchor Bible, 1971, 618). Origen took the NT references to refer to stations on the road to God (De prin. 2, 11, 6), and this may lie behind the Vulg. mansio and Eng. mansion which meant a dwelling place rather than a sumptuous large house. F. Hauck takes Jn. 14:2 to refer to the movement from below up to God. "The word seems to be deliberately chosen to express the fact that our earthly state is transitory and provisional compared with eternal and blessed being with God. On the other hand, 14:23 (the movement is from above downwards) depicts salvation after the departure of the Saviour as a permanent abiding of Christ and God in believers" (TDNT IV 580). However, C. K. Barrett rejects the idea that life in heaven involves a progression, and claims that v. 23 implies a permanent abiding-place or mode of abiding (The Gospel according to St John, 1955, 381; cf. 1 Macc. 7:38). In Jewish belief there were various compartments or dwelling places in heaven (Eth. Enoch 39:4 ff.; cf. 15:7, 10; 22:9 ff.; 71:15 f.; Sl. Enoch 61:2; TDNT IV 580 f.). Hence, the RSV: "In my Father's house are many rooms [monai polloi]; if it were not so, would I have told you that I go to prepare a place for you?" (Jn. 14:2); "Jesus answered him, 'If a man loves me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our home [monēn] with him'" (Jn. 14:24). This corresponds to the use of menō in Jn. (see above 4). The former passage stresses the certainty of the coming salvation and fellowship with Jesus; the latter the present salvation which comes from the indwelling of the Father and the Son. (→ also House, art. oikos) C. Brown ἀδιάλειπτος (adialeiptos), unceasing, constant; ἀδιαλείπτως (adialeiptōs), unceasingly, constantly.

ἀδιάλειπτος

CL & OT Both the adj. and the adv. are comparatively rare in secular Gk. (cf. Liddell-Scott, 22; Arndt, 16). In the LXX only the adv. occurs and that exclusively in the Maccabean literature (1 Macc. 12:11, 2 Macc. 3:26; 9:4; 13:12; 15:7; 3 Macc. 6:33). It is also found in Test. Lev. 13:2; Josephus, War 3, 164; 3, 241), whilst the adj. occurs in Arist. 84 and Josephus, War 2, 155; 5, 31.

NT adialeiptos describes in Rom. 9:2 Paul's unceasing anguish of heart (adialeiptosodynē tē kardia mou) for the Jews, for whose sake he could wish himself accursed and cut off from Christ (v. 3). For though they are descended from → Israel and have all the formal promises, they are not truly of Israel. Paul's yearning for the salvation of Israel may be compared with Jesus' concern for → Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37 ff. par.

Lk. 13:34 f.). In 2 Tim. 1:3 it is used of Paul's constant remembrance of Timothy in his → prayers.

The adv. adialeiptōs is likewise only found in the Pauline literature. In Rom. 1:9 it is used of Paul's intercession for the Roman Christians and similarly in 1 Thess. 1:2 for the Thessalonians. Likewise, Paul thanks God constantly for the response of the Thessalonians to the word of God (1 Thess. 2:13) and urges them to pray unceasingly (1 Thess. 5:17).

Thus all the contexts in which these words are found in the NT express unremitting concern for others, particularly in prayer and praise. C. Brown

(a). R. Bultmann, The Gospel of John, 1971; F. Hauck, menō etc., TDNT IV 574–88; J. E. Russcop, Abiding in Christ: Studies in John 15, 1973.

(b). J. Heise, Bleiben. Menein in den johanneischen Schriften, 1967; A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Johannes, 1960³.

Remember, Remembrance

μυμνήσκομαι	μυμνήσκομαι (mimnēskomai), recall to mind, remember; μνεία (mneia), remembrance, memory, mention; μνήμη (mnēmē), recollection, memory; μνημονεύω (mnēmoneuō), remember, mention; μνημόσυνον (mnēmosynon), memory, recollection; ἀνάμνησις (anamnēsis), reminder, remembrance; ὑπόμνησις (hypomnēsis), recollection; ἀναμυμνήσκω (anamimnēskō), remind; ὑπομυμνήσκω (hypomimnēskō), remind.
-------------	---

CL 1. mimnēskomai is derived from the Indo-European root mēn*, to think. The words from this root cover three areas of meaning: (a) me-, mn-, to intend, want, require (Gk. memona); (b) to be enraptured, to rave (Gk. mainomai; → Ecstasy); (c) menā-, menei-, to be mindful of (Gk. memnēmai), might, power, ferocity, liveliness, etc. (Gk. menos), to remember, recall, mention (Gk. mimnēskō, -omai), counsellor (Gk. mnēmōn); memorial (Gk. mnēma). See E. Boisacq, Dictionnaire Étymologique de la Langue Grecque – Étudiée dans ses Rapports avec les autres Langues Indo-Européennes, 1916, 625. Hence there arises, in Indo-European languages generally, the following complex of meanings: (a) to remember (referring to the intellectual ability, and its exercise, of linking the past to the present); (b) to consider, weigh up (where the present is linked to the future); (c) to be mindful, take into account, mention (assessing how the present relates both to past and future). This range of meanings can be seen in English, e.g., in the various uses of the word “mind”: to remind, call to mind, give one's mind to, bear in mind, have a mind to, etc. (see further E. Boisacq, op. cit., 627, 638).

The various simple and compound forms of both vbs. and nouns in Gk. (Liddell-Scott give no less than 45!) are used interchangeably. No fundamental difference in meaning exists between, on the one hand, compounds such as anamnēsis and hypomnēsis, and, on the other hand, simple forms such as mimnēskō and mnēmē, apart, of course, from their being different parts of speech (cf. J. Behm, anamnēsis etc., TDNT I 348 and O. Michel, mimnēskomai, TDNT IV 678 ff.). In view of this strong inter-connexion of meaning and the resulting difficulty of distinguishing the sense of one word from that of another, many theologians translate all derivatives of the stem mnē- by memory, to remember, etc., with the unfortunate result that significant shades of meaning are obscured.

2. In Gk. literature (from Homer to the inscriptions and papyri of the Hellenistic period) the following principal meanings are attested:

(a) to remind oneself or someone else, to remind once again (especially in Plato anamimnēskesthai and anamnēsis), recollection, memory. These meanings apply to 50% of the relevant words. The commonest prefixes before trans. vbs. are: ana-, epi- and hypo-.

(b) to consider, think of, ponder, reflect (meanings not found in all the writers and works investigated) (5%).

(c) to remember for good or ill, concern oneself with, to want, strive after, desire (10%; in Homer almost 50%).

(d) to be mindful of, take into account, comply with (10%).

(e) to mention (verbally or in writing), make known, call, name; to warn; deed, document (compounds often formed with hypo-) (25%).

anamnēsis has special significance in Plato. From the fact that it is possible to probe behind the externals of things, events etc., and to recall their "idea", he deduces a bodiless, free, purely spiritual pre-existence of the → soul, and its survival after death (see especially Phdr. 73c; Theaetetus and Meno; cf. G. Vlastos, "Anamnesis in the Meno", Dialogue, IV, 1965, 143–67; on memory in philosophy see S. Shoemaker, "Memory", in P. Edwards, ed., The Encyclopedia of Philosophy, V, 1967, 265–76). (→ also Resurrection, art. anastasis CL.)

3. From the time of Homer until the time of Christ and beyond, mnēmē is one of the ideas central to the ancient Gk. and Hellenistic Gk. cults and religio-philosophical systems (TDNT IV 679).

(a) In Homer, Hades is the kingdom of lēthē, i.e. oblivion and forgetfulness. Its inhabitants are mute and unremembered. The situation may be expressed in the form of two equations: forgetting = silence = death; remembering = speech = life (Homer, Od. 11, 71, 97 ff., 140 ff., 147 ff.).

(b) Whereas in Homer remembering and forgetting are mental phenomena, in Orphism mnēmē is personified as a goddess Mnēmosynē; but also, under the figures of water from a divine spring, or a "passport" for the dead, it is a gift of the goddess, i.e. the divine immortality of the human soul (A. Olivieri, Lamellae Aureae Orphicae, Kleine Texte 133, 1915). Here then memory is not only a natural power but also the process which this power sets in motion.

(c) In gnosticism the human soul has left its heavenly home and so become separated from the unity of the divine (→ One, art. heis). Its sentence and fate is to forget its divine origin, through contamination by earthly evil. Recollection occurs in similar bodily fashion, being the soul's first step in returning to its heavenly home. This recollection is evoked by the arrival of the redeemer (in the form of the "call", the "heaven-sent epistle", the "messenger", etc.). The "call" is, as it were, the magic formula which sets the process in motion (and is so represented in the "Hymn of the Pearl" [i.e. the soul] in the Acts of Thomas, text in Henn.-Schn., II, 498–504; similarly in the Manichaean literature). (For gnostic texts see W. Foerster, Gnosis: A Selection of Gnostic Texts, I Patristic Evidence, 1972, II Mandaic Sources, 1974.)

(d) This line is carried further in the mystery cults, where the fortunes of the particular god being worshipped are recalled in sensual fashion by means of ceremonies frequently based on a mixture of mysticism and → magic. (See further G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries: The Problem of the Pauline Doctrine of Baptism in Romans VI. 1–11, in the light of the Religio-Historical "Parallels", 1967.)

These remarks should make it clear that the NT use of words from the stem mnē- cannot be made to originate in these areas (as in many works of the so-called "Benedictine School" of Dom Odo Casel and others, and also of those Lutheran theologians who try to interpret "remembrance" as a sacramental "representation" of the exalted Christ (cf. K. H. Bartels, "Der theoretische Quellort der 'Sammlung' und ihre Parole 'Katholische Reformation'", EvTh 20, 1960, 364 ff.).

OT In the LXX words from mnē- generally correspond to derivatives of the Heb. vb. zākar and are used as in ordinary Gk. Meanings: (a) to remember, etc. (Gen. 40:23; Wis. 12:2; Gen. 8:1); (b) to consider, etc. (Isa. 47:7; Sir. 41:1 f.); (c) to remember for good or ill, used mainly (53 times) of God, rarely (4 times) of men (Gen. 30:22; Jer. 40:8 LXX). In particular Deut. "especially develops a theology of remembering" (O. Michel, TDNT IV 675; cf. Deut. 5:15; 7:18; 8:2, 18; 9:7; 15:15; 16:3, 12; 24:18, 20, 22; 32:7); (d) to be mindful of (Deut. 15:15 and passim; Michel, ibid.); (e) to mention, etc. (Dan. 5:10 LXX; Est. 2:23; 2 Ki. 18:18 LXX). Then there is a specifically biblical use, partially foreshadowed in profane Gk., but undoubtedly going back to early oriental and Heb. influences which had a lasting effect upon the vocabulary and style of the LXX. Hence the distribution of meanings of mnē- in the OT differs characteristically from that in profane Gk. and in rabbinic Judaism (the latter being exposed to other influences). The following percentages refer to the meanings given above, profane Gk. being given in brackets: (a) 24 (50) %; (b) 5 (5) %; (c) 18 (10) %; (d) 30 (10) %; (e) 23 (25) %.

2. Specifically biblical meanings have already been enumerated. They are:

(a) To mention in prayer to God, call to God's remembrance (→ Prayer, art. proseuchomai; for epikaleomai → Call). Ps. 109 (LXX 108):14 may be paraphrased thus: "Let the accuser [Job 2:1, → Satan] make mention [LXX anamnēstheīē; MT yizzākēr] of the iniquity of his fathers before the judgment seat of God." In the LXX of Ps. 62:7; Ezek. 33:13, "to think of" and "to be thought of" mean to mention or be mentioned in intercession before God (cf. also Isa. 48:1; O. Michel, homologeō TDNT V 204 f.; Bartels, Gedächtnis, 13 f., and notes 86–97).

(b) To proclaim, to celebrate, to solemnize (→ Feast, art. heortē; → Proclamation, art. angellō). The existence of the people of Israel, their faith in Yahweh as their saviour and redeemer, their obedience to him as their sovereign and as Lord of history, their public worship – all these things are grounded in their experience of his gracious help in the past. Hence, at their festivals the people of God are publicly called upon to remember, and as they do so, the same God who did such great things for them in the past, speaks to them once again at the present. In this way, at daily worship and at the recurring festivals, the words spoken, sung or heard take up redemptive history and turn it into something requiring present commitment (H. W. Wolff, "Das Alte Testament und das Problem der existenzialen Interpretation", EvTh 23, 1963, 10, 14 f.). Hence, the words of this group may be used like angellō, i.e. to convey the idea of authorized proclamation (as did the Heb. zākar before them; cf. W. Schottroff, "Gedenken" im Alten Orient und im Alten Testament, 1964, 23), occasional examples being found already in Aristotle. A typical passage is Ps. 70(71):15–17, where v. 16b (“I praise thy righteousness, thine alone”) is literally: “I remember [i.e. declare, proclaim] thy righteousness . . .” Here the reference is to oral “remembrance”, but elsewhere (e.g. Exod. 13:8; Jos. 4:6 f.) God’s mighty acts are commemorated by tangible objects (→ Miracle, art. sēmeion), or, as in Exod. 12:14, by a holy day, the mnēmosynon (Heb. zikkaron) being nothing less than the celebration of a festival (cf. G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I 1962, 242 f.; K. H. Bartels: Dies tut zu meinem Gedächtnis. Zur Auslegung von 1 Kor. 11, 24.25, Dissertation, Mainz, 1959, 14–17 and notes 98–124).

(c) To believe, obey, become converted, turn about. To remember God in this sense means to serve him, to adore him, to obey and follow him, to recognize him as Creator and Lord (Num. 15:39 f.; Tob. 1:11 f.; cf. H. Graf Reventlow, “Das Amt des mazkîr”, ThZ, Basel, 1959, 161 ff., especially 165). The phrase “to remember God” can be a formula summing up a man’s religious standing (Jud. 13:19; Tob. 2:2). Thus in Ps. 22(21):28 f. mnēsthēsontai (yizkrû), used in parallel with epistraphēsontai (yāšûbû), probably refers to the act of turning in faith to the Lord (cf. Pss. Sol. 4:21; Bartels, Gedächtnis, 18 f. and notes 125–130).

(d) To confess with praise and adoration, give adoring testimony (→ Confession; → Thank, art. aineō; → Blessing, art. eulogia). Whenever words of the mnē- group are used as synonyms or metonyms of homologeō, to confess (Heb. yādâh in hiphil, tôdâh), they always at least include the idea of the public confession or acknowledgment of God. Examples are Pss. 30(29):4; 97(96):12; 45(44):17; 6:5 (cf. Sir. 17:27 f., Bar. 2:17; Bartels, Gedächtnis, 24) and Tob. 14:7 ff., and especially the titles of Pss. 38 (37) and 70 (69). Both titles probably refer to the content of their respective psalms (38:19; 70:4) (cf. the titles of Pss. 60, 80 and 145), and so represent liturgical rubrics (cf. Schottroff, op. cit., 334 ff.), in which case they are to be translated “for a testimony”, i.e. to God’s goodness – such testimony being borne through the public recital of the psalm (Bartels, Gedächtnis, 23–26 and notes 188–208). This usage has been transferred from the Heb. zâkar to the Gk. of the LXX; no analogy exists in profane Gk.

3. In rabbinic Judaism, however, the specifically biblical usage recedes. Remembrance for good or ill comes to be heavily rationalized, e.g. the Midrash on Gen. 30:22, where God’s remembrance is interpreted as his recollection of Rachel’s good works: “What did he remember? Her silence toward her sister. . . . Of what did he think? Of the fact that she had brought the concubine into her home” (Ber. Rabbah 355). On the other hand, the biblical meaning to help, to be gracious, lived on in the liturgy (cf. the so-called zikrônôt in the liturgy for the new year’s day; P. Fiebig, Rosch-ha-schana, 1914). The meaning to mention occurs frequently in the formula “his memory was kept in honour” (Yoma 3:9b and passim). The use of ’azkârâh in the place of the divine name is significant (O. Michel, TDNT IV 682 n.; R. Meyer, TDNT III 982 f.; Schottroff, op. cit., 333 and n. 1). Here remembrance stands for šēm, → name (as it does occasionally in the OT: Exod. 20:24 LXX, where onomazein stands for the Heb. zâkar). In the Qumran texts the idea persists of God “remembering” for good and is more prominent than in the rabbinic literature. Thus, it is stated that God thought of the old covenant and gave the new covenant for his elect, while in the eschatological war he will remember the sons of light and help them against the sons of darkness. For instances of zâkar see IQS 6:27; IQM 10:7;

17:2; 1QH 4:34 f.; 1Q 34 2:5; 32, 5; 6QD 3:5; CD 1:4; 6:2; 15:2.

K. H. Bartels

4. The theological interpretation of memory and remembering has been the subject of investigation in OT scholarship. In 1926 J. Pedersen put forward a theory of the Hebrew psychology of memory which claimed that the Hebrew viewed reality with the purpose of discovering a totality (Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–II, 99 ff.). Man is a nepeš (soul). Abstract thought is something alien to the primitive Hebrew approach to life. “When the soul remembers something, it does not mean that it has an objective memory image of some thing or event, but that this image is called forth in the soul and assists in determining its direction, its action. When man remembers God, he lets his being and his actions be determined by him. . . . The peculiarity about the Israelite is that he cannot at all imagine memory, unless at the same time an effect on the totality and its direction of the will is taken for granted” (op. cit., 106 f.). The general attack on Pedersen’s method by James Barr in The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961, has been followed up by a detailed critique by B. S. Childs in Memory and Tradition in Israel, SBT 37, 1962.

Childs gives what is perhaps the most detailed study in English of zākar, and claims that Pedersen has imposed his own preconceived ideas on the material he has examined. He rejects the method of listing the occurrences of the root in an attempted chronological order, as this takes too much account of the accidental appearances it makes in writing, and too little of its function within the particular contexts of life and worship. Employing the techniques of form-criticism, Childs studies the use of the vb. in the setting of the cult, the law court, prophecy, narrative etc. He agrees with Pedersen that features of OT thought exhibit similarities with that of other contemporary, primitive peoples. But “the biblical evidence simply does not confirm his theory that event is conceived of merely as a manifestation of the soul and effected independently of external factors” (op. cit., 29). The Hebrews were certainly aware that thoughts did not always lead to a corresponding action, as in the complaint to Moses, “O that we had meat to eat. We remember the fish we ate in Egypt for nothing . . . and there is nothing at all but this manna to look at” (Num. 11:5; cf. Est. 4:13 for a similar example of where the thought is quite different from the reality). “But one can go a step beyond this. Israel developed a sense of history because of its understanding of Yahweh’s relation to the world which broke the primitive pattern. God controls the external world through the dimension of the historical” (op. cit., 29 f.; cf. Gen. 50:20; Isa. 10:7 ff.).

(a) When the vb. is used of God, Childs notes two distinct formulae: “On the one hand, the imperative form has its context within the complaint psalm. An expansion of the form away from its cultic origin was traced in the complaints of Jeremiah and Job. The great break came with the prophetic adaptation for purposes of judgment and promise. On the other hand, the use of the finite form of the verb arose within the hymn. The Priestly school accommodated the form to express a theological interpretation of covenantal history” (op. cit., 44).

(i) The complaint Psalm may be both individual (Pss. 25[24]: 6 f.; 119[118]:49) or communal (Pss. 74[73]:2, 18, 22; 79[78]:8; 106[105]:4; 137[136]:7; cf. Isa. 64:8; Jer. 14:21; Lam. 5:1; Neh. 1:8). It may be negative or positive: “Do not remember against us the sins of our forefathers” (Ps. 79[78]:8); “Remember how the enemy scoff" (Ps. 74[73]:18; cf. v. 22). Frequent appeals are made to the → covenant relationship (Jer. 14:21; Ps. 25[24]:6; cf. Pss. 119[118]:49; 74[73]:2). Outside the Psalms among the pre-exilic non-cultic material are the prayers of Hannah (1 Sam. 1:11), Samson (Jdg. 16:28) and Hezekiah (2 Ki. 20:3 par. Isa. 38:3). Other passages containing intercessory prayers are Exod. 32:13; Deut. 9:27; 2 Chr. 6:42; Pss. 20(19):4; 89(88):48, 51; 132(131):1.

(ii) In the pleas of Jeremiah for Yahweh to remember him, access to the divine presence through the cult has been replaced by a direct confrontation with Yahweh. His plea is grounded in the fact that he is the bearer of the prophetic word (Jer. 18:20; 20:8 ff.) which has brought about his isolation and rejection (Jer. 15:15–18). Job's complaints are "characterized by a poetic freedom which allows him wide latitude" (op. cit., 38; cf. Job 7:7–10). In Neh. "the imperative appears frequently in a stereotyped prose phrase (Neh. 5:19; 6:14; 13:14, 22, 29, 31). For examples of the prophetic oracle, adapting the complaint psalm, see Hos. 6:1–7:2; 8:8, 11 ff.; 9:9; Jer. 14:2–12; 31:15–20 (cf. also Isa. 43:25; Jer. 2:2; 31:34 which are not related to the complaint Psalm).

(iii) A different genre is the hymn, where instead of the imperative urging Yahweh to remember, the writer praises Yahweh in the indicative for remembering his covenant faithfulness and promises (Pss. 98[97]:3; 105[104]:8, 42; 106[105]:45; 111[110]:5; 136[135]:23; 1 Chr. 16:15). Yahweh's memory is not confined to past events; it is active in the present and will continue into the future (Pss. 105[104]:8; 103[102]:7, 14; 111[110]:5).

(iv) Finally, in passages which he ascribes to the Priestly writer Childs sees certain affinities with the hymn, but points out that God's remembering is uncultic in character and figures in a historical work in prose passages concerned with the history of redemption. "The use of the verb zkr reflects the Priestly writer's concern to present history as a witness to the unfolding of the purpose of the covenant God who is active in Israel's midst. This history is merely a working out of the one eternal act of divine grace" (op. cit., 43; cf. Gen. 8:1; 9:15 f.; 19:29; Exod. 2:24; 6:5; Lev. 26:42, 45; cf. also Ezek. 16:60). God's remembrance of his covenant includes a renewed promise of the land (Exod. 6:8; cf. Lev. 26:42, 45).

(b) But not only does Yahweh remember; Israel also remembers. Here Childs notes several distinctive types of usage.

(i) In the case of Deuteronomic usage "the writer has as his chief problem the relating of the new generation of Israel to the tradition of Moses. No longer has Israel direct access to the redemptive events of the past. Now memory takes on central theological significance. Present Israel has not been cut off from redemptive history, but she encounters the same covenant God through a living tradition. Memory provides the link between past and present" (op. cit., 55; cf. Deut. 7:18; 9:7; 24:9; 25:17). "The divine commands as event meet each successive generation through her tradition calling forth a decision, and in obedience Israel shares in the same redemption as her forefathers" (op. cit., 56; cf. Deut. 5:15; 15:15; 16:12; 24:18, 22). Here the → sabbath plays an important part, and the emphasis is rather different from Exod. 20:8. "Memory does not serve to arouse a psychological reaction of sympathy for slaves. Rather, quite the reverse is true. Israel observes the Sabbath in order to remember her slavery and deliverance" (op. cit., 53). In so doing there is an actualization of redemptive history. "Israel in every generation remembers and so shares in the same redemptive time" (op. cit., 54).

(ii) In Mic. 6:5 "the prophet appeals to Israel's memory as a means of actualizing Yahweh's original purpose for his people" (op. cit., 57). The appeal to memory is characteristic of a defendant's speech in a law court. The present rupture with Yahweh stems from Israel's failure to understand the saving acts.

(iii) In Isa. 43:18, 44:21 and 46:9 there is "both the continuity and the discontinuity of history. There is a continuity between the past and the future because of the one purpose of God. There is a discontinuity because of Israel's failure. Israel's past response evokes the need of a radical new quality within history. In both instances Israel's memory is an active response in faith which links her to the redemptive action of God's entrance into history" (op. cit., 59).

(iv) Ezekiel focuses attention on the problem of Israel remembering his sins (Ezek. 6:9; 16:22, 61; 20:43; 23:19, 27; 36:31). Remembering is also connected with the formula "they [or you] shall know that I am Yahweh" (Ezek. 6:10; 16:62; 20:44; 36:23).

(v) The Psalms contain the largest number of instances of zākar, the overwhelming majority of which occur in the individual complaint Pss. (e.g. 42[41]:5; 77[76]:4; 119[118]:52, 55; 143[142]:5). Allied to this is the communal complaint (Ps. 137[136]:1, 6) and → Jonah's psalm (Jon. 2:8). "The fact that the psalmist can remember a situation different from his present plight evokes his bitter complaint and fervent plea for aid" (op. cit., 60). Ps. 42 pictures the individual cut off from the temple, and thus apparently from the divinely appointed means of access to Yahweh, and thirsting for his presence. In Ps. 77 the Psalmist grieves that Yahweh has changed his attitude towards him. "Memory as a psychological process is the same in the two parts of the psalm. The difference is that in vv. 2–11 the psalmist's remembering results in bitter frustration, whereas in vv. 12 ff. he encounters God through his memory The act of memory forms a bridge which links the psalmist with the God of the forefathers, not because of a Herculean act of self-projection, but because the events of the tradition possess a power which continues to meet Israel in her struggle" (op. cit., 63). In the case of Ps. 63, Childs thinks that an experience which was originally cultic in nature is actualized through a process which is no longer cultic, whereas Ps. 137 expresses bitter sorrow for → Jerusalem's destruction.

(c) The LXX uses the noun mnēmosynon chiefly to translate various forms from the root zkr. In particular, the MT uses two Heb. nouns zikkārôn and zēker.

(i) zikkārôn, memorial sign, is derived from the qal stem of zkr (J. Barth, Die Nominalbildung in den semitischen Sprachen, 1894², 324). It occurs 23 times (including once in an Aram. cognate). It is found 14 times in the Pentateuch, 12 of which Childs locates in the Priestly source (op. cit., 66). Childs sees two broad categories of meaning. In the passive sense it means a memorandum, a thing worthy to be remembered: memorable deeds (Est. 6:1), sayings (Job 13:12), remembrance (Eccl. 1:11; 2:16), a record (Ezr. 6:2), a memorial written in a book which will serve to bring to mind the defeat of the Amalekites (Exod. 17:14), a book of memorial(s) (Mal. 3:16; Est. 6:1). In the active sense it means a memorial which calls something else to remembrance. In 9 cases it is a cultic object: the altar covering (Num. 16:40; 17:5), booty (Num. 31:54), onyx stones (Exod. 28:12, twice), atonement money (Exod. 30:16), breastpiece (Exod. 28:29), cereal offering (Num. 5:15, 18). It is twice used of the cultic activity of blowing trumpets (Num. 10:10; Lev. 23:24), and once of a cultic festival, the passover (Exod. 12:14). "According to the usual Priestly idiom the zikkārôn is a 'memorial for the children of Israel before Yahweh'. One has only to recall the role of the cult for the Priestly writer to recognize the full significance of the phrase. God has established a covenantal relationship with Israel which expresses itself in his eternal ordinances (ḥuqqat 'ôlām, Num. 10:8). Signs and memorials serve within this dispensation of grace both to guarantee and maintain for each generation this eternal relationship. The cultic acts of Israel continually remind God of this eternal covenantal order. The cultic objects and rites act to guarantee that the covenant is not forgotten" (B. S. Childs, op. cit., 67). Other instances are the crown in the temple (Zech. 6:14), its pejorative use of an idolatrous cult symbol (Isa. 57:8), the unleavened bread (Exod. 13:9) and the stones set up in the Jordan to be "to the people of Israel a memorial for ever" (Jos. 4:7).

(ii) The Heb. zēker, remembrance, memorial, occurs 23 times. It is used as a parallel for šēm, name, in 5 cases (Exod. 3:15; Isa. 26:8; Ps. 135[134]:13; Job 18:17; Prov. 10:7), and the contexts of 4 other passages suggest a similar meaning (Hos. 12:6, Pss. 30[29]:5; 97[96]:12; 102[101]:13). Because the → name expresses a person's essence in Heb. thought, the destroying of one's name is the same as to annihilate someone (Jer. 11:19; Job 18:17). Thus a number of passages deal with the destruction of the enemy, cutting off all mention of the name (Exod. 17:14; Deut. 15:19; 32:26; Isa. 26:14; Pss. 9:7; 34[33]:17; 109[108]:15; 112[111]:6; Eccl. 9:5; Est. 9:28). In Ps. 6:6 the psalmist complains that "in death there is no remembrance of thee; in Sheol who can give thee praise?" Childs relates Est. 9:28 to the problem of actualizing the past and thus translates the verse: "that the days of Purim should not fall into disuse among the Jews nor should the recounting of them cease among the descendants" (op. cit., 72). He also suggests that zēker in Ps. 111(110):4 refers primarily to the act of proclaiming, which in turn leads to the acts being remembered. Childs concludes that zēker "is not used primarily as a means of renewing the redemptive traditions of Israel, and that it should be carefully distinguished from zikkārôn" (op. cit., 73).

(d) Whether one assigns certain passages to the Priestly writer will depend on the view one takes of the authorship and composition of the Pentateuch. This in turn will have a bearing on how the appeal to memory is seen as developing in the worship and history of Israel. Childs sees memory as deeply related to Israel's cult "as a means of actualizing the past. In times of crisis, when the role of the cult was threatened, Israel's memory assumed a new significance in renewing her tradition" (op. cit., 80). S. Mowinckel saw this process of actualization against the wider background of the mythopoeic thought of the ancient Near East (cf. The Psalms in Israel's Worship, I–II, 1962). The cult serves to renew the structure of the world by re-enacting the sacred drama of the myth. The content of the myth is renewed and the participants experience its elemental power. Childs is among those who object to this on the grounds that it fails to do justice to the fact that in Israel the myth was replaced by historical events (op. cit., 82; cf. G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 99–125). Moreover, these events could not be repeated; they were fixed in time. A view which is diametrically opposed to Mowinckel's sees the process of actualization as the recital in the cult of the great historical events of the past which established Israel's existence. "Actualization occurs when the worshipper experiences an identification with the original events. He bridges the gap of historical time and participates in the original history” (B. S. Childs, op. cit., 82; cf. M. Noth, “The ‘Representation’ of the O.T. in Proclamation”, in C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963, 76–88; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel, 1962).

Childs himself wishes to combine the two positions, while laying greater emphasis on the latter, though he believes that remembering in the OT is more than a mental event. The historical redemptive event “causes a continued reverberation beyond its original entry” (op. cit., 83). On the one hand, it was unique in time and space. But on the other hand, redemptive history continues. “It means more than that the influence of a past event continued to be felt in successive generations, which obvious fact no one could possibly deny. Rather, there was an immediate encounter, an actual participation in the great acts of redemption Actualization is the process by which a past event is contemporized for a generation removed in time and space from the original event. When later Israel responded to the continuing imperative of her tradition through her memory, that moment in historical time likewise became an Exodus experience. Not in the sense that later Israel again crossed the Red Sea. This was an irreversible, once-for-all event. Rather, Israel entered the same redemptive reality of the Exodus generation” (op. cit., 84 f.).

There is much in Childs’ work which commands assent. Nevertheless, it may be questioned whether the concept of actualization may not be taken too far. For the data which Childs examines do not warrant the conclusion that the past event is somehow made present. Rather, it is the living God, Yahweh, who is ever present. Past history serves to give the present its shape. And reflection on the past serves to remind the believing Israelite that Yahweh can be counted upon to remain true. In this respect, the appeal to memory has a double function: it serves as a basis of appeal to Yahweh in prayer; and as such it also serves to encourage the believing Israelite that, however black his present predicament may be, he can still count on Yahweh. (For further discussion on the rôle of history in biblical thought see C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith, 1977, especially 13–75, 147–224.)

5. In the LXX mnēmosynon also translates the Heb. ’azkārâh, the memorial meal offering which was burnt with oil and frankincense as a pleasing odour to Yahweh (Lev. 2:2, 9, 16; 6:8[15]; Num. 5:26; → Sacrifice). In the case of the very poor it could serve as a sin offering (Lev. 5:12). All the passages where ’azkārâh occurs are widely attributed to P. On the use of anamnēsis to translate the term in Lev. 24:7 see below, 9. On the offering see R. de Vaux, Studies in Old Testament Sacrifice, 1964, 30.

6. The LXX uses mneia, remembrance, for phrases with the vb. zākar (Deut. 7:18; Job 14:13; Isa. 26:13; Jer. 31[28]:20; Ezek. 21:37[32]: 25:10; Zech. 13:2), for zēker (Ps. 111[110]:4; Isa. 28:6), and without equivalent in Isa. 32:10; Bar. 4:27; 5:5; Wis. 5:14.

7. The LXX uses mnēmē for zēker (Pss. 30[29]:4; 97[96]:12; 145[144]:7; Prov. 10:7; Eccl. 9:5), for zīkrôn, memorial (Eccl. 1:11; 2:16) and without Heb. equivalent (Prov. 1:12; Wis. 4:1, 19; 8:13; 10:8; 11:12; 2 Macc. 2:25; 7:20).

8. Two cognate nouns are found in the LXX in the sense of memorial, grave: mnēma for qeber (Exod. 14:11; Num. 11:34 f.; 19:16, 18; 33:16 f.; Deut. 9:22; 2 Chr. 16:14; 34:4, 28; Job 10:19; Isa. 65:4; Jer. 26[33]:23; Ezek. 32:26; 37:12) and q^ebûrâh (Ezek. 32:23 f.); and mnēmeion for the same pair of words, qeber (Gen.

23:6, 9; 49:30; 50:5, 13; Neh. 2:3, 5; Isa. 22:16; Jer. 26[33]:23; Ezek. 39:11) and q^ebûrâh (Gen. 35:20). (→ further Bury, Grave, Tomb.)

9. The noun anamnēsis, remembrance, which features in the words of institution in the → Lord's Supper is comparatively rare. In Lev. 24:7 it stands for 'azkārâh, which was a memorial offering (see above, 5): "And you shall put pure frankincense with each row, that it may go with the bread as a memorial portion [MT l^eazkārâh; LXX eis anamnēsin] to be offered by fire to the LORD." This particular 'azkārâh was evidently intended to be a perpetual reminder of the → covenant, to be offered every → sabbath: "Every sabbath day Aaron shall set it in order before the LORD continually on behalf of the people of Israel as a covenant for ever. And it shall be for Aaron and his sons, and they shall eat it in a holy place, since it is for him a most holy portion out of the offerings by fire to the LORD, a perpetual due" (Lev. 24:8 f.). There would seem to be no propitiatory element in this offering. On the other hand, the memorial aspect of it seems to have had a double reference, i.e. a God-ward and a man-ward reference. Just as Yahweh may be said to remember and was called upon to remember, the offering may have been regarded as an appeal to Yahweh's covenant faithfulness. At the same time it was a reminder to Israel of Yahweh's covenant faithfulness. The fact that only the → priests might eat it indicates not only the holy character of the offering but their representative rôle on behalf of the people.

Num. 10:10 has also a cultic context but the Heb. noun is zikkārôn (see above, 4 (c) (i)): "On the day of your gladness also, and at your appointed feasts, and at the beginning of your months, you shall blow the trumpets over your burnt offerings and over the sacrifices of your peace offerings; they will serve you for remembrance before your God [MT w^ehâyû lâkem l^ezikkārôn lîp^enê YHWH 'ôhêkem; LXX kai estai hymin anamnēsis enanti tou theou hymōi]: I am the LORD your God." The expression "before the LORD" coupled with the context of the previous verse suggests that the remembering here too has a God-ward reference which indeed is primary, although the man-ward reference is implicit: "And when you go to war in your land against the adversary who oppresses you, then you shall sound an alarm with the trumpets, that you may be remembered before the LORD your God [MT w^enizkartem lîp^enê YHWH 'lôhêkem; LXX kai anamnēsthēsesthe enanti kyriou], and you shall be saved from your enemies" (Num. 10:9; → Trumpet).

anamnēsis occurs in the titles of Ps. 38 (LXX 37; "A Psalm of David, for the memorial offering" RSV) and Ps. 70 (LXX 69; "To the choirmaster. A Psalm of David, for the memorial offering"). On the titles of the Pss. see A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I, 1972, 43–51. Their origin and value with regard to the interpretation of the Pss. are very uncertain. The contents of neither Ps. make explicit reference to the cult, and S. Mowinckel thinks that the purpose was to remind Yahweh of the distress of the worshippers (The Psalms in Israel's Worship, 1962, II, 212). The MT uses the hiphil of the vb. zākar.

In the Apocrypha anamnēsis occurs only in Wis. 16:6 with a clear man-ward reference: "But for admonition they were troubled for a short space, having a token of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of thy law [eis anamnēsin entolēs nomou sou]."

The vb. anamimnēskō, remember, is a little more frequent than the noun, and always stands for zākar where there is a Heb. equivalent (Gen. 8:1; 41:9; Exod. 23:13; Num. 5:15; 10:9; 2 Sam. 18:18; 20:24; 1 Ki. 4:3; 17:18; 2 Ki. 18:18, 37:

Neh. 9:17; Job 24:20; Ps. 109[108]:14; Jer. 4:16; Ezek. 21:28 f. [24 f.]; 23:19; 29:16; 33: 13, 16). There is no corresponding Heb. in 1 Ki. 3:1; Sir. 3:15; 4 Macc. 16:18.

C. Brown

NT 1. Altogether 72% of all the passages in the NT reflect normal Gk. usage. They bear the following meanings:

(a) To remember, call to mind (20% of NT instances; 50% in profane Gk.). Thus, "Peter remembered [emnēsthē] the saying of Jesus, 'Before the cock crows, you will deny me three times.' And he went out and wept bitterly" (Matt. 26:75; here mimnēskomai is used as a reflexive vb., to remind oneself, i.e. to remember, with the object in the gen.). In the par. passages the other synoptic evangelists use different cognates: "Peter remembered [anemnēsthē]" (Mk. 14:72; the passive of anamimnēskō, remind); "Peter remembered [hypemnēsthē]" (Lk. 22:61; the passive of hypomimnēskō, remind). Similarly, Matt. 16:9: "Do you not yet perceive? Do you not remember [mnemoneuete] the five loaves of the five thousand, and how many baskets you gathered?" (cf. par. Mk. 8:18). 2 Pet. 1:15 uses a verbal phrase: "And I will see to it that after my departure you may be able at any time to recall these things [tēn toutōn mnēmēn poieisthai]." In 2 Tim. 1:6 the vb. anamimnēskō means to remind, and governs the acc. of the person and the infinitive: "Hence I remind you to rekindle the gift of God that is within you through the laying on of my hands." This basic secular sense is used in all these passages to draw theological lessons. Peter's memory of Jesus' warning about his denial underlines the folly of self-confidence, the loving way in which Jesus handled Peter, and the part of remorse in repentance and restoration. In the case of Matt. 16:9 par. Mk. 8:18, memory of Jesus' past actions should have sustained the disciples' faith in present difficulties. And in the other two passages cited, remembering plays an important part in sustaining the life of faith.

(b) To consider (6.5% of the NT instances; 5% in profane Gk.). "Remember [mnēmoneuete] Lot's wife" (Lk. 17:32; cf. Gen. 19:26; Wis. 10:6 ff.; 2 Pet. 2:7 f.; SB III 769 ff.). The object is in the gen. The example of Lot's wife in refusing to give herself totally to escaping the → judgment on Sodom and Gomorrah served as a warning to be considered in both Jewish and Christian teaching. In Heb. 10:32 the object is in the acc.: "But recall [anamnēskesthe] the former days when, after you were enlightened, you endured a hard struggle with sufferings." The allusion is uncertain, but Heb. 12:4 suggests a persecution which had stopped short at martyrdom. This could have been the expulsion of Jews from Rome in A.D. 49, when rioting among the Jewish colony may have been caused by the introduction of Christianity (cf. Suetonius, Claudius 24, 4; Acts 18:2; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 266–70; and "Christianity under Claudius", BJRL 44, 1961–62, 309 ff.). In Lk. 16:25 mnēsthēti is followed by a dependent clause: "But Abraham said, 'Son, remember that you in your lifetime received your good things, and Lazarus in like manner evil things; but now he is comforted here, and you are in anguish'" (on the parable see especially J. D. M. Derrett, "Dives and Lazarus and the Preceding Sayings", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 78–99). Here again, remembering in the form of considering, plays – or should play – an important part in the conduct of life.

(c) To remember for good, to remember in a way which will benefit the person concerned in some way or other (14.5% of the NT instances; 10% in profane Gk.).

Here the passages are either OT quotations or have strong OT overtones. Mary's psalm The Magnificat recalls: "He has helped his servant Israel, in remembrance of his mercy [mnēsthēnai eleous]" (Lk. 1:54; cf. Ps. Sol. 10:4; → Mercy). Zechariah's psalm blesses God for fulfilling his promises "to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember [mnēsthēnai] his holy covenant" (Lk. 1:72; cf. Exod. 2:24; 6:5; Pss. 105[104]:8; 106[105]:7. 45). Heb. 8:12 also operates within the theology of the → covenant, taking up the promise of Jer. 31:34: "For I will be merciful toward their iniquities, and I will remember [mnēsthō] their sins no more." The same passage is again cited in Heb. 10:17. The plea of the penitent thief means in effect, "Save me!": "Jesus, remember me [mnēstheti mou] when you come in your kingly power" (Lk. 23:42; → Paradise). Gal. 2:10 refers to the eagerness of James, Peter and John, in extending the right hand of fellowship to Paul and Barnabas in their mission to the Gentiles, to "have us remember the poor [tōn ptōchōn hina mnēmoneuōmen], which very thing I was eager to do" (Gal. 2:10). On this aspect of the Christian mission → Poor, art. ptōchos. Rev. 18:5 expresses the converse aspect of this kind of remembering in the oracles against → Babylon: "for her sins are heaped high as heaven, and God has remembered [emnēmoneusen] her iniquities."

(d) To be mindful of (26% of the NT instances; 10% in profane Gk.). In most of these cases the translation "to remember" would be too weak. Rather, the remembering is seen as a positive force which affects one's behaviour (cf. 1 Esd. 4:22 LXX). Thus Heb. 11:15 might be paraphrased: "If their hearts had still been [mnēmoneuousin] in that land from which they had gone out, they would have had opportunity to return." The allusion is to the departure of → Abraham from Ur and his sojourning in the land with his dependants prior to the settlement of Israel in the promised land (Gen. 11:31 ff.). 2 Pet. was written expressly "that you should remember [mnēsthēnai] the predictions of the holy prophets and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour through the apostles" (2 Pet. 3:2). O. Michel claims that this "is not meant in a historicizing or intellectual sense . . . To remind the congregation is to bear witness to the Gospel; to remind oneself is to place oneself under the Word of Jesus. Here, too, the whole man is embraced" (TDNT IV 678). Similarly Timothy is exhorted: "Remind them of this [tauta hypomimnēske], and charge them before the Lord to avoid disputing about words, which does no good, but only ruins the hearers" (2 Tim. 2:14). In 1 Cor. 11:2 hoti memnēsthe means "that you have regard for me to such an extent that [epexegetical kai] you maintain the tradition even as I delivered it to you." In 2 Tim. 1:5 hypomnēsēsin labōn conveys the force of "having become convinced". According to 1 Cor. 4:17, Timothy has been sent to the Corinthians "to remind [hos anamnēsei] you of my ways in Christ, as I teach them everywhere in every church." For similar meanings which go beyond the merely intellectual exercise of bringing the past to mind, see 2 Pet. 1:12 f.; Jude 5, 17; 2 Pet. 3:1; Acts 11:16; Heb. 13:3.

(e) To mention (5% of the NT instances; 25% in profane Gk.). This may be the sense in 2 Cor. 7:15, although the context implies that what Titus is doing here is not something casual: "And his heart goes out all the more to you, as he remembers [anamimnēskenou] the obedience of you all, and the fear and trembling with which you received him." hypomnēsō in 3 Jn. 10 means "I will bring up", i.e. the elder will raise the question of the actions of Diotrephes before the church council. In the vision of Rev. 16:19 great → Babylon "was remembered before God [emnēsthe enōpion tou theou], i.e. arraigned before God, her condemnation being expressed by the infinitive clause “to make her drain the cup of the fury of his wrath” (cf. Rev. 18:5 see above (c); Ps. 109[108]:14).

2. The specifically biblical usage occurs only in 28% of the NT passages.

(a) To mention in prayer, to remember in → prayer. The two phrases mneian poioumenoi “mentioning” and mnēmoneuontes “remembering” in 1 Thess. 1:2 f. both mean to intercede. In Acts 10:4 Cornelius the centurion is told by an angel of God, “Your prayers and your alms have ascended as a memorial before God [anebēsan eis mnēmosynon emprosthen tou theou].” E. Haenchen thinks that the meaning here is simply that the prayers and alms are remembered before God, and that the connexion with the burnt part of the meal offering is too remote to see any association (The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 347; cf. OT 5 above). On the other hand, F. F. Bruce sees in the use of mnēmosynon a “sacrificial efficacy” in Cornelius’s conduct (The Acts of the Apostles, 1952², 216; cf. Ps. 111[110]:2; Phil. 4:18; Heb. 13:15 f.; Tob. 12:12). In Acts 10:31 emnesthēsan (“have been remembered”) is substituted in the case of the alms, and the prayer is simply said to have been heard. The passage may be compared with the prayer of the righteous for vengeance in Eth. Enoch 47:1 f.

(b) To proclaim. “Therefore I intend always to remind [hypomimnēskein] you of these things, though you know them and are established in the truth that you have [en tē parousē alētheia]. I think it right, as long as I am in this body, to arouse you by way of reminder [en hypomnēsei]” (2 Pet. 1:12 f.). Here the reminding is understood in terms of presenting again the known truth of the gospel. According to Jn. 14:26, such reminding is the work of the Holy Spirit as the paraclete: “But the Counselor [paraklētos], the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance [kai hypomnēsei hymas] all that I have said to you” (→ Advocate). As Christ’s hearers bring to mind the message which they have heard from him and which therefore in some measure remains within them, the Holy Spirit enables them to proclaim the Lordship of Christ in ways which are relevant to each succeeding generation. There are overtones of this sense of proclamation in 1 Cor. 4:17 (see above (d)). There is a sense in which Paul himself is being proclaimed to the Corinthians, for the apostle is part and parcel of the eschatological event (cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 303 ff.).

Similarly, the woman who anointed Jesus becomes part of the NT proclamation: “And truly, I say to you, wherever the gospel is preached in the whole world, what she has done will be told in memory of her [eis mnēmosynon autēs]” (Mk. 14:9; cf. Matt. 26:13). J. Jeremias has argued that the verse refers not to the church’s mission in the world but to the last judgment, where the woman will be remembered by God (“Mc. 14, 9”, ZNW 44, 1952–53, 103–7). J. H. Greenlee takes it to mean that the action served as her memorial to Jesus in view of his impending death (“eis mnēmosynon autēs, ‘For her memorial’, Mt. xxvi. 13; Mk. xiv. 9”, ExpT 71, 1959–60, 245). For further discussion see A. L. Moore, The Parousia in the New Testament, Supplements to NovT 13, 1966; and W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC 1974, 494 f. Lane draws attention to Ps. 41(40):2, where the one who protects the poor is assured of the blessing of Yahweh. The disciples might at first sight appear to be well qualified for this benediction in view of their suggestion about selling the ointment and using the proceeds for the poor. "It is the woman, however, who receives Jesus' praise for her response to the poor man above all others who is about to suffer for the people of God" (Lane, op. cit., 494). Jesus' pronouncement in v. 8, that "She has done what she could; she has anointed my body beforehand for burying", indicates that Jesus anticipated that he would suffer a criminal's death, for only in such circumstances would there be no anointing of the body (D. Daube, "The Anointing at Bethany and Jesus' Burial", Anglican Theological Review 32, 1950, 187 f.). V. 9 looks beyond the crucifixion to the post-resurrection church situation of the → proclamation of the → gospel.

Exhortation in the form of anamnēsis or hypomnēsis is a marked feature of the Christian message: "Hence I remind [anamimnēskō] you to rekindle the gift of God that is within you through the laying on of my hands" (2 Tim. 1:6; → Gift; → Hand, art. epitithēmi); "Remind [hypomimnēske] them to be submissive to rulers and authorities, to be obedient, to be ready for any honest work" (Tit. 3:1).

(c) To believe. "Remember Jesus Christ [mnēmoneue Iēsoun Christon], risen from the dead, descended from David, as preached in my gospel" (2 Tim. 2:8). What is to be remembered is a short credal statement (→ Confess; → Proclamation). It may be compared with the somewhat longer form in Rom 1:3 f., where the order is chronological. Stress is laid on the fact that these truths are integral to the apostolic gospel. See further J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 1972³, 1–29; V. H. Neufeld, The Earliest Christian Confessions, New Testament Tools and Studies 5, 1963; O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions, 1949; E. Stauffer, New Testament Theology, 1955, 244–48.

(d) To confess. Referring to the sacrifices under the old covenant, Heb. 10:3 declares: "But in these sacrifices there is a reminder of sin [anamnēsis hamartiōn] year after year." Here the allusion may well be to the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. 16), which involved public acknowledgment of sins committed in the past year (cf. J. A. Bengel, Gnomon of the New Testament, IV, 1866⁶, 4219 ff.; F. F. Bruce, op. cit., 228 f., who draws attention to Num. 5:15, where the ordeal of jealousy involves "a meal-offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance", and Jub. 34:19, where the Day of Atonement is the anniversary of the day on which Joseph was sold by his brothers, and "has been ordained that they should grieve for all their sins, and for all their errors, so that they might cleanse themselves on that day once a year"). As the OT sacrifices cannot remove sin, their effect is to expose it, so that he who brings an offering for sin year by year, is thereby confessing that he is, and remains, a sinner (cf. K. H. Bartels, Gedächtnis, 26 and notes 209 f.).

3. The only other NT instances of anamnēsis occur in the Pauline and Lucan accounts of the Last Supper (→ Lord's Supper): "and when he had given thanks, he broke it, and said, 'This is my body which is for you. Do this in remembrance of me [touto poieite eis tēn emēn anamnēsin].' In the same way also the cup, after supper, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me [touto poieite, hosakis ean pinēte, eis tēn emēn anamnēsin]' " (1 Cor. 11:24 f.); "And he took bread, and when he had given thanks he broke it and gave it to them, saying, 'This is my body which is given for you. Do this in remembrance of me [touto poieite eis tēn emēn anamnēsin]' " (Lk. 22:19 RSV mg.; for discussion of the textual variants in Lk. see Metzger, 173–77).

Traditionally, these words have been generally understood to mean that the Lord's Supper was Jesus' appointed means of being present in the hearts and minds of the community of the church. At one end of the scale, there was the Zwinglian interpretation which saw the Lord's Supper as a kind of aide mémoire, a stimulus to the act of mental recollection of Jesus' atoning death. Whether this does full justice to Zwingli himself is open to question (cf. Zwingli On the Lord's Supper, 1526, in G. W. Bromiley, ed., Zwingli and Bullinger, Library of Christian Classics XXIV, 1953, 176–238). Zwingli believed that the physical body of Christ was risen, ascended, and seated at the right hand of the Father, and therefore could not be present in the Lord's Supper. Moreover, he held that it is the Spirit that gives life (Jn. 6:63), and therefore the access that we have to Christ in remembering him is through the Spirit. At the other end of the scale is the Catholic interpretation which speaks of the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, involving the doctrine of transubstantiation in which the substance of the bread and the wine is changed into the substance of the body and blood of Christ, though the accidents (i.e. the outward appearances) remain. It was defined de fide by the Lateran Council of 1215 (cap. 1), received classical formulation by Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologiae 3a, QQ. 75–77), and reaffirmed by the Council of Trent (Session 13, 1551, cap. 4). This was also closely linked with the doctrine of eucharistic sacrifice, in which the eucharist was seen as the means of making present to the church the atoning death of Christ. More recently Catholic theologians have attempted to restate the doctrine of the eucharist. Thus Gregory Dix saw the essence of the early church's understanding of the eucharist as "the recalling before God of the one sacrifice of Christ in all its accomplished and effectual fulness so that it is here and now operative by its effects in the souls of the redeemed" (The Shape of the Liturgy, 1945, 243). The Protestant writer, Max Thurian, who is a member of the Taizé community, takes the words eis tēn emēn anamnesin to mean: "'with a view to my memorial, in memorial of me, as the memorial of me.' This memorial is not a simple subjective act of recollection, it is a liturgical action. But it is not just a liturgical action which makes the Lord present, it is a liturgical action which recalls as a memorial before the Father the unique sacrifice of the Son, and this makes Him present in His memorial, in the presentation of His sacrifice before the Father and in His intercession as heavenly High Priest. The eucharistic memorial is a recalling to us, a recalling by us to the Father and a recalling of the Son to the Father for us. Hence the eucharistic memorial is a proclamation by the Church; it is a thanksgiving and intercession of Christ for the Church" (The Eucharistic Memorial, II, The New Testament, Ecumenical Studies in Worship 8, 1961, 35 f.).

A somewhat different line of approach, which nevertheless sees these words of Jesus as having a God-ward reference, is taken by J. Jeremias in The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966, 249–55. Jeremias takes the phrase to mean: "that God may remember me." He claims that in such passages as Mk. 14:9 (par. Matt. 26:13), Acts 10:4 and in the OT and Palestinian memorial formulae, it is almost always God who remembers (op. cit., 251 f.; cf. 246–49). He also cites the Passover Haggadah prayer which may in essence go back to the time of Jesus: "Our God and God of our fathers, may there arise, and come, and come unto, be seen, accepted, heard, recollected and remembered, the remembrance of us and the recollection of us, and the remembrance of our fathers, and the remembrance of the Messiah, son of David, thy servant (zīkrōn māšīaḥ ben Dāwiḍ 'abdekā), and the remembrance of Jerusalem thy holy city, and the remembrance of all thy people, the house of Israel. May their remembrance come before thee, for rescue, goodness . . .” (op. cit., 252). In other words, Jeremias contends that the command for repetition may be understood as “‘This do, that God may remember me’; God remembers the Messiah in that he causes the kingdom to break in by the parousia” (ibid.). Paul’s explanation in v. 26 (“For as often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord’s death until he comes”) is taken by Jeremias to mean: “As often as the death of the Lord is proclaimed at the Lord’s supper, and the maranatha rises upwards, God is reminded of the unfulfilled climax of the work of salvation ‘until (the goal is reached, that) he comes’” (op. cit., 253; → Present, art. maranatha).

It should be observed that Jeremias is making a point which is rather different from the older Catholic interpretations and even that of Thurian. There is nothing in his argument which suggests a doctrine of the real presence of Christ or a eucharistic sacrifice which either repeats or extends that of Christ on the cross. Its emphasis is eschatological. The Lord’s Supper would thus be an enacted prayer comparable with Ps. 132(131):1: “Lord, remember David [mnēsthēti, kyrie, David].” It might also be compared with the vision of the fifth seal in Rev. 6:9 f., where the souls of the martyrs under the altar “cried out with a loud voice, ‘O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before thou wilt judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell upon the earth?’” Jeremias sees this interpretation as essentially Jewish and Palestinian in outlook, making it “very probable that the command goes back to Jesus himself” (op. cit., 255).

However, Jeremias’s view has not been universally endorsed. Although he can point to Did. 10:5 f. for supporting testimony to prayer in the early church for the eschatological remembrance of God and to the OT for the idea of God remembering, his view does not rule out other interpretations. touto poieite (“This do”) may be regarded as a summary of the procedure to be followed by participants in the Lord’s Supper. They are to act as Jesus did, when instituting the Supper on the eve of his passion, according to the Synoptic account. All the words and actions are intended to be eis tēn emēn anamnēsin. Comparison with the passages discussed in OT 2 (d) and with Heb. 10:3 suggests that this command to repeat the words and actions may be paraphrased as follows: “Do this, by eating the bread and drinking the cup (i.e. by participating in my life and death), by the preaching of the word (1 Cor. 11:26) and the singing of praise.” The word anamnēsis covers all these ideas. For a detailed analysis see Bartels, Gedächtnis, 27–42 and notes 212–334, where the most important literature on the subject is also discussed (→ further Body; → Blood; → Fellowship; → Song; cf. Mk. 14:26).

In the early church liturgies of the Lord’s Supper, which give a fuller interpretation of the words of institution, the anamnēsis is expanded into a credal statement which is sometimes quite extensive. Evidence of this is found as early as Justin Martyr (Dial. 70, 4) and in the so-called Church Order of Hippolytus (cf. Bartels, Gedächtnis, 42–49 and notes 336–39). Accordingly in the ancient church it was the legal duty of baptized church members to participate in the Lord’s Supper (Apostolic Constitutions 8, 47, 9), such participation being forbidden to all who were not full members (Apostolic Constitutions 12, 1 f.).

4. The original meanings of the mimmnēskō word-group were entirely non-religious, ranging from sexual desire to the heights of philosophy. However, as a result of their adoption into the Gk. scriptures as renderings of Heb. and ancient eastern equivalents, the Gk. words underwent a significant expansion of meaning, particularly along the lines of public worship (Schottroff, op. cit., passim). In this matter the NT followed implicitly in the footsteps of the OT, largely defying common Gk. usage.

What makes this so significant is the fact that the Gk. of the NT possesses so many other words relating to public worship, and yet this, the mnē- group, is introduced into early Christian vocabulary for use in this special area, with the result that what has been an altogether peripheral meaning in profane Gk. now becomes central. This is a sure sign that existing NT words were felt to be inadequate. In both OT and NT, the public worship of God (including sacrifice) belongs to the sphere of the historical. God's revelation, unlike the nature religions, does not follow the birth-and-death cycles of nature; it is no automatically unfolding process as in the mystery religions or in gnosticism. Rather, it occurs within the course of history (although not confined to history, cf. R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 25 f.) stretching from yesterday, through today, and on into the future, from Sinai to Calvary, from the OT covenant people to the church of Christ, then on to us and eventually to the end of the age and God's eternal kingdom. Hence, all the church's worship is and always has been historical, verbal and personal, rather than nature-orientated, mystical or dramatic. This is true of the preaching of the word, which aims to give outward expression to something which has happened in the past, by removing it from the wrappings of memory or of oral or written tradition and so recalling it to men's minds. The same applies also to the Lord's Supper, instituted at a precise time and place to be a "remembrance" of Christ throughout a definite period in the church's history, namely, "till he come" (1 Cor. 11:26). The Supper has its roots in the historical event of Christ's passion, so, as in the case of preaching, each time it takes place it is "in remembrance of" Jesus Christ. We give outward, visual expression to what we inwardly remember in order once again to "feed on him in our hearts by faith".

God's "remembrance" of his people (expressed in preaching) dovetails with his people's "remembrance" of him in praise and testimony. Within the context of revelation, God's remembrance is expressed verbally, i.e. it is addressed to men's minds and is personal, but it is not therefore mere words. "God's remembering is thus an efficacious and creative event" (O. Michel, TDNT IV 675). It can bring → blessing (Gen. 30:22) or → judgment (Rev. 16:19). Man's response is similarly "remembrance", expressed not only verbally in the ordinance of public worship, but in a manner which involves the whole person as only eating and drinking can do, i.e. in the Lord's Supper; and, over and above all this, expressed tangibly in collecting money for the poor (Gal. 2:10). Hence, words of the mnē- group cover a concept which is fundamental to the Bible and which embraces the whole of divine and human life: the "Word" of revelation and the "response" of faith.

5. Finally, the instances in the NT of the following nouns may be noted: mneia, remembrance (1 Thess. 3:6; 2 Tim. 1:3), mention, in the NT only in prayer (Rom. 1:9; Eph. 1:16; 1 Thess. 1:2; Phil. 1:3; Phlm. 4); mnēma, lit. a sign of remembrance, especially for the dead, and thus a grave or tomb (Mk. 5:3 par. Lk. 8:27; Mk. 15:46 par. Lk. 23:53; Mk. 16:2 par. Lk. 24:1; Acts 2:29; Rev. 11:9); mnēmeion, lit. a token of remembrance, especially for the dead, and hence a monument or memorial

(probably Lk. 11:47) and a grave or tomb (Matt. 8:28 par. Mk. 5:2; Matt. 23:29 par. Lk. 11:47; Matt. 27:52 f., 60 par. Mk. 15:46, Jn. 19:41 f.; Matt. 28:8 par. Mk. 16:8; Mk. 6:29; 16:2 f., 5; Lk. 11:44; 23:55; 24:2, 9, 12 v. l., 22, 24; Jn. 5:28; 11:17, 31, 38; 12:17; 20:1–4, 6, 8, 11; Acts 13:29). hypomnēsis (2 Tim. 1:5; 2 Pet. 1:13; 3:1) is virtually identical in meaning with anamnēsis in the act. sense. For further discussion → Bury; → Lord's Supper, → Proclamation; → Resurrection K. H. Bartels

(a). J. Behm, anamnēsis etc., TDNT I 348 f.; E. P. Blair, "An Appeal to Remembrance: The Memory Motif in Deuteronomy", Interpretation 51, 1961, 41 ff.; B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel, SBT 37, 1962; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, 1945; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1966²; D. Gregg, Anamnesis in the Eucharist, 1976; D. Jones, "anamnēsis in the Septuagint and the Interpretation of 1 Cor. xi. 25", JTS New Series 6, 1955, 183 ff.; E. Käsemann, "The Pauline Doctrine of the Lord's Supper", Essays on New Testament Themes, 1964, 108–35; A. Oepke and R. Meyer, kryptō etc., TDNT III 957–1000; O. Michel, mimneskomai etc., TDNT IV 675–83; M. Noth, "The 'Representation' of the O.T. in Proclamation", in C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963, 76–88; J. J. Petuchowski, "Do this in Remembrance of Me' (1 Cor. 11:24)", JBL 76, 1957, 293 ff.; M. Thurian, The Eucharistic Memorial, I The Old Testament, II The New Testament, Ecumenical Studies in Worship 7 and 8, 1961.

(b). K. H. Bartels, Dies tut zu meinem Gedächtnis. Zur Auslegung von 1 Kor. 11, 24, 25 (Dissertation, Mainz, with extensive bibliography), 1959; and "Der theoretische Quellort der 'Sammlung' und ihre Parole 'Katholische Reformation'", EvTh 20, 1960, 364 ff.; J. Begrich, "sōpēr and mazkîr" ZAW Neue Folge 17, 1940–41, 1 ff.; P. A. H. de Boer, Gedenken und Gedächtnis in der Welt des Alten Testaments, 1962; P. Bonnard, "Die Anamnesis, eine grundlegende Struktur des Urchristentums", in Zeichen der Zeit, 1971, 81–88; P. Brunner, "Zur Lehre vom Gottesdienst", Leiturgia 1, 1954, 84 ff.; N. A. Dahl, "Anamnesis: Mémoire et Commemoration du Christianisme primitif", StTh 1, 1947, 69–95; O. Haggmüller, "Erinnern und Vergessen Gottes und der Menschen", Bibel und Leben 3, 1962, 1 ff.; J. Jeremias, "Mk. 14, 9", ZNW 44, 1952–53, 103 ff.; P. Neuenzeit, Das Herrenmahl. Studien zur paulinischen Eucharistieauffassung, 1960; H. Graf Reventlow, "Das Amt des mazkîr", ThZ Basel 15, 1959, 161 ff.; G. Schmidt, "MNĒSTHETI", in Viva Vox Evangelii, Festschrift W. Meiser, 1951, 259 ff.; W. Schottroff, "Gedenken" im Alten Orient und im Alten Testament, Wissenschaftliche Monographien 15, 1964; and zākar, THAT I 507–18.

Remnant, Leave

λειμμα

λείπω (leipō), leave, leave behind, lack; λοιπός (loipos), remaining, other; λειμμα (leimma), remnant; καταλείπω (kataleipō), leave, leave behind, leave over; κατάλειμμα (kataleimma), remnant; ὑπόλειμμα (hypoleimma), remnant.

CL The basic Gk. vb. leipō (found as early as Mycenaean Gk., related to Lat. linquere, Eng. leave) means to leave, leave behind, leave over. As an intrans. active, it can assume the meaning of to be lacking (e.g. soi polla leipei, you lack much). There are various compound derivatives: kataleipō, to leave behind, leave remaining; hypoleipō, to leave remaining; perileipomai, to survive (all these are found in Homer, e.g. Il. 10, 238; Od. 16, 50; Il. 19, 230); and dialeipō, to cease (Xenophon, Apology 16). Later derivatives are the adjectives loipos, remaining (Pindar); and kataloipos, left over (Plato). The rare noun leimma, remnant, residue, occurs from Hdt. onwards; the LXX has also kataleimma, with the same meaning. Neither the vbs. nor the nouns acquired in Gk. any special nuance or religious meaning, apart from the general meaning of to leave, leave remaining, remnant, residue (of persons and things). This is true even in the writings of Josephus who, instead of the nouns, generally used to leipsanon, the remainder (cf. Eur. Medea 1387; Josephus, Ant. 11, 213; War 4, 414).

OT 1. In the LXX leipō and its derivatives are used in most cases for the following Heb. verbs and their derivatives: (a) šā'ar (niphāl, to be left remaining; hiphil, to leave remaining; some 200 times in the MT); (b) 'āzab, to forsake (niphāl, to be forsaken; some 200 times); pālat, to escape (22 times in piel meaning to save); (c) sārad, to run away (once only, Jos. 10:20; the derivative sārīd, survivor, occurs however 28 times).

The noun leimma is found only once (2 Ki. 19:4, for š'erīt, remnant); the vb. leipō in all 8 times (3 times for 3 different Heb. verbs, 4 times in the Apocrypha, and at Prov. 11:3 giving a different sense from that of the MT); but the adj. loipos more than 120 times (mostly for yeter, remnant, and 10 times for š'ar or š'erīt, remnant). Most frequent of all, however, with nearly 300 instances, is kataleipō, chiefly for šā'ar, to be left remaining, to leave remaining; 'āzab, to forsake; and yātar, to be left remaining, to leave remaining. The adj. kataloipos (over 90 times) is used in most cases for š'ar or yeter, remnant; the noun kataleimma (21 times) usually for š'ar or š'erīt, remnant, but also twice for sārīd, escapee. hypoleipō (c. 90 times) is likewise used for šā'ar, yātar and other Heb. vbs. Less frequent is the noun hypoleimma, remnant, which occurs 9 times in all, rendering in 6 instances derivatives of šā'ar and once sārīd, survivor. perileipō and periloipos translate derivatives of šā'ar and yātar. Differences of meaning between the various compounds of leipō used to translate Heb. words are especially marked in the case of dialeipō, to cease (10 times for various Heb. vbs.), and ekleipō, to cease, come to an end (over 150 instances), neither of which are ever used for šā'ar or yātar.

2. In the general sense most of these vbs. are used of things to describe total destruction with nothing remaining (e.g. Exod. 10:15, where the locusts leave nothing remaining; Exod. 10:19, the locusts are not left remaining, i.e. they are totally removed), or to refer to a remnant which survives (e.g. Isa. 10:19, where the remnant of the forest trees can be counted by a child; Isa. 44:17, 19, where the rest of a tree is fashioned into an idol).

(a) Important uses of the words are the concepts of the remnant in the case of the noun, and to leave remaining in the case of the vb., in the context of the holy → war. Here it is a matter of the total annihilation of peoples or specific groups (Og of Bashan, Num. 21:35; the inhabitants of Ai, Jos. 8:12 ff., or the leaving of survivors after a campaign, a few Anakim in Gaza, Gath and Ashdod, Jos. 11:12).

The terms “remnant” and “survive” can be used to describe the activity of Yahweh in preserving what he has created. Thus in the flood story (10th century B.C.) we find the words: “Only Noah was left [MT wayyiššā'er; LXX kai kateleiphthē], and those that were with him in the ark” (Gen. 7:23; → Noah).

(b) The military use of the word šā'ar is combined with the preserving activity of Yahweh towards the end of the 9th century B.C., in the promise of Yahweh to → Elijah (1 Ki. 19:18) at a time when Israel was threatened from within by apostasy and outwardly by the Syrian Hazael: “Yet I will leave [MT w'hiš'arti; LXX kai kataleipseis] seven thousand in Israel, all the knees that have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth that has not kissed him.”

3. (a) The first suggestions of the idea of a remnant of Israel are found in the early prophets. Thus in Amos 5:14 f. we can see the “vague hope of a remnant as yet unspecified” (S. Herrmann, Die prophetischen Heilserwartungen im Alten Testament, 1965, 124 f.), when the prophet says that “it may be” (!) that Yahweh will be gracious to “the remnant of Joseph”. In Isaiah the military concept of a remnant is given a theological content. In the context of the prophet’s exhortation to King Ahaz not to be afraid (cf. Isa. 30:15) and to trust in Yahweh, we find the name of the prophet’s son Shear-jashub (š’e’ar yāšûb, “A remnant shall return” (Isa. 7:3). The object of the prophet’s exhortation is to save the people from a catastrophe in which, while the people of God will not be totally destroyed, only a remnant will survive. Here the concept of the remnant serves to underline and confirm the dreadfulfulness of the catastrophe. Those who cannot muster up confidence in Yahweh become a worthless residue (cf. Isa. 30:15 ff.). Herrmann holds that “the concept of the remnant is peripheral to Isaiah’s message” (op. cit., 130), but in Isaiah a “forerunner of the doctrine of the remnant” can be seen (U. Stegemann, “Der Restgedanke bei Jesaja”, BZ Neue Folge 19, 1969, 186). Some scholars hold that the mention of a remnant in Isaiah led in the later, post-exilic period to the addition of various sayings (Isa. 6:13; 10:20 ff.; 11:11 ff.; 28:5 f.), which seek to tone down the prophet’s message of → judgment by the thought of the remnant, and to place more emphasis on the remnant in the prophet’s message generally.

(b) Even in the first half of the 6th century B.C., the time of the catastrophic downfall of the Southern Kingdom in 597 and 587 B.C., there is no mention of a remnant of Israel which could maintain the hope of a new beginning. Jeremiah threatens that Yahweh will let Judah be annihilated (Jer. 19:11). He compares those who have been left in the land under Zedekiah (hanniš’arîm bā’ares) to bad figs (24:8; → Fruit, art. sykē). The remnant of Judah under Gedaliah forfeits the possibility of remaining in the land, when Gedaliah is murdered by Ishmael (Jer. 40:11–15).

In Ezekiel, the concept of the remnant is either excluded (Ezek. 9:8; 11:13; 17:21), or used in an entirely different way. There is a remnant remaining in → Jerusalem after the judgments of Yahweh (war, famine, wild beasts, pestilence); but the only purpose is to bring home to the exiles a proof of the massive destruction of Jerusalem and its inhabitants (cf. W. Eichrodt, Ezekiel: A Commentary, 1970, 190 f. on Ezek. 14:22; cf. 12:16, where the survivors are to “confess all their abominations among the nations where they go”, i.e. the self-condemnation of Israel).

For Jeremiah and Ezekiel alike, the true remnant is represented by the company of exiles, i.e. by those who have survived the catastrophe through deportation. They are the ones, according to Ezekiel, to whom God appears.

(c) A somewhat more optimistic attitude to the remnant is seen in Deuteronomy. Although at Deut. 28:62, like Lev. 26:36, the survivors are warned of calamity and fear in the land of their enemies, Deut. 4:27 ff. reminds those who remain of the mercy of Yahweh, should they repent. They are promised consolation in an unusually emphatic way.

(d) It was during the period of the exile that the concept of the remnant acquired a fixed theological content, viz. the hope of Yahweh’s preserving and saving work. Behind this was the discovery that, although in the national catastrophe Yahweh had executed a terrible judgment, even this judgment was limited by Yahweh’s will to maintain and preserve his people. We have a witness to this hope in Isa. 46:3 f. when the prophet makes Yahweh address the exiles as “the remnant of the house of Israel”, whom he will “bear, carry and save” (Isa. 46:4). In these chapters we also find another, different thought: the concept of a remnant is applied to the “survivors of the nations” (Isa. 45:20) who, embarrassed as a result of their idolatry, take counsel before Yahweh.

(e) In the late exilic and post-exilic periods, i.e. in the second half of the 6th century B.C., when the → temple was rebuilt by the returned exiles, the concept of the remnant gained increasingly in importance. To this period belong probably the sayings of Mic. 2:12 f.; 5:7 f.; 7:18, and Zeph. 2:7, 9, where the recovery of the coastal strip is promised to the remnant of Judah (v. 7), or of the people generally (v. 9). In Obadiah (v. 17) we find, already during the exilic period, the concept of the remnant linked with the hope for → Jerusalem or Zion; and Zechariah announces the return of Yahweh to Zion, and awakes in the survivors the hope of the preservation of Jerusalem (8:3; 8:11 f., “a sowing of peace”, i.e. secure tenure).

(f) In Joel 2:32 the concept of the remnant is still linked to Zion (cf. also Ezr. 9:8) at a still later date (4th or 3rd century B.C.). In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah (4th or 3rd century B.C.) the idea of the remnant is several times applied to the exiles who have returned (Ezr. 9:8; 9:15; Neh. 1:2 f.). After 300 B.C. the later parts of the book of Zechariah speak of a remnant which will be purified (Zech. 13:8 f.), and which will survive on the day when the nations assemble to fight against Jerusalem (14:2, linked with apocalyptic ideas about the day of Yahweh).

(g) A completely new kind of saying is found concerning the Philistines at Zech. 9:7: “it too shall be a remnant for our God; it shall be like a clan in Judah.” Isa. 66:18 ff. (which could be as late as 160 B.C., cf. C. Westermann, Isaiah 40–66: A Commentary, 1969, 295–308, 423 f.) speaks of a mission of survivors to the nations – in the context of apocalyptic sayings, a line of thought which extends the idea of the remnant to the nations, and has its ultimate continuation in the NT!

4. (a) In the extra-canonical, apocalyptic writings, the remnant concept is only occasionally applied to the whole creation: “And now, my son, arise and make a petition to the Lord of glory, since thou art a believer, that a remnant may remain on the earth, and that He may not destroy the whole world” (Eth. Enoch 83:8). 2 Esd. 13:26 speaks of “a Man coming from the heart of the sea” through whom “the Most High” will deliver his creation “and the same shall order the survivors”. Much more frequent are the remnant sayings which refer to → Israel or the synagogue: 2 Esd. 9:7 f. refers to “my salvation in my land, and within my borders” in connexion with those who have been saved (cf. 2 Esd. 12:34; 13:48; Eth. Enoch 90:30). According to Syr. Bar. 40:2, the messiah will “protect the rest of My people which shall be found in the place which I have chosen.”

(b) The tying of the remnant concept to Israel led, in Palestinian Judaism, to the making of exclusive claims for particular groups, and consequently to an intensification. The Qumran community, for instance, saw in itself the holy remnant promised in the OT (CD 1:4), and enjoying God’s assistance (1QM 13:8; 14:8 f.), while their enemies are utterly destroyed with none remaining (1QM 1:6; 4:2; 14:5; cf. also 1QS 4:1–5:13; CD 2:6). Likewise, the → Pharisees attempted, by voluntary submission to priestly ordinances regarding cleansing, to set themselves up as the holy remnant

(cf. J. Jeremias, "Der Gedanke des 'Heiligen Restes' im Spätjudentum und in der Verkündigung Jesu", in Abba, 1966, 122).

(c) In rabbinic Judaism the condition for belonging to the remnant was held to be observance of the Torah. "So . . . shall great deeds be done . . . (but only) for the remnant, who have not sinned" (Targum Isa. 10:22 f.). "Those who survive will return to Zion, and those who have kept the Torah will remain in Jerusalem" (Targum Isa. 4:3). Here the concept of the remnant is quite clearly associated with the keeping of the → law.

NT 1. In the NT the noun leimma, remnant, is found only once (Rom. 11:5), and the vb. leipō 6 times, with the meaning to lack, be in want of (Lk. 18:22; Tit. 1:5; 3:13; Jas. 1:4 f.; 2:15). The adj. loipos, remaining, other, which is used chiefly in the plur., the others, the rest, or adverbially, in other respects, is found altogether 55 times; occasionally with a critical undertone, when it refers to those who are hardened (Lk. 8:10; Rom. 11:7), who do not believe (Mk. 16:13; 1 Thess. 4:13), who act as hypocrites (Gal. 2:13), or who do not repent (Rev. 9:20).

As in the LXX, the most common compound is kataleipō, again with various meanings such as to leave (a region, Matt. 4:13; people, Matt. 19:5 par., Mk. 10:7; cf. Gen. 2:24; possessions, Lk. 5:28); to fall behind, neglect (Acts 6:2); to leave, leave behind (someone somewhere, e.g. Acts 18:19). The following appear once each: kataloipoi, rest (Acts 15:17 = Amos 9:12 LXX); dialeipō, to leave off, cease (Lk. 7:45); hypoleipomai, to be left remaining; and hypoleimma, remnant (Rom. 9:27 = citation of Isa. 10:22; in the TR kataleimma).

2. (a) In the NT, the OT remnant concept is taken up only in Rom. 9–11. Here Paul is dealing with the fact that the majority of Jews refuse to believe in Christ. Indeed, the central theme of Rom. is the question of the standing of the Jewish people in relation to the salvation that is in Christ alone. Chs. 1–8 deal with the ground of salvation showing that the OT anticipates the way of salvation in Christ. Chs. 9–11 deal with the position of the Jews as the chosen people in the light of their rejection of Christ and God's overall purposes. What attitude, then, should be adopted towards this fact by the early Christian church, composed as it is of both Gentile and Jewish Christians? Does this rejection of Christ mean that the → election of Israel no longer applies? Paul holds on to the special position of Israel among the nations. This special position, however, is based on God's free elective grace, kat' eklogēn, "according to election" (Rom. 9:11; 11:5), just as is the calling of the Gentiles into the community of the new people of God (9:24).

To show that the Gentiles are accepted as children of God, Paul cites Hos. 2:23 and 1:10 (Rom. 9:25 f.). This is followed immediately (9:27) by the warning of Isa. 10:22 f., which speaks of the decimation of Israel down to a remnant that repents: like the LXX, Paul does not say "A remnant will return", but "A remnant will be saved." To this he adds in v. 29 a citation of Isa. 1:9, where the LXX has already introduced a greater note of hope: for the Heb. šārīd, remnant, both LXX and Paul have sperma, lit. "seed", i.e. descendants. This combination of OT citations displays clearly the direction of Paul's reinterpretation of the remnant. In setting a reference to the remnant of Israel alongside the prophecy of the Gentiles' acceptance as the children of God, Paul is altering the status of the former. The remnant of OT prophecy merges into the new people of God, constituted on the basis of faith in Christ. The remnant of Israel is not eliminated; but it stands alongside those Gentiles who are called to be members of God's new people. The remnant (Isa. 1:9 MT), or the descendants (Isa. 1:9 LXX), are those whom God has called, together with the Gentiles, into the church of Christ. In Rom. 11:3, 4, 5, the concept of the remnant is introduced by a reference back to Elijah's complaint on Mount Horeb (1 Ki. 19:10), and Yahweh's reply (1 Ki. 19:18). This reference is used by Paul as evidence that God has not rejected Israel. The leimma kat' eklogēn charitos, remnant chosen by grace (→ Election, art. haireomai; → Grace, art. charis), is however based not on Israel's efforts, but on God's set purpose (Rom. 11:5); and it is characterized by faith in Christ. Paul's hope is that through this remnant, and through the Gentile Christians who with them form the church, the "fullness" (plērōma, Rom. 11:12 AV) of Israel can be won for Christ. Thus in the remnant of Israel, which confesses faith in Christ, there is a new beginning for all Israel. This remnant is a challenge to all the Jews.

God's gracious activity is directed towards all nations and towards the whole of Israel, with the aim of making them part of the new people of God. Paul takes up the concept of the remnant and weaves it into an elaborate argument in these chapters, where he appears as the spokesman of Israel. His purpose is not to take over into the Christian church the ideas about the remnant which were current in 1st century Judaism, and to suggest that the church is the holy remnant. Nor is he attacking the idea of the remnant. He is reinterpreting and developing it further, to show that the OT prophecy of the remnant is fulfilled in a community consisting of Jews and Gentiles.

(b) The adj. loipos, remaining, is twice used by Paul of those who mourn because they have no hope (1 Thess. 4:13), or who are asleep in the sense that they are not expecting the parousia (1 Thess. 5:6) (→ Present, art. parousia). In Rom. 1:13 it is used of other nations, or Gentiles, in contrast to those being addressed in the letter, and in Gal. 2:13 it refers to other Jewish Christians who joined Peter in acting hypocritically, in that at first they had fellowship at table with the Gentiles in Antioch, but later abandoned it out of fear.

Otherwise Paul uses the adj. without any specialized meaning, and in this he is not unlike other NT writers: other (the rest of the Gentiles, Rom. 1:13; the rest of the Jews, Gal. 2:13; and the rest of the churches, 2 Cor. 12:13; the other co-workers, Phil. 4:3; the other apostles, 1 Cor. 9:5, cf. Acts 2:37; cf. the other virgins, Matt. 25:11; the rest of the scriptures, 2 Pet. 3:16); the others (Rom. 11:7; 1 Cor. 7:12; Eph. 2:3; 1 Tim. 5:20; cf. Matt. 22:6, 27; Mk. 16:13; Lk. 8:10; 18:9, 11; 24:10; Acts 5:13; 16:30 D; 17:9; 27:44; Rev. 19:21; 20:5); all the others (2 Cor. 13:2; Phil. 1:13; cf. Lk. 24:9; Acts 28:9); the other things, the rest (1 Cor. 11:34; 15:37; cf. Mk. 4:19; Lk. 12:26; Rev. 3:2).

loipos is used adverbially in various expressions of time: (to) loipon, from now on, in the future, henceforth (1 Cor. 7:29; 2 Tim. 4:8; cf. Matt. 26:45; Mk. 14:41; Heb. 10:13); loipon, finally (Acts 27:20); tou loipou, from now on, in the future (Gal. 6:17), finally (Eph. 6:10). (to) loipon is also used adverbially in the sense of beyond that, as far as the rest is concerned, finally (1 Cor. 1:16; 2 Cor. 13:11; Phil. 3:1; 4:8; 1 Thess. 4:1; 2 Thess. 3:1); and in this connexion, then, furthermore (1 Cor. 4:2).

3. In the Synoptic Gospels the adj. is also occasionally used to describe those who are outside the rule of God. Thus in the parable of the royal wedding feast

(Matt. 22:1–13), hoi loipoi, the others, the rest, are those who mock and kill the servants sent by the king to invite them; and in Matt. 25:1–12 the “other [loipai] maidens” (v. 11) are those excluded from the wedding feast. Jesus’ cry of dereliction from the cross (Matt. 27:46) is finally received by “the others [hoi loipoi]” with the words: “Wait, let us see whether Elijah will come and save him” (Matt. 27:49). In Lk. 8:10 the “others” are contrasted with the disciples. loipoi here means those who are outside the band of disciples and do not understand the meaning of the → parables, because they are → hardened (cf. also Rom. 11:7). The parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Lk. 18:9–14) is addressed to those who, in their own faithful observance of the law, despise others (loipous, v. 9). The expression “other men”, used by the Pharisee, is here a judgment on those who do not keep the law (v. 11). Whether the polemic of the gospels against the → Pharisees (cf. Matt. 23, especially v. 13) is connected with their claim to be the remnant community (cf. J. Jeremias, op. cit., 129 f.), and whether the absence of reference to the remnant in the Gospels may be traced to this, is a question which cannot be answered with certainty. All that can be said is that neither the OT concept of the remnant, nor its narrower Judaistic counterpart, is to be found in the Gospels.

4. The vb. leipō is used in Lk. 18:22 of the decisive shortcoming which hinders the rich man from the life of discipleship, namely his riches: “One thing you lack [eti hen soi lepei], sell all that you have and distribute to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me” (→ Poor; → Possessions). In Jas. 1:4, 5 and 2:15 the vb. means to lack, have need of, in the literal sense. In Tit. 3:13 it has the sense of lack, and in Tit. 1:5 it is used of the defects which Titus is to amend in the church in Crete.

5. In the Revelation the adj. loipos is found 8 times; in two cases it has a meaning reminiscent of the remnant idea. In Rev. 11:13 we read of the “rest” who survive the judgment on the city unharmed, and give glory to God. Rev. 12:17 speaks of the war waged by the dragon on the “rest” of the offspring of the woman, “who keep the commandments of God and bear testimony to Jesus”, and against whom in Rev. 13 both the beasts fight. Although we may see behind these sayings a wealth of Jewish apocalyptic material, the reference here is not to the remnant in the sense of a new beginning.

6. The place in early Christian theology for the concept of the remnant in its proper sense is in dealing with the relationship of the church to Israel. The return to an understanding of it in the sense of a kind of ecclesiola in ecclesia, a church within the church, is a repetition of the narrowing of the doctrine which took place in Jewish apocalyptic. It ignores two facts: firstly, that we are told that God’s purpose for the remnant is his purpose for the whole people; and secondly, that in the confrontation between Israel and the message of Jesus Christ, the idea of a specially qualified remnant became modified and reinterpreted, finding in this message its ultimate fulfilment in an unexpected way (→ Redemption, art. sōzō NT; → Elect, art. eklegomai; → Take, art. lambanō NT).
W. Günther, H. Krienke

→ Church, → Israel

(a). J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, TC, 1972; K. Barth, CD II, 2, 269–305; H. Berkhof, Christ the Meaning of History, 1966; J. C. Campbell, “God’s People and the Remnant”, SJT 3, 1950, 78–85; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; W. Eichrodt, Ezekiel, 1970; G. Fohrer, “The Stems pl̄ and ml̄ in the Old Testament”, in sōzō

etc., TDNT VI 978 ff.; L. Goppelt, Jesus, Paul and Judaism, 1964; H. Gross, "Remnant", EBT II 741 ff.; G. F. Hasel, "Linguistic Considerations Regarding the Translation of Isaiah's Shear-Jashub: A Reassessment", Andrews University Seminary Studies 9, 1971, 36–46; "Semantic Values of Derivatives of the Hebrew root š'r", ibid. 11, 1973, 152–69; The Remnant: The History and Theology of the Remnant Idea from Genesis to Isaiah, 1974²; and "Remnant", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 735 f.; E. W. Heaton, "The Root š'r and the Doctrine of the Remnant", JTS New Series 3, 1952, 27–39; J. Jocz, A Theology of Election: Israel and the Church, 1958; R. Martin-Achard, A Light to the Nations, 1962; B. F. Meyer, "Jesus and the Remnant of Israel", JBL 84, 1965, 123–30; J. Morgenstern, "The Rest of Nations", JSS 2, 1957, 225–31; J. Munck, Christ and Israel, 1967; J. Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, NLC, II, 1965, 39 ff., 68 ff.; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965, 21 f., 165 ff., 187; P. Richardson, Israel and the Apostolic Church, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 10, 1969; V. Hertrich and G. Schrenk, leimma etc. TDNT IV 194–214; C. Westermann, Isaiah 40–66, 1969; R. N. Whybray, Isaiah 40–66, New Century Bible, 1975; E. J. Young, The Book of Isaiah, The New International Commentary on The Old Testament, I–III, 1965–72; W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel, I, Hermeneia, 1978.

(b) F. Dreyfus, "La Doctrine du Reste d'Israël chez le Prophète Isaïe", Revue des Sciences Philosophiques et Théologiques 39, 1955, 361–86; S. Herrmann, Die prophetischen Heilserwartungen im Alten Testament, 1965; J. Jeremias, "Der Gedanke des 'Heiligen Restes' im Spätjudentum und in der Verkündigung Jesu", ZNW 42, 1949, 184 ff. (reprinted in Abba, 1966, 121–32); U. Luz, Das Geschichtsverständnis des Paulus, 1968, 80–83; P. Meinhold, Studien zur israelitischen Religionsgeschichte, I, Der heilige Rest, 1903; C. Müller, Gottes Gerechtigkeit und Gottes Volk. Eine Untersuchung zu Röm. 9–11, FRLANT 86, 1964; W. E. Müller and W. E. Preuss, Die Vorstellung vom Rest im Alten Testament, 1973; G. Schrenk, Die Weissagung über Israel im Neuen Testament, 1951; U. Stegemann, "Der Restgedanke bei Jesaja", BZ Neue Folge 19, 1969, 161–86; R. de Vaux, "Le 'Reste d'Israël' d'après les Prophètes", RB 42, 1933, 526–39; H. Wildberger, š"ar, THAT II 844–55.

Rest

ἀνάπαυσις	ἀναπαύω (anapauiō), give rest, mid. rest, take one's rest; ἀνάπαυσις (anapausis), rest; ἐναπαύομαι (enapauiomai), rest, take one's rest, rely on; καταπαύω (katapauiō), bring to rest, rest, stop, resting; κατάπαυσις (katapausis), rest, place of rest.
-----------	--

CL In cl. Gk. anapauiō is used in its act. form for: (a) make to cease, bring to an end, stop or hinder from something (Homer, Il. 17, 550); (b) to rest (trans.), make to halt, refresh (Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7, 1, 4). In mid. and pass. it means to cease, take rest from, recover, come to rest (Plato, Critias 106a); later also, to die. Thus the expression to take one's rest can be used of the dead (cf. IG 14, 1717). katapauiō means to stop, put an end to; with reference to persons, to put an end to, hinder, depose, kill (Homer, Il. 16, 618; thus often with an unpleasant undertone); but also, to appease, calm (Homer, Od. 4, 583). In Judaism the term was taken up in the sense of to give someone a good rest (LXX). anapausis in cl. Gk. meant repose, relaxation, recreation, a rest from something.

OT 1. Heb. equivalents. The vb. anapauiō is used in the LXX to translate no less than 14 different Heb. vbs. The most common of these is nūah, rest, repose, be quiet, and in the trans. forms to lay down, let remain, leave. nūah occurs in the following passages: Exod. 23:12; Deut. 5:14; 2 Sam. 7:11; 1 Ki. 5:18 (4); 13:20 A; 1 Chr. 22:9, 18; Neh. 9:28; Est. 9:16 ff., 22; Job 3:13, 17, 26; Prov. 21:16; 29:17; Eccl. 7:9 (10); Hab. 3:16; Zech. 6:8; Isa. 7:19; 11:2; 14:1, 3, 6; 32:18; Lam. 5:5; Dan. 12:13. anapauiō stands for bālaḡ, look cheerful (Job 10:20); yāšab, sit, remain, dwell (Mic.

4:4); nāham, comfort, console (Jer. 42[49]:10); nāpaš, be refreshed (Exod. 23:12); rābaš, lie down (Gen. 29:2; 49:14; Isa. 13:20 f.; 14:30; 27:10; Ezek. 34:14 f.); rāgā', be at rest, repose (Deut. 28:65; Isa. 34:14; Jer. 47[29]:6); rawaḥ, be wide, spacious, find relief (Job 32:20); šā'an, be at ease, at peace, rest securely (Jer. 48[31]:11); šābat, cease, desist, rest (Exod. 32:12; Isa. 14:4); šakab, lie down (Num. 24:9); šākan, settle down, abide, dwell (Isa. 13:21; 32:16; 34:17; 57:15; Ezek. 17:23; 31:13); šāqaṭ, be quiet (Isa. 57:20; Jer. 49:23 [30:12]; Ezek. 16:42); and 'ābar, pass over (Job 13:13?). It is without Heb. equivalent in Jdg. 4:11; 1 Sam. 16:16; Job 2:9; Sir. 3:6; 18:16; 22:11; 31 (34):21; 39:11; 47:23; Lam. 1:6; Ad.Dan. Susannah 37.

The noun anapauma which does not occur in the NT is without equivalent in Job 3:23, and stands for nūaḥ in Isa. 28:2 and m^enūḥāh, rest, in Isa. 28:12, though it can also mean a resting-place.

anapausis stands chiefly for m^enūḥāh (Gen. 49:15; Num. 10:33; Ruth 1:9; 1 Chr. 22:9; 28:2; Pss. 23[22]:1; 132[131]:8; Mic. 2:10; Isa. 11:10; Jer. 45:3[51:33]), and other cognates of nūaḥ, i.e. mānōaḥ, resting-place, state or condition of rest (Gen. 8:9; Ruth 3:1; Ps. 116[115]:7; Isa. 34:14; Lam. 1:3), and naḥat, quietness, rest (Eccl. 4:6; 9:5, 17), and the vb. nūaḥ (Isa. 23:12). It stands for rabaš, repose (Isa. 17:2), rēbeš, resting-place (Isa. 65:10); rega', a moment (Job 7:18; 21:13); šabbāt, → sabbath rest (Exod. 16:23; Lev. 25:8), šebet, cessation (Isa. 37:28), šabbatōn, sabbath observance (Exod. 31:15; 32:2; Lev. 16:31?; 23:3, 24, 39; 25:4 f.); and šābat, cease, desist, rest (Exod. 23:12); šāqaṭ, be quiet (Isa. 32:17); and nūaḥ (Isa. 25:10; 28:2). It is without Heb. equivalent in Est. 9:17; Job 3:23; Ps. 132(131):4; Wis. 4:7; Sir. 6:28; 11:19; 20:21; 22:13; 24:7; 28:16; 30:17; 33:25 (30:34); 31(34):3 f.; 36:24(29); 38:14, 23; 40:5 f.; 51:27; Isa. 23:13 v.l.

The vb. epanapauomai, rest in or upon, stands for nūaḥ (Num. 11:25 f.; Jdg. 16:26; 2 Ki. 2:15; Isa. 11:2 v.l., for šā'an, lean, support oneself on (2 Ki. 5:18; 7:2, 17; Mic. 3:11; Ezek. 29:7), and is without equivalent (1 Macc. 8:12).

In the LXX katapauomai translates no less than 16 different Heb. vbs. or nouns, but again the most common is nūaḥ (Exod. 20:11; 33:14; Deut. 3:20; 12:10; 25:19; Jos. 1:13, 15; 3:13; 21:42; 22:4; 23:1; 2 Sam. 21:10; 1 Chr. 23:23; 2 Chr. 14:5 f. [6 f.]; 15:15; 20:30; Eccl. 10:4). šābat is also not uncommon (Gen. 2:2 f.; 8:22; Exod. 5:5; 31:17; 34:21; Deut. 32:26; Neh. 4:5[11]: 6:3; Hos. 1:4; Lam. 5:14; Ezek. 30:13; Dan. 9:27 Theodotion; 11:18). Other vbs. used are 'āsap, gather (Ps. 85[84]:3, here in the sense of withdraw [anger]); ḥāyāh, live (Deut. 5:33); yāšaḥ (Ruth 2:7); kālāh, come to an end, cease (Gen. 49:33; Exod. 31:18; 34:33; Hos. 11:6); līn, lodge, spend the night, abide (Jdg. 18:2); nāhal, get through (2 Chr. 32:22); rāga' (Job 26:12); rāpāh, let drop (Ezek. 1:24); šārap, burn (Ps. 74[73]:8: the MT has "they burned all the meeting places of God in the land", whereas the LXX has "come, let us cause to cease from the land the festivals of the Lord"); šūb, turn back, return (Num. 25:11; 1 Ki. 12:24; Job 21:34); š'kābāh, deposit, layer of dew (Exod. 16:13); šāken, dwell (Deut. 33:12; Ps. 55[54]:6); šāqaṭ, be undisturbed, be at peace, be quiet (Jos. 11:23); nāpaš, take breath, refresh oneself (Exod. 31:17). There is no Heb. equivalent at Exod. 35:2; Jdg. 8:3A; 20:43A; Ezr. 9:13 Symmachus; Jud. 6:1; Wis. 10:19 Symmachus; Sir. 5:6; 10:17; 24:8, 11; 38:23; 43:5, 13; 44:23; 45:3; 47:12 f.; Lam. 3:11; 1 Macc. 9:73; 2 Macc. 15:37).

katapauma, rest, occurs only at Sir. 36:15(18). katapausis stands for 3 Heb. sets of words: nūaḥ, rest (vb. Num. 10:36), nōaḥ, rest (2 Chr. 6:41), mānōaḥ, resting-place (1 Chr. 6:16[31]), m^enûhâh, resting-place (Deut. 12:9; Jdg. 20:43; 1 Ki. 8:56; Pss. 95[94]:11; 132[131]:14; Isa. 66:1); 'huzzâh, property (Lev. 25:28); šābat, rest (Exod. 34:21). There is no Heb. equivalent in Exod. 35:2; Jud. 9:8; 2 Macc. 15:1.

2. Theological usage. The concept of rest is important in the OT, especially in connexion with the idea of the people of God being given rest by Yahweh from their many enemies. The vb. nûah is frequently used in a lit. sense, meaning to settle down to rest, e.g. of an army or swarms of locusts (the Arabic par. is used of camels lying down). In the religious realm the use was extended to the idea of God's → Spirit resting on men and things (Num. 11:25; Isa. 11:2), the resting of God's → hand (Isa. 25:10), and of rest in the grave (Job 3:17). Probably the most important use theologically is that of the hiphil in the sense of to give rest to (Isa. 14:3; 28:12), usually with Yahweh as subject. He gives rest to his people by the provision of the promised land and the conquest of their enemies (Jos. 1:13, 15; 21:44; Deut. 3:20; 12:10; 25:19; cf. Deut. 12:9 m^enûhâh). Typical of the concrete and this-worldly hopes of the OT faith in Yahweh is this promise of peace in the land, where Judah and Israel will dwell securely, "every man under his vine and under his fig tree" (1 Ki. 4:25).

At a later period the → sabbath rest (Heb. šabbāt; LXX anapausis, or katapauō) gained special significance for Israel. The first creation narrative, which is often attributed to the Priestly writer, accounts for this by reference to Yahweh's rest on the 7th day of creation (Gen. 2:2 f.; Exod. 20:22), in contrast to the soteriological explanation given in Deut. 5:12–15. Characteristically, the sabbath rest is by no means confined to the religious, worshipping community, or to a privileged class: male and female slaves, aliens, and even cattle are expressly included in the day of rest devoted to Yahweh (Exod. 16:23, 25; 20:10). Along with the curse of work (Gen. 3:17 ff.), the people of God are given the blessing of rest, in which to rejoice in their God and his works. anapausis is used in post-canonical Judaism, notably Sir., to refer to the rest promised to the disciples of wisdom; the refreshment that comes from the possession of wisdom given by God (cf. Sir. 6:28; 24:7; 30:17; 51:27).

NT 1. In the NT anapauō means: (a) to take one's rest in the normal bodily sense (Mk. 14:41; Matt. 26:45); (b) to calm someone who has become disturbed, to refresh by giving pleasure, comfort or compensation (1 Cor. 16:18; Phlm. 7, 20; 2 Cor. 7:13). This may come about through Christian love, fellowship or action, or news of such. Jesus called his disciples to come apart and rest for a while in body and spirit because of the many who were coming and going (Mk. 6:31). The unclean spirits also seek rest (Matt. 12:43; Lk. 11:24). Self-reformation only makes the last state worse than the first, for the spirit only returns with seven other spirits more evil than himself. Matt.'s account of this saying applies it to contemporary Judaism: "So shall it be with this evil generation" (Matt. 12:45c).

In the Book of Revelation the meaning is extended to signify rest from hardship and affliction in the eschatological consummation (Rev. 6:11; 14:13). The four living creatures praise God without rest (anapausis) (Rev. 4:8; → Cherub); by contrast, those who worship the beast have no rest from torment (Rev. 14:11; → Animal, art. therion).

But the concept of rest finds its ultimate and deepest development in Matt. 11:28 ff. "To this rest are invited those who in truth have found in Judaism only a burden” (O. Bauernfeind, TDNT I 351). Everyone, whether under the Law (Jews) or far off from God (Gentiles), everyone whose life is marked by a lack of peace and security, is called to become a disciple of Jesus: here true rest is found, not the invulnerability and calm of the Stoic, but peace, contentment and security in God, the Father God revealed by Jesus. (On this passage → Yoke.)

2. The concept of rest is of particular importance in Hebrews. In this letter the task given to Joshua, namely to bring God’s people into their rest in the promised land (katepausen, Heb. 4:8), is regarded as having been fulfilled only in a limited sense, and is linked up with the true rest of God on the seventh day (Heb. 4:4; cf. Gen. 2:2; katapausis 3:11 [= Ps. 95, 11], 18; 4:1, 3, 5, 10 f.). Here the thought of Heb. shows a similarity to the interpretation given in some passages of Deut. to the fulfilment of the promise made to the people: this fulfilment is not a guarantee of permanent rest, but it gives rise to new promises, which accompany the people of God on their way through history and are realized in topical events (cf. Deut. 5:53; 12:10; Heb. 4:1 ff.). In Heb., God’s people of the new → covenant are exhorted to claim now the ancient promise of God’s rest, available to them in Jesus Christ, and to lay hold of it in hope, by faith in Christ as Lord.

3. 1 Pet. 4:14 stands in a context in which Christians are urged to be guiltless and thus not to give grounds for just punishment on their part. On the other hand, they are to rejoice in suffering in so far as they suffer for the sake of Christ and even share in his sufferings (v. 13). Indeed, suffering of this kind may be taken as a sign of being owned by God: “If you are reproached for the name of Christ, you are blessed, because the spirit of glory and of God rests upon you [ei oneidizesthe en onomati Christou, makarioi hoti to tēs doxēs kai to tou theou pneuma eph’ hymas anapauetai]” (1 Pet. 4:14). The passage recalls Jesus’ own promise (Matt. 5:11; Lk. 6:22). J. N. D. Kelly suggests that the idea of suffering “on behalf of” or “because of” or “in” Christ’s → name was almost a technical expression in the early church (The Epistles of Peter and of Jude, BNTC, 1969, 186; cf. these vv. with Matt. 10:22; Mk. 13:13; Lk. 21:17; Jn. 15:21; Acts 9:16; 15:26; 21:13; Rev. 2:3; 3:8). The passage may be directed against certain charismatics in the early church who may have taught that those who truly enjoyed the → gifts of the → Spirit were exempt from → suffering (cf. Paul’s thorn in the flesh; → Fruit, art. skolops). The point is countered by arguing almost the opposite; i.e. not that possession of the Spirit makes suffering inevitable, but that if it is suffering for the sake of Christ, it is a sign that the Spirit rests upon the believer. Note the connexion between Christ and the Spirit: the Spirit is the Spirit of Christ (cf. 1 Pet. 1:2, 11); the Christ who lived and died in history (1:19; 2:21–25; 3:18) is present to believers through the Spirit both before and after the coming of Christ (1:10 ff.; 3:8), and indeed it is the Spirit who made Christ alive after his death (3:18; cf. 1:13). The believer’s life should be lived for Christ (1:4 ff.; 3:16; 5:1). The Spirit is bestowed especially on the persecuted, cf. the saying of Christ (Matt. 10:19 f.) and the description of Stephen whose face was “like an angel’s face”, being “full of the Holy Spirit”, and seeing “the glory of God” (Acts 7:55; cf. 6:15; and Mart. Poly. 2, 2; Eusebius, HE 5, 1, 29 and 34).

1 Pet. 4:14 uses OT imagery. The → glory which manifested itself in the pillar of cloud and in other ways in the OT (cf. Exod. 33:9 f.; 40:34 f.; Isa. 40:1–7; Hag. 2:7) is now a present reality in the life of the persecuted Christian (cf. 1 Pet. 1:7; 5:4; 2 Cor. 4:17; Col. 3:4). The wording seems to be inspired also by Isa. 11:2: “And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him [kai anapausetai ep' auton pneuma tou theou], the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the LORD" (cf. Isa. 42:1; 48:16; 61:1; Matt. 3:16; Jn. 1:32; 16:13; 1 Cor. 1:30; Eph. 1:17 f.; 2 Tim 1:7). But what was in the first instance applied to the servant of Yahweh and then to Christ is here applied to the believer, for the believer belongs to Christ through the Spirit, and shares in his suffering and life. On the grammatical difficulties presented by the phraseology see Kelly, op. cit., 187.

4. katapausis occurs outside Heb. only at Acts 7:49, where Stephen's speech cites Isa. 66:1: "Heaven is my throne, and earth my footstool. What house will you build for me, says the Lord, or what is the place of my rest?" The context is a polemical attack on the idea of Yahweh being tied to the → temple. Similarly the vb. katapauō occurs only in Acts outside Heb., though here there is no special theological significance: "with these words they scarcely restrained the people from offering sacrifice to them" (Acts 14:18).

5. epanapauō is a late and rare word. In Lk. 10:6 it is used of the disciples' greeting of → peace as they go upon their evangelistic mission: "Whatever house you enter, first say, 'Peace be to this house!' And if a son of peace is there, your peace shall rest upon him; but if not, it shall return to you" (Lk. 10:5 f.; cf. Matt. 10:12 f.). The greeting was no mere formality. In the context of the mission it was decisive as to where the recipients stood in relation to Jesus. But even where it was spurned, it would not be made void. It would remain with those who brought this peace in all its fullness.

In Rom. 2:17 the vb. means to rest upon, i.e. place reliance on, the → law. In context Paul is addressing the Jew who relies on formal adherence to the law, and fails to see that his actions are at variance with it and that he is condemned by it.

R. Hensel, C. Brown

→ Sabbath, → Yoke

(a). C.K. Barrett, "The Eschatology of the Epistle to the Hebrews", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1954, 363–93; J. B. Bauer, "Rest", EBT II 748 ff.; O. Bauernfeind, anapauō etc., TDNT I 350 f.; and katapauō etc., TDNT III 627 f.; H. D. Betz, "The Logion of the Easy Yoke and of Rest", JBL 86, 1967, 10–24; G. W. Buchanan, To the Hebrews, 1972; W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land: Early Christianity and Jewish Territorial Doctrine, 1974; E. Lohse, sabbaton etc.; TDNT VII 1–35; H. A. Lombard, "Katapausis in the Letter to the Hebrews", Neotestamentica 5, 1971, 60–71; M. Maher, "'Take my yoke upon you' (Matt. xi. 29)", NTS 22, 1975–76, 97–103; G. von Rad, "There Remains Still a Rest for the People of God: An Investigation of a Biblical Conception", in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1966, 94–102; R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1970.

(b). J. B. Bauer, "Requiem Aeternam", Heiliger Dienst 8, 1954, 91–96; and "Das milde Joch und die Ruhe, Matt. 11, 28–30", ThZ 17, 1961, 99–106; G. Braulik, "m^enūhāh. Die Ruhe Gottes und des Volkes im Lande", BuK 23, 1968, 75–78; J. Cadet, "Repos dominical et Loisir humain", La Maison-Dieu 83, 1965, 71–97; E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk, FRLANT 55, 1939, 40 ff.; O. Hofius, Katapausis. Die Vorstellung vom endzeitlichen Ruheort im Hebräerbrief, WUNT 11, 1970; T. Ohm, Ruhe und Frömmigkeit, 1955; M. Philippe, "Le repos du Père et l'Alliance éternelle", Verbum Caro 20, 79, 1966, 9–25; C. Spicq, L'Épître aux Hébreux, II, 1953, 95–104; F. Štolz, nūah, THAT I 43–6; P. Vielhauer, "Anapausis. Zum gnostischen Hintergrund des Thomasevangeliums", in Apophoreta, Festschrift for E. Haenchen, 1964, 169 ff. (reprinted in Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament, ThB 31, 1965, 215 ff.).

Resurrection

The NT uses two words groups when it deals with the resurrection, one connected with anhistēmi and the other with egeirō. They are not substantially different in meaning; which is used depends mainly on whether the stress is on the active or the passive aspect. The theological differentiation in use is discussed under anhistēmi NT 1.

ἀνάστασις	ἀνάστασις (anastasis) resurrection; ἐξανάστασις (exanastasis), resurrection; ἀνίστημι (anhistēmi), raise, intrans. rise; ἐξανίστημι (exanhistēmi), raise up, awaken, intrans. rise; ἀναζάω (anazaō), come to life again.
-----------	--

CL The vb. anhistēmi, a compound of histēmi, → stand, meant in secular Gk. (already in Homer) to make to stand up, raise, awaken, rouse (of persons lying down or sleeping). In one direction, its meaning was widened to include appointing to an office or task; in the other, when used intrans., it could mean to stand up, rise, start, appear, with the connotation of a revolt or political uprising. Especially with the part. it also expresses the beginning of an action, or readiness for it, e.g., of a conference, the beginning of a reign, of a movement. In post-Homeric writings it is also used of things, e.g., for the setting up or repairing of statues, altars, etc. Occasionally it means to get well. exanhistēmi (Soph. onwards) has the same meaning. anastasis (Aesch. and Hdt. onwards) and exanastasis (Hippocrates onwards) have the intrans. meaning of getting up, rising up (also from the dead). (For general usage see further Liddell-Scott, 121, 144 f., 584 f.)

L. Coenen

anabiōskomai, come to life again, is used of the transmigration of souls (Plato, Phd. 71e onwards; cf. Aristides, Orationes 20[21], 19; Hierocles, In Carmen Aureum 26, p. 479 M; Sannyrio, 3D; Philostr., VA 4, 45; used as the causal of anabiōō, bring back to life in, e.g., Plato, Cri. 48c; Phd. 89b; Aelianus, De Natura Animalium 2, 29; Themistius, Orationes 8, 115c). The vb. anabiōō, come to life again, occurs, e.g., in Plato, Rep. 614b; Aristophanes, Ranae 177; Andocides, 1, 125; and the noun anabiōsis, return to life, in Plutarch, Lucullus 18; Appianus, Keltikē 1, 3 etc.

The doctrine of the transmigration of the soul into some other body appears in Greece as a philosophical doctrine (OCD, 1089). The earliest exponent known is Pherecydes of Syros (Cicero, Tusculanae Disputationes 1, 38). It was regarded as a characteristic doctrine of the Pythagoreans (cf. Horace, Odes 1, 28, 10; Empedocles, 375; Pindar, Ol. 2, 56 ff.). It was also Orphic (Pindar, Fragment 127). It found classical expression in Plato and thence to Vergil, Aeneid 6, 713 ff. Little trace is found in Italy, though there is evidence of it among the druids (Caesar, Bellum Gallicum 6, 4, 5; Lucan, 1, 454 ff.). Evidence of belief in direct translation to the heavenly abode is even more rare. Various stories tell of Ganymedes being carried off to become the cup-bearer of Zeus (OCD, 457). Other figures credited with it include Menelaus, Apollonius of Tyana in Greece, Utanapishtim in the Babylonian flood epic who was granted immortality by the god Ea, and Sehetepibrē, the king of Upper and Lower Egypt, though in this case the reference is to a god being united with his father rather than a mortal called to dwell with the gods (R. Martin-Achard, From Death to Life: A Study of the Doctrine of the Resurrection in the Old Testament, 1960, 68 f.; on the fate of the dead generally see S. G. F. Brandon, Man and his Destiny in the Great Religions, 1962 and The Judgment of the Dead: An Historical and Comparative Study of the Idea of a Post-Mortem Judgment in the Major Religions, 1967; and L. R. Farnell, Greek Hero Cults and Ideas of Immortality, 1921).

In his Phaedo Plato defended the idea of the immortality of the soul in the course of a dialogue between Socrates and his friends prior to the former's execution at his own hand by drinking poison. Socrates does not fear death because of the immortality of the soul which he defends on various grounds related to the Platonic doctrine of forms, the eternal realities behind our transient physical world (cf. Phd. 75, 102; Rep. 6, 508–11; 7, 514 ff.). The soul possesses a certain likeness to the forms, so that when the body dies the soul goes on. Certain forms are incompatible, like heat and cold, life and death. It is an essential feature of the soul that it should partake in life. Therefore at death the soul retires elsewhere. Plato also sees a certain cyclical pattern in nature: cold becomes hot, and hot becomes cold; day follows night, and night follows day. By analogy, the dead awake in a new life after death. Otherwise, life would vanish. Plato also made use of the doctrine of recollection (anamnēsis), according to which the soul is able to recall things known in a previous existence. Similarly, in the Meno 82b–85b a slave boy is able to solve geometrical problems on the basis of such recollection. Knowledge of the forms can only have been acquired in this way (Phd. 72e ff.).

Plato set out his doctrine of the transmigration of souls in the myth of Er at the end of his Republic (Book 10). Er is a soldier killed in battle. But after several days there are no signs of decay in his body, and he returns to life on the funeral pyre to tell of what he has seen in the beyond. At death the soul goes to a spot where it is judged. The just souls are seen ascending to a thousand years of happiness; the unjust tell of their thousand years of travail on the earth, where they have been sent as punishment, each soul receiving tenfold retribution for the evil it has done (Rep. 615). The very wicked are cast for ever into Tartarus, the traditional place of punishment in Hades surrounded by a brazen wall and encircled by impenetrable darkness. Here, they receive terrible torture (Rep. 626). After spending seven days by a meadow the soul journeys to a place where it must choose the next form of its life. It is brought to a place where the mechanism of the earth is visible, where the Fates can be seen and heard (Rep. 616 f.). The symbolism suggests the elements of necessity and choice. Thus Lachesis, the daughter of Necessity declares: "Your destiny shall not be allotted to you, but you shall choose it for yourselves. Let him who draws the first lot be the first to choose a life, which shall be his irrevocably. Virtue owns no master: he who honours her shall have more of her, and he who slights her, less. The responsibility lies with the chooser. Heaven is guiltless" (Rep. 617). Lots are cast to decide the order of choice. The forms of life are predetermined, but each man's will is his destiny. Some souls mistakenly choose power for themselves. Some even choose to become animals or birds because of their bitter experience of humans on earth (Rep. 620). Souls are generally wiser for their experiences in previous existences. The Republic ends with the exhortation: "Indeed, if we follow my advice, believing the soul to be immortal, and to possess the power of entertaining all evil, as well as all good, we shall ever hold fast the upward road, and devotedly cultivate justice combined with wisdom; in order that we may be loved by one another and by the gods, not only during our stay on earth, but also when, like conquerors in the games collecting the presents of their admirers, we receive the prizes of virtue; and, in order that both in this life and during the journey of a thousand years which we have described, we may never cease to prosper" (Rep. 621). In the Phaedrus 249 ff. Plato not only links the ideas of transmigration, the forms and recollection, but also implies that the truly enlightened soul which loves the forms will one day transcend the circle of earthly existence and return to the pure state from whence it came.

There was a strong tradition in Gk. thought which denied the possibility of resurrection, referring either to the noun anastasis or the vb. anhistēmi (Homer, Il. 21, 56; 24, 551 and 756; Hdt. 3, 62; Aesch., Ag. 1360 f.; Eum. 648; Soph., El. 137 ff.; and probably Eur., Hercules Furens 719). On the other hand, certain passages entertain the idea of resurrection as an isolated miracle (Plato, Symp. 179c; Lucianus, De Saltatione 45). Evidently the physician Aesculapius enjoyed the reputation of being able to raise the dead (Pseudo-Xenophon, Cynegeticus 1, 6; Pausanias, Periegeta 2, 26, 5; cf. 2, 27, 4). Apollonius of Tyana raised in Rome an apparently dead girl (Philostratus, Vita Apollonii 4, 45). A. Oepke sees the raisings reported in the Acts of Peter of Vercelli 25–28 as essentially Hellenistic (TDNT I 369). Oepke concludes that "the idea of a general resurrection at the end of the age is alien to the Greeks", and thinks that it is attacked in the Phrygian inscription noted by Ramsay (ibid.; cf. W. M. Ramsay, The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, 1895–97, No. 323). Acts 17:31 f. records how Paul's preaching of the resurrection at Athens met with sceptical amusement. Acts 17:18 reports that: "Some also of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers met him. And some said, 'What would this babblers say?' Others said, 'He seems to be a preacher of foreign divinities, – because he preached Jesus and the resurrection.'" F. F. Bruce notes various possible interpretations of anastasis here (The Acts of the Apostles, 1951, 333). If Iēsous was connected with iasis (healing) or Iēsō (Healer), anastasis might remind them of anastatēria, a word quoted by Hesychius as meaning sacrifices offered on recovery from sickness (cf. F. H. Chase, The Credibility of the Acts of the Apostles, 1902, 205 f.). Anastasis may, however, have been thought of as a goddess (cf. Chrysostom, Hom. in Act. 38, 1; Oepke, ibid.; E. Haenchen, The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, 518).

OR 1. The pre-exilic portions of the OT are widely considered to contain no statements which enable us to recognize a hope of resurrection from the dead. Death is the definite end, the destruction of human existence (cf. Gen. 3:19; Job 30:23). This concept is not invalidated by the accounts of isolated individuals returning to life, viz. the widow's son in Zarephath (1 Ki. 17:17–22), the Shunammite's son (2 Ki. 4:18–37), and the man thrown hurriedly into Elisha's grave (2 Ki. 13:20 f.). If Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and → Elijah (2 Ki. 2:11) did not die, but were snatched away from earth before their death, it was a proclamation of the power of death to destroy life and the general lack of hope beyond it. This may be seen most clearly in Job's words to his friends (Job 7:7–10; 20:20 ff.; 14:14; on Job 19:25 f. → Redemption, art. lyō ot).

2. It is further confirmed by those statements in the Psalms in which prayer is made for salvation and preservation from the domain of death which destroys life, but not from a death which has already been experienced. Thus the author of Ps. 88 prays to be delivered from Sheol (Heb. š'öl; Gk. hadēs) and the Pit or destruction (Heb. šahat; Gk. diaphthora) (→ Hell, art. hadēs), where the dead are evidently cut off from Yahweh: he is "like one forsaken among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, like those whom thou dost remember no more, for they are cut off from thy hand. . . . Dost thou work wonders for the dead? Do the shades rise up to praise thee? Selah. Is thy steadfast love declared in the grave, or thy faithfulness in Abaddon? Are thy wonders known in the darkness, or thy saving help in the land of forgetfulness?" (Ps. 88[87]:5, 10 f. [6, 11 f.]). Conversely, the faithful who are saved by Yahweh sing of salvation in the same terms (Pss. 30[29]:2 f., 11; 86[85]:12 f.; 103[102]:1, 3 ff.; 116[115]:8; 118[117]:7; Isa. 38:17.)

The salvation of which the psalmist sings in Ps. 16(15):10 appears to be this-worldly, though it also points beyond the grave: "For thou dost not give me up to Sheol, or let thy godly one see the Pit" (cf. Acts 2:25–28, 31). Some scholars see no mention of a life after death in Ps. 16 (e.g. A. F. Kirkpatrick, H. Gunkel, C. Barth, H.-J. Kraus, S. Mowinckel), whereas others do (S. R. Driver, A. Weiser, M. Dahood, H. H. Rowley) (cf. H. H. Rowley, The Faith of Israel, 1956, 175; A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I, 1972, 145). R. Martin-Achard points out that "The real question in Ps. xvi is that of communion with the Living God: the writer foresees no end to this; he does not understand how its persistence will be possible, but that does not trouble his mind, because it depends on God" (From Death to Life: A Study of the Development of the Doctrine of the Resurrection in the Old Testament, 1960, 152 f.). The point is borne out by the final verse of the Psalm: "Thou dost show me the path of life; in thy presence there is fullness of joy, in thy right hand are pleasures for evermore" (Ps. 16[15]:11).

Another passage is Ps. 49(48):15: "But God will ransom my soul from the power of Sheol, for he will receive me [MT yiqqāhēnī; LXX lambanē me]." M. Dahood suggests that the psalmist expected to be assumed in a way similar to Enoch or Elijah (Psalms, Anchor Bible, I, 1966, 301; cf. R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 157 f.). He does so on the grounds that the Heb. vb. lāqah is precisely that used in Gen. 5:24; 2 Ki. 2:3, 5, 9; cf. Sir. 42:15; 48:9; Ps. 73(72):24. However, it must be pointed out that both the Heb. and Gk. vbs. are the regular vbs. meaning to take, and it is probably best to exercise the same caution indicated by the interpretation of Ps. 16. Ps. 49 clearly does not teach a positive doctrine of resurrection. On the other hand, it envisages an ongoing life with Yahweh in which the believing Israelite is saved from the ongoing power of Sheol.

A similar thought is probably expressed in Ps. 73(72):24: "Thou dost guide me with thy counsel, and afterward thou wilt receive me to glory [MT w'ahar kābôd tiqqāhēnī; LXX kai meta doxēs proselabou me]." Again the Heb. vb. is lāqah, and glory could mean honour and prosperity in this life. However, H. H. Rowley thinks that the psalmist's way of speaking is odd, if he is referring to this life only. "He speaks of God receiving him, rather than of his bestowing some material boon upon him. He first declares that he enjoys God's fellowship here and now, and if God is to receive him, it must be to future fellowship. If that is still in this life, nothing is added to the thought; but if it is beyond the grave then the words contribute something to the thought. It seems to me likely that the meaning is that both before death and after death he has a secure treasure in the fellowship of God. The God who delights to enrich him with the experience of himself now will grant him fuller fellowship hereafter” (op. cit., 173).

Summing up the testimony of the psalmists, G. E. Ladd observes that “Such passages give us only glimpses of a hope of a blessed existence after death. It is important to note that the hope is based on confidence in God’s power over death, not on a view of something immortal in man. The Psalmists do not reflect on what part of man survives death – his soul or spirit; nor is there any reflection on the nature of the after life. There is merely the confidence that even death cannot destroy the reality of fellowship with the living God. This is very different from the Greek view of immortality. ‘The psalmists . . . cannot conceive that this communion with God can ever be broken even by death’ ” (I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975, 47; the last sentence is a quotation from R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 180).

3. Outside the Book of Psalms, the Song of Moses (Deut. 32) and that of Hannah (1 Sam. 2) proclaim that Yahweh kills and makes alive. The Song of → Moses has been described as a sort of compendium of prophetic theology, bringing to mind the historical evocations of Hos. 2, Jer. 2 and Ezek. 16, 23, and the historical theology associated with the Deuteronomistic outlook (cf. R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 53). It celebrates the power of the living God, culminating in the assertion: “See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no god beside me; I kill and I make alive, I wound and I heal; and there is none that can deliver out of my hand” (Deut. 32:39). Whereas the Song of Moses reflects on Yahweh’s dealings with the nation, the Song of Hannah which comes after the birth of Samuel celebrates Yahweh’s power to those in need, including the barren (2 Sam. 2:5). In the mid-point of the song there is the reflection: “The LORD kills and brings to life; he brings down to Sheol and raises up” (1 Sam. 2:6). For interpretations of the song see R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 56 f., who concludes that both songs stress the extraordinary power of the God of Israel. “Yahweh freely disposes of life, He bestows it, withdraws it, and gives it again. The history of the Chosen People and the existence of the Israelite alike abundantly testify to this sovereign power that Yahweh exercises at the expense of His enemies and for the sake of His own. The writers of these hymns do not envisage the resurrection of the dead, they are simply asserting that the Living God is able to intervene, effectively, everywhere, and at all times, even in the darkest hour; His liberating interventions are particular evidence of His tremendous power” (op. cit., 57).

4. The continuity of the living God and the ongoing life of those who belong to him is the premise of Jesus’ interpretation of Exod. 3:6 in his debate with the → Sadducees over the resurrection and the problem case of levirate marriage (Matt. 22:23–33; Mk. 12:18–27; Lk. 20:27–40; → Marriage, art. gameō or 5). “And as for the dead being raised, have you not read in the book of Moses, in the passage about the bush, how God said to him, ‘I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob’? He is not God of the dead, but of the living; you are quite wrong” (Mk. 12:26 f., cf. par. Matt. 22:31 f., Lk. 20:37 f.). The idea of Yahweh as the protector of the patriarchs and of his covenant people recurs in Exod. 3:15 f.: 4:5 and also later writings (cf. Man. 5:1; Ass. Mos. 3:9; Jub. 45:3; Test. Reub. 4:10; Test. Sim. 2:8; Test. Jos. 2:2; 6:7; Test. Gad 2:5; 3 Macc. 7:16; Wis. 9:1; Jud. 9:11; 1QM 10:8). “The concept ‘God of the dead’ implies a blatant contradiction, especially in the context of the Sadducean understanding of death as extinction, without the hope of resurrection. If God has assumed the task of protecting the patriarchs from misfortune during the course of their life, but fails to deliver them from that supreme misfortune which marks the definitive and absolute check upon their hopes, his protection is of little value. . . . In citing Ex. 3:6 Jesus showed how resurrection faith is attached in a profound way to the central concept of biblical revelation, the covenant, and how the salvation promised by God to the patriarchs and their descendants in virtue of the covenant contains implicitly the assurance of the resurrection. It was the failure to appreciate the essential link between God's covenant faithfulness and the resurrection which had led the Sadducees into their grievous error" (W. L. Lane, The Gospel according to Mark, NLC, 1974, 430; cf. F. Dreyfus, "L'Argument Scripturaire de Jésus en Faveur de la Résurrection des Morts (Marc, XII, 26, 27)", RB 66, 1959, 213–24; C. F. D. Moule, The Birth of the New Testament, 1966, 65). R. N. Longenecker sees Jesus as confounding the Sadducees for whom every word of the Torah possessed validity, by employing their own methods of exegesis against them (Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975, 68 f.).

5. The two passages dealing with translation require further comment.

(a) The translation of Enoch is mentioned in a list of the antediluvian patriarchs, given in Gen. 5 which is widely attributed to P. The list extends from → Adam to → Noah. Ten names are mentioned and the great longevity of each is stated. Apart from the first, the last and the case of Enoch, there is a general pattern of description which R. Martin-Achard expresses as follows: "When A had lived x years, he became the father of B. A lived after the birth of B y years, and had other sons and daughters. Thus all the days of A were (x + y) years; and he died" (op. cit., 65). Generally speaking, as the generations proceed, the life-span of the patriarchs diminishes, as though in growing older man is increasingly alienated from the creator. But in the case of Enoch the process is momentarily interrupted, and he differs from the rest in that he did not die. "When Enoch had lived sixty-five years, he became the father of Methuselah. Enoch walked with God after the birth of Methuselah three hundred years, and had other sons and daughters. Thus all the days of Enoch were three hundred and sixty-five years. Enoch walked with God; and he was not, for God took him [MT wayyithallek h'nôk 'et-hâ'lohîm w'ênennû kî-lāqah 'ōtô 'lōhîm; LXX kai euērestēsen Enōch tō theō kai ouch hēurisketo hoti metethēken auton ho theos]" (Gen. 5:21–24). On the LXX translation → Please, art. areskō, NT 3; the intention was evidently to make it sound less anthropomorphic. In the LXX Enoch is one hundred and sixty-five years old at Methuselah's birth, and the rest of his life is correspondingly diminished to two hundred years.

In Heb. 11:5 Enoch is seen as an example of the → faith that is pleasing to God which was the cause of his translation. Martin-Achard suggests, however, that Enoch was originally an astral divinity, a sun-god (op. cit., 67). This is partly connected with the number 365 which is both his life-span and the number of days in the solar year. He also sees a connexion between the fact that Enoch was the seventh in line and that the Mesopotamian Enmeduranna was the seventh antediluvian king and was also lord of the oracles, custodian of the divine secrets, a renowned prophet and astrologer and King of Sippar, city of the sun (cf. the Sumerian king list in ANET, 265). Martin-Achard may well be right when he observes with W. Zimmerli that "the number 365 stands for a whole and so indicates that the Patriarch accomplished a complete cycle, his life being fulfilled when God takes him; the divine decision is not a sign of reprobation but, on the contrary, sanctifies a life lived with God" (op. cit., 67 f.). On the other hand, E. A. Speiser thinks that the slight similarity of names is apparently coincidental, and that the initial ḥ in the Heb. form of Enoch's name appears to preclude any etymological relationship with the Sumerian Enmeduranna (Genesis, Anchor Bible, 1964, 41, 43).

The crucial vb. lāqah means to take. Martin-Achard thinks that it is used here "as a technical expression to denote the assumption of a human being to God" (op. cit., 69; cf. 2 Ki. 2:2, 5, 9 f.; Pss. 49[48]:15; 83[82]:24; Sir. 44:16; 48:9; 49:14 f.; and liqû in the Gilgamesh epic, Tablet x, line 205 [for text of the tablet see ANET, 89–93]). But nothing is said about the mode of the taking. The LXX uses the vb. metatithēmi, change the position of, convey to another place, and in this it is followed by the author of Heb. (Heb. 11:5a and b; cf. Sir. 44:16; Wis. 4:10; 1 Clem. 9:3; the noun metathesis, removal, is used in Heb. 11:5c and 12:27). Josephus used the expression "withdrew to the divine [anechōrēse pros to theion]" (Ant. 1, 85); a phrase he also used to describe the passing of Moses (Ant. 4, 326; cf. 3, 96).

Subsequently a considerable Jewish literature grew up which supplied elaborate details of Enoch's translation. The so-called First Book of Enoch exists in its entirety only in Ethiopic, hence the title Ethiopic Enoch. About a third of it exists in Gk. and fragments in the original Aramaic and Heb. (representing the remains of more than ten separate manuscripts found at Qumran). Among these are all the sections of Eth. Enoch except chs. 37–71, the "Similitudes of Enoch". There is also a single Lat. fragment. R. H. Charles divided the work into five sections composed at different dates (Charles, II, 163–281): (i) chs. 1–36 incorporate portions of the Book of Noah and was written before 170 B.C.; (ii) chs. 37–71 contain the "Parables" or "Similitudes of Enoch" with the Son of Man passages which have NT affinities (c. 105–64 B.C., though some of it may belong to the Christian era); (iii) chs. 72–82 "The Book of the Heavenly Luminaries" (before 110 B.C.); (iv) chs. 83–90 "The Dream Visions" (c. 165–161 B.C.); (v) chs. 91–104 contain an "Apocalypse of Weeks" with material of various dates. The whole work is one of the most important Jewish pseudepigrapha, embodying revelations to Enoch on such topics as the origins of → evil, the → angels and their destinies, Gehenna (→ Hell) and → paradise. For critical edition of the text see M. A. Knibb and E. Ullendorff, eds., The Ethiopic Book of Enoch: A New Edition in the Light of the Aramaic Dead Sea Fragments, I–II, 1977.

Slavonic Enoch or 2 Enoch bears the title "The Book of the Secrets of Enoch" in some manuscripts. It survives in Slavonic only in two recensions, and has numerous points of contact with Eth. Enoch. It has been variously seen as the work of an Alexandrian Jew at the beginning of the Christian era (Charles, II, 429), and as a Christian reply to Eth. Enoch dated in the 2nd or early 3rd cents. (A. Vaillant; cf. ODCC, 460). Hebrew Enoch or 3 Enoch is a Jewish, perhaps anti-Christian, work dating from the Christian era.

Eth. Enoch 1:9 is quoted by Jude 14 f.: "It was of these also that Enoch in the seventh generation from Adam prophesied, saying, 'Behold, the Lord came with his holy myriads, to execute judgment on all, and to convict all the ungodly of all their deeds of ungodliness which they have committed in such an ungodly way, and of all the harsh things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.'" He is mentioned in Jub. 4:17 as "the first among men that are born on earth who learned writing and knowledge and wisdom." Elsewhere he is seen as the type of the righteous man:

“Enoch was found perfect, and he walked with Yahweh, and was taken; a sign of knowledge to every generation” (Sir. 44:16). The thought is amplified in Wis. 4:10 ff., stressing his innocence in the midst of wickedness and pointing out that “while living among sinners he was translated”. Philo explained the translation as follows: “Concerning him it is said that ‘Enoch was well-pleasing to God and was not found, for God translated [metetheken] him’; for ‘translation’ [metathesis] denotes turning and changing, and that a changing for the better” (Abr. 17 f.); “By ‘translation’ is clearly signified the new home [granted to him ‘who escaped the insurrections of the body and deserted to the side of the soul’], and by ‘not found’ the solitary life” (Praem. 17; cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 188). In short, what in Gen. 5:21–24 began as a cursory statement about the life of Enoch, culminating in the statement, “Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him”, was articulated in later Judaism into a view of Enoch as a model of wisdom and righteousness, culminating in elaborate theories of translation.

(b) The translation of → Elijah is described in 2 Ki. 2:1–15. It belongs to the Elisha cycle, telling how the latter asked and received a double share of Elijah’s spirit (the double portion being the right of the first-born, Deut. 21:17). Elijah is taken up to heaven by a whirlwind. “And as they still went on and talked, behold, a chariot of fire and horses of fire separated the two of them. And Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven” (v. 11; cf. Job 38:1). Martin-Achard suggests that the scene recalls the earliest theophanies of the God of Israel, as he first appeared to the tribes as the Lord of war and storm (op. cit., 70; cf. H. Fredriksson, Jahve als Krieger, 1945, 47 ff.). The text itself hardly supports Martin-Achard’s suggestion of overtones of the sun myth in the light of the horses dedicated to the luminary at the entrance to the temple (2 Ki. 23:11). His other suggestion is more likely, that Yahweh is thought of in terms of chariots and horsemen, i.e. symbols of power in the realm where Israel was extremely needy. This latter point is underlined by the fact that the king of Syria allowed Israel to maintain a defensive force of only fifty horsemen, ten chariots and a thousand infantry (2 Ki. 13:7; cf. also Ps. 20:7). The people of God lack physical force, but Yahweh has it in abundance. Subsequent search fails to find the body of Elijah (2 Ki. 2:16 ff.), and Elisha succeeds him. For the sons of the prophets recognize that “The spirit of Elijah rests on Elisha” (v. 15).

The end of no other OT prophet is described in these terms. Again the vb. lāqah is used for the taking of Elijah. It is questionable whether the carrying of Elijah by the Spirit of God (1 Ki. 18:12 ff., where the vb. is nāsā’) implies some form of supernatural transport, or whether lāqah implies a more permanent and in fact a horizontal action as against nāsā’ which has been thought to imply a vertical action (so L. Bronner. The Stories of Elijah and Elisha as Polemics against Baal Worship, Pretoria Oriental Series 6, 1968, 126 f.). Indeed, the only safe conclusion that can be drawn from the brief descriptions of the end of both Elijah and Enoch is the positive one that they both imply the positive points that (i) they entered the presence of Yahweh at the end of their earthly lives, and (ii) that Yahweh himself took the initiative. Negatively it may be said that in neither case is death mentioned, but then that the writers of the two accounts clearly wished to focus attention on the positive aspect. In the case of Elijah a whirlwind or tempest (Heb. s“ārâh; LXX sysseismos) is mentioned. This may be compared with the manifestations of Yahweh’s power in the elements in 1 Ki. 18:38, 45; 19:11–14 and the motif of Baal as the rider of the clouds (cf. Bronner, op. cit., 122 ff.). Yahweh's power is manifested through the elements. In the case of the end of Elijah and the bestowal of his spirit on Elisha it was manifested through the whirlwind or tempest. (For the considerable rabbinic speculation on Elijah after his translation from this world see SB IV, 2, 764–98.)

6. A number of passages in the prophets are relevant to the discussion.

(a) Hos. 6:1–3 states: "Come, let us return to the LORD; for he has torn, that he may heal us; he has stricken, and he will bind us up. After two days he will revive us [MT y^eḥayyēnū; LXX hygiaseti hēmas, he will heal us]; on the third day he will raise us up [MT y^eqimēnū; LXX anastēsometha], that we may live before him [MT w^eniḥyeh l^epānāyw; LXX kai zēsometha enōpion autou]. Let us know, and let us press on to know the LORD; his going forth is sure as the dawn; he will come to us as the showers, as the spring rains that water the earth." For a review of critical opinion see R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 74–86. The historical background is that of the Syro-Ephraimitish War (735–734 B.C.) and its aftermath (cf. 2 Ki. 15 and 18; Isa. 7 and 8), and the passage constitutes a call to repentance and faith in Yahweh for restoration. Martin-Achard sees in the terms "in two days", "on the third day", "dawn" and "dew" allusions to the Baal cult in the Ras Shamra texts, in which Baal descends into the nether world with his retinue, clouds, winds, rains, his servants and daughters, and restores life (op. cit., 84 f.). He concludes that resurrection is therefore envisaged, though on the basis of the agricultural cults. But the argument is slender. The context does not imply cultic renewal, and indeed repudiates it (Hos. 6:6). Moreover, Baal-worship is condemned as harlotry (v. 10; cf. vv. 4 and 7; and 2:13; 9:2). Rather, the passage implies national renewal on the basis of returning to Yahweh, using the language of healing after being stricken for apostasy. There is a case for saying that Hosea consciously takes over the language and idioms of Baal-worship and uses them polemically against the Baals (cf. H. W. Wolff, Hosea, Hermeneia, 1974, xx-vi ff.). Hosea's point is that it is not the Baals that do these things through the cults but Yahweh; and it is Yahweh in Hos. 6:1–3 who will restore Israel to health and vitality, just as the spring rains renew the parched, dead earth.

Hos. 13:14 asks: "Shall I ransom them from the power of Sheol? Shall I redeem them from Death? O Death, where are your plagues? O Sheol, where is your destruction? [LXX pou hē dikē sou (your judgment), thanate; pou to kentron sou (your sting), hadē; the MT has a positive statement instead of questions, 'hī d^eḥāreykā māwet^e 'hī qāṭābkā š^eōl, i.e. I will be . . .]. Compassion is hid from my eyes." On the various questions raised by the language here see R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 88. The LXX, like the Syriac, reads 'ayyēh' ("where") for 'hī' ("I will be"). It should be remembered that the Heb. text would be unpointed, i.e. written with the consonants only. The phraseology of Hos. 13:14b appears to be taken up by Paul in 1 Cor. 15:55 in celebrating the resurrection of the dead: "When the perishable puts on the imperishable, and the mortal puts on immortality, then shall come to pass the saying that is written: 'Death is swallowed up in victory.' 'O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting [pou sou, thanate, to nikos; pou sou, thanate, to kentron]?' " (1 Cor. 15:54 f.; v. 54 quotes Isa. 25:8).

Luther and others have seen the passage as a predictive prophecy of the downfall of death before the risen Christ (for a review of interpretations see R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 90 ff.). However, to see the passage as a prediction in this sense is to violate the original intention of the words which in context refer to the coming judgment on the nation. Nevertheless, the passage testifies to “the extraordinary power of the God of Israel; Yahweh treats Death as a lord treats one of his subjects; He commands it as a vassal, and, in spite of all, Sheol is at His disposal. In face of the Living God, even the dominion of death has to yield” (R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 92). But in any case, the reference appears to be to the historical situation of Israel, threatened with destruction by the foreign nations. “These nations stand under the commanding authority of Israel’s God (cf. 10:10). If those hostile nations punish Israel with the ‘thorns’ and ‘stings’ of the drover or foreman, then the imagery of tormenting and distressing death is clear (cf. Josh. 23:13; Nu. 33:55; Ju. 8:7). To be sure, only in Ps. 91:6 are ‘thorn’ (dbr) and ‘sting’ (qtb) mentioned in connection with a humanly wielded weapon (‘arrow’ in v. 5). In most cases these words denote pestilence, which would naturally fit here as the instrument of death and Sheol as well. In each case Yahweh refuses to be compassionate” (H. W. Wolff, op. cit., 228).

In context, therefore, Hosea’s words do not refer to the resurrection hope of the individual but to Yahweh’s power over the death and destruction of the nation in history. However, as C. K. Barrett points out, Paul is not here “grounding an argument on Scripture, but writing freely, in scriptural language, of the ultimate victory over death” (The First Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1968, 283). To be more precise, Paul appears to be making use of OT testimonia, following a pesher style of exegesis which interprets the meaning of the original text in the light of the point the expositor is making (cf. E. E. Ellis, Paul’s Use of the Old Testament, 1957, 96 ff., 144 ff.). The original meaning of Hosea’s words finds its ultimate fulfilment in the resurrection, where men are ransomed from Sheol and redeemed from death, and where thus Sheol and death are mocked.

(b) On the other hand, Isa. 26:19 expresses fleetingly a confidence in the resurrection of Israel: “Thy dead shall live, my bodies shall rise. O dwellers in the dust, awake and sing for joy! For thy dew is a dew of light, and on the land of the shades thou wilt let it fall” (RSV mg.). The attempt to work out who is speaking presents a puzzle. “If the profession of trust in Yahweh is uttered by the praying community . . . or an individual leading the prayer, then the dead are departed Israelites who are particularly close to him, or perhaps even the righteous. . . . On the other hand if Yahweh is the speaker, as most modern commentators accept, what we have is a promise in reply to the praying community, and all the subsequent relationships are simply reversed” (O. Kaiser, Isaiah 13–19, 1974, 215 f.). There are certain discrepancies of reading represented by the MT and the Vulgate on the one side and the LXX, the Qumran Isaiah Scroll and the Syriac and Aramaic traditions on the other. This has led to the conjecture of emendation concerning the clause in the MT yihyû mēteḳā n’bēlāîf y’qûmûn (“your dead shall live, my bodies shall rise” MT), as contrasted with the LXX anastēsontai hoi nekroi kai egerthēsontai hoi en tois mnēmeiois (“the dead shall rise and those in the tombs shall be raised” LXX). However, the passage clearly teaches a belief in the resurrection. This has led some commentators like Kaiser to regard it as an interpolation, on the grounds that such an expression of belief is too rare in Isaiah’s day and appears only on the very limits of the OT (op. cit., 218). For the same reason he regards Isa. 25:8 also as an interpolation: “He will swallow up death for ever, and the Lord God will wipe away tears from all faces, and the reproach of his people he will take away from all the earth, for the LORD has spoken.” Similarly, R. Martin-Achard dates the passage in the 4th cent. B.C. at the time of the upheavals attending the conquests of Alexander the Great (op. cit., 131; but cf. E. J. Young, The Book of Isaiah, The New International Commentary on the Old Testament, II, 1969, 225–29, 253–61). There is no need with Martin-Achard to see in the allusion to dew the Mother Earth theme, reflecting ideas found at Ras Shamra (op. cit., 132; cf. Hos. 6:4; 14:5; Mic. 5:6; Ps. 110:3; Isa. 66:14). The dew in Palestine replaced the rain in summer and increased in quantity in the autumn (cf. Kaiser, op. cit., 217).

For discussion of the Servant Songs of Isa. (especially Isa. 53:10 ff. in 52:13–53:12) see R. Martin-Achard (op. cit., 103–23; → also Serve). As Martin-Achard points out, “The prophet here seems to be informing us of the destiny of an individual and not about the lot of a group; thus the exaltation of the Servant implies more than the restoration of Israel and the prospective greatness of the People of God. The destiny of the humiliated and glorified Servant presupposes his resurrection; yet Deutero-Isaiah makes no specific reference to this ” (op. cit., 122).

(c) Ezekiel’s vision of the valley of dry bones (Ezek. 37) has frequently been taken as a prediction of the resurrection (cf. Justin, Apol. II, 87; Irenaeus, Haer. 5, 1; Tertullian, De resurrectione carnis 30). In the vision the prophet is asked by Yahweh whether these bones can live (v. 3). The prophet replies that Yahweh alone knows. “Again he said to me, ‘Prophesy to these bones, and say to them, O dry bones, hear the word of the LORD. Thus says the Lord God to these bones: Behold, I will cause breath to enter you, and you shall live. And I will lay sinews upon you, and will cause flesh to come upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and you shall live; and you shall know that I am the LORD’” (Ezek. 37:4 ff.). In the vision the prophet does so, and what is promised comes about (vv. 7–11). He is then given the interpretation: “Then he said to me, ‘Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel. Behold, they say, “Our bones are dried up, and our hope is lost; we are clean cut off.” Therefore prophesy, and say to them, Thus says the Lord God: Behold, I will open your graves, and raise you from your graves, O my people; and I will bring you home into the land of Israel. And you shall know that I am the LORD, when I open your graves, and raise you from your graves, O my people. And I will put my Spirit within you, and you shall live, and I will place you in your own land; then you shall know that I, the LORD, have spoken, and I have done it, says the LORD’ ” (vv. 11–14).

The background is the fall of → Jerusalem, the capture of the → temple and the exile which left the Israelites saying: “Our transgressions and our sins are upon us, and we waste away because of them; how then can we live?” (Ezek. 33:10). In the context of the times, therefore, the vision is one of national restoration. H. Riesenfeld has seen in it traces of sacral ceremonies, including the drama of the New Year festival in which the king was supposed to engage in combat with his enemies, representing the conflict of creative powers with chaos (The Resurrection in Ezekiel xxxvii and in the Dura-Europos Paintings, 1948). However, the evidence for this festival is tenuous, and any link with Ezek. 37 is uncertain. It is more likely that Ezekiel based his view of the creative power of Yahweh on the theology that is found in Gen. 2:7, and that the picture derives from the countless corpses scattered on the battlefield in the wake of Nebuchadnezzar’s armies. “The prophet is not concerned with the resurrection of the dead as such, but there is no doubt that the symbolism that he employs raised among the Jews the question of renewal of life for the departed, and it is in this sense that both Jewish and Christian tradition re-read this chapter. Ezekiel's confidence is founded on the sovereign power of the God of Israel, a power that was made especially manifest when He created man" (R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 102; cf. W. Eichrodt, Ezekiel, 1970, 505–15; J. W. Wevers, Ezekiel, New Century Bible, 1969, 276–80).

(d) Dan. 12:2 is "the only passage in the Old Testament where we have a clear and undisputed reference to the resurrection of the dead" (H. H. Rowley, op. cit., 167). The context speaks of a great tribulation such as there has never been, with Michael (→ Angel) arising in charge of the people and a book containing the names of the people who shall be delivered (v. 1). "And many of those who sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12:2). V. 3 goes on to say: "And those who are wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament; and those who turn many to righteousness, like the stars for ever and ever." Some writers trace this to the influence of Persian thought (e.g. H. Birkeland, "The Belief in the Resurrection of the Dead in the Old Testament", StTh 3/1, 1950, 75 f.). But Rowley thinks that "the author was driven by the dynamic of his own faith to this as the corollary of that faith" (ibid.). In common with many scholars Rowley locates Dan. in the Maccabean period, which in turn gave rise to the → Pharisaic belief in the resurrection. Thus, R. Martin-Achard sees in the passage an allusion to the victims of Antiochus Epiphanes (op. cit., 145; cf. 2 Macc. 7:11). (For an exposition of Dan. setting it in the time of the exile in terms of the events that it describes see E. J. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 1949.) Dan. 12 is apparently concerned only with a resurrection within Israel: some to salvation and others to condemnation. "The mass of the people does not appear to be interested in an event which will enable the Ḥasidim to be rewarded and the impious punished; the indifferent will thus remain in the dust. Justice requires the resurrection, for only the resurrection provides the one answer to the problem raised by the death of the most faithful servants of the Living God" (R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 144; cf. 2 Macc. 7:9, 11 f., 13 f., 23, 29, 36 f.; 12:43 f.; 14:46). On the possible influence of Persian thought on Dan. see below, 9.

7. Before leaving the canonical writings of the OT, mention may be made of the episode in 1 Sam. 28 in which the medium at Endor conjured up the spirit of Samuel at the behest of Saul. The woman said to Saul: "I see a god coming up out of the earth" (1 Sam. 28:13). Commenting on Samuel's words, "Why have you disturbed me by bringing me up?" (v. 15), J. Mauchline writes: "The meaning of the statement by Samuel that he has been disturbed probably does not refer to an emotional disturbance at meeting Saul again but at having to leave Sheol to be involved in earthly affairs again (cf. Job 3.12–19)" (1 and 2 Samuel, New Century Bible, 1971, 182). The reference to a "god" means a "godlike being", and is probably best rendered by "spirit" (H. W. Hertzberg, I & II Samuel, 1964, 219). (On mediums in Israelite religion → Magic, art. mageia OT 4.)

8. The literature of the intertestamental period exhibits a variety of beliefs about the after-life and resurrection.

(a) Jesus ben Sirach, writing about 180 B.C., had no conception of resurrection or life after death, and thus held a position comparable with that of the → Sadducees in the time of Christ. Sheol is the ultimate abode of the dead. It is devoid of pleasure (Sir. 14:16). It is a place of darkness (22:11), endless sleep (46:19), silence (17:27 f.)

and corruption (10:11). Men cannot praise God there (18:28). There is no return from death (38:21) which is a state of eternal rest (30:17). The only immortality known to Sirach is a good name (39:9; 41:11 ff.; 44:8) or the perpetuation of one's name in one's children (11:28; 46:12).

(b) However, 2 Macc. describes the hope of the martyrs of Israel in the struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes (see especially 2 Macc. 7:9, 11, 14, 22 f., 29; 12:43; and cf. above 6(d) on the Book of Daniel). Thus the elder, Razis, disembowelled himself rather than fall into the hands of the Greeks. He flung his bowels at the crowds, "calling on Him who is lord of life and spirit to restore them to him again" (2 Macc. 14:46).

(c) The Apocalypse of Baruch was written late in the 1st cent. A.D., reflecting on the tragedy of the destruction of Jerusalem. The only hope lies in the world to come. For the author the dead will be raised in exactly the same form: "For the earth shall then assuredly restore the dead [which it now receives in order to preserve them]. It shall make no change in their form, But as it has received them, so shall it restore them, And as I delivered them unto it, so also shall it raise them" (Syr. Bar. 50:2). They will thus be recognizable (vv. 3 f.). But then they will be changed, just as the wicked will be tormented: "Also (as for) the glory of those who have now been justified in My law, who have had understanding in their life, and who have planted in their heart the root of wisdom, then their splendour shall be glorified in changes, and the form of their face shall be turned into the light of their beauty, that they may be able to acquire and receive the world which does not die, which is then promised to them" (Syr. Bar. 51:3). This hope seems to combine transformation "into the splendour of angels" (v. 5) with a Gk. idea of the eternal world. At the same time it makes resurrection dependent on adherence to the practice of the law.

(d) Another apocalyptic and pseudepigraphical writing is 2 Esdras which was similarly written about A.D. 100 and which describes the coming of the messiah. After an interim kingdom of four hundred years "the earth shall restore those that sleep in her, and the dust those that are at rest therein [and the chambers shall restore those that were committed unto them]. And the Most High shall be revealed upon the throne of judgment: (and then cometh the End) and compassion shall pass away (and pity be far off). . . . And then shall the pit of torment appear, and over against it the place of refreshment; The furnace of Gehenna shall be made manifest, and over against it the Paradise of delight" (2 Esd. 7:32-6). The nations shall also be raised for judgment (vv. 37 ff.). The saved are those who observed "the Law of the lawgiver perfectly" (v. 89). The face of the righteous in the resurrection shall shine like the sun (v. 97).

2 Esd. 7 is "the one passage in Jewish intertestamental literature which speaks of a dying Messiah" (G. E. Ladd, op. cit., 69). At the end of this evil age God will intervene to punish the wicked and reward the righteous in the age to come. "For my Son the Messiah shall be revealed, together with those who are with him, and shall rejoice the survivors four hundred years. And it shall be, after these years, that my Son the Messiah shall die, and all in whom there is human breath. Then shall the world be turned into the primeval silence seven days, like as at the first beginnings; so that no man is left. And it shall be after seven days that the Age which is not yet awake shall be roused, and that which is corruptible shall perish" (2 Esd. 7:28-31). (For further discussion of the messiah and the resurrection see G. E. Ladd, op. cit., 60-73.)

(e) The date and structure of Ethiopic Enoch have already been noted above in 5(a). The five sections express a variety of eschatological expectations. Chs. 1–36 do not speak explicitly of a resurrection, but one is implied. Enoch visits Sheol, the intermediate state of the dead. The statement that some of the spirits of the wicked shall be slain on the day of judgment (Eth. Enoch 22:13) suggests that others will be raised. The resurrection of the righteous Israelites (though not of others) is implied in Eth. Enoch 90:33. The same is true of the Similitudes of Enoch. The wicked “shall have no hope of rising from their beds, Because they do not extol the name of the Lord of Spirits” (46:6). But the righteous shall be raised as the chosen of the Elect One, the heavenly Son of man: “And in those days shall the earth also give back that which has been entrusted to it, And Sheol also shall give back that which it has received, And hell shall give back that which it owes. For in those days the Elect One shall arise, And he shall choose the righteous and holy from among them: For the day has drawn nigh that they should be saved” (Eth. Enoch 51:1 f.). The nature of the resurrection is described in Eth. Enoch 62:13–16: “And the righteous and the elect shall be saved on that day, And they shall never thenceforward see the face of the sinners and unrighteous. And the Lord of Spirits will abide over them, And with that Son of Man shall they eat, And lie down and rise up for ever and ever. And the righteous and elect shall have risen from the earth, And ceased to be of downcast countenance. And these shall be the garments of life from the Lord of Spirits: And your garments shall not grow old, Nor your glory pass away before the Lord of Spirits.”

This latter passage seems to envisage the resurrection of a transfigured body. G. E. Ladd points out that the concept of resurrection in the final section of Eth. Enoch seems to be a resurrection of the spirit, although this is quite uncommon in Judaism (I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975, 75): “And the spirits of you who have died in righteousness shall live and rejoice, And their spirits shall not perish, nor their memorial from before the face of the Great One unto all the generations of the world: wherefore no longer fear their contumely” (Eth. Enoch 103:4; cf. 95: 33 ff.; 104:2–6).

(f) The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs were probably compiled in the first two centuries B.C. Again the resurrection of righteous Israelites is affirmed (Test. Jud. 25:1–4; Test. Ben. 10:6–9; Test. Zeb. 10:4).

(g) Although the Qumran community expected a grand final conflict between the sons of light and the sons of darkness (cf. 1QM generally; 1QH 3:34 ff.; CD 20:14 f.), they do not seem to have been much concerned about the fate of the dead (G. E. Ladd, op. cit., 57 f.; cf. H. Ringgren, The Faith of Qumran, 1963, 148 ff.). J. Pryke attributes to them a view of the immortality of the soul rather than the resurrection of the body in any Christian or late Jewish sense (“Eschatology in the Dead Sea Scrolls”, in M. Black, ed., The Scrolls and Christianity, SPCK Theological Collections 11, 1969, 56). The sect clearly shared a belief in some form of future life. Perhaps the nearest statement of belief in a resurrection comes in the following Hymns, but even here it may be poetic metaphor: “And then at the time of Judgment the Sword of God shall hasten, and all the sons of His truth shall awake to [overthrow] wickedness; all the sons of iniquity shall be no more” (1QH 6:29 f.); “Hoist a banner, O you who lie in the dust! O bodies gnawed by worms, raise up an ensign for [the destruction of wickedness]! [The sinful shall] be destroyed in the bat-bles against the ungodly" (1QH 6:34); "that bodies gnawed by worms may be raised from the dust to the counsel [of Thy truth], and that the perverse spirit (may be lifted) to the understanding [which comes from Thee]; that he may stand before Thee with the everlasting host and with [Thy] spirits [of holiness], to be renewed with all the living and to rejoice together with them that know" (1QM 11:12 ff.). The Manual of Discipline speaks of "the Renewal", of God choosing them "for an everlasting Covenant and all the glory of Adam shall be theirs" (1QS 4). "And as for the visitation of all who walk in this spirit, it shall be healing, great peace in a long life, and fruitfulness, together with every everlasting blessing and eternal joy in life without end, a crown of glory and a garment of majesty in unending light" (1QS 4:7 f.).

It is passages such as these which lead Pryke to conclude that the main thrust of Qumran belief was that "the ultimate destiny of those raised from the dead is to join the angelic company of spirits and to be transmuted from the matter into spirit, from man into angelic being" (op. cit., 56). This variety of emphases found in the Qumran texts lends substance to the accounts of Josephus, who held that the Essenes believed in both the resurrection of the body and the immortality of the soul: "Now the following opinion is firmly held among them . . . that while bodies are corruptible and their material substance has no permanency, souls are immortal and continue for ever; and that, emanating from the finest atmosphere, they are bound up in their bodies as in prisons, into which they are drawn by a certain natural attraction: but when they are released from the bonds of the flesh, they rejoice and are borne upwards, freed from a long slavery" (Josephus, War 8, 11). "Now the dogma (word) of the resurrection also is firmly held among them. . . . For they confess that the flesh also will rise and be immortal as the soul is already immortal, which they now say, when separated from the body, enters a place of fragrant air and light, to rest until the judgment . . . for they say that there will be a judgment and a conflagration of everything, and that the wicked will be eternally punished" (Hippolytus, Haer. 27; both quotations taken from M. Black, "The Account of the Essenes in Hippolytus and Josephus", in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1954, 175). Perhaps these summaries are weighted by a background Greek understanding of the immortality of the soul. But there is a passage in the Angelic Liturgy which together with the Horoscopes of Qumran comes near to gnosticism: "The sixth among the chief Princes will bless [. . .] all the perfect in righteous acts with seven words of wonder, so that they should be for ever with those who live for ever [. . .] The seventh of the sovereign Princes shall bless [. . .] who [for ever] praise his glorious kingdom with seven wondrous words which will be to them for eternal peace" (4QS1 1:24 ff.; cf. J. Pryke, ibid.; M. Delcor, "Recherches sur un Horoscope en Langue Hébraïque provenant de Qumrân", Revue de Qumrân 20, 1966, 521–42; J. Carmignac, "Les Horoscopes de Qumrân", Revue de Qumrân 18, 1965, 199–217).

(h) In the later Talmudic literature "the primary doctrine of Judaism is the resurrection, the revivification of the dead" (G. F. Moore, Judaism, II, 379). The two terms are here synonymous. For complete demonstration, proof was sought from the three main divisions of scripture as in the discussion between Rabban Gamaliel II and the Sadducees. The latter asked Gamaliel where in scripture was the evidence that the Holy One brings the dead to life. Gamaliel replied by citing from the law Deut. 31:16, from the prophets Isa. 26:19, and from the hagiographa Cant. 7:10.

But the Sadducees were not satisfied, and Gamaliel finally quoted Deut. 11:9, claiming that the promise of the land "to them" implied resurrection of the dead (cf. Sanhedrin 90b; Moore, Judaism, II, 382, and for further data 377–95; SB IV, 2, 1166–98 on the question of a general or partial resurrection of the dead in Judaism; SB IV, 2, 1213–1323 on ideas of judgment in Judaism). However, recent investigation has also shown widespread belief in Judaism between c. 200 B.C. and A.D. 100 of immortality of the soul alongside resurrection (cf. H. C. C. Cavallin, Life After Death. Paul's Argument for the Resurrection of the Dead in 1 Corinthians 15. Part I: An Enquiry into the Jewish Background, 1974, 200).

9. Neither the OT nor later intertestamental literature contains a uniform eschatological expectation. In large tracts of the NT, expectation is concentrated on this life and on what Yahweh is doing in history. But in various places there is the growing belief that, because Yahweh lives, his faithful people will also live. The nature of such an existence is rarely defined, though there is an implied continuity of identity. While Sheol is often depicted as the ultimate end of man, there is "the beginnings of the thought of a richer and more worth-while survival in another world, and the growth of a belief in a resurrection to life on earth" (H.H. Rowley, op. cit., 160 f.).

Such beliefs are sometimes traced to foreign influence. One such suggestion is that the Israelites got the idea of resurrection from the Egyptian cult of Osiris (H. Gressmann, Tod und Auferstehung des Osiris, Der Alte Orient 13, 1923; R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 195–205; but cf. F. Nötscher, Altorientalischer und alttestamentlicher Auferstehungsglauben, 1926, 177 ff., 185, and H. H. Rowley, op. cit., 161 ff.). This was related to the Babylonian Tammuz cult and to the Canaanite fertility cult (cf. the account of the "Descent of Ishtar to the Nether World", ANET, 196–9; H. Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods, 1945, 286 ff.). Osiris may well be connected with Adonis, the Syrian counterpart of Tammuz (Lucian, De Dea Syra 7; cf. W. W. von Baudissin, Adonis und Esmun, 1911, 94 ff.). The Osiris cult was originally a rite in which pharaoh was identified with Osiris, thus assuring him of immortality. It has been suggested that such rites were incorporated into Israelite religion in the form of a new year festival in which the king ritually died and rose again. In this he represented God, and the ceremonies were designed to encourage fertility and the renewal of nature. The idea of sacred marriage belonged to these rites, and this was reflected in the religious prostitution denounced by the prophets.

Although it is clear from the denunciations of the prophets that Canaanite religion encroached upon that of the Israelites, the subject of the new year festival as such is not directly mentioned by the OT writers. It is rather inferred from constructions placed on certain passages, and many scholars now doubt whether there ever was such a festival (cf. D. J. A. Clines, "The Evidence for an Autumnal New Year in Pre-Exilic Israel and Judah Reconsidered", JBL 93, 1974, 22–40; and "The Psalms and the King", Theological Students' Fellowship Bulletin 71, 1975, 1–6; → also Might, art. thronos OT 4; → Myth, art. mythos OT). Even if there was a new year festival, Rowley doubts whether the Israelites could have gained their notions of an after-life from Canaanite or Egyptian religion via this rite. If they had, one would have expected faith in resurrection to have appeared in pre-exilic times. But in any case, such Israelite belief in resurrection as there was had an essentially different character. "In the rites the central thing was not to set before men the idea of human resurrection, but to maintain fertility in family, field and flock throughout the community” (Rowley, op. cit., 163). It is possible that some of the ideas of the Pss. (see above, 1) reflect the language of the rites. There are references to Adonis gardens in Isa. 17:10, weeping for Tammuz in Ezek. 8:13 f., and mourning for Hadad-rimmon in Zech. 12:11. But none of these passages warrants the conclusion that Israelite belief in an after-life or resurrection was actually derived from the non-Israelite sources so far discussed.

Another, but later, suggested source is Persian Zoroastrianism (cf. J. D. C. Pavry, The Zoroastrian Doctrine of a Future Life, 1929; J. H. Moulton, Early Zoroastrianism, 1913, 154 ff.; H. S. Nyberg, Die Religionen des alten Iran, 1938, 308 ff.; A. T. Nikolainen, Die Auferstehungsglauben in der Bibel und ihrer Umwelt, I, 1944, 22 ff.; R. Martin-Achard, op. cit., 186–95). But, although Rowley shares the widespread view that Jewish thought bears the influence of Persian ideas, particularly in the Book of Daniel and especially in connexion with its angelology, he rejects the suggestion that Iranian thought was the source of Daniel’s doctrine of resurrection (op. cit., 161; cf. H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic, 1947², 40; F. Nötscher, Altorientalischer und alttestamentlicher Auferstehungsglauben, 1926, 185–96; A. Bertholet, “The pre-Christian Belief in the Resurrection of the Body”, American Journal of Theology 20, 1916, 25 ff.; and “Zur Frage des Verhältnisses vom persischen und jüdischen Auferstehungsglauben”, in Festschrift F. C. Andreas, 1916, 51–62). In Daniel there is no thought of a universal resurrection of the kind found in Zoroastrianism. It may be that the “many” of Dan. 12:2 may have an inclusive sense, i.e. “all” (→ All, art. polloi) and this would fit the context. But this still leaves considerable differences between Heb. and Persian thought. W. W. von Baudissin has pointed out that the terminology employed by the Jews in discussing the resurrection is typically Semitic and does not recall Iranian expressions (Adonis und Esmun, 1911, 418 ff.). Whereas the biblical passages speak of awakening from death, as from sleep, the Persians thought of it as a reconstitution of the body through the reunion of its elements. In conclusion it may be said that the Jews had a conception of resurrection before they came into contact with the Persian Empire. The thought of an after-life has its deepest root in the awareness of the living God himself; because Yahweh lives and is the covenant God of Israel, his people, there is an on-going relationship and life. This awareness developed in the course of history in Israel’s many vicissitudes and partly also in contrast with surrounding religious beliefs.

C. Brown

NT Both the vb. and the noun are found in the NT in general senses not connected with resurrection. anhistēmi is used of raising up children for a deceased brother in a levirate marriage (Matt. 22:24; cf. Gen. 38:8), of rising to speak (Matt. 26:62; cf. Mk. 14:57, 60), to read scripture (Lk. 4:16), or from prayer (Lk. 22:45) etc. It can be used in the sense of to appear or come, of a king (Acts 7:18; cf. Exod. 1:8), a priest (Heb. 7:11, 15), accusers (Matt. 12:41; Lk. 11:32; Mk. 14:57), a questioner (Lk. 10:25; cf. Acts 6:9), and an enemy rising up or rebelling against someone (Mk. 3:26; Acts 5:36). There is also the weakened meaning indicating the beginning of an action expressed by another vb., i.e. rise, set out, get ready (Matt. 9:9; Mk. 2:14; 7:24; 10:1; and perhaps 1:35; Lk. 1:39; 4:29, 39; 5:28; 6:8; Acts 8:26; 9:6, 11, 34). In Mk. 13:2 v.l. it means to rise. (For further discussion and usage outside the NT in these senses see Arndt, 69.) anastasis is used in the expression "Behold, this child is set for the fall and rising of many in Israel" (Lk. 2:34), i.e. because of him many will fall and others will rise in Israel. These words of Simeon draw attention almost at the outset of Lk. to the rôle of Jesus in God's purposes and to his divisive effect within Israel, a fact borne out by the succeeding narrative. Altogether the vb. occurs 107 times in the NT, including 71 instances in the Lucan writings alone (4 times in Matt.; 17 in Mk.; 26 in Lk.; 8 in Jn.; 45 in Acts; once each in Rom., 1 Cor. and Eph.; and twice each in 2 Thess. and Heb.). The noun is found 42 times, again predominantly in the Lucan writings (4 times in Matt.; 2 in Mk.; 6 in Lk.; 4 in Jn.; 11 in Acts; 2 in Rom.; 4 in 2 Cor.; once each in Phil. and 2 Tim.; 3 in Heb.; twice each in 2 Pet. and Rev.). Although the vb. is much more common, most instances of it do not refer to the resurrection; it is the reverse in the case of the noun. In the case of → egeirō it is the vb. which is more commonly used in connexion with resurrection.

1. In secular Gk. we find these words are hardly ever used to express resurrection of the dead to life, but this is their theologically richest meaning in the NT. When this happens, the root has become virtually synonymous with → egeirō. At first sight, as is the case in the LXX, it seems that there is hardly any difference between them. Closer study shows that egeirō, especially in the pass., is used predominantly for what happened at Easter, i.e. the wakening of the Crucified to life, while anhistēmi and anastasis refer more especially to the recall to life of people during the earthly ministry of Jesus and to the eschatological and universal resurrection. 1 Cor. 15:25 f. makes the difference between the two concepts clear (although the Eng. does not always make it sufficiently clear that two different roots are being used). They soon became interchangeable, however, as is shown by īēn dynamin tēs anasteōs autou ("the power of his resurrection") in Phil. 3:10, and especially by anastasis Iēsou Christou ("resurrection of Jesus Christ") in 1 Pet. 1:3 and 3:21. M. E. Dahl has shown in table-form that with both verbal stems the intrans. meaning predominates (The Resurrection of the Body: A Study of I Corinthians 15, SBT 36, 1962, 98 ff.); with both, except in 1 Cor. 15, the subject is almost always Christ. When they are used trans., God is predominantly the subject and Christ the object. Although we cannot apply it universally, we may say that the general rule in the NT is that, in contrast to the LXX, the action of God on and through Christ is expressed by egeirō, while anhistēmi expresses, as it were, that which happens in the realm of human experience.

2. Central for the NT are the statements about Jesus' resurrection, including the predictions Mk. 8:31 par. Matt. 16:21; Lk. 9:22; Mk. 9:9 par. Matt. 17:9; Mk. 9:31 par. Matt. 17:23; Mk. 10:34 par. Matt. 20:19, Lk. 18:33, and the testimony by Mary Magdalene (Matt. 28:8, 10) and the disciples (Acts 1:22; 2:31; 4:33 etc.). Through an act of God, the dead and buried Lord had been awakened to → life again (cf. Acts 2:31, 34; Eph. 5:14) with a body, which was new, material, not identical with the old, but not merely visionary (cf. Jn. 20; 21). He appeared to his disciples in a form that could be seen and felt (Jn. 20:27; Lk. 24:16, 31, 39; Acts 1:2, 9; cf. 1 Jn. 1:1 ff.), though he might not always permit the latter (Jn. 20:17), because from then on they should know him only as the Exalted One, i.e. independently from his form in the flesh (cf. 2 Cor. 5:16). Though Jesus already possessed the → light and → spirit → body of the new age (→ Time, art. aiōn), he maintained normal human fellowship with his disciples by eating and drinking with them (Lk. 24:29 f.; Jn. 21:12 f.). The testimony of the disciples was not based on the event of Jesus being raised which no one had seen – according to Matt. 28:4 the guards fainted – but on their meetings with the Risen One (Acts 1:22). The fact that Jesus did not remain among the dead, but was alive (Lk. 24:5) gave the disciples, who until then had vacillated, the certainty that they had to do with the Lord, the Son (Rom. 1:4). The resurrection of Jesus thus became the sign of God’s triumph over the power of → sin and → death. In other words, it had cancelled the fall of → Adam and all human slavery that had resulted from it, for the Crucified had entered the glory → of God as the first among many (→ Sacrifice, art. aparchê). This message is the foundation of all Christian hope and preaching (1 Pet. 1:3; 1 Cor. 15; → Proclamation); it also explains why → baptism is the sign of salvation (1 Pet. 3:21; Rom. 6:5).

In the mystery of his person Jesus incorporates “the resurrection and the life” (Jn. 11:25). In other words, the resurrection, which the Jews had conceived only eschatologically, begins at the point where he appears and sets his Spirit to work. Anyone who is linked to him by → faith, and has been possessed by his power, experiences the beginning of the transition from this transient age to the new one, to the liberation from sin and death (Phil. 3:10; → Redemption). This is testified to in the → Lord’s Supper (Jn. 6:54). Hence, faith may be interpreted as a dying and rising again with Jesus (Rom. 6:11; Jn. 5:24).

4. Even if John gives us a concept of resurrection as something apparently contemporaneously realized, that is only a beginning. (On Jn.’s eschatology → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (d).) 2 Tim. 2:18 expressly rejects the idea that the general resurrection of the dead took place in that of Jesus; the context of Col. 2:13 and Eph. 2:6 does not suggest it either. The general resurrection, which is inferred from that of Jesus, is held fast. In Jn. 6:39 f., 54 it is recorded as taught by Jesus himself. It is always in the sense of the resurrection of the → body; it is never a mere continuation of being, or a reawakening of the soul. As such, it was the real point of opposition to the proclamation of the gospel. It was rejected by the Sadducees (Matt. 22:23), who held that only the Torah, the OT law, was authoritative, and they claimed that the resurrection was not taught there (cf. Matt. 22:31 f.) It was equally rejected by the Greeks, because the teaching was too materialistic for their spiritualized thinking (Acts 17:18, 32; 1 Cor. 15:12). Faith in a resurrection linked with → judgment (cf. Heb. 6:2) belongs to the fundamental elements of faith (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10; Lk. 14:14; Heb. 11:35).

5.(a) Although the word resurrection is clearly used of a definite event in the future (Jn. 11:24; Matt. 22:28), the term does not necessarily imply it. There are here, as in Jewish apocalyptic, two lines of thought discernible concerning the scope of its effects. Besides the general resurrection as it is depicted in Rev. 20:11–15, Matt. 25:31–46, which is linked with the return of Christ and the separation (→ Judgment) of the good and bad, the NT also speaks of a preceding “first” resurrection of the righteous (Lk. 14:14), of the dead in Christ (1 Thess. 4:16; probably also in 1 Cor. 15:23 f., where to telos may mean the rest [cf. Arndt, 819]). In Rev. 20:4 ff. the dead in Christ are said to reign for a thousand years, whereas the remainder of the dead appear before the throne of God first on the day of final judgment (Rev. 20:11 ff.). (For interpretations of the millennium → Number, art. chilias NT 4.) While it is also true of the general resurrection that individual identity persists in spite of death, so that men will stand before God in their complete being, a fuller language is used for believers. They will be “equal to angels [isangeloi]” (Lk. 20:36), free of all impulses of the psychē, including sexual ones (Matt. 22:30; 24:38); they will be like Jesus, for they will “see him as he is” (1 Jn. 3:2). In this connexion Paul once uses the expression exanastasis (Phil. 3:11): “that if possible I may attain the resurrection from the dead.” It is debated whether the compound word simply means anastasis, as is normally the case, or whether Paul is alluding to the earlier transformation and the church’s being lifted up to be with Christ (1 Thess. 4:17; Rev. 20:4). In any case, we must remember that the analogy of → seed and harvest has only a superficial resemblance to the process of resurrection. God gives a body as he wills (1 Cor. 15:38), and so he alone guarantees the identity of the person.

6. The vb. anazaō, come to life again, is rare in secular Gk. It is found in the NT in the following senses. In Rev. 20:5 f. TR it is used of the dead coming to life. In Rom. 7:9 it describes the action of the commandment in provoking and condemning sin: “I was once alive apart from the law, but when the commandment came, sin revived and I died.” The argument is that it is the law which identifies sin for what it is (Rom. 7:7). But sin uses the commandment to attempt to justify itself by assuming that man can actually fulfil the law (vv. 8 ff.). This is a deception, and results in killing the person concerned (v. 11), because failure to keep the law brings condemnation. Finally, the vb. is used of the prodigal son after his return: “for this my son was dead, and is alive again [anezēsen]; he was lost, and is found” (Lk. 15:24).

L. Coenen

In Phil. 3 Paul describes how he counts as “loss” all the things which he previously gloried in as a Jew in order to gain Christ (Phil. 3:8; → Dirt, art. skybalon). His desire now is to have a → righteousness not of his own, but “that which is through faith in Christ” (v. 9), “that I may know him and the power of his resurrection [tēn dynamin tēs anastaseōs autou], and may share in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, that if possible I may attain the resurrection from the dead [ei pōs katantēsō eis tēn exanastasin tēn ek nekrōn]” (vv. 10 f.). R. P. Martin suggests that the background here is a polemical confrontation with those perfectionists who were arguing that knowledge of the heavenly Lord was all-important and that believers were already raised with Christ to new life (Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976, 134; cf. Phil. 3:12–16; 2 Tim. 2:18; 1 Cor. 15:12; W. Schmithals, Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971, 155 ff., 259 ff.; P. Siber, Mit Christus Leben. Eine Studie zur paulinischen Auferstehungshoffnung, 1971, 116–22). “He does so with a forceful statement that the only way to enter into the power of his resurrection is by a willingness to share his sufferings, and so become like him in his death. The last phrase is clearly baptismal (cf. Rom. 6:1–11; 2 C. 4:7–15; Col. 2:12, 20; 3:1; 2 Tim. 2:11), referring to the representative death of Jesus on the cross in which believers participate as they too die to their old life and are raised to new existence” (ibid.; cf. J. Jervell, Imago Dei, 1960, 206 ff., 261, 273 ff.; M. B. Ahern, “The Fellowship of his Sufferings (Phil. 3,10)”, CBQ 22, 1960, 1–32; H. Seesemann, Der Begriff KOINONIA im Neuen Testament, 1933, 83 f.). The reference to “his resurrection” (v. 10) suggests a present experience. In v. 11 “Paul expresses the hope that complete conforming to his Lord (3:21) will come at the resurrection from among the dead (the unparalleled expression – ‘intended clearly to express the realism of the resurrection from the physically dead’ [Gnilka] – is probably to be accounted for by Paul’s emphasis on the necessity for a future resurrection to complete God's saving plan for his people" (R. P. Martin, op. cit., 135; cf. J. Gnilka, Der Philipperbrief, Herders Theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament, 1968, ad loc.). Polycarp observed that false prophets said that "there is neither resurrection nor judgment" (To the Philippians 7). The phrase ei pōs ("if possible") is seen by Martin not as an expression of doubt about the reality of Paul's resurrection but about the way in which it will be his, i.e. whether by martyrdom in the near future or by some other means at a more distant time (op. cit., 136; cf. Phil. 1:20–26; on the Gk. see Funk § 375).

(b) That which happens between earthly death and eschatological resurrection is, from the standpoint of time, unimportant, for with death man is no longer within → time. Discussion about the intermediate state of the soul can only be speculative. The decisive point is that after death all men will stand before Christ, either as judge or saviour, "who will change our lowly body to be like his glorious body, by the power which enables him even to subject all things to himself" (Phil. 3:21, cf. v. 20; 1:10, 21; 2:10 f.; → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c) for Paul's eschatological teaching, and the note below on The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology 2 for interpretations of the NT teaching on the resurrection of believers).

C. Brown

ἐγείρω

ἐγείρω (egeirō), wake, rouse, raise up; ἐγερσις (egersis), awakening, i.e. resurrection.

CL This word-group is often found in Gk. literature, the vb. from Homer onwards, the noun from Empedocles and Hippocrates, and is absolutely synonymous with anhistēmi. Accordingly the meaning of the vb. when trans. is to waken, lift up, erect, stimulate, stir up; when intrans. awake, get up, stand up. When used of persons, it is used for those who are awakened from sleep, unconsciousness, or lethargy, who are stimulated to action or revolt, or for those who do such actions. The noun means (trans.) a waking up, an establishing, (intrans.) a waking, standing up, a recovery (from illness). The meaning resurrection (from death) in our understanding of the term can hardly be found, either in a verbal or substantival sense. One of the few possible exceptions is Menander of Ephesus quoted in Josephus Ant. 8, 5, 3 (146), Ap. 1, 119, though this interpretation of egersis is not given in the standard translations of Whiston and Thackeray. From this we can infer, as was already pointed out under → anastasis, CL, that the concept was not native to Gk. thought, and occurs only symbolically or cultically for the waking up of sleeping gods. Fuller details in TDNT II 333.

OT The OT use of the word-group normally corresponds to Gk. idiom. In the LXX, which uses it as virtually synonymous with the anhistēmi group, it represents the Heb. qūm (rise), ʾūr (arouse) and ʾamaḏ (stand): Pharaoh awoke (Gen. 41:4, 7); the Lord raised up judges (Jdg. 2:16, 18); Gabriel set Daniel, who had fallen unconscious, on his feet (Dan. 8:18); King Ahasuerus rose from table (Est. 7:7); God is solemnly called on to arise and scatter his enemies (Num. 10:35). That it is synonymous with anhistēmi may be seen from Gen. 38:8 and 2 Sam. 7:12 where anhistēmi is used both for man and God, while in Isa. 45:13a egeirō is used (→ anastasis OT). At the same time already in LXX there is a marked modification of the verbal connotation through its use for the raising of the dead (→ anastasis OT) and the work of God's Spirit in man.

NT 1. Generally speaking the word-group has the same meaning in the NT as in CL and OT. egersis is found only once, viz. Matt. 27:53 in connexion with the resurrection of Jesus; elsewhere anastasis or its verbal forms is used. However, egeirō occurs 143 times (36 in Matt.; 19 in Mk.; 18 in Lk.; 13 in Jn.; 12 in Acts; 10 in Rom.; 20 in 1 Cor.; 4 in 2 Cor.; 2 in Eph.; once each in Gal., Phil., Col., 1 Thess., 2 Tim., Heb., Jas., 1 Pet. and Rev.). egeirō is particularly used by Matt. as an introduction to action (e.g. 1:24; 2:14; 8:26; 25:7), and for the appearance of characters on the stage of history (e.g. 24:7, 11, 24). This usage is common also in Lk. (e.g. 13:25). Mk. prefers the imperative (but cf. Lk. 5:23 f.; Jn. 14:31).

2. A survey of the cases in which the word-group is used for awaking to life creates at first the impression that the line of development already seen in the OT and Jewish apocalyptic has been merely further developed. There are occasional cases where those regarded by the doctors as dead are reported as brought back to life by Jesus. He took the hand of Jairus' daughter and caused her to get up and walk (Mk. 5:41). According to the Synoptics (Matt. 9:25; Mk. 5:41; Lk. 8:54 f.), it was his touch and kingly command that gave the child back her life. The command was expressed by the imperative egeire. The same is true of the widow's son outside the gate of Nain (Lk. 7:14; the command egerthēti is used). Lazarus was raised from the dead after a previous prayer of thanks merely by the command deuro exō, "Come out" (Jn. 11:43). In the case of "the officer in the royal service" (NEB) it was sufficient for Jesus to say, "Your son is alive" (Jn. 4:50). In the two latter cases the relation to the → faith of those concerned and of the spectators is underlined and it is stressed that Jesus had full authority to bring the dead to life (Jn. 4:50; 11:25, 40). The young man at Nain was called back to life merely out of pity for the mother (Lk. 7:13). It is probably also characteristic that both before the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk. 5:39) and of Lazarus (Jn. 11:11) Jesus stated that (for him) the dead persons were not dead, but asleep. Both the Synoptics and John indicate that death can set no bounds to Jesus' activity, but that the → life which proceeded from him stripped death of its power, i.e. that the otherwise immutable frontier of → death and → time had been broken through or leaped over. The spectators' laughter at such a statement (Mk. 5:40) serves best to stress the extraordinary and incomprehensible nature of this life-giving → power. What the Jews at best considered possible, and to be expected, apart from their belief in eschatological resurrection (Jn. 11:24; Martha), was that someone should be preserved from death, even as in the OT: "Could not he . . . have kept this man from dying?" (Jn. 11:37). But now God, the Lord over life and death, stood in person before them.

3. This has brought us to the heart of the concept which has to do with the raising of Jesus. The epistles of the NT never use egeirō, except in Phil. 1:17, in any sense but that of resurrection from the dead. It is so frequently used in Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., that we recognize that it must have been a dominant element in Paul's preaching. In fact, in 1 Cor. 15 he explains that God's breaking into history in the resurrection of Jesus is the decisive factor in the → gospel, the means by which we are saved, without which all faith would be vain. Witnesses are adduced for the truth of the happening;

they were those to whom Jesus had “appeared” (ōphthē is used four times in vv. 5–8). For the preacher of the gospel it had become the touchstone of its truth. The one who disputed or denied the resurrection made God a liar and their → faith a hollow mask (vv. 14–17: kenos and mataios; → Empty). After all, it is faith “in him who raised from the dead Jesus our Lord” (Rom. 4:24), and his spirit lives in those who believe “to give life” to their mortal bodies (Rom. 8:11; cf. 2 Cor. 4:14). It is the fact of Jesus’ resurrection that has removed our sins (1 Cor. 15:17) and has broken the power of death (Rom. 6:4, 9, in connexion with → baptism).

The resurrection of Jesus is not described only with God as subject and Jesus as object; the vb. may be taken intrans. in the middle voice with Jesus as subject, i.e. “he arose from the dead” (e.g. Rom. 6:4, 9; 8:34, and especially in the Synoptics, Mk. 14:28; 16:6; Matt. 27:63). This change in usage shows that while the resurrecting power always issued from God, it belongs to the Son also, who is of one being with the Father.

4. This is seen most clearly in the case of the eschatological resurrection, when it is normally left open who raises the dead, Christ or God himself. “The dead will be raised”, i.e. will rise (1 Cor. 15:52; Matt. 11:5). It is, however, clear that the resurrection of the dead is inseparably linked with the resurrection of Christ; it is based on it and follows on it (1 Cor. 15:13–17). Except in 1 Cor. 15 the anhistēmi group is normally used for it. In 1 Cor. 15:42–44 Paul contrasts the difference between now and then by the contrasts phthora, corruption – aphtharsia, incorruptibility; atimia, dishonour – doxa, glory; astheneia, weakness – dynamis, power; psychikon, natural, of the psychē – pneumatikon, spiritual. The power to raise the dead is transferred from God to Jesus, and by him is promised to his disciples (Matt. 10:8). Perhaps its most exalted expression is found in Matt. 3:9: “God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham.”

L. Coenen

The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology

The purpose of this note is to make a survey of some of the more recent influential studies of the NT teaching on resurrection looking at: 1. The Resurrection of Jesus, and 2. the Resurrection of Men in General.

1. The Resurrection of Jesus. (a) Rudolf Bultmann, who for more than a quarter of a century has dominated German NT interpretation, put forward the paradoxical position maintaining “the incredibility of a mythical event like the resuscitation of a corpse – for that is what the resurrection means” and the fact that “the resurrection is itself an article of faith” (cited from “New Testament and Mythology” (1941) in H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, I, 1953, 39 f.; → Myth). For Bultmann the cross and the resurrection constitute the heart of the NT kerygma. Although they are presented in the context of obsolete, mythological world-views, they cannot be set aside. Nor can they be verified by historical scholarship. For the cross and resurrection confront us with the eschatological which transcends all historical and objective investigation. “In accepting the word of preaching as the word of God and the death and resurrection of Christ as the eschatological event, we are given an opportunity of understanding ourselves. Faith and unbelief are never blind, arbitrary decisions. They offer us the alternative between accepting or rejecting that which alone can illuminate our understanding of ourselves. The real Easter faith is faith in the word of preaching which brings illumination. If the event of Easter Day is in any sense an historical event additional to the event of the cross, it is nothing else than the rise of faith in the risen Lord, since it was this faith which led to the apostolic preaching. The resurrection itself is not an event of past history. All that historical criticism can establish is the fact that the first disciples came to believe in the resurrection" (op. cit., 41 f.).

In reply to criticisms Bultmann could even say: "It has often been said, most of the time in criticism, that according to my interpretation of the kerygma Jesus has risen in the kerygma. I accept this proposition. It is entirely correct, assuming that it is properly understood. It presupposes that the kerygma itself is an eschatological event, and that it expresses the fact that Jesus is really present in the kerygma, that it is his word which involves the hearer in the kerygma. If that is the case, then all speculation concerning the modes of being of the risen Jesus, all the narratives of the empty tomb and all the Easter legends, whatever elements of historical fact they may contain, and as true as they may be in their symbolic form, are of no consequence. To believe in the Christ present in the kerygma is the meaning of the Easter faith" ("The Primitive Christian Kerygma and the Historical Jesus", in C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, eds., The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ: Essays on the New Quest of the Historical Jesus, 1964, 42). (On Bultmann's position → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1 (d); → Myth; cf. also R. Bultmann, Jesus Christ and Mythology, 1951; the various essays in Kerygma and Myth, combined volume, 1972; L. Malevez, The Christian Message and Myth: The Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, 1958; C. W. Kegley, ed., The Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, 1966; W. Schmithals, An Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, 1968, 126–46; and C. Brown, "Bultmann Revisited", The Churchman 88, 1974, 167–87).

(b) Probably the most substantial study of the resurrection event by a German scholar in recent years is that of Hans Grass, Ostergeschehen und Osterberichte, (1956), 1964³. Grass begins with an examination of the gospel narratives. He considers much to be legendary and dominated by ulterior motives. "What remains now as the historical kernel of the legendary Easter stories of the gospels which were shaped by various motives? The conjecture that the first appearances occurred in Galilee (by the lake?) at a point in time removed from Easter, that the circle of disciples participated in the appearances and that Peter was dominant in it, or rather saw the Lord before the other disciples. Out of the appearances arose the Easter faith: the Lord is risen indeed. The encounter with the Lord was understood as a commission to continue his work. Nothing more certain can be derived from the reports about the mode and manner of the appearances. It also remains uncertain whether any dependable information about the empty tomb still stands behind the grave stories. The legendary character of all the gospel Easter reports would itself make these data appear questionable, if we did not have the resurrection testimony of Paul and could not derive from him a series of more certain data" (op. cit., 93). Nevertheless, the appearances were not a piece of self-deception for such self-deception could not have survived the rigours of the opposition encountered by the early church and the awareness of the presence of the risen Christ was intrinsic to the early church's message and sacraments (op. cit., 263 ff.; cf. 14, 29–32, 127).

Grass believes that the original ending of Mk. was erased by a community which may have felt a tension between the (later) tradition of a third-day appearance in Jerusalem and an earlier Galilean appearance (op. cit., 18 f.). The original may be represented in Jn. 21 which contains a Galilean tradition which is older than the theologically slanted one of Jn. 20 (op. cit., 74–85; cf. 51–73). Grass regards many of the details given in Matt. as legendary and late, e.g., the story of the guard (Matt. 27:62–66; 28:4, 11–15) which is also found in Gos. Pet. He sees a tension here in that the appearance is to non-believers, whereas the earlier tradition (which survived in Acts 10:41) maintained that Jesus appeared only to believers (op. cit., 25). However, the parousia-like scene of the commissioning of the disciples preserves the historical element of locating it in Galilee (op. cit., 28 ff.). Luke's account of the Emmaus road encounter is also legendary and apologetic in intention (op. cit., 35 ff.). The story of the forty days and the ascension represent the answer of a post-Pauline theology to the question why the appearances had ceased (op. cit., 48 ff.), and they represent events in a much more naturalistic and verifiable way than they actually were.

Grass rejects all attempts at harmonization of the gospel accounts. "The gospel narratives are . . . strongly legendary and give no true picture of the events. Paul, as the more original account, must retain precedence over the gospel accounts" (op. cit., 107; cf. 1 Cor. 15:3–10). The kerygma which Paul took over contained only the first two appearances, those to Peter and the Twelve. The appearances to Peter and the twelve took place in Galilee, whereas those to James and "all the apostles" occurred in Jerusalem. The one to the five hundred brethren took place before that to James (op. cit., 101).

Grass is sceptical about "the third day" and the empty tomb. The place of the former in early tradition may be due to the discovery of the empty tomb on that day. But the idea may be due to a Christian adaptation of current Jewish interpretation of Hos. 6:2 in connexion with the general resurrection (op. cit., 134). The story of the empty tomb is a late development which came about through the need to regard the body of Jesus as freed from corruption and as having ascended into heaven (op. cit., 145 f.). In Paul's view the tomb does not need to be empty (op. cit., 146–73). The function of 1 Cor. 15:4 is to stress Jesus' death. Grass understands 2 Cor. 5:1–10 as teaching that those who rise from the dead do not need their old bodies (cf. 1 Cor. 15:49, 53). Resurrection does not necessitate the transformation of the physical body but its replacement by a glorious body.

Although ecstatic experiences were not uncommon in the early church, the resurrection appearances were not the subjective product of ecstasy. Despite the Lucan attempts to argue for the resurrection of Jesus' earthly body, Christ always appeared with a sōma doxēs (body of glory) or sōma pneumatikon (spiritual body) (op. cit., 232). "That a psychic disposition among certain disciples conditioned the visionary contemplation of the exalted Lord is no more probable than the reverse assumption that enthusiastic phenomena were a consequence of encounter with the Risen One" (op. cit., 238). The appearances were essentially visionary, though the visions have a divine authority. "The Easter event is reduced for critical, historical study to a series of Christ-visions, by which the scattered and shattered disciples were empowered to a death-defying proclamation of Christ, to the founding of the church and to mission. With them begins the history of Christianity. Theological reflection has no cause to dispute the visionary character of the Christ-encounters. It believes, however, that this was not a case of self-deception on the part of the disciples to be explained by imminent factors, but rather that God has acted here. He has not left Christ in death, but raised and exalted him, revealing the Living and Exalted One not to all the people but to a circle of chosen witnesses, who in visionary contemplation were allowed to see him in his doxa and were certain of his kyriotēs which commissioned them anew" (op. cit., 249). The commissioning element is very old and original, though not necessarily authentic, in the sense that it is useless to ask which sayings are authentic (op. cit., 252 f.).

(b) In 1964 Willi Marxsen published a discussion paper intended for theologians which was subsequently translated into English under the title "The Resurrection of Jesus as a Historical and Theological Problem" (in C. F. D. Moule, ed., The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ, SBT Second Series 8, 1968, 15–50). The paper led to calls for Marxsen's removal from the examining commission of the Evangelical Church of Westphalia on the grounds of heresy. Marxsen himself followed it up with a more popular presentation, The Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth (1968; E. T. 1970, cited below as The Resurrection). Commenting on 1 Cor. 15:14 ("If Christ has not been raised, then our preaching is in vain and your faith is in vain"), Marxsen says: "This means surely that apart from the resurrection of Jesus there would be no Church" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 15; cf. The Resurrection, 12). But for us the question is now on a different plane from what it was in NT times in view of our post-Enlightenment critical attitude to history. We cannot answer the question of historicity simply by appealing to the texts, any more than we can answer the question about how the world came into being by appealing to the Book of Genesis without taking into consideration the conclusions of natural science (Moule, ed., op. cit., 16). Although there is a close relationship between the theological interpretation of the biblical writers and their historical beliefs, the former is not altogether invalidated if the latter can no longer be accepted at face value (Moule, ed., op. cit., 17; cf. The Resurrection, 15). Whereas Bultmann appears to be uninterested in the connexion between theology and history, Marxsen thinks that it is at least worth investigating (Moule, ed., op. cit., 18 f.).

"Now it is of course obvious that I have no direct access to any event in the past" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 20). We have to work through the witness of intermediaries and build up a picture of what happened on the basis of our critical evaluation of their sources. One cannot short-circuit this process by appealing to spiritual insight. "But by means of spiritual perception no event is grasped, no historical fact, but merely the significance of a phenomenon open to others as well. Of this significance reality is a necessary characteristic. But this reality is recognized not in addition to, but precisely in the event" (Moule, op. cit., 21). Now, Paul's experience of Jesus on the Damascus road was not like, say, his encounter with Peter at Antioch. He did not claim to have seen the Risen One, but speaks of Jesus as God's Son (Gal. 1:15) and asks "Have I not seen Jesus our Lord?" (1 Cor. 9:1). Only in 1 Cor. 15:8 is there a somewhat different emphasis: "Last of all, as to one untimely born, he appeared also to me [ōphthē kamoī]" (on this verse → Birth, art. ektrōma). Conversely, when Paul spoke of the raising of Jesus he never did so in terms of something that had happened to him (Moule, ed., op. cit., 23). On this basis, Marxsen infers that "The belief that Jesus' resurrection had actually taken place is therefore founded for Paul not upon a happening of something which he considers to have taken place; on the contrary, it is a process of deduction. We are therefore on no account allowed to appeal to Paul if we want to describe Jesus' resurrection (directly) as an event which has happened, but we must begin by asking if this process of deduction is reliable" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 24).

Marxsen's logic at this point is curious. For while granting what he says about Paul's language, neither the formal premises of Paul's position nor his actual statements warrant the inference that for him belief in the resurrection of Christ was a deduction as contrasted with "something which he considers to have taken place" (cf. 1 Cor. 15:4-7). While it is true to say that no one in the NT ever claimed to have seen the event of the resurrection (this is first found in the Gospel of Peter), the kerygma does presuppose that the resurrection was a historical event (→ Proclamation, art. kēryssō). In the meantime, Marxsen himself claims that belief in the resurrection came into being on the basis of two data. On the one hand, there was the empty tomb which in any case he believes to be ambiguous. For whilst it could be empty because Jesus was risen (Mk. 16:6 par.), it could be claimed that the disciples stole the body (Matt. 27:64; 28:13; cf. Jn. 20:13). On the other hand, there are the appearances which can be divided into two groups. In the first group only the fact of the appearances is mentioned (cf. 1 Cor. 15:5-7). In the second group there are more elaborate descriptions, and these Marxsen takes to be later embellishments (Moule, op. cit., 26 f.; cf. The Resurrection, 25-78 with 79-113).

Marxsen lays particular stress on the precise terminology used. The word ōphthē is pre-Pauline and is found in formalized traditional material (1 Cor. 15:5, 6, 7, 8; Lk. 24:34; cf. Acts 9:17; 13:31; 26:16). It can be taken as the aorist passive of horan, to see, i.e. he was seen (the person in each case being in the dat.). But a deponent meaning is also possible (cf. Funk §§ 191 (1), 313), i.e. he appeared, or let himself be seen, or showed himself. A third possibility is to understand the passive as a form (common in Judaism) used as a paraphrase for the name of God, i.e. "God . . . let himself be seen" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 27; cf. K. H. Rengstorf, Die Auferstehung Jesu. Form, Art und Sinn der urchristlichen Osterbotschaft, 1960⁴, 57). The use of this kind of language suggests that what we have in the resurrection was some kind of vision. And in the last analysis Marxsen thinks that there is no fundamental distinction between a subjective vision and an objective one. For with due respect to Hans Grass, "the so-called objective-vision theory when examined closely is a subjective one too, i.e. it is derived from our own faith" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 30). Again in passing we may note a certain flaw in Marxsen's logic. For whilst the articulation of such a theory may be an articulation of one's faith, it is a question for critical investigation and not dogmatic assertion whether such a vision was the cause or the product of faith.

In the meantime, Marxsen asks whether to call the resurrection a vision is "indeed the whole truth of what really happened?" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 31). He follows Ulrich Wilckens in saying that "the witnesses who had the experience of this happening were obliged to make it known 'with the resources of the tradition'" (op. cit., 32; cf. U. Wilckens, "Der Ursprung der Überlieferung der Erscheinungen des Auferstandenen", in W. Joest and W. Pannenberg, eds., Dogma und Denkstrukturen, 1963, 56 ff.). From this he concludes that "The formulae show that both the setting up of the community as well as the reasons given for functioning within it were traced back to a vision of Jesus after his crucifixion. Now this means that what supplies the real basis of the community and the function within it is the fact, not of the resurrection itself, but of Jesus' appearances; this fact alone is brought into prominence" (op. cit., 34). But again in passing we may note a curious leap of logic. For the community did not have ready-made resources of this particular tradition to hand; these resources were shaped by the community as it went along. Admittedly Matt. 28:16 ff.; Jn. 20:19–23 and Acts 10:44 ff. are capable of being interpreted in terms of visual experiences shared by those who had faith, but they are also capable of being understood as encounters with an objective, personal presence.

In terms of content the resurrection appearances do not provide the witnesses "with a fresh content to preach, or fresh revelations which need to be handed on and which now made this vision and what was connected with it to be the central content of the preaching. The content is rather, as Jesus is reported to have said later in the Gospel of John: 'As the Father has sent me, even so I send you' (20:21)" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 37). Here again this is not strictly true; it is only half the truth. For whilst the witnesses were sent, and whilst they were aware of the continuity of the identity of the one who sent them, there was in fact a new content, viz. that the one who sent them was risen from the dead.

For Marxsen, to speak of the resurrection of Jesus is "an outcome of reflection" (Moule, ed. op. cit., 41). And it is reflection which gives rise to the further hope of a general resurrection of mankind. It is connected with the outlook of Jewish anthropology which (unlike Greek-Hellenistic anthropology) happened to be monistic, understanding man as a unity. But already in 1 Cor. 15:35 ff. this is blended with Greek-Hellenistic ideas in which the resurrection body is seen as belonging to a quite different order from the earthly, physical body. But for Marxsen, the essential point is that "Jesus was experienced in his earthly ministry as an anticipation of the eschaton, as a divine event" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 47). After his death he continued to be experienced in this way. The language of resurrection is an objectifying interpretation of this event. "We must therefore hold firmly to the fact that the raising of Jesus is not the fundamental datum of Christianity" (ibid.). The language of raising expresses the reality of our encounter with the eschaton in the kerygma, and this is the real basis of the church and Christian faith and hope (cf. The Resurrection, 174–88).

(d) In addition to the paper referred to by Marxsen, Ulrich Wilckens has written on "The Tradition-History of the Resurrection of Jesus" (C. F. D. Moule, ed., op. cit., 51–76) and Auferstehung (1970). Wilckens is concerned about the Sitz im Leben of the NT testimony to the resurrection. 1 Cor. 15:3–5 "contains material from a kerygmic and catechetical tradition which had a fixed form before Paul made use of it" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 57). But the other appearances to unspecified and collective groups (vv. 6 f.) are additions to the original list (op. cit., 59 ff.; cf. Auferstehung, 28 ff.). Equally ancient is the pre-Markan Easter story (Mk. 16:1–8a; cf. Moule, ed., op. cit., 71). This influenced Paul as well as Mk. Paul's mention of the burial serves not only to emphasize Jesus' death. It is probably connected with the empty tomb tradition of the evangelists.

Wilckens distinguishes three main phases in the emergence of belief in the resurrection. (1) "It was the appearances of the risen Jesus in Galilee which inspired belief in the resurrection and led to the founding of the primitive community. On this basis, the resurrection of Jesus came to be a fundamental assumption in everything the community thought and did. Moving to Jerusalem, the community found in existence the women's story of the discovery of the empty tomb" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 73 f.). This story was treated as confirmation of the resurrection belief and came to occupy an important place in the passion narrative. (2) "At an early period diaspora Jews who were in Jerusalem came to believe in Jesus through contact with the primitive community" (ibid., 74). They had never known the earthly Jesus. "What they knew was the story of the passion and resurrection, and the nucleus of their preaching was a brief summary of this: Jesus died and was raised by God; now he is with God in heaven and is the principal mediator of salvation in the final phase of time which is to come" (ibid.). When they were driven out of Jerusalem they preached this message with extraordinary vigour and made it "the central article of Christian belief" (ibid.). Under the influence of the Jewish Diaspora and Hellenism there arose a cosmic christology with the central themes of the death and resurrection of Jesus. (3) In the meantime through the influence of Hellenization in Palestine certain stories developed like that of the Emmaus road (excluding the doctrinal discussion, Lk. 24) and the appearance to Mary Magdalene (Jn. 20:14 ff.). But there were also counter-influences which stressed the physical aspect of the risen Christ in opposition to incipient gnosticism. "This reaction played an important part in ensuring that the risen Christ remained identified with Jesus of Nazareth in common Christian tradition" (Moule, ed., op. cit., 75).

In Auferstehung Wilckens stresses the oneness of the Christian traditions with pre-Christian literature. He sees a connexion between Mk. 15:24 and Ps. 22:19 and between Mk. 15:29 and Ps. 22:8 f. Furthermore, the Lord is seen as a heavenly being who is admitted to the secrets of heaven (cf. Rev. 1:9 ff.; Acts 7:55 f.; Rom. 8:34; Eph. 1:19 ff.; Col. 1:18 ff.; Heb. 1:3; 13:20; ff.; op. cit., 91 ff.). There is thus an apocalyptic stamp about certain descriptions of the risen and ascended Christ, and this raises the question of how valid such descriptions can be for us today.

(e) In The Formation of the Resurrection Narratives (1971) R. H. Fuller aims "to start with the earliest record of the Easter traditions, in 1 Corinthians 15, and then to apply the tools of tradition and redaction criticism to the Easter narratives of the four Gospels. In so doing our purpose will be to reconstruct the history of the tradition from its earliest recoverable form in allegedly factual reports (beyond this the historian cannot go) through its successive developments in the preliterary and literary stages" (op. cit., 7). When this is done, "resurrection faith . . . becomes not a matter of believing in the historical accuracy of these narratives but of believing the proclamation which these narratives, for all their differences, enshrine" (op. cit., 8). For Fuller the resurrection is not a historical event but has a "meta-historical character" (op. cit., 23). It remains somewhat obscure whether this latter point represents any positive advance upon the more traditional views. It seems designed to claim that any judgment about historicity lies beyond the competence of the historian, which is a view which we shall see questioned below. On the other hand, traditionalists have always implied that the resurrection transcended the limitations of time and space.

Fuller holds "that 'on the third day' is not a chronological datum, but a dogmatic assertion: Christ's resurrection marked the dawn of the end-time, the beginning of the cosmic eschatological process of resurrection" (op. cit., 27). In making this point he is following M. Goguel in his claim that this is akin to Hos. 6:2 and those Talmudic texts which state that the general resurrection will occur three days after the end of the world (La Foi à la Résurrection de Jésus dans le Christianisme Primitif, 1933, 169 ff.; cf. SB I 747). The list of appearances in 1 Cor. 15:3–8 is a catena of Jerusalem traditions which Paul acquired from Peter and James (Gal. 1:18 f.), combined with his own Damascus road experience. Previously they had been unconnected examples of kerygmatic assertion, but Paul used these as evidence for the resurrection and to prove his apostleship (1 Cor. 15:9 ff.; cf. K. Barth, The Resurrection of the Dead, 1933). Fuller agrees with Bultmann in seeing this as the beginnings of an attempt to “prove” the resurrection (op. cit., 29; cf. Kerygma and Myth, I, 39).

The language of the NT here is “analogical”. It was made “for the description of events in this age; the New Testament has the problem of conveying events which belong to the eschatological age, but which are disclosed through this-worldly, historical events. The farthest we can get perhaps is to say that the events through which the Easter revelations were conveyed were visionary, but to describe them as visions, even as ‘objective visions’, is not entirely felicitous. The word vision, at best, denotes the this-worldly event through which the eschatological event is mediated. “‘Objective’ points to the divine act of disclosure mediated by the vision, but does not indicate that what was disclosed was eschatological” (op. cit., 33; cf. E. G. Selwyn, “The Resurrection”, in E. G. Selwyn, ed., Essays Catholic and Critical, 1926, 281–319, especially 296–99). Perhaps the “this-worldly” aspect of the visions is open to public verification, but it would seem that the eschatological dimension lies outside the techniques of the historian. The appearances to Peter and the Twelve have a special function: “In these appearances the Risen One initiates the foundation of the eschatological community: they are ‘church-founding appearances’. As such they must be distinguished from the later appearances, whose function is the call and sending of apostles to fulfil a mission” (op. cit., 35). But as A. R. C. Leaney comments, “The difficulty of maintaining this distinction is great and it is hard to believe that the apostles could have made it” (“Recent Studies on the Resurrection of Jesus”, in R. H. Preston, ed., Theology and Change: Essays in Memory of Alan Richardson, 1975, 65).

Fuller holds that the two primary appearances in Galilee are Marcan rather than primary and authentic (op. cit., 57 f.), and that the finding of the empty tomb by Mary or the other women is Palestinian and apocalyptic tradition (rather than Hellenistic materialism). “The disciples received Mary’s report not as the origin and cause of their Easter faith, but as a vehicle for the proclamation of the Easter faith which they already held as a result of the appearances” (op. cit., 70).

Turning to Matt., Fuller suggests that the angelophany in Mk. became a Christophany in Galilee in Matt., both being to women. “The earlier tradition of primary Christophanies in Galilee is beginning to react upon the originally quite separate story of the empty tomb with which only the women were originally associated (Mark 16:1 f.)” (op. cit., 78). The significance is twofold. “It is the first symptom of a tendency which culminates in the relocation of the primary appearances to the disciples in Jerusalem in Luke 24 and John 20:2. The Christophany of Matthew 28:11–17 is the first instance we have of a materialization of the appearances” (op. cit., 79). “The final scene in Matthew’s Gospel adds only one fresh point to our knowledge of the resurrection appearances as they actually occurred, viz., that some of the disciples doubted. He has taken from the earliest tradition (via Mark) the second appearance to the Twelve in Galilee, and by drawing out the implications of Mark 16:7 . . . has re-interpreted this appearance, not as the founding of the eschatological community, but as the inauguration of the mission" (op. cit., 91).

Although Luke is concerned with salvation history, Fuller thinks that his picture of a diffusion from Jerusalem is nearer to actual history. On the other hand, Leaney thinks that there could have been a "spontaneous combustion" of Christianity in various places where the earthly Jesus had ministered in Galilee, Decapolis and Syria as a result of the resurrection restoring faith among believers there (op. cit., 66; cf. Fuller, op. cit., 212). Leaney thinks that the appearance to more than five hundred need not have been in Jerusalem.

The thrust of the Johannine accounts is to emphasize that the faith engendered by the appearances is not primarily factual (that he did rise) but christological (since he is alive, he is to be confessed with Thomas as my Lord and my God) (op. cit., 142 ff.; cf. especially Jn. 20:24–29).

For Fuller, the resurrection has profound significance for the Christian community. "The resurrection does not mean that the earthly Jesus is relegated to past history but has as its consequence the extension of the word and work of the earthly Jesus into the present life of the community" (op. cit., 173). "Faith seeks the earthly Jesus not as a dead teacher, but as the living Lord, whose word and work were not merely accomplished once upon a time, but are now made ever present in the community" (op. cit., 74).

(f) It is virtually an axiom among the scholars following in the wake of Bultmann that the historian can only deal with the faith of the disciples in the resurrection but not the resurrection itself. Thus G. Bornkamm insists that "the last historical fact" available to scholars is "the Easter faith of the disciples" (Jesus of Nazareth, 1960, 180). The underlying premise is that the historian can deal with questions on a purely human level, but that he has to suspend judgment on questions which involve the metaphysical and supernatural. It is precisely this point which Alan Richardson questions in the name of critical history. According to Richardson, "such an attitude involves the abandoning of historical method altogether, for the historian cannot admit that there are any 'last facts' in history, for they would be causeless events" (History – Sacred and Profane, Bampton Lectures for 1962, 1964, 1966). This is not to say that the historian has direct access to the resurrection or any other event. At best the historian's work is a piece of reconstruction, the creation of a picture or model of how he conceives the original event on the basis of the historical data available to him (for further discussion see C. Brown, "History and the Believer", in C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith; Four Exploratory Studies, 1976, 147–224). On the other hand, the historian cannot stop short at the data. "History is a causal nexus in which there can be no breaks, no events which are in principle inexplicable. The historian, if he is to be true to his calling, is bound to go on to consider the various possible explanations of the alleged happening or, if he can, to find a new and better one" (A. Richardson, op. cit., 196 f.).

In view of this, Richardson insists that we are bound to ask what caused the resurrection faith of the disciples, and that this is a proper question for the historian to ask. "Either Christ's resurrection called the Church's faith into being or we must give some more rationally coherent account of how that faith with all its tremendous consequences arose" (op. cit., 209; cf. "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ", Theology 74, 1971, 146–54, especially the conclusion on 153 f.). Hence, Richardson in common with traditional apologetics sees three possible explanations of the church's Easter faith. The first is that the resurrection was in some sense a historical fact. We may not be able to say how it happened, any more than we can say how Hannibal crossed the Alps. The historian is rarely an eye-witness, and "historical facts" are always inferences from pieces of testimony and other evidence which the historian has good reason to accept. The second possibility is that the claim that Jesus was raised was fraudulent. But Richardson rejects this on the grounds that "it is incredible that a faith which brought reconciliation with the all-holy God and peace and charity amongst men could have originated in a fraudulent conspiracy" (op. cit., 206). The third suggestion is that the disciples could have been mistaken. Such a view entails dismissing the claims found in the NT to have encountered the risen Christ and that the tomb was empty. It also means finding an explanation of how such a mistake could have arisen.

In making these points, Richardson has performed a valuable service in setting the debate about the resurrection of Jesus in the wider context of historical method. But several questions arise which these particular considerations do not solve. The argument leaves open the question of what the early church did see in the resurrection appearances and what kind of a resurrection body Jesus had (cf. op. cit., 212). It leaves to one side the detailed examination of the testimony to particular appearances and the empty tomb. Furthermore, Richardson appears to diminish its force by conceding that in the end the historical judgment that Jesus was raised from the dead cannot be made without an element of faith (ibid.). But it may be asked whether such a predisposing faith is a necessary condition and whether Richardson's approach actually demands it. The question can be pressed even further and put in the form of whether the first disciples had such a predisposing faith. The answer would seem to be in the negative. For it was encounter with the risen Christ which awakened faith, and not an existing faith that Jesus would rise that created resurrection belief.

(g) A German church historian who thinks that insufficient weight has been given to the actual historical evidence is Hans von Campenhausen in "The Events of Easter and the Empty Tomb" (Tradition and Life in the Church: Essays and Lectures in Church History, 1968, 42-90). Campenhausen does not wish to return to naive apologetics and sacrifice critical history. On the other hand, the evidence of the empty tomb should be taken more seriously than German scholars are wont to take it. "Thus, two essential and reliable pieces of data emerge from the confused mass of material handed down to us: a series of indubitable appearances of Christ, which must be placed in Galilee, and the discovery of the empty tomb in Jerusalem. At a very early date attempts were made to align the two accounts as closely as possible, that is to say, to make the first appearances begin at the empty tomb, and then, finally, to shift them all to Jerusalem. . . . Admittedly Mark's witness is not on a par with that of Paul; but, even so, it is old, in no way contradicts Paul, and cannot simply be ignored. Both pieces of data, therefore, the Galilean appearances and the empty tomb, must be upheld. They form the fixed points of departure, and point the line to be followed, for a consistent account of the events of Easter to be reconstructed" (op. cit., 77).

Campenhausen does not wish to stress external proof at the expense of faith. Rather, due weight must be given to both. "The credibility of the message rests not on bare historical proofs, but, on the one hand, on its existential ratification in the spirit and through 'signs that follow', and, on the other, on the character of the events as fulfilments in salvation-history, or, dogmatically speaking, on the 'proof from scripture'. This, however, does not mean that the history can be treated as unimportant. It belongs, in fact, of necessity to the witness, which, apart from it, would lose its meaning" (op. cit., 87).

The question of the empty tomb has featured prominently in the debates on the resurrection since the eighteenth century. In the last of his Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour (1729) Thomas Woolston maintained that the disciples had stolen the body of Jesus, the Roman soldiers being bribed and drunk. Jesus appeared only to his disciples who themselves eventually came to believe their own lies. Woolston was fined and imprisoned for blasphemy, but a less savage reply came from Thomas Sherlock whose Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection (1729) took up the theme of the court case, putting the witnesses in the dock. Sherlock found it impossible to think that the disciples would have faced the persecution that befell them for the sake of a lie, while at the same time preaching a faith which demanded the utmost integrity. (For a latterday attempt at the same kind of thing see S. Greenleaf, The Testimony of the Evangelists Examined by the Rules of Evidence Administered in the Courts of Justice, [1874] 1965.) Admittedly, resurrection is contrary to the known laws of nature. But to someone living in a tropical climate in the eighteenth century the concept of ice is inconceivable. However, to others who have a wider experience the idea of water solidifying is comprehensible. The illustration figured in various apologetic works of the time. It has its limitations in that the phenomenon of ice is subject to repeated public verification, whereas the resurrection of Jesus is an unrepeatable event in the past. On the other hand, the Christian may assert that there will be an eschatological verification in the general resurrection. To say this, however, is to admit that resurrection claims are not on a par with other factual empirical assertions.

Other writers to pursue the theme were Peter Annet in a series of pamphlets, Gilbert West in his Observations on the History and Evidences of the Resurrection (1747), and H. S. Reimarus in the pamphlets published anonymously by G. E. Lessing known as the Wolfenbüttel Fragments (cf. Fragments, ed., C. H. Talbert, 1971; The Goal of Jesus and his Disciples, ed., G. W. Buchanan, 1970; H. Chadwick, ed., Lessing's Theological Writings, 1956). Reimarus, who is commonly though wrongly credited with having initiated the quest of the historical Jesus, took over many of the arguments of the English deists, claiming that the ideas of the resurrection and the second coming of Jesus were invented by the disciples at a time when Jesus' body could no longer be discovered, in order to perpetuate their comfortable way of life (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1 (a)). Reimarus's work was subjected to minute critique by numerous contemporaries but above all by J. S. Semler in his Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten insbesondere vom Zweck Jesu und seiner Jünger (1779). (On this whole question see further C. Brown, Jesus in European Protestant Theology, 1778–1860: A Study of Trends in Theological Method, I–II, Dissertation, Bristol, 1969.)

The idea that the disciples stole the body goes back to NT times, and according to Matt. 28:13, it was even put forward by the Jewish elders in their attempt to bribe the Roman soldiers. It figured in Origen's debate with Celsus, in which Origen argued that men do not suffer persecution and risk martyrdom for a lie (Contra Celsum 2, 56; cf. Acts 7:60; 12:2). The rationalist H. E. G. Paulus put forward the "swoon theory" in Das Leben Jesu als Grundlage einer reiner Geschichte des Christentums, I, 2, 303 ff. Jesus was taken down from the cross still alive, and lingered on for another forty days before finally taking his leave in the mist (op. cit., 331). Shortly afterwards two disciples returned with the news that Jesus was now in a state of eternal bliss. It was the cool of the tomb and the aromatic spices which revived Jesus who stripped off his shroud and put on the gardener's clothes, hence the mistake of Mary Magdalene (Jn. 20:15). Jesus managed to emerge from the tomb because the earthquake had shifted the stone. In more recent times a similar view has been set out by H. Schonfield in The Passover Plot (1965). Other explanations of the empty tomb are those of K. Lake in The Resurrection of Jesus, 1912, 78 ff., and J. Klausner in Jesus of Nazareth, 1925, 357, who both suggest that Joseph of Arimathea buried the body. Lake conjectured that there were several tombs and that the women misunderstood the young man who said that Jesus was not there. The man had intended to redirect them to the right place, but they read into it something more.

Whilst all such theories fasten upon one or other detail of the Gospel narratives, they all place upon these details a construction other than the natural one in the context of the narrative. But even more significantly they do not explain the resurrection faith of the disciples. As G. E. Ladd points out, "Faith did not create the appearances; the appearances created faith" (I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975, 138). The disciples themselves regarded the empty tomb as ambiguous, according to the Gospel accounts. It was the appearances of Jesus which convinced them; the empty tomb was the corroborative corollary. In reply to the suggestion that these appearances might have been some kind of subjective vision, Ladd follows W. Milligan in replying that the vision theory is inconsistent with the mental states of the disciples, that such visions could not have been witnessed by more than five hundred persons at once, and that they would not be likely to extend over a period of forty days and then cease (ibid.; cf. W. Milligan, The Resurrection of Our Lord, 1894⁴, 81–114; and W. Pannenberg, Jesus – God and Man, 1968, 85 ff.).

G. W. H. Lampe has argued that the empty tomb should not be taken literally (in G. W. H. Lampe and D. M. MacKinnon, The Resurrection: A Dialogue Arising from Broadcasts, 1966, 58 ff.). As a historian, he thinks that it rests on inferior evidence, and, as a theologian, he feels that Christ's resurrection should be of the same kind as that of other believers, whose bodies die and are decayed. Over against this view may be set that of N. Clark that, "the Empty Tomb stands as the massive sign that the eschatological deed of God is not outside this world of time and space or in despair of it, but has laid hold on it, penetrated deep into it, shattered it, and begun its transformation" (Interpreting the Resurrection, 1967, 98; cf. W. Künneth, The Theology of the Resurrection, 1965, 97). Moreover, the tradition of the empty tomb is not a late accretion designed to combat docetism. A number of scholars hold that Paul's mention that "he was buried [etaphē]" (1 Cor. 15:4) implies Paul's knowledge of the empty tomb (K. Bornhäuser, Die Gebeine der Toten, 1921, 9–37; W. Künneth, op. cit., 94; C. F. D. Moule, The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ, 7 f.; cf. also J. A. T. Robinson, IDB III 45 f.; and The Human Face of God, 1973, 127–41). In reply to the suggestion that a Jew of those times would in any case have thought of a continuity of identity between the earthly body and the risen one and thus would have assumed the emptiness of the tomb, C. F. D. Moule points out that “the story in its essentials is very far indeed from conforming to the presuppositions of Jewish apocalyptic. Jewish apocalyptic did not believe in a permanent raising from death until the End, which was still in the future” (op. cit., 8). Before that, all that the Pharisaic Jew could believe in was temporary restoration to this life (as in the raisings by Elijah and Elisha and of Lazarus and Jairus’s daughter) or to immaterial forms (as in 1 Sam. 28:12 ff.; Job 4:16; Mk. 6:49). In addition, Moule thinks that the failure to produce the body of Jesus should not be too readily dismissed and that the fact that women were the principal witnesses argues in favour of credibility, as women were notoriously invalid witnesses according to Jewish principles of evidence (op. cit., 9).

To Moule, belief in the empty tomb does not imply that the body of Jesus was exactly the same in its risen state. Rather, he suggests that the evidence implies transformation in a way comparable with the resurrection of believers. Admittedly their bodies die and decompose. “But is it conceivable that the total matter of this time-space existence is destined by the Creator not to be ‘scrapped’ but to be used up into some other existence? This, it might be said, would imply a doctrine of creation, not ex nihilo in nihil (out of nothing into nothing), but ex nihilo in aliquid novi (out of nothing into something new); and the latter is certainly congruous with the idea of a God who never creates without a purpose. If so, is it inconceivable that in just the area of the body of Jesus, which alone had been surrendered to death in total absolute obedience to the will of God, this transformation and using up was anticipated; while with the rest of mankind their ‘material’ returns to the collective reservoir of the totality of matter one way or another, by decomposition slow or sudden, until this new totality of things is ultimately used as the material of a new existence, in which they, by the grace of God, will share?” (op. cit., 10). For further elaboration of Moule’s position see “St Paul and Dualism: The Pauline Conception of Resurrection”, NTS 12, 1965–66, 106–23; and Moule and D. Cupitt, “The Resurrection: A Disagreement”, Theology 75, 1972, 507–19. Moule’s view may also be compared with that of G. E. Ladd discussed below under (h).

(h) A conservative NT scholar who has examined the historicity of the data is G. E. Ladd in I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975. His investigation is carried out against the background of a study of resurrection belief in the OT and in Judaism. Ladd draws attention to the curious fact that the NT writers never appealed to Isa. 53:10 f. (“He shall see his offspring, he shall prolong his days; the will of the LORD shall prosper in his hand; he shall see the fruit of the travail of his soul and be satisfied”) to support the resurrection of Jesus (op. cit., 67). Indeed, the disciples were not prepared for either the death or the resurrection of Jesus. “When Jesus began to teach that as the Son of Man his mission was to suffer and die (Mt. 8:31), the disciples were sure something was wrong. The Son of Man by definition was a heavenly super-human being who would come to earth with power and glory to transform the present order and reign in God’s glorious Kingdom. But a suffering and dying Son of Man – such a thing was unheard of. It was in fact a contradiction in terms. The Son of Man was to conquer and reign, not to die” (op. cit., 71). The only dying messiah in Jewish literature is in 2 Esd. 7, and there his death has no saving power. Hence, the disciples were slow to realize how Jesus was fulfilling the rôle of messiah, because their expectations and those of contemporary Judaism were different.

Turning to the evidence of the Gospels, Ladd is willing to say that they were first written some thirty to forty years after the events that they describe, and that each evangelist selected and to some degree shaped his material to suit his theological and ecclesiastical interests (op. cit., 74). He regards Mk. as the earliest Gospel written c. A.D. 65 in Rome by Mark the attendant of Peter (op. cit., 75; cf. Papias in Eusebius, HE 3, 39, 15). Ladd rightly rejects the longer ending of Mk. (16:9–19) as not original (op. cit., 83; cf. on this subject W. R. Farmer, The Last Twelve Verses of Mark, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 25, 1974).

Ladd himself thinks that the ending of Mk. has been lost. Nevertheless, it would not be true to say that there is no evidence for the resurrection of Jesus in Mk. Jesus foretold his resurrection after Peter's confession of him as messiah at Caesarea Philippi (Mk. 8:31 par. Matt. 16:21; Lk. 9:22), at his transfiguration (Mk. 9:9 par. Matt. 17:9), and at his second prediction of his passion (Mk. 9:31 par. Matt. 17:23). On Easter morning Mk. relates that when the women came to the tomb, a young man announced to them, "Do not be amazed; you seek Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified. He has risen, he is not here; see the place where they laid him. But go, tell his disciples and Peter that he is going before you to Galilee; there you will see him, as he told you." And they went out and fled from the tomb; for trembling and astonishment had come upon them; and they said nothing to any one, for they were afraid" (Mk. 16:6 ff.).

Ladd points out that, whilst (in his view) Matt. and Lk. both made use of Mk. they largely go their separate ways in their resurrection narratives. "All this means that at the points in which the gospels agree, that agreement is all the more striking" (op. cit., 84). The following table is based on that given by Ladd (op. cit., 80 ff.). Agreements are shown in ordinary print; points of difference are in italics.

Matt. 28:1–20	Mk. 16:1–8	Lk. 26:1–53	Jn. 20:1–21:25
1. toward the dawn of first day	when Sabbath was past	on the first day of the week	on the first day of the week
2. women	women	women	women
3. Mary Magdalene, the other Mary	Mary Magdalene Mary, mother of Salome	Mary Magdalene Mary, mother of James; Joanna	Mary Magdalene (alone)
4. to see the tomb	to anoint Jesus' body	taking spices	no reason given (Nicodemus anoints the body, 19:39)
5. an earthquake an angel rolled the stone	they found the stone rolled away	they found the stone rolled back	found the stone taken away
6. an angel	a young man	two men	two angels (20:12)
7. the guards fall like dead men
8.	the women enter the empty tomb	they did not find the body

9.	“He has risen, as he said”	“He has risen, he is not here”	“Why do you seek the living among the dead?”
10.	“Go, tell his disciples”	“Go, tell his disciples and Peter ”
11.	“He is going before you to Galilee; there you will see him.”	“He is going before you to Galilee; there you will see him.”
12.	They departed quickly with fear and joy	They fled trembling and astonished	They returned from the tomb	Mary runs to tell Peter and the other disciple
13.	They ran to tell his disciples	They said nothing to anyone; they afraid	They told all this to the eleven and all the rest. They do not believe
14.	Jesus meets the two women
15.				Peter and John enter the empty tomb; Peter believes (21:3–10)
16.				Jesus appears to Mary (21:11–17)
17.				Mary tells the disciples
18.			appearance to two disciples near Emmaus
19.			an appearance to the eleven in Jerusalem (24:36–49)	an appearance to the disciples (20:19–23)
20.				a second appearance to the eleven, including Thomas (20:21–29)
21.				an appearance in Tiberias (21:1–23)
22.	the great commission in Galilee
23.			the ascension from Bethany

In many instances the disagreements are negligible, and are capable of being resolved without any great stretch of the imagination, bearing in mind the various standpoints of the writers and their sources of information. Thus the action of the women in coming to the sealed tomb two nights and a day after the death of Jesus may be less improbable than it appears, if we remember with C. E. B. Cranfield that "love often prompts people to do what from a practical view is useless" (The Gospel according to Saint Mark, 1959, 464). According to Jn. 19:40, the body was wrapped in strips of linen (othonia); according to the Synoptics it was wrapped in a linen shroud (sindōn) (Mk. 15:46 ff. par.). Possibly the body was wrapped in the shroud and then the strips were wound around it (op. cit., 85). Whereas the Synoptics mention several women, Jn. mentions only Mary Magdalene. Nevertheless, she used the plur. when she said, "They have taken the Lord out of the tomb, and we do not know where they have laid him" (Jn. 20:2). Whereas Mk. and Matt. focus attention on Galilee as the scene of the appearances, Lk. relates them only in or near Jerusalem. But Lk.'s interest may be explained in the light of his overall purpose of showing how the church has spread to the very heart of the Roman empire, being rejected by Israel both in Jerusalem and Rome, but finding response among the Gentiles. Thus Acts closes with an account of Paul's effective ministry in Rome. "Luke is not interested in writing a complete history nor does he have any particular interest in Galilee. He is interested in the movement from Jerusalem to Rome, and in connection with this interest, he relates only appearances in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Undoubtedly the command to the disciples not to leave Jerusalem (Acts 1:4) was given after the disciples had returned from Galilee to Jerusalem" (op. cit., 87 f.).

In contrast with Campenhausen who, on the basis of Lk., holds that "Peter seems to have understood the empty tomb as a pledge that the resurrection had occurred and to have influenced the others accordingly" (op. cit., 85), Ladd insists that "The empty tomb did not and does not arouse faith in the resurrection of Jesus" (op. cit., 89; cf. Mk. 16:8; Lk. 24:11, 21). The fact that the women were primary witnesses bears, moreover, the mark of verisimilitude especially in view of the attitude to women in Judaism. "If the faith of the community had entered significantly into the substance of the resurrection stories, we should have expected the primary witnesses to have been apostles instead of women" (op. cit., 90). Ladd, in common with C. H. Dodd and C. F. D. Moule, insists that we do not have to choose between Galilee and Jerusalem as the locale of the appearances, but that there are solid grounds for accepting both (ibid.; cf. C. H. Dodd, The Founder of Christianity, 1970, 163–72; C. F. D. Moule, "The Ascension – Acts i. 9", ExpT 68, 1956–57, 207).

Ladd concludes: "The Gospels agree in certain important points which we may take as being historically credible. 1. Jesus was dead and buried. 2. The disciples were not prepared for his death; they were overcome with confusion. 3. The tomb was found on Easter morning to be empty. 4. The empty tomb was not itself a proof of the resurrection. Mary thought the body had been stolen. 5. The disciples encountered certain experiences which they took to be appearances of Jesus risen from the dead. In the last analysis, it does not really matter where or to whom these appearances occurred. 6. We must include another important historical fact. Contemporary Judaism had no concept of a dying and rising Messiah. 7. Another historical fact: the disciples proclaimed the resurrection of Jesus in Jerusalem, near where he had been buried" (op. cit., 93; cf. 91 ff. for an outline harmonization of the Gospel accounts).

So far nothing has been said about the nature of the resurrection body of Jesus.

But the Gospels contain certain indications that the authors did not think of it merely as the resuscitation of a corpse. The description of the position of the grave clothes in Jn. 20:7 f. leads Ladd to say with S. H. Hooke that, "It seems to be the evangelist's intention to suggest that Peter saw the grave clothes lying like a chrysalis out of which the risen body of the Lord had emerged" (op. cit., 94; cf. S. H. Hooke, The Resurrection of Christ, 1967, 79). The account in Lk. 24 of the encounter on the Emmaus road and the breaking of bread afterwards "says two things: the person of Jesus was capable of being recognised by those who had known him in his earthly ministry; and yet he was capable of sudden, inexplicable disappearance" (op. cit., 97). The subsequent appearances in Lk. 24:34–40 suggest a "material" body, but one which had properties different from that of the body of Jesus in his earthly ministry. This may be compared with Jn. 20:19, 26. "He possessed a real body, but also powers never before heard of – of being able to appear and disappear at will to the human physical senses" (op. cit., 99). All this is far removed from the extravagances of the description of the actual resurrection in the Gospel of Peter, but it is compatible with Paul's concept of a "spiritual body" (1 Cor. 15:44). To Ladd the resurrection "was an event that was observed by no one, an event caused by God – indeed, an event in which the world of God intersected the world of time and space . . . All that the historian as such can say is that something marvellous has happened here. Only those who have reason to believe in the God to whom the Bible witnesses can accept the witness of the gospels, viz., that God raised Jesus from the dead" (op. cit., 101 f.).

Turning to Paul, Ladd maintains that the account in 1 Cor. 15:3–8 embodies traditions independent of the Gospels (op. cit., 105). The appearance to Cephas, whose person was highly esteemed at Corinth (1 Cor. 1:12), is mentioned in the Synoptics only at Lk. 24:34. The appearance to the "twelve" could be that to the eleven in Lk. 24:36–49 or an appearance in Jn. 20. That to the five hundred is not mentioned in the Gospels, but could have occurred in Galilee. Nothing is known of the appearance to James. The scriptures which Paul had in mind may have been passages like Ps. 16 (cf. Acts 2:26 f.) and Ps. 110, Hos. 6:2, Jon. 2 interpreted christologically, finding a transcended fulfilment in the resurrection of Jesus. Ladd thinks that the appearance to Paul himself was not simply a vision (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4; 2 Cor. 12:1) but a face-to-face encounter with the risen, exalted Christ. Commenting on 1 Cor. 15:23 ("But each in his own order; Christ the first fruits, then at his coming those who belong to Christ"), he writes: "the resurrection body of Jesus was of the same order as the resurrection bodies of the saints at the end of the age" (op. cit., 123; cf. Phil. 3:21). As against Pannenberg, Ladd does not think that Paul derived his concept of a spiritual body from Syr. Bar. 50–51, for the differences are too great to establish dependence (op. cit., 124; cf. W. Pannenberg, "The Revelation of God in Jesus" in J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb, eds., Theology as History, 1967, 115). Rather, "it was Paul's familiarity with the theology of glory, and his experience of meeting Jesus in his glorified state, that led Paul to his theology of glorified bodies in the eschatological resurrection" (op. cit., 125).

There is a sense in which "the resurrection of Jesus was his exaltation. At his resurrection he entered the invisible world of God. His appearances to his disciples did not mean the passing of one body through other solid substances; it means that Jesus, who was with them but invisible, made himself visible to their physical senses"

(op. cit., 127). Support for this view of the exaltation of Jesus is found in Acts 2:32 f.; 5:30 f.; Col. 3:1; Phil. 2:8 f.; Heb. 1:3 (cf. 1:13; 8:1; 10:12; 12:2 which all refer to the exaltation, whereas only Heb. 13:20 refers to the resurrection as such). Only Luke-Acts emphasizes the ascension as an event separate from the resurrection. Ladd sees Lk.'s account as signalling the end of the resurrection appearances (op. cit., 128).

(i) G. E. Ladd's reflections on the resurrection body of Jesus bring us to the point where we may consider the views of a number of theologians on the theological significance of the resurrection of Jesus. And in so doing this final section on the resurrection of Jesus forms a bridge to the second part of this survey which will deal with the resurrection of men in general.

For the Barth of the early part of the Church Dogmatics the resurrection meant the breaking in of "fulfilled time", the time of "the pure presence of God" (CD I, 2, 115). For in the period of the forty days between the resurrection and the ascension God encountered the church in Christ in a direct and unique way. Eternity broke into time in this event of revelation in a way which transcended the successive momentariness of our time which is either "not yet" in the case of the future or "no longer" in the case of the past. "But the Easter story (with, if you like, the story of the transfiguration and the story of the conversion of Saul as prologue and epilogue respectively) actually speaks of a present without any future, of an eternal presence of God in time. So it does not speak eschatologically. The Easter story, Christ truly, corporeally risen, and as such appearing to His disciples, talking with them, acting in their midst – this is, of course, the recollection upon which all the New Testament recollections hang, to which they are all related, for the sake of which there is a New Testament recollection at all" (CD I, 2, 114). For Barth the resurrection of Jesus cannot be proved. It can be recollected, proclaimed and received in faith. This is because it belongs to the transcendent dimension of God and can be known only in revelation. Nevertheless, it took place in history.

In the theology of the later volumes of the Church Dogmatics the resurrection of Jesus not only has a revelatory significance. It belongs to the basis of the universal covenant with all mankind by which, according to Barth, God has united man to himself in virtue of the union of the divine and human natures in Jesus Christ. Thus no man can ever be considered as an independent subject. "In virtue of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ – whether he knows it and believes it or not – it is simply not true that he belongs to himself and is left to himself, that he is thrown back on himself. He belongs to the Head, Jesus Christ, of whose body he is or is to become a member, the Lord of the Church who is also the Lord of the cosmos, and therefore the Lord of those who so far do not believe in him, or do so no longer. He exists because Jesus Christ exists. He exists as a predicate of this Subject, i.e. that which has been decided and is real for man in this Subject is true for him" (CD II, 2, 539; for critical discussion of Barth's position see C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 1967, 64 ff., 129 ff.).

In The Easter Jesus (1973) G. O'Collins seeks to understand the resurrection in the light of history, belief and theology. The theological value of the resurrection is the way in which it transforms our concrete and material existence, revealing Christ's continued and effective presence in the church. In Lk. and Jn. it is combined with a realism which insists on the physical reality of what is revealed, the other-worldly and transformed identity of the risen Christ with the earthly Jesus. While the resurrection transcends history it is not supra-historical. It anticipates the end and purpose of history, but also leaves evidential traces within history. Thus, although O'Collins regards the empty tomb as "an ambiguous episode" (op. cit., 44), he lays great store by the probability of the narratives. The appearances were objective in the sense that "The encounters produced the disciples' faith and not vice versa" (op. cit., 34). But for us today the evangelists provide "an amalgam of believing witness and historical reminiscence with the aim of eliciting and developing the faith of their readers" (op. cit., 77).

In Resurrection and the New Testament, SBT Second Series 12, 1970, C. F. Evans studies the idea of resurrection and the several NT traditions. His form-critical analysis leads him to see a great fragmentation within the NT. Hence, what matters is not to believe in the historical accuracy of the stories but the central proclamation that they enshrine. The resurrection signifies that God has made Jesus Lord and messiah of Israel (Rom. 1:4; Acts 2:36; 3:13 ff.). "If, then, resurrection is the principal source of faith in the lordship and messiahship of Jesus, it follows that resurrection is also the source of the existence of the church, and its knowledge of itself as the community of the risen Lord and Messiah, the community of the last days" (op. cit., 149). However, for Evans the cause of the resurrection faith of the early church remains obscure: "Whatever the Easter event was, it must be supposed to be of such a kind as to be responsible for the production of these traditions as its deposit at whatever remove" (op. cit., 130). In its rudimentary form "Resurrection is the divine reversal of the Cross as life is opposite to death" (op. cit., 132; cf. Acts 2:23 f.). But in another sense Jesus' messianic lordship is established by God in the church which is the continuing sphere of Christ's presence. "From this point of view the resurrection body of Jesus is simply the church" (op. cit., 150). There is also for Paul the present resurrection life of the Spirit. "While the expectation of the parousia remained with Paul all his life, and so determined his thought on resurrection, the realization of what was involved in being here and now 'in Christ' or 'with Christ' served to unhook some of the links which tied resurrection to apocalyptic expectation, and to allow it to play a more creative role of its own" (op. cit., 163). For further discussion of Paul's eschatological teaching → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c).

According to Rom. 1:3 f., Jesus is "God's Son, who was descended from David according to the flesh and designated Son of God in power according to the Spirit of holiness by his resurrection from the dead, Jesus Christ our Lord [tou horisthentos hyiou theou en dynamei kata pneuma hagiosynes ex anastaseos nekron lesou Christou tou kyriou hēmōn]." On the interpretation of these verses see M. E. Boismard, "Constitué Fils de Dieu", RB 60, 1953, 51–7; E. Schweizer, "Röm. 1, 3 f. und der Gegensatz von Fleisch und Geist vor und bei Paulus", EvTh 15, 1955, 563–71; A. J. B. Higgins, "The Old Testament and Some Aspects of New Testament Christology", Canadian Journal of Theology 6, 1960, 200–10; L. C. Allen, "The Old Testament Background of (pro)horizein in the New Testament", NTS 17, 1970–71, 104–8; E. Linnemann, "Tradition und Interpretation in Röm. 1, 3 f.", EvTh 31, 1971, 164–71; and C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, I, 1975, ICC, 57–65. Paul is probably making use of existing confessional formulae. There is no other reference to Christ's Davidic descent in Pauline literature apart from 2 Tim. 2:8.

However, the reference to Jesus' Jewish origin in terms of → David fits the theme of Romans which is to expound the nature and identity of the people of God in the light of Christ and the new situation this has created for Jew and Gentile. Cranfield thinks that horizō here means to appoint, constitute or install. No clear example of the meaning "declare" or "show to be" has been found contemporary with the NT. The patristic interpretation along the latter lines (e.g. Chrysostom 397) may be due to doctrinal considerations. The passage does not teach a form of adoptionism. Cranfield sees the meaning of the opening words of v. 4 as "who was appointed Son-of-God-in-power" (that is, in contrast with His being Son of God in apparent weakness and poverty in the period of His earthly existence)" (op. cit., 62). The resurrection which is here attributed to the → Spirit thus inaugurates a new era in which Christ is exalted (cf. G. E. Ladd's view under (h) above; → Lord; → Son).

G. Kegel's Auferstehung Jesu – Auferstehung der Toten. Eine traditions-geschichtliche Untersuchung zum Neuen Testament (1970) sees the resurrection faith initially articulated in terms of Jewish apocalyptic in Lk.-Acts but issuing in a specifically Christian world-view of the general resurrection and future hope. He asks, however, what happens when the apocalyptic thought world is questioned (op. cit., 121). Like Marxsen, to whom he is much indebted, the appearances are the primary data recoverable by historical research. The "resurrection of Jesus" represents a conclusion from these appearances cast in apocalyptic terms. It was motivated by apologetic concerns which in the last analysis represent a confession of God (op. cit., 12–25). Kegel's work thus raises the question of hermeneutics.

In similar vein X. Léon-Dufour is also concerned with interpretation in Resurrection and the Message of Easter (1974). The work examines (1) the conceptual categories which underlie the earliest expressions of Easter faith (resurrection, exaltation, appearance); (2) the literary genre of the stories of encounter with the risen Jesus; (3) the various theological and christological perspectives in the narratives; and (4) the focal point of interpretation and pastoral communication. The task for today is not to attempt to bring faith and science into line but to mediate and translate different language systems. God's action occurs in the "silence of God" and is accessible only in its consequences.

In Dieu l'a Ressuscité Exégèse et Théologie Biblique (1973) B. Rigaux examines the ideational background of resurrection faith, i.e. not only the conceptual categories in which it is expressed but the psychological content of the various images. This he finds not only in pre-Christian Judaism but in the preaching of Jesus himself. Jesus believed in a resurrection involving a transformation of life rather than its mere restoration. The resurrection brought about a new perspective in which the revelation of God as the God of Israel is transformed: "The act of God in the resurrection of Jesus comprises an essential and unique characteristic conferring on it an unprecedented and definitive function in God's relationship with humanity. First of all, it places Jesus at the term of the interventions of the mystery of revelation; secondly, it constitutes a living relation between God and the Church instituted by the risen Messiah" (op. cit., 321).

The views of R. E. Brown in The Virginal Conception & Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (1973) are of interest in that they represent the thought of a leading contemporary American Roman Catholic scholar who is thoroughly versed in historical and literary criticism. After a review of the biblical data in the light of contemporary scholarship Brown concludes that "The resurrection of Jesus, along with his exaltation and his giving of the Spirit, constituted an eschatological event – the beginning of the end-time" (op. cit., 125). Our everyday language of "seeing" and "speaking" is that of analogy. No one knows when the resurrection took place, and no one can describe it. But it is wrong to think of it as not being historical, "for, while the risen Jesus stood outside the bounds of space and time, by his appearances he touched the lives of men who were in space and time, men who were in history. The interaction of the eschatological and the historical should not be lost sight of" (op. cit., 126). If there had been a body of Jesus in the tomb, it would be "difficult, if not impossible, to understand how the disciples could have preached that God raised Jesus from the dead, since there would have been irrefutable evidence that He had not done so" (ibid.). The tradition of the empty tomb is old, but it does not provide the basis of faith, for "Christians believe in Jesus, not in a tomb" (op. cit., 127). But in turn this affected the formation of the narratives. There was a real continuity between the earthly Jesus and the risen Christ. Whilst it is right to speak of the bodily resurrection of Jesus, we must think of that body in terms of a resurrection body. "Jesus' risen body was no longer a body as we know bodies, bound by the dimensions of space and time. It is best to follow Paul's description of risen bodies as spiritual, not natural or physical (psychikos . . .); he can even imply that these bodies are no longer flesh and blood" (op. cit., 128; cf. 1 Cor. 15:50). The fact that Jesus' body was not corrupted has important theological implications: "It was the sovereign action of God glorifying Jesus of Nazareth. Only because God has done this for His Son are new possibilities opened for His many children who have come to believe in what He has done" (op. cit., 128). "If Jesus' body corrupted in the tomb so that his victory over death did not involve bodily resurrection, then the model of destruction and new creation is indicated. If Jesus rose bodily from the dead, then the Christian model should be one of transformation" (op. cit., 129).

Finally we may note the significance of the resurrection in the theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg (cf. Jesus – God and Man, 1968; Basic Questions in Theology, I–III, 1973; Theology and the Philosophy of Science, 1976; "Did Jesus Really Rise from the Dead?", Dialog 4, 1965, 128–35; W. Pannenberg, ed., Revelation as History, 1969; J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb, eds., Theology as History, New Frontiers in Theology III, 1967; A. D. Galloway, Wolfhart Pannenberg, 1973; E. F. Tupper, The Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg, 1974; and D. Fuller, Easter Faith and History, 1968, 177–87; → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1 (f)). As against the theologies of revelation through the Word, Pannenberg stresses revelation in history. It is only at the end of history that God will be fully revealed. Nevertheless, the resurrection of Jesus anticipates this final revelation. "The resurrection of Jesus supports our attempt at a new interpretation of the concept of revelation. It depends on the one hand on the fact that the raising up of Jesus implies a confirmation by God himself of his pre-Easter appearance and that the pre-Easter Jesus remained dependent on this confirmation, so that no position in regard to the pre-Easter Jesus and his message can be justified without regard to the cross and resurrection. On the other hand, the proper meaning of the resurrection depends from the beginning on its connection with the apocalyptic expectation: for only in relation to this connection is the resurrection already the inauguration of the expected end, which for the remainder of mankind is still to come. And this eschatological character of the resurrection of Jesus as anticipation in Jesus of the end-event, for our outline, is the foundation of its original meaning as revelation of God, since – and here again we can argue only in terms of the history of the transmission – in the apocalyptic understanding of history the revelation of God’s glory (and therefore of God himself) was expected in connection with the end-event of the raising of the dead and the judgment” (Revelation as History, 193). The “fate of Jesus” is “the anticipation of the end of all history” (op. cit., 134; cf. Basic Questions in Theology, I, 24).

This view of Jesus posits treating the resurrection of Jesus as an event in history, and Pannenberg does just this (cf. Jesus – God and Man, 53–114). But apart from the particular historical arguments in favour of the resurrection, Pannenberg has also defended the methodology of treating the resurrection as a historical event. In contrast with Ernst Troeltsch’s view of analogy, which insists that we cannot accept anything in the past as historical unless it bears analogies with the events that we know in the present, Pannenberg insists that analogy must not be used to pre-empt the question of historicity. The positivistic historian would reject accounts of the resurrection on the grounds that he has no experiences of resurrection in the modern world. But Pannenberg insists that analogy can only enable us to discern events of a similar kind. It cannot prejudice the historicity of events that are dissimilar. In the case of the resurrection it is the raising of Jesus which provides the decisive context for understanding and interpreting all subsequent history and not vice versa (Basic Questions in Theology, I, 44 ff.; cf. C. Brown “History and the Believer”, in C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith, 1976, 171 ff.).

2. The Resurrection of Men in General. The following survey is particularly indebted to the article by M. J. Harris, “Resurrection and Immortality: Eight Theses”, Themelios 1, 1976, 50–55. It takes up the eight theses put forward by Harris and draws on the literature noted by him.

(a) The NT speaks of immortality, but this concept clearly does not mean endless, personal survival through the avoidance of physical death. Rather, it involves participation in the eternal life of God and therefore immunity from eternal death. Admittedly, the terms which are rendered “immortality” suggest by their etymology immunity from death (athanasia; 1 Cor. 15:53 f.; 1 Tim. 6:16) and decay (aphtharsia; Rom. 2:7; 1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53 f.; Eph. 6:24; 2 Tim. 1:10). But in the context of the NT, Harris urges that they should be defined qualitatively as well as quantitatively. The concept of immortality involves sharing in the nature of God (2 Pet. 1:4) and enjoying fellowship with Christ (Lk. 23:43; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23). Comparison of 2 Cor. 5:4 with 1 Cor. 15:53 f. indicates that “life” and “eternal life” are equivalents for “immortality” (op. cit., 50; cf. R. W. Thomas, “The Meaning of the Terms ‘Life’ and ‘Death’ in the Fourth Gospel and in Paul”, SJT 21, 1968, 199–212, especially 204). The terms are juxtaposed in Rom. 2:7 (“to those who by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honour and immortality, he [God] will give eternal life”) and 2 Tim. 1:10 (“Christ Jesus, who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel”). Harris concludes: “The Christian is destined to gain an immunity to that principle of decay and deterioration which characterizes humanity in Adam, through sharing the endless life of God” (op. cit., 50 f.).

(b) “In the distinctive New Testament usage, resurrection signifies not the reanimation of corpses but the transformation of the whole person into the image of Christ by the power of the indwelling Spirit, in spite of the intervention of death” (op.

cit., 51). The Gk. pagan of the 1st cent. would probably have understood hē anastasis tōn nekron as “the standing up of corpses” (Acts 17:23a), whereas others in the tradition of Judaism may have had some idea of the new body as a permanent home of the soul which had been preserved intact in the heavenly treasuries since the time of death (cf. P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde, 1934, 117–21, 249–55). The NT contains examples of restoration to life in the raising of Lazarus (Jn. 11:1–44) and the widow of Nain’s son (Lk. 7:11–17), but these were only temporary. They were quite different from the resurrection of Christ who was never to die again (Acts 13:34; Rom. 6:9) and is always exalted at the right hand of God (Rom. 8:34).

The NT does not actually refer to “the resurrection of the body” or “the resurrection of the flesh” but only to “the resurrection of the dead” or “resurrection from the dead”. “The subjects of resurrection are whole persons, who are transformed outwardly and inwardly in what may be called an acceleration of the process of Christification (see Rom. 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:49; 2 Cor. 3:18; Col. 3:10)” (op. cit., 51; on the credal formularies cf. W. Bieder, “Auferstehung des Fleisches oder des Leibes? Eine biblisch-theologische und dogmengeschichtliche Studie” ThZ 1, 1945, 105–20; J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body, 1964, 220–27; J. G. Davies, “Factors leading to the Emergence of Belief in the Resurrection of the Flesh”, JTS New Series 23, 1972, 448–55; R. M. Grant, “The Resurrection of the Body”, JR 28, 1948, 120–30, 188–208; J. Gnlika, “Contemporary Understanding of ‘the Resurrection of the Body’”, in P. Benoit and R. Murphy, eds., Immortality and Resurrection, 1970, 129–41). Even the phrase “resurrection in the body” is not without difficulty (C. R. Bowen, The Resurrection in the New Testament, 1911, 76). In view of the NT understanding of → body, Harris suggests that the phrase “resurrection of the person” is least open to objection (ibid.; cf. P. H. Menoud, Le Sort des Trépassés, 1966², 60 f.).

A number of passages retain the primitive language of “coming to life again” (cf. Jn. 5:21a) or emergence from the tomb (cf. Jn. 5:28 f.). There is a resurrection which leads to → judgment and not life (Jn. 5:29; Acts 24:15; cf. Matt. 25:46; Lk. 11:32; Dan. 12:2; 2 Esd. 7:32–8), a reanimation of “the rest of the dead” that leads to “the second death” (Rev. 20:4 ff., 11–15).

Harris believes that in the Pauline epistles resurrection is a privilege reserved for the new humanity in Christ (op. cit., 52; cf. J. Héring, “Saint Paul a-t-il enseigné deux résurrections?”, RHPR 12, 1932, 308 f.; and J. Jeremias, “‘Flesh and Blood cannot Inherit the Kingdom of God’ (1 Cor. xv. 50)”, NTS 2, 1955–56, 155, who holds that Paul distinguishes between hoi nekroi, deceased Christians, and the anarthrous nekroi, the dead in general; but against this J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Philippians, 1894⁴, 151). In any case, whatever the state of the wicked dead, they do not possess spiritual bodies, since the sōma pneumatikon (1 Cor. 15:44, 46) is imperishable (1 Cor. 15:42, 50).

The resurrection of Christ or the resurrected Christ forms the prototype and pattern for the resurrection of believers. Aquinas believed that his resurrection caused that of believers (Summa Theologiae 3, Q. 56; cf. M. E. Dahl, The Resurrection of the Body, SBT 36, 1962, 49 f.). But this goes beyond the explicit teaching of the NT which speaks of Christ as the firstfruits (aparchè) of those who have fallen asleep (1 Cor. 15:20, 23; Col. 1:18; Rev. 1:5; → Sacrifice). The term suggests both priority in time (cf. Acts 26:23) and superiority in status, in that his resurrection forms the first and most significant part of the series. Moreover, this concept implies a pledge that Christians will have a share in the full ingathering of the harvest (2 Cor. 1:22; 3:18; 5:4 f.; → Seed, Harvest).

(c) "Only with the death and resurrection of Christ did the ideas of resurrection and immortality emerge from the Old Testament shadows into the full light of the New Testament day (cf. 2 Tim. 1:10)" (op. cit., 52). OT teaching has been reviewed above under anastasis. But there are grounds for maintaining a Jewish doctrine of immortality distinct from the idea of resurrection and the Gk. idea of the soul which was widespread in the period 200 B.C. to A.D. 100 (cf. H. C. C. Cavallin, Life After Death. Paul's Argument for the Resurrection of the Dead in 1 Corinthians 15. Part I: An Enquiry into the Jewish Background, 1974, 200). However, it was the resurrection of Jesus which first gave any tangible grounds for the hope of an after-life.

(d) Immortality is not a present possession of all men but a future acquisition of Christians. According to 1 Cor. 15:42, 52 ff., it is only after the resurrection transformation that believers "put on" the garment of immortality (op. cit., 53; cf. M. J. Harris, "Paul's View of Death in 2 Corinthians 5:1-10", in R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney, eds., New Dimensions in New Testament Study, 317-28). In Paul's thought it is not immortality but death that is inherited from → Adam (Rom. 5:12; 1 Cor. 15:22; cf. C. K. Barrett, "Immortality and Resurrection", London Quarterly and Holborn Review 190, 1965, 97, 101). "Man is not immortal because he possesses or is a soul. He becomes immortal because God transforms him by raising him from the dead" (Harris, op. cit., 53). Sharing the divine nature is a future experience reserved for those who belong to Christ (1 Cor. 15:23, 54 f.; 2 Pet. 1:4).

Man may be said to possess a → "soul" already but this is not necessarily immortal in the Gk. sense. Matt. 10:28 teaches not the potential immortality of the soul but the irreversibility of divine judgment on the unrepentant. Similarly Rev. 20:6, 14 and 21:8 counter the idea of immunity from death with that of the "second death". The NT sees man essentially as a unity and promises the transformation of the whole person, and not just the survival of a part.

But to speak of immortality as a future acquisition and the resurrection as a future event is not to deny that man may proleptically enjoy eternal life now (cf. Rom. 8:2, 11). The transformation is something which begins now, because of the Spirit of life which dwells within the believer.

In the last analysis only God has immortality (1 Tim. 6:15 f.; cf. Jn. 5:26; Rom. 1:23; 1 Thess. 1:9). Whatever man has, he must receive as a gift from God alone. He has nothing intrinsic to himself as of right.

(e) "Just as resurrection is an act of God, so immortality is a gift of God" (op. cit., 54). The agent of resurrection is generally said to be the Father (Jn. 5:21; Acts 26:8; Rom. 4:17; 8:11; 1 Cor. 6:14; 2 Cor. 1:9; 4:14b; Heb. 11:19) but on occasion the Son (Jn. 6:39, 40, 44, 54). In raising Jesus, God was active by the Spirit of holiness (Rom. 1:4).

Denial of the resurrection stems not from ignorance of man's constitution but from ignorance of God, his word and his power (Mk. 12:24; 1 Cor. 15:12, 34).

(f) In Pauline thought, resurrection and immortality are inseparable and complementary ideas (op. cit., 54). In 1 Cor. 15 the two ideas are clearly juxtaposed. In the light of vv. 42, 50-54 it is clear that there can be no immortality without prior resurrection. Those at Corinth who denied the resurrection (v. 12) may have been enlightened rationalists who advocated the immortality of the soul, claiming that the resurrection of the body was inconceivable and unnecessary. But Harris prefers to think of them as “over-realized eschatologists” who asserted that the only resurrection – the spiritual one – lay in the past having been accomplished at baptism (ibid., cf. 1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Tim. 2:17 f.). Against this view Paul insists on the futurity of the resurrection and the reality of the resurrection body. Resurrection and immortality are in fact complementary notions; neither can be had without the other. Those who were raised by Christ in his earthly ministry had to die, as these raisings did not confer immortality. But once raised, believers will bear permanently the image of the man from heaven (Rom. 8:29; 1 Cor. 15:49; 1 Jn. 3:2).

(g) All believers will be transformed, but not all will be resurrected (ibid.). This is due to the fact that some will still be alive at the parousia. But they too, like the dead, will be transformed (1 Thess. 4:15; 1 Cor. 15:51). The dead in Christ will be both raised and transformed (1 Cor. 15:42, 52).

(h) “The identity between ‘the physical body’ and the ‘spiritual body’ is not substantial but personal” (op. cit., 55). According to 1 Cor. 15:53, “this corruptible body must put on incorruption”. “It is sown a physical body, it is raised a spiritual body” (1 Cor. 15:44). No mortal can inherit immortality (1 Cor. 15:50, 53). “Substantial or numerical identity between the successive forms of the Christian’s embodiment seems excluded by the dual concept of a ‘spiritual body’ not yet possessed (2 Cor. 5:1) and the indispensability of change before such possession (1 Cor. 15:50)” (ibid.). Nevertheless, there is a continuity of personal identity (cf. 1 Cor. 15:49). There are two dwellings but one occupant. Although Matt. 22:29 implies that the resurrection body has no procreative powers, it does not mean that the distinction between the sexes will be obliterated.

The above discussion has focused on the concept of the resurrection body. For other eschatological concepts → Heaven, → Hell, → Judgment, → Punishment, → Number, art. chilias (for the millennium), → Present (for views of the parousia and eschatology).

C. Brown

- (a). J. T. Addison, Life Beyond Death in the Beliefs of Mankind, 1933; J. Alsop, The Post-Resurrection Appearance Stories of the Gospel Tradition, 1976; J. Baillie, And the Life Everlasting, 1934; K. Barth, The Resurrection of the Dead, 1933; CD (see indexes); M. Barth and V. H. Fletcher, Acquittal by Resurrection, 1964; H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, I–II combined volume, 1972; G. R. Beasley-Murray, Christ is Alive, 1947; F. W. Beare, “Sayings of the Risen Jesus in the Gospel Tradition: An Inquiry into their Origin and Significance”, in W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr, eds., Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, 1967, 161–82; F. S. M. Bennet, The Resurrection of the Dead, 1929; P. Benoit, The Passion and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, 1969; P. Benoit and R. Murphy, eds., Immortality and Resurrection, 1970; A. Bertholet, “The pre-Christian Belief in the Resurrection of the Body”, American Journal of Theology 20, 1916, 1 ff.; H. Birkeland, “The Belief in the Resurrection of the Dead in the Old Testament”, Studia Theologica 3, 1950, 60–78; E. L. Bode, The Gospel Account of the Women’s Visit to the Tomb of Jesus, 1969; G. Bornkamm, “The Risen Lord and the Earthly Jesus: Matthew 28. 16–20”, in J. M. Robinson, ed., The Future of our Religious Past; Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, 1971, 203–29; C. R. Bowen, The Resurrection in the New Testament, 1911; S. G. F. Brandon, Man and his Destiny in the Great Religions, 1962; and The Judgment of the Dead: A Comparative Study of the Idea of a Post-Mortem Judgment in the Major Religions, 1962; C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 1967; Jesus in European Protestant Theology, 1778–1860: A Study of Trends in Theological Method, I–II, (Dissertation, Bristol) 1969; and C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith: Four Exploratory Studies, 1976; R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception & Bodily Resurrection of Jesus, 1973; R. Bultmann, “New Testament and Mythology”, in H. W. Bartsch, ed., op. cit., 1–44; and Jesus Christ and Mythology, 1960; J. Burnet, “The Socratic Doctrine of the Soul”, Proceedings of the British Academy 7, 1915, 235–60; C. F. Burney, Israel's Hope of Immortality, 1909; H. von Campenhausen, “The Events of Easter and the Empty Tomb”, in Tradition and Life in the Early Church: Essays and Lectures in Church History, 1968, 42–89; H. C. C. Cavallin, Life After Death. Paul's Argument for the Resurrection of the Dead in I Corinthians 15. Part I: An Enquiry into the Jewish Background, 1974; R. H. Charles, A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism and in Christianity, 1913²; N. Clark, Interpreting the Resurrection, 1967; J. Comblin, The Resurrection in the Plan of Salvation, 1966; Concilium 10, 6, 1970, the whole issue is devoted to Immortality and Resurrection; H. Conzelmann, “On the Analysis of the Confessional Formula in I Cor. 15.3–5”, Interpretation 20, 1966, 15–25; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, I, 1975, ICC; O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? The Witness of the New Testament, 1958; D. H. van Daalen, The Real Resurrection, 1972; M. E. Dahl, The Resurrection of the Body: A Study of I Corinthians 15, SBT 36, 1962; J. G. Davies, “Factors Leading to the Emergence of Belief in the Resurrection of the Flesh”, JTS New Series 23, 1972, 448–55; J. D. Davis, “The Future Life During the Pre-Persian Period”, Protestant Theological Review 6, 1908, 246–68; G. Dellling, “The Significance of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ”, in C. F. D. Moule, ed., op. cit., 77–104; C. H. Dodd, “The Appearances of the Risen Christ: An Essay in Form-Criticism in the Gospels”, in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, 1957, 9–35; J. W. Drane, “Some Ideas of Resurrection in the New Testament Period”, TB 24, 1973, 99–110; F. X. Durwell, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, 1960; C. M. Edsman, “The Body and Eternal Life”, Mélanges J. Pedersen I, 1946, 33 ff.; C. F. Evans, Resurrection and the New Testament, SBT Second Series 12, 1970; L. R. Farnell, Greek Hero Cults and Ideas of Immortality, 1921; F. Foulkes, “Some Aspects of St. Paul's Treatment of the Resurrection of Christ in I Corinthians XV”, Australasian Biblical Review 16, 1968, 15–30; J. G. Frazer, The Fear of the Dead in Primitive Religion, 1933; D. P. Fuller, Easter Faith and History, 1968; R. H. Fuller, The Formation of the Resurrection Narratives, 1972; M. Gaster, Samaritan Eschatology, 1932; T. H. Gaster, “Resurrection. The Raising of the Dead”, IDB IV 39–43; H. -G. Geyer, “The Resurrection of Jesus Christ: A Survey of the Debate in Present Day Theology”, in C. F. D. Moule, ed., op. cit., 105–36; J. Gnlika, “Resurrection of the Body”, in P. Benoit and R. Murphy, eds., op. cit., 129–41; R. M. Grant, “The Resurrection of the Body”, JR 28, 1948, 120–30; 188–208; D. W. A. Gregg, A Comparison of the New Testament Teaching about Post-Mortem Existence, Concerning particularly the Fate of the “Wicked Dead”, with the Jewish Beliefs, (Dissertation, Bristol) 1968; E. M. B. Green, Man Alive!, 1967; S. Greenleaf, The Testimony of the Evangelists Examined by the Rules of Evidence Administered in the Courts of Justice, (1874) 1965; R. H. Gundry, SOMA in Biblical Theology with Emphasis on Pauline Anthropology, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 29, 1976, 159–83; M. J. Harris, “Paul's View of Death in 2 Corinthians 5:1–10”, in R. N. Longenecker and M. C. Tenney, eds., New Dimensions in New Testament Study, 1974, 317–28; and “Resurrection and Immortality: Eight Theses”, Themelios 1, 1976, 50–55; G. Hebert, “The Resurrection-Narrative in St Mark's Gospel”, SJT 15, 1962, 66–73 (reprinted with alterations from The Australasian Biblical Review 8, 1959); J. Hick, Death and Eternal Life, 1976; S. H. Hooke, The Resurrection of Christ as Experience and History, 1967; W. Jaeger, “The Greek Ideas of Immortality”, in K. Stendahl, ed., Immortality and Resurrection, 1965, 97–114; J. Jeremias, “‘Flesh and Blood Cannot Inherit the Kingdom of God’ (I Cor. xv. 50)”, NTS 2, 1955–56, 151–59; A. R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel, 1949; E. Jünger, Death: The Riddle and Mystery, 1975; J. Kennedy, The Resurrection of Jesus Christ, 1882; J. Knox, The Death of Jesus, 1958, 175–82; W. Künneth, The Theology of the Resurrection, 1965; M. Kwiran, The Resurrection of the Dead: Exegesis of I Cor. 15 in German Protestant Thought from F. C. Baur to W. Künneth, Theologische Dissertationen 8, 1972; G. E. Ladd, I Believe in the Resurrection of Jesus, 1975; S. Laeuchli, “Monism and Dualism in the Pauline Anthropology”, Biblical Research 3, 1958, 15–27; K. Lake, The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, 1907; G. W. H. Lampe and D. M. MacKinnon, The Resurrection: A Dialogue Arising from Broadcasts, 1966; H. Latham, The Risen Master, 1901; R. B. Laurin, “The Question of Immortality in the Qumran ‘Hodayot’”, JSS 3, 1958, 344–55; A. R. C. Leaney, “Recent Studies on the Resurrection of Jesus”, in R. H. Preston, ed., Theology and Change: Essays in Memory of Alan Richardson, 1975, 5–67; X. Léon-Dufour, Resurrection and the Message of Easter, 1974; J. Mánek, “The Apostle Paul and the Empty Tomb”, NovT 2, 1957, 276–80; I. H. Marshall, “The Resurrection of Jesus in Luke”, TB 24, 1973, 55–98; J. P. Martin, “History and Eschatology in the Lazarus Narrative, John 11.1–44”, SJT 17, 1964, 332–43; R.

Martin-Achard, From Death to Life: A Study of the Development of the Doctrine of the Resurrection in the Old Testament, 1960; W. Marxsen, "The Resurrection of Jesus as a Historical and Theological Problem", in C. F. D. Moule, ed., op. cit., 15–50; and The Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, 1970; J. Moltmann, "God and Resurrection: Resurrection Faith in the Forum of the Question of Theodicy", in Hope and Planning, 1971, 31–55; and The Crucified God, 1974; F. Morrison, Who Moved the Stone? 1930; C. F. D. Moule, "The Post-Resurrection Appearances in the Light of Festival Pilgrimages", NTS 4, 1957–58, 58–61; "St Paul and Dualism: The Pauline Conception of Resurrection", NTS 12, 1965–66, 106–23; C. F. D. Moule, ed., The Significance of the Message of the Resurrection for Faith in Jesus Christ, SBT Second Series 8, 1968; C. F. D. Moule and D. Cupitt, "The Resurrection: A Disagreement", Theology 75, 1972, 507–19; H. C. G. Moule, Jesus and the Resurrection: Expository Studies on St John XX, XXI, 1905⁴; G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Resurrection, Immortality and Eternal Life in Intertestamental Judaism, 1972; R. R. Niebuhr, Resurrection and Historical Reason: A Study of Theological Method, 1957; M. P. Nilsson, "The Immortality of the Soul in Greek Religion", Eranos 39, 1941, 1–16; and A History of Greek Religion, 1925; G. O'Collins, "Aquinas and Christ's Resurrection", Theological Studies 31, 1970, 512–22; review of Marxsen, op. cit., Heythrop Journal 12, 1971, 207–11; "Karl Barth on Christ's Resurrection", SJT 26, 1973, 85–99; and The Easter Jesus, 1973; A. Oepke, an-, exanhistiēmi etc., TDNT I 368–72; and egeirō etc., TDNT II 333–39; J. Orr, The Resurrection of Jesus, 1908; E. H. Pagels, "The Mystery of the Resurrection: A Gnostic Reading of 1 Corinthians 15", JBL 93, 1974, 276–88; D. W. Palmer, "The Resurrection of Jesus and the Mission of the Church", in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 205–23; and "To Die is Gain" (Philippians 1:21)", NovT 17, 1975, 203–18; W. Pannenberg, Jesus – God and Man, 1968; Basic Questions in Theology, I–III, 1973; "Did Jesus Really Rise from the Dead?", Dialog 4, 1965, 128–35; W. Pannenberg, ed., Revelation as History, 1969; L. B. Paton, Spiritism and the Cult of the Dead in Antiquity, 1921; J. D. C. Pavry, The Zoroastrian Doctrine of a Future Life, 1929; J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–II, 1926, III–IV, 1940; and "Wisdom and Immortality", VT Supplements 3, 1955, 238–46; M. L. Peel, The Epistle to Rheginos: A Valentinian Letter on the Resurrection, 1969, revised Ger. edition, 1974; and "Resurrection, The Treatise on", IDB Supplementary Volume 741 f.; N. Perrin, The Resurrection Narratives: A New Approach, 1977; A. M. Perry, The Resurrection of Man, 1976; C. V. Pilcher, The Hereafter in Jewish and Christian Thought, 1940; K. Rahner, "The Resurrection of the Body", in Theological Interpretation, II, 1963; 203–16; K. Rahner, W. Bulst, J. Schmid, J. Schmitt, and J. Ratzinger, "Resurrection", Sacramentum Mundi V 323–42; A. M. Ramsey, The Resurrection of Christ, 1945; and "What Was the Ascension?", in M. C. Perry, ed., Historicity and Chronology in the New Testament, SPCK Theological Collections 6, 1965; 135–44; I. Reist, "The Old Testament Basis for the Resurrection", EQ 43, 1971, 6–24; A. Richardson, History – Sacred and Profane, Bampton Lectures for 1962, 1964; and "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ", Theology 74, 1971, 146–54; H. Riesenfeld, "Paul's 'Grain of Wheat' Analogy and the Argument of 1 Corinthians 15", in The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 171–86; H. H. Rix, "Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Body, or What?" Reformed Theological Review 17, 1958, 73–82; J. A. T. Robinson, "Resurrection in the NT", IDB IV 43–53; and The Human Face of God, 1973, 127–41; E. Rohde, Psyche: The Cult of Souls and Belief in Immortality among the Greeks, I–II, 1966; H. H. Rowley, "Death and Beyond", in The Faith of Israel: Aspects of Old Testament Thought, 1956, 150–76; D. T. Rowlingson, "The Moral Context of the Resurrection Faith", in B. Lindars and S. S. Smalley, eds., Christ and Spirit in the New Testament. In Honour of Charles Francis Digby Moule, 1973, 415–25; E. W. Saunders, "Resurrection in the NT", IDB Supplementary Volume 739 ff.; J. A. Schep, The Nature of the Resurrection Body, 1964; O. Schilling, "Resurrection", EBT II 754–64; J. N. Schofield, Archaeology and the Afterlife, 1951; J. M. Shaw, "Resurrection of Christ", DAC II, 329–67; R. J. Sider, "The Pauline Conception of the Resurrection Body in I Corinthians xv. 35–54", NTS 21, 1974–75, 428–39; W. J. Sparrow Simpson, Our Lord's Resurrection, 1905; and The Resurrection and Modern Thought, 1911; E. Smick, "The Bearing of New Philological Data on the Subjects of Resurrection and Immortality in the Old Testament", WTJ 31, 1968–69, 12–21; P. Gardner Smith, The Narratives of the Resurrection: A Critical Study, 1926; N. Snaith, "Justice and Immortality", SJT 17, 1964, 309–24; W. D. Stacey, "St Paul and the 'Soul'", ExpT 66, 1954–55, 274–77; G. Stählin, "On the Third Day", Interpretation 10, 1956, 282–99; D. M. Stanley, Christ's Resurrection in Pauline Soteriology, Analecta Biblica 13, 1961; K. Stendahl, ed., Immortality and Resurrection, 1965; E. L. Sukenik, "Arrangements for the Cult of the Dead in Ugarit and Samaria", Mémorial Lagrange, 1940, 59 ff.; E. F. Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, 1946; L. Swain, "The Resurrection in the Old Testament. Eternal Life in the Old Testament", Clergy Review 51, 1966, 949–54; ibid. 52, 1967, 104–9; H. B. Swete, The Appearances of Our Lord after the Passion: A Study of the Earliest Christian Tradition, 1907; R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ. A Study in Pauline Theology, BZ NW 34, 1967; R. W. Thomas, “The Meaning of the Terms ‘Life’ and ‘Death’ in the Fourth Gospel and in Paul”, SJT 21, 1968, 199–212; R. C. Ware, “The Resurrection of Jesus, I: Theological Orientations”, The Heythrop Journal 16, 1975, 22–35; “The Resurrection of Jesus, II: Historical-Critical Studies”, ibid., 174–94; T. F. Torrance, Space, Time and Resurrection, 1977; D. Wenham, “The Resurrection Narratives in Matthew’s Gospel”, TB 24, 1973, 21–54; B. F. Westcott, The Gospel of the Resurrection: Thoughts on its Relation to Reason and History, 1898²; U. Wilckens, “The Tradition-history of the Resurrection of Jesus”, in C. F. D. Moule, ed., op. cit., 51–76; H. A. Williams, Jesus and the Resurrection, 1951; and True Resurrection, 1972; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974; R. C. Zaehner, The Teaching of the Magi: A Compendium of Zoroastrian Beliefs, (1956) 1975, 139–50.

(b). S. K. Aboa, Die Entstehung der Auferstehungshoffnung im Alten Testament, (Dissertation, Hamburg) 1967; A. Albrecht, Tod und Unsterblichkeit in der evangelischen Theologie der Gegenwart, 1946; A. Albert, Die israelitisch-jüdische Auferstehungshoffnung in ihren Beziehungen zum Parsismus, 1910; B. J. Alfrink, “L’Idée de Résurrection d’après Daniel 12, 1–2”, RB 40, 1959, 355–71; P. Althaus, Die Wahrheit des christlichen Osterglaubens, 1940; and Die letzten Dinge, 1949⁵; L. Aubert, La Vie après la Mort chez les Israélites, 1902; W. W. von Baudissin, “Adonis und Esmun”. Eine Untersuchung zur Geschichte des Glaubens an Auferstehungsgötter und Heilgötter, 1911; and “Alttestamentliches hajjim in der Bedeutung von Glück”, Festschrift E. Sachau, 1915, 143–61; W. Baumgartner, “Der Auferstehungsglaube im Alten Orient”, Zeitschrift für Missionskunde und Religionswissenschaft 48, 1933, 193–214; P. Benoit, “Marie-Madeleine et les Disciples au Tombeau selon Jean 20, 1–18”, in W. Eltester, ed., Judentum, Urchristentum und Kirche, Festschrift J. Jeremias, 1960, 141–52; W. Bieder, “Auferstehung des Fleisches oder des Leibes? Eine biblisch-theologische und dogmengeschichtliche Studie”, ThZ 1, 1945, 105–20; A. Bertholet, Die israelitischen Vorstellungen vom Zustand nach dem Tode, 1914²; and “Zur Frage des Verhältnisses vom persischen und jüdischen Auferstehungsglauben”, in Festschrift F. C. Andreas, 1916, 51–62; E. Böckl, Die Verwandtschaft der jüdisch-christlichen mit der parsischen Eschatologie, 1902; M. E. Boismard, “Constitué Fils de Dieu”, RB 60, 1953, 51–7; K. Bornhäuser, Die Gebeine der Toten, 1921; E. Brandenburg, “Die Auferstehung der Glaubenden als historisches und theologisches Problem”, WuD 9, 1967, 16–33; H. Bückers, Die Unsterblichkeitslehre des Weisheitsbuches, 1938; J. Carmignac, “Les Apparitions de Jésus et le Calendrier biblico-quémranien”, Revue de Qumrân 7:4 (28), 1971, 483–504; A. Causse, Der Ursprung von der jüdischen Lehre von der Auferstehung, 1908; H. Clavier, “Brèves Remarques sur la Notion de soma pneumatikon”, in W. D. Davies and D. Daube, eds., The Background of the New Testament and its Eschatology. In Honour of Charles Harold Dodd, 1956, 342–62; Y. Congar, “Le Purgatoire”, in Le Mystère de la Mort et sa Célébration, 1951, 279 ff.; F. Delekat, “Tod, Auferstehung, ewiges Leben”, EvTh 21, 1961, 1 ff.; A. Descamps, “La Structure des Récits Evangéliques de la Résurrection”, Biblica 40, 1959, 726–41; E. P. Dhorme, “Séjour des Morts chez les Babyloniens et chez les Hébreux”, RB 4, 1908, 59–78; “L’Idée de l’au-delà dans la Religion Hébraïque”, RHR 123, 1941, 113–42; E. Ebeling, Leben und Tod nach den Vorstellungen der Babylonier, 1931; H. M. Féret, “La Mort dans la Tradition Biblique”, in Le Mystère de la Mort et sa Célébration, 1951, 15 ff.; J.-B. Frey, Tod, Seelenglaube und Seelenkult im alten Israel, 1898; and “La Vie de l’au-delà dans les Conceptions Juives au Temps de Jésus-Christ”, Biblica 13, 1932, 129–68; G. Friedrich, “Auferstehung Christi”, EKL I 240 ff.; A. Geense, Auferstehung und Offenbarung. Über den Ort der Auferstehung Jesu Christi in der heutigen deutschen evangelischen Theologie, Forschungen zur systematischen und ökumenischen Theologie 27, 1971; M. Goguel, La Foi à la Résurrection de Jésus dans le Christianisme Primitif, 1933; H. Gollwitzer, Jesu Tod und Auferstehung nach dem Bericht des Lukas, 1951; H. Grass, Ostergeschehen und Osterberichte, 1964³; P. Grelot, “L’Historien devant la Résurrection du Christ”, Revue d’Histoire de la Spiritualité 48, 1972, 221–50; G. Greschake, Auferstehung der Toten. Ein Beitrag zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion über die Zukunft der Geschichte, 1969; H. Gressmann, Tod und Auferstehung des Osiris, Der alte Orient 23, 3, 1923; J. Guillet, “Les Sources Scripturaires de la Foi en la Résurrection de la Chair”, Bible et Vie Chrétienne, 1953, 40–56; J. Halévy, La Croissance à l’Immortalité de l’Ame, Mélanges de Critique et d’Histoire, 1883; J. Héring, “Saint Paul a-t-il enseigné deux Résurrections?”, Revue d’Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses 12, 1932, 300–20; A. Jeremias, Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode, Der alte Orient, 1887; and Hölle und Paradies bei den Babyloniern, Der alte Orient, 1903²; H. Kees, Totenglaube und Jenseitsvorstellungen der alten Aegypten, 1926; G. Kegel, Auferstehung Jesu – Auferstehung der Toten.

Eine traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Neuen Testament, 1970; F. König, Zarathustras Jenseitsvorstellung und das Alte Testament, 1964; B. Klappert, Die Auferweckung des Gekreuzigten. Der Ansatz der Christologie Karl Barths im Zusammenhang der Christologie der Gegenwart, 1971; and B. Klappert, ed., Diskussion um Kreuz und Auferstehung. Zur gegenwärtigen Auseinandersetzung in Theologie und Gemeinde, 1968³; J. Kremer, Das älteste Zeugnis von der Auferstehung Christi, Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 17, 1966; and "Die Überlieferung vom leeren Grab", . . . Denn Sie Werden Leben, 1972, 72 ff.; P. L. Landsberg, Essai sur l'Expérience de la Mort, 1951; G. Larcher, "La Doctrine de la Résurrection dans l'Ancien Testament", Lumen Vitae 3, 1952, 11–34; G. van der Leeuw, Unsterblichkeit oder Auferstehung?, TheEH Neue Folge 52, 1956; K. Lehmann, Auferweckt am dritten Tag nach der Schrift, 1968; J. Lippert, Der Seelenkult in seinen Beziehungen zur althebräischen Religion, 1881; A. Lods, La Croyance à la Vie future et le Culte des Morts dans l'Antiquité Israélite, 1906; Le Culte des Ancêtres dans l'Antiquité Hébraïque et ses Rapports avec l'Organisation familiale et sociale des anciens Sémites, 1906; "De quelques Récits de Voyages au Pays des Morts", Comptes rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, 1940, 434–52; and "Notes sur deux Croyances Hébraïques relatives à la Mort et à ce qui la suit: le Sort des Incirconcis dans l'au-delà et la Victoire sur le Léviathan", ibid., 1943, 271–97; E. Lohmeyer, "Die Idee des Martyriums im Judentum und Urchristentum", ZStH 5, 1927, 232 ff.; E. Lohse, Die Auferstehung Jesu Christi im Zeugnis des Lukasevangeliums, 1961; R. Mehl, Notre Vie et notre Mort, 1953; P. Menoud, Le Sort des Trépassés, Cahiers Théologiques 9, 1945; W. Michaelis, Die Erscheinungen des Auferstandenen, 1944; J. Monnier, La Descente aux Enfers, 1905; E. Morin, L'Homme et la Mort dans l'Histoire, 1951; F. Mussner, ZOE. Die Anschauung vom Leben im Vierten Evangelium, 1956; and Die Auferstehung Jesu, Biblische Handbibliothek 7, 1969; W. Nauck, "Die Bedeutung des leeren Grabes für den Glauben an den Auferstandenen", ZNW 47, 1956, 243 ff.; A. T. Nikolainen, Der Auferstehungsglaube in der Bibel und ihrer Umwelt, I–II, 1944–46; F. Nötscher, "Das Angesicht Gottes schauen" nach biblischer und babylonischer Auffassung, 1924; and Altorientalischer und alttestamentlicher Auferstehungsglauben, 1926; A. Oepke, "Wie entsteht nach den Schriften des Neuen Testaments der Glaube an die Auferstehung Jesu?", Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Karl Marx-Universität Leipzig, Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 3, 1953–54, 109 ff.; A. Parrot, Le "Refrigerium" dans l'au-delà, 1938; and Malédiction et Violations des Tombes, 1939; J. van der Ploeg, "L'Immortalité de l'Homme d'après les Textes de la Mer Morte", VT 2, 1952, 171–75; G. Quell, Die Auffassung des Todes in Israel, 1925; K. H. Rengstorf, Die Auferstehung Jesu, 1960⁴; B. Rigaux, Dieu l'a Ressuscité. Exégèse et Théologie Biblique, 1973; L. Rost, "Alttestamentliche Wurzeln der ersten Auferstehung", In Memoriam E. Lohmeyer, 1951, 67 ff.; J. Scheffelowitz, "Der Seelen- und Unsterblichkeitsglaube im Alten Testament", Archiv für Religionswissenschaft, 1916, 210 ff.; and Die altpersische Religion und das Judentum, 1920; L. Schenke, Auferstehungsverkündigung und leeres Grab, Stuttgarter Bibelstudien 33, 1968; O. Schilling, Der Jenseitsgedanke im Alten Testament, 1951; J. Schmidt, Der Ewigkeitsbegriff im Alten Testament, Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen, 1940; F. Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode nach den Vorstellungen des alten Israel und des Judentums einschliesslich des Volksglaubens im Zeitalter Christi, 1892; H. Schwantes, Schöpfung und Endzeit. Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis der Auferweckung bei Paulus, 1963; E. Sellin, "Die alttestamentliche Hoffnung auf Auferstehung und ewiges Leben", Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 30, 1919, 232 ff.; P. Siber, Mit Christus Leben. Eine Studie zur paulinischen Auferstehungshoffnung, 1971; N. Söderblom, La Vie Future d'après le Mazdéisme. Etude d'Eschatologie Comparée, 1901; G. Stemberger, Der Leib der Auferstehung, 1972; P. de Sury, ed., La Résurrection du Christ et l'Exégèse Moderne, 1969; H. Thielicke, Tod und Leben. Studien zur christlichen Anthropologie, 1946; J. Touzard, "Le développement de la Doctrine de l'Immortalité dans l'Ancien Testament", RB 7, 1898, 207–41; P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde, 1934; G. Wied, Der Auferstehungsglaube im späten Israel in seiner Bedeutung für das Verständnis von Apokalyptik und Weisheit, (Dissertation, Bonn) 1965; U. Wilckens, Auferstehung, 1970.

Revelation

Revelation in Christian theology expresses the significant self-disclosure of God to man. The Gk. language possesses various terms and expressions relevant to this process. apokalyptō, a compound word formed from kalyptō (→ hide, conceal) and apo (from), carries with it the idea of unveiling something previously hidden. dēloō, derived from dēlos, clear, manifest, calls more attention to the goal, i.e. that as a result something becomes known and manifest. epiphaneia, from the root -phan- (cf. phainomai, appear; phaneroō, let be seen; → Light art. phainō), suggests a visual appearance, a manifestation of deity. Other relevant concepts include gnōrizō, make known (→ knowledge, art. ginōskō); horama, an apparition (something seen) and optasia, a vision (→ See). Also → Hear, → Scripture, → Secret, → Teach, → Truth, → Word.

ἀποκαλύπτω ἀποκαλύπτω (apokalyptō), uncover, disclose, reveal;

ἀποκάλυψις (apokalypsis), disclosure, revelation.

CL 1. The vb. apokalyptō, unveil, formed from kalyptō, cover up, conceal, and apo, from, is attested in cl. Gk. from Hdt. onwards to denote the disclosure of previously hidden things; the noun apokalypsis, disclosure, revelation, is, however, only used from the 1st cent. B.C. onwards, and then predominantly in a religious sense.

2. The religious and theological use of both words is rare in the Greek-Hellenistic world. They occur sporadically in the Corp. Herm. (13, 1; in the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D.), in the neo-Platonist Iamblichus (3rd cent. A.D.) and in later astrological and alchemical texts. Other words were preferred to designate divine revelations and manifestations. For the pronouncement of the Delphic oracle, for example, sēmainō, (indicate, explain, command: from sēma, a sign or mark) was used (cf. A. Oepke, TDNT III 566). In Hellenistic times the words → epiphaneia, an appearance, a becoming visible, and → parousia, presence (→ Present), signify that a hidden divinity has become visibly perceptible (cf. Arndt, 304, 635). It is instructive that the same expressions also play a rôle in the divine worship accorded to rulers. In the mystical Hermetic literature gnōsis, → knowledge, becomes the revelation (A. Oepke, TDNT III 569 f.). Clearly there is no question here of revelation in the NT sense of the word; the two concepts are quite distinct. God has indeed not left himself without a witness among the heathen (Acts 14:17); but even if they had the ability to recognize an invisible power and godhead from the works of God, they have perverted this knowledge through perverting faith in God into worship of idols (Rom. 1:18–23). If there is a reality behind heathen idol-worship, it is the reality of demonic powers (1 Cor. 10:20).

OT 1. Corresponding with its late appearance, the noun apokalypsis is found in the LXX only in 1 Sam. 20:30 for erwâh, nakedness, and a further 3 times without Heb. equivalent in Sir. (11:27; 22:22; 42:1). The vb. apokalyptō (found c. 80 times) almost without exception represents forms of the Heb. vb. gālâh, in particular the niphâl, to strip, and piel, expose, uncover. Thus it is used literally in Gen. 8:13 of removing the roof of the ark; in Num. 5:18 of the uncovering of the head, although this probably referred originally (as in the legal prescriptions of Lev. 18:6 ff. and 20:11 ff.) to the exposure of the otherwise covered sex-organs for the purpose of sexual union. The goal of the uncovering is thus not distant observation, but entrance to the most intense form of encounter which can involve the individual person. This picture was most notably taken up by Ezek. in order to characterize Israel's guilty and corrupt state (Ezek. 13:14; 16:36 f., 57: 21:29[24]; 22:10; 23:10, 18, 29).

In a figurative but still everyday use, apokalyptō means to reveal, to make known. It is used of human speech in Jos. 2:20; 1 Sam. 20:2, 13; 22:8, 17; and of human plans in 1 Macc. 7:31. The noun apokalypsis is used in Sir. 22:22 and 42:1 (?) in a secular sense for the revelation or publication of secrets. Perhaps there is theological significance in Sir. 11:27; at the end of a man's life stands "the revelation of his works". Here the thought could be of God's → judgment.

2. On the whole, apokalyptō is found relatively rarely in the LXX with a theological significance. The secular use is dominant. It occurs in the story of Balaam's prophetic experience in Num. 22:31 and 24:4, 16. God opened the prophet's inner eye and presented him with a true view of reality which, of course, did not accord with the wishes of Balak who wanted him to curse Israel. God gave him knowledge of the Most High, so that he could hear and speak his word. In a time when revelations were rare, God revealed himself to Samuel who previously did not know him (1 Sam. 3:1, 7); Samuel's prophetic authority is grounded in a series of further revelations (3:21). The account of Samuel's call (1 Sam. 3:1–4:1) has been seen to imply that not only were revelatory words from Yahweh rare, but that they were at that time received by men in visions (cf. Isa. 1:1; 2:1; Amos 1:1; Ezek. 1:1; Obad. 1). But in other instances of the writing prophets there are no explicit references to visions (cf. Jer. 1:1; Hos. 1:1; Zeph. 1:1; Zech. 1:1; Mal. 1:1). Samuel was evidently fully awake and not in an ecstatic state (1 Sam. 3:9 ff.; J. Mauchline, 1 and 2 Samuel, New Century Bible, 1971, 56; → Prophet; → See; → Word). 1 Sam. 9:15 and 2 Sam. 7:27 refer to the opening of the ear. In this way Samuel and David are able to hear God's instructions and promises. "Open my eyes, that I may behold the wonders in your Law" prays the Psalmist (Ps. 119[118]:18). To the prophets, his servants, God reveals his divine paideia, his secret counsel (Heb. sōd) (Amos 3:7). In Theodotion's translation of Dan., the disclosure of the mysteries of God is rendered by apokalyptō, whereas the LXX uses anakalyptō, ekphainō and dēloō (Dan. 2:27–30, 47).

God's revelation mediates knowledge of God, his decrees and secrets, a knowledge which, in the last analysis, is inexhaustible: "The root of wisdom, to whom was it revealed?" (Sir. 1:6). Along with the mediation of knowledge goes the revelation of God's deeds. 1 Sam. 2:27 looks back to the revelation of God's deeds in → Egypt at the time of Israel's slavery. Isa. 52:10 and 53:1 speak of the revelation of the "arm" of God, i.e. of his power. In Isa. 56:1 God reveals his compassion and in Ps. 98(97):2 f. his → righteousness and his salvation, which the ends of the earth will see. The language of the LXX gives a clear picture of God's revealing activity under the old covenant.

3. For Judaism at the time of Jesus the content of divine revelation is drawn up and set down in the → Scripture (art. graphē). This is also called "the Law and the Prophets" (cf. Matt. 5:17, 12, etc.), by virtue of its contents of which the most important part is the → law of → Moses, the Torah. Prophecy, however, is extinct. "The prophets have gone to sleep" (Syr. Bar. 85:3; cf. e.g. 1 Macc. 4:46; 9:27; 14:41). Consequently the use of the word-group apokalyptō is rare in Judaism apart from the LXX (cf. TDNT III 578). There were the ideas that the messiah would give a new exposition of the law and that he would give a new Torah (SB III 577). The Dead Sea Scrolls, however, and in particular the Hymns Scroll, show that at the turn of the era there were Jewish circles with a continuing and living consciousness of prophetic revelation and illumination (e.g. 1QH 1:21; 5:9; 6:4; cf. O. Betz, Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte, 1960).

In this connexion, apocalyptic literature describes how God had entrusted holy men of antiquity with revelations of the last things, the coming of the messiah and his → kingdom, the → resurrection of the dead, the → judgment, and so on. Determinative for such apocalyptic thought is the contrast between the two worlds, the present age and the age to come (cf. e.g. Gal. 1:14; → Time, art. aiōn). Linked with assertions concerning the future are all manner of portrayals of the heavenly world, speculations about the constellations and the course of history. It is also a typical apocalyptic motif (→ art. dēloō, οἶ) for an angel to appear as a mediator of revelation. Apocalyptic also penetrated into early Christianity. As well as the Revelation to John there were other Christian-apocalyptic works which, however, were not accepted in the NT Canon. These include the Apocalypse of Peter and the Shepherd of Hermas. Jewish writings such as 3 Esd. were revised. It is also worth mentioning that the author of Rev. does not conceal his authorship behind the name of some man of antiquity but gives his own name.

NT 1. Numerically, the word-group is not very common in the NT (the vb. 26 times, and the noun 18 times). It is entirely lacking in a range of writings – Mk., Acts, Col., 1 Thess., the Pastoral Epistles, the Catholic Epistles (except 1 Pet.). In Jn.'s Gospel the vb. is found only in a quotation from Isa. 53:1 in Jn. 12:38, explaining unbelief of the Jews. Otherwise phaneroō is used for the act of revelation (Jn. 1:31; 2:11; 3:21; 7:4; 9:3; 17:6; 21:1, 14; cf. 1 Jn. 1:2; 2:19, 28; 3:2, 5, 8; 4:9). In Rev. the noun is found only in the title (1:1). Hence, we can assert at the start that the words are used predominantly by Paul (13 times each for verb and noun), 1 Pet. (perhaps dependent on Paul; the noun and vb. 3 times each), Matt. (4 times) and Lk. (6 times).

The noun always has theological significance; the vb. is found in Lk. 2:35 in an everyday sense, of thoughts being revealed. On the borderline of secular usage is the aphorism in Matt. 10:26 (par. Lk. 12:2): nothing is covered that will not be revealed (ho ouk apokalyphthēsetai; → Hide, art. kryptō NT 1). This dominical word is also transmitted in Mk. 4:22 (par. Lk. 8:17); but instead of apokalyphthēsetai there stands hina phanerōthē/phaneron genēsetai. If apokalyptō refers to the removal of a covering, then phaneroō, used in context with phōs/phainō, has the basic meaning of bringing into the → light, making visible. In the NT the meaning of both words is virtually interchangeable, so that, as with the synonymous dēloō, to make known, any attempt at precise conceptual distinction only leads to artificial demarcations (cf. Rom. 1:17; 3:21; 1 Sam. 3:21 LXX; 1 Pet. 1:12). By contrast with the LXX, the prevailing significance of the vb. in the NT is also the religious and theological one.

2. A theological understanding of the NT revelation is in the first instance orientated around the content, and only secondarily around the act and event of the revelation. Nevertheless, the latter must also be considered.

The OT statements (Num. 22:31, 1 Sam. 9:15 etc.; see above OT 2) make it plain that revelation is a divinely-effected opening of the eyes and ears. The NT is no different. Corresponding with the eyes there is a becoming visible, an appearance of God or Christ (2 Tim. 1:10; Tit. 2:11; 3:4). Corresponding with the opening of the ears there is a speaking by God (Heb. 1:1 f.). God's revelation must become perceptible in the earthly world. In accordance with this, the apostles preach what they have heard and seen, and have even touched with their hands (Acts 4:20; 1 Jn. 1:1). The content of this seeing is Jesus Christ, the Word become flesh (ho logos sarx egeneto), the Word of Life (tou logou tēs zōēs) (Jn. 1:14; 1 Jn. 1:1). The disciples are called blessed, because they have been allowed to hear and see what was denied to many prophets and righteous men who longed for it, and what the angels themselves long to see (Matt. 13:16 par. Lk. 10:23 f.; 1 Pet. 1:12). To → hear and → see in this way, and in faith to perceive the glory of God (Jn. 11:40), is distinguished from the hearing and seeing of disbelief, which in truth is no hearing or seeing at all (Isa. 6:9 f. is cited 6 times in the NT: Matt. 13:13 ff., par. Mk. 4:12, Lk. 8:10; Jn. 12:39 ff.; Acts 28:26 f.; Rom. 11:8).

The knowledge of a new revelation of God surpassing the previous one is the characteristic of the attitude of faith of NT Christians. The earlier revelation given to the prophets is a pointer to Christ and the → gospel (Rom. 1:2; 1 Pet. 1:11 f.). Now, when unbelieving Jews read the OT, a veil lies over their → hearts which can only be removed when they are converted to Christ (2 Cor. 3:14 ff.; → Hide, art. kalypō NT 3).

3. (a) In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is the bearer of divine revelation. Simeon's words describe him as a phōs eis apokalypsin ethnōn, a light for revelation to the nations (Lk. 2:32; cf. Isa. 42:6). Jesus further confronts us as Revealer in the words of Matt. 11:25 ff. (par. Lk. 10:21 f.), where he praises the Father and Lord of the world for giving his revelation not to the wise and understanding, but to babes. It was not the → scribes or the → Pharisees, versed in the law, nor was it the High → Priests and spiritual leaders, but the → "poor in spirit", the fishermen from Galilee, who became his disciples. "All things have been delivered to me by my Father; and no one knows the Son except the Father, and no one knows the Father except the Son and any one to whom the Son chooses to reveal him" (Matt. 11:27; cf. par. Lk. 10:22). Knowledge of God through the old covenant has been surpassed; it can be regarded as only the first step towards the knowledge which the revelation of Jesus mediates. The authenticity of this logion has frequently been denied, but it fits into the picture which the Evangelists have painted of Jesus without any difficulty. Everywhere we meet the divine authority and consciousness of having been sent (Mk. 1:22, 27) which is expressed in Matt. 11:25 ff. On the authenticity of the saying see A. M. Hunter, "Cruz Criticorum – Matt. xi. 25–30 – A Re-appraisal", NTS 8, 1961–62, 241–49; I. H. Marshall, "The Divine Sonship of Jesus (Did Jesus conceive himself as the Son of God?)", Interpretation 21, 1967, 87–103; J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, SBT Second Series 6, 1967, 48 ff.; and New Testament Theology, I, 1971, 56–61; D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 205 ff. The saying has been challenged because of its Johannine ring (cf. Jn. 3:35; 10:15). But it may be questioned if such a parallel must make a saying ipso facto inauthentic. Jeremias regards the Synoptic saying as a stage on the way to Johannine thought. Moreover, the saying is not only lacking in precise Hellenistic parallels, but it can be shown to be Semitic in language and style (cf. W. D. Davies, Christian Origins and Judaism, 1962, 144; Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus, 46). Jeremias sees the picture drawn from everyday Jewish life: "Just as only a father really knows his son, so only a son really knows his father" (op. cit., 50; cf. Jn. 10:15). It is a key statement about Jesus' mission with parallels elsewhere in the Gospels (cf. Matt. 5:17, Jesus brings the final revelation; Lk. 15:1–32, Jesus' action reflects God's attitude to sinners; Matt. 13:11 par. Mk. 4:11, Lk. 8:10, Jesus passes on the mystery of the kingdom of God). For further discussion of Jesus' sonship → Son.

(b) Although in Jn.'s Gospel the noun is lacking and the vb. occurs only in 12:38 (the quotation from Isa. 53:1), the theme that Jesus is the mediator of the divine revelation is expounded even more powerfully than in the Synoptic Gospels. He is the only Son who has made the Father known (Jn. 1:18; → One, art. monos). He speaks in the world what he has heard from his Father (Jn. 3:32; 8:26; 15:15). The word "to reveal", however, is not rendered in the Johannine literature by apokalyptō but by phaneroō (Jn. 1:31; 2:11; 3:21; 7:4; 9:3; 17:6; 21:1; 14; 1 Jn. 1:2; 2:19, 28; 3:2, 5, 8; 4:9) and emphanizō (Jn. 14:21 f.). The description of Jesus as the → light of the world (Jn. 1:4 f.; 8:12 etc.) corresponds with this, as does the emphasis which is laid not only on hearing (→ hear) the voice of Jesus (Jn. 10:3, 2 f.), but also on seeing (→ see) the → glory of Jesus or God (Jn. 1:4; 11:40; 14:7, 9).

(c) The central content of the revelation is Christ himself. The Father in heaven revealed to Peter who Jesus is: "flesh and blood" could not mediate this knowledge to him (Matt. 16:17). The disciples are to declare openly in their → proclamation what has been revealed to them and what Jesus has said to them (Matt. 10:26 f.). Thus in the preaching of the disciples the event of revelation is continued: he who hears the disciples hears Jesus himself (Lk. 10:16; cf. Matt. 10:40; Jn. 12:44; 13:20). In Jn.'s Gospel Jesus promises his disciples the → Spirit of → truth who will bear witness to him. He will teach them everything and lead them into the full truth (Jn. 14:26; 15:26; 16:13). The event of revelation is not terminated in the earthly existence of Jesus.

4. (a) This is important for understanding the apostle Paul. He, too, is aware of himself as a bearer of divine revelation; the word apokalypsis consequently has fundamental significance. He lays great stress on the fact that Christ works and speaks through him (Rom. 15:18; 2 Cor. 13:3). From him he received his apostolic commission (Rom. 1:5), which is grounded in the fact that he has seen the resurrected Lord (1 Cor. 9:1; 15:8; → Birth, art. ektrōma; → Resurrection). Thereby he belongs to the circle of Easter witnesses and apostles (1 Cor. 15:11). This "seeing" is understood by him to be an event of revelation; it pleased God to reveal his Son to him (cf. Jn. 21:1, 14; the Easter appearances as self-revelation of the Risen One).

The authority with which Paul attacks the heresy threatening the Galatians is founded on the revelation of the Resurrected One. With a solemn gnōrizō (make known; cf. 1 Cor. 15:1) he insists that he has not received his gospel from men but by the revelation of Christ. gnōrizō is used both in LXX and NT language of immediate proclamations of the divine will (2 Sam. 7:21; Ps. 16:11; Col. 1:27; cf. Lk. 2:15, 17; Jn. 15:15; 17:26; Acts 2:28 [= Ps. 16:11]; 7:13; Rom. 9:23 f.; 16:26; 1 Cor. 12:3; 15:1; 2 Cor. 8:1; Gal. 1:11; Eph. 1:9; 3:3, 5, 10; 6:19, 21; Phil. 1:22; 4:6; Col. 1:27; 4:7, 9; 2 Pet. 1:16). To the Thessalonians Paul stresses that the gospel they received from him is not the word of men but the → Word of God (1 Thess. 2:13). 1 Cor. 2:10 points in the same direction; the Holy Spirit appears as the author of the revelation given to the apostle. The statements in Rom. 16:25 and Eph. 3:5 also crystallize the revelatory character of the apostolic message, which is identical with the mystery of Christ (→ Secret, art. mystērion).

The view that only Jesus' proclamation is revelation, and that the preaching of the early church is but an approximation to it (so J. Jeremias, The Problem of the Historical Jesus, 1964), does not, in view of the above affirmations, do justice to the statements of the NT. The NT does not draw a distinction here: the apostolic message is called the "Word of God" just as much as the word of Jesus (cf. Lk. 5:1; 8:21; with 1 Cor. 14:26; Col. 1:25). The consequence of this understanding was that early Christianity accepted both the words of Jesus transmitted in the Gospels and the apostolic writings into the Canon, and gave them recognition as the authoritative records of the divine revelation.

(b) Equally the word apokalypsis is not confined in Paul to the foundation message of Christ. In Gal. 2:2 he reports that he travelled to Jerusalem to the Apostolic Council on the basis of a revelation, i.e. he undertook the journey on the basis of divine direction, although we are not given any more exact details of the way he received it. 2 Cor. 12:1 ff. (cf. also 1 Cor. 14:6) refers to "visions and revelations" which Paul experienced, and which may have been ecstatic experiences (→ Ecstasy, art. ekstasis; → Paradise, art. paradeisos NT 1 (b)). In this connexion Paul also mentions the word that the exalted Lord spoke to him: "My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness" (v. 9).

But however important these revelations were for the personal faith and life of the apostle, we must distinguish them from the basic initial revelation of Christ. Such a revelation can be shared by other Spirit-filled Christians (1 Cor. 14:26, 30; Phil. 3:15). This is the explanation of Paul's prayer that God might give the Ephesians "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation" (Eph. 1:17). For the Spirit who guides the disciples into all truth opens up the understanding of revelation which is given them in the word of Jesus and of the apostles (cf. Eph. 2:18; Jn. 16:13; → Advocate).

(c) Alongside the revelation through the word stands the revelation in the acts of God. Paul is thinking of this when he speaks, from the standpoint of a man imprisoned under the law, of the message of → faith (pistis) which is to be revealed. The thought there is not only of the message itself but also of its content, the salvation event in Christ (Gal. 3:23). In the gospel is disclosed God's great gift enclosing salvation – the → "righteousness of God", through which sinful man is justified (Rom. 1:17; cf. 3:21).

This revelation of course contrasts with another: the revelation of the wrath of God, which falls on sinful humanity and allows it to sink even deeper into sin (Rom. 1:18 ff.; → Revelation in Contemporary Theology 2 (a)); on "the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God [en hēmera orgēs kai apokalypseōs dikaiokrisias tou theou]" (Rom. 2:5 AV) it will strike the impenitent in all its full severity. This revelation is anticipated by the gospel and the cross of Christ which show God's love and enmity to sin. 1 Cor. 3:13 also speaks of "fire" which will be revealed on the day of the Lord. Paul seems here to be thinking not only of the fire of → judgment, but also of a purifying fire. Preceding the day of Christ (2 Thess. 2:2), however, will be the revelation of the anti-Christian power which seizes control of the Sanctuary of God; the Lord will destroy it through the appearance of his advent (2 Thess. 2:3, 6, 8; → Present, arts. hēmera, parousia, and The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c)).

This advent is the day of the revelation of Christ when he appears in the fullness of his power (1 Cor. 1:7; 2 Thess. 1:7). With it is linked the "revelation of the sons of God” and of their heavenly → glory (doxa) which the sufferings of the time cause them to forget (Rom. 8:18 f.). Whenever 1 Pet. uses the word (apart from 1:12) it has the end revelation in view. The revelation of Christ is the revelation of his glory, in which Christians who are now led through suffering and manifold temptations will also have a share. They should therefore set all their hope on this salvation and grace (1 Pet. 1:5 ff., 13; 4:13; 5:1).

Such an apokalypsis is also the great theme of Rev. (1:1), which ends its vision of the future with the prayer “Amen. Come, Lord Jesus” (22:20; → Present, art. maranatha 2 (b)). The hope of this eternal future is a part of the Christian belief in revelation that cannot be surrendered.

W. Mundle

δηλώω

δηλώω (dēloō), reveal, make clear, explain, give information, notify; δῆλος (dēlos), clear, plain, evident.

CL dēloō, from dēlos, visible, clear, manifest, is attested from the 5th cent. B.C. (Aesch., Hdt.), and means to announce, make manifest, explain, set forth. The word has a secular sense, first of all, and is so used in the LXX (Jos. 4:7; Tob. 10:8). In Stoic philosophy it takes on the meaning of to interpret, clarify (Cornutus, Theologia Graeca 6, p. 6, 13 f.; 33, p. 71, 4). Hellenistic writers of the 2nd cent. A.D. such as Pausanias (4, 33, 5; 9, 25, 6) and Aelius Aristides (47, 51 and 55, 49, 48) use the vb. for the publication of divine secrets. The post-Christian use of the word in Hermas, Mandata (4, 3, 3; 4, 1; 8, 8 etc.) and the Leiden magical papyrus, the Eighth Book of Moses, corresponds with this (cf. K. Preisendanz, Papyri Graecae Magicae, XIII, 614). An angel declares the divine revelation. It is not possible to differentiate precisely between dēloō and other synonymous words such as → apokalyptō, emphanizō (→ light) and phaneroō → epiphaneia (→ Truth, art. alētheia NT 2 (c)).

OT In the LXX dēloō is principally a designation for the divine revelation. The underlying Heb. root equivalent is generally yāda' (hiph), to declare, let know. Thus revelation includes the imparting of → knowledge (art. ginōskō). God reveals his → name (Exod. 6:3; → God, art. theos OT 2), his purposes (Exod. 33:12), his ways (1 Ki. 8:36; 2 Chr. 5:27), his mysteries (Ps. 50[51]:8; Dan. 2:28, 29, 30; → Secret), his → covenant (Ps. 25[24]:8). dēloō can also denote the revelation of God's power (Jer. 16:21) and → glory (2 Macc. 2:8). The word is found very frequently in Dan. 2 (14 times out of 38 passages in the LXX), occasionally in the sense of expounding, interpreting (Dan. 2:5 ff.; 7:16); but there is no thought here of allegorical textual interpretations such as in the Stoa, but of the interpretation of → dreams (→ Explain). In Dan. 2 the Aram. vb. is ḥwh, show, make known.

NT In the NT the rare use of dēloō is confined to two passages each in 1 Cor. and Heb., and one passage each in Col. and 1 and 2 Pet., where the adj. is also found three times. The vb. bears the everyday sense of making known in 1 Cor. 1:11 and Col. 1:8. Similarly in Matt. 26:73, hē lalia sou dēlon se poiei means “your speech makes you known” (cf. RSV “your accents betrays you”). Also non-theological is the regular expression dēlon hoti, “it is clear that . . .” in 1 Cor. 15:27, Gal. 3:11; 1

Tim. 6:7 v.l. 1 Pet. 1:11 leads into the sphere of faith. Here it is stated that the prophets inquired concerning the → time indicated by the Spirit at work in them, when bearing witness to the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glory. According to 2 Pet. 1:14, the Lord revealed to Peter the nearness of his end. In Heb. dēloō is used of the spiritual interpretation of the OT. According to Heb. 9:8, the Holy Spirit reveals that the way into the sanctuary did not yet become visible as long as the first → tent (the Jewish tabernacle) was still standing, and that only with Christ, the High Priest of the good things to come (v. 11), did the fulfilment appear. Heb. 12:27 offers a spiritual interpretation of Hag. 2:6. The convulsion spoken of here which is to follow is again an allusion to the everlasting → Kingdom, which is not subject to the transitoriness of created things (→ Shake). 1 Cor. 3:13 deals with the final revelation of the day of judgment, which will reveal the true character and value of human works “by fire”. This use of dēloō expresses not imparting of knowledge, but God’s final active revelation.

W. Mundle

ἐπιφάνεια

ἐπιφάνεια (epiphaneia), appearance, revelation; ἐπιφαίνω (epiphainō), show, appear; ἐπιφανής (epiphanēs), powerful, splendid, terrible; φανερός (phaneros), visible, clear, open, evident; φανερῶς (phanerōs), openly; φανερόω (phanerōō), reveal, make known, show, manifest; φανέρωσις (phanerōsis), revelation, manifestation, disclosure; φαντάζω (phantazō), make visible; φάντασμα (phantasma), apparition.

CL 1. epiphaneia, derived from phainō, to appear (cf. phōs → Light), and attested since the 4th cent. B.C. (in the Pre-Socratics only in later reports), denotes originally: (a) purely outward appearance or mode of appearance; thus “the three visible sides of a town” (Polyb., 4, 70, 9; cf. also Acts 27:20). Analogous to the meaning “glorious” for the related word epiphanēs, attested since Pindar, there developed simultaneously the figurative meaning (b) glorious appearance, i.e. esteem, distinction, majesty (Pseudo-Plato, Alcibiades 1, 124c). Since already in c. 350 B.C. Isaeus of Chalcis could use epiphaneia to express (c) the sensation which a person or thing causes, it is not surprising that, at the time of Jesus, the word had almost become a technical term for (d) the succouring appearance of an otherwise hidden deity (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 104).

2. (a) Since the appearances of a divinity occur principally in the temple, the whole narrative section of the temple chronicle of Lindos (beginning of 1st cent. B.C.) is entitled epiphaneiai. The epiphany of a god is celebrated in the cult as the feast of his birth, of his accession, of a single miracle worked by him (cf. with this the relationship of the Christian feast of Epiphany to Lk. 2 and Matt. 2, to → baptism, and to the miracle at Cana), or of his return from a foreign land (cf. E. Pfister, Pauly-Wissowa, Supplement 4, 277–323). It is experienced not only in the personal appearance of the divinity, but also in extraordinary happenings which reveal the power and providence of the divinity (Diod. Sic., Plut. and others; cf. R. Bultmann and D. Lührmann, TDNT IX 8 f.). epiphaneia thus denotes the appearance of the divinity less in myth than in historical events.

(b) Since epiphaneia is used to describe the powerful intervention of the gods, rulers who were regarded as divine kings applied the adj. epiphanēs to themselves. Thus Antiochus Epiphanes in 1 Macc. 1:10 and after; cf. also Caesar's title, ton apo Areōs kai Aphrodeitēs theon epiphanē kai ... sōtēra, "the mighty god and ... saviour descended from Ares and Aphrodite" (W. Dittenberger, SIG II, 760, 6 f.).

OT 1. In the LXX epiphainō is the chief rendering of Heb. 'ōr (hiph.), to cause to shine. It occurs in the Aaronic blessing (Num. 6:25) and associated passages (Pss. 31[30]:16; 67[66]:1; 80[79]:3, 7, 19; 118[117]:27; 119[118]:135; Dan. 9:17 Theodotion). In addition gālāh (niph.), to show oneself (Gen. 35:7; Ezek. 39:28), zārah, to shine forth (Deut. 33:2) and māṣā' (niph.) to (let oneself) be found (Jer. 29[36]:14) are all rendered by epiphainō. But always it is Yahweh's marvellous rescuing and redemptive vindication of his people in the sense of the OT theophany that is meant.

2. epiphanēs is the LXX rendering of Heb. nōrā' (niph. part. of yārē', to fear terrible (Jdg. 13:6; Joel 2:11, 31[3:4]; Hab. 1:7; Mal. 1:14; 3:23[4:5]). The pl. nōrā'ōt is (only in 2 Sam. 7:23) translated by epiphaneiai, the terrifying deeds of God. The LXX has obviously confused derivatives of yare' with derivatives of rā'āh, to see (or even 'ōr, to illuminate) and so introduced the element of the terrible into the ancient epiphany concept. This becomes clear in the translation of the expected "great" and "terrible" day of the LORD (Joel 2:11, 31[3:4]; Mal. 3:23[4:23]) by megalē and epiphanēs (→ Present, art. hēmera OT). Acts 2:20 picks up Joel 2:11. Some texts render epiphanēs here by "glorious": the coming day of judgment is terrible for those who are to be punished, but glorious for those who are to be saved. Correspondingly the LXX also translates nōrā'ōt by ta endoxa (Deut. 10:21; Isa. 64:2), the marvellous deeds, or – more correctly – by ta phobera, (e.g. Pss. 106[105]:22; 145[144]:6), the terrible deeds.

Through the introduction by the LXX of the elements of the terrible into the epiphany concept, the expectation of the appearance of God as an eschatological event means that words from this group can be used to designate the double outcome of salvation history (see below, NT 1).

3. The word-group is found especially in 2 Macc. epiphainō serves here to denote the rescuing intervention of God (2 Macc. 2:24; 14:15; and especially 15:27) in the sense of an OT theophany. 3 Macc. 2:19 and 6:4, 9 go back to the OT linguistic usage corresponding with Num. 6:25. On the other hand, epiphainō is used in the sense of 1 (a) to refer to Judas Maccabaeus' troops. The adj. epiphanēs can both describe the "Lord" (2 Macc. 15:34; 3 Macc. 5:35), the God of Israel, and also the sanctuary of Dionysus (2 Macc. 14:33). In Josephus epiphaneia is found in the above-mentioned sense of CL 2 (b) (Ant. 1, 255; 2, 339; 3, 310; 9, 60; 12, 136, quoting Polyb.; 18, 286). But this sense does not occur in Philo (TDNT IX 9).

NT If, as Wrede, Knopf, Jülicher, Bultmann, Bornkamm and others hold, 2 Thess.

and the Pastoral Epistles are sub-apostolic writings, then the word epiphaneia emerges only late in the NT. On the other hand, other scholars regard them as Pauline, though the Pastoral Epistles belong to Paul's latest writings (for discussion see D. Guthrie, New Testament Introduction, II, 1961, 198–236; W. G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament, 1975², 370–87). The word is used with a twofold meaning for the visible appearance of Jesus Christ on earth.

1. epiphaneia occurs with reference to the appearance of the Lord on earth at the end of history. According to 2 Thess. 2:1–12, written in the language of Jewish apocalyptic, the advent of the “man of lawlessness” (→ Antichrist) precedes the visible appearance of the Kyrios (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c)). In fact he is already at work (2:7), but his parousia (2:9) is at the moment impeded by some not further defined power (2:6 f.). The Lord Jesus will destroy him tē epiphaneia tēs parousias, at the appearance of his coming (2:8). epiphaneia and parousia are to be understood here as a hendiadys, epiphaneia stressing the powerful and effective action of the returning Christ, and parousia accentuating more strongly the fact of his re-appearance. The decisive factor at the return of the Lord is what he will do. His appearance, the judgment and the eschatological establishment of his → kingdom belong inextricably together. The awaited judgment day of the Lord will be both terrible and glorious. The NEB translates epiphanēs in Joel 2:31 by “terrible” and the quotation of this verse in Acts 2:20 by “resplendent” (AV “notable”; RSV “manifest”). Because there are two possible outcomes in salvation history, the need to stand one’s ground in the fight of faith has to be stressed as the confirmation of this (note how the thought of 1 Tim. 6:12 precedes that of 6:14). Anyone who stands the test belongs to those “who have come to have a love for” the Lord’s both powerful and illuminating intervention and so for “his appearance” (2 Tim. 4:8). The stress that is laid on Christ’s powerful action in the designation of his return as epiphaneia derives ultimately from the fact that the Kyrios can be called God (Tit. 2:13) in connexion with his expected epiphaneia, even though the NT is still very restrained in its application of this title to Jesus Christ (→ God, art. theos NT 6; → Lord, art. kyrios NT 3).

2. From the use of the word in CL 2 (b) it is not surprising that Christians applied epiphaneia also to the visible earthly appearance of their Saviour (2 Tim. 1:10; and later Justin, Apol. I 14, 3 and 40, 1).

epiphainō (apart from Acts 27:20) is used in the NT solely of Jesus’ earthly appearance, whether with a forward (Lk. 1:79) or a backward look (Tit. 2:11; 3:4). To see God’s powerful revelation shining in Jesus’ servant-form is not a judgment of the reason, but one exclusively of faith, for outside faith the revelation of God is not visible (cf. R. Bultmann, “The Concept of Revelation in the New Testament”, in Existence and Faith, [1961] 1964, 67–106).

3. The no longer and not yet visible Lord, who is nevertheless believed in as present and active, can be requested in the prayer of the early church to reveal himself (1 Clem. 59:4 and 60:3; cf. Num. 6:25; and further 1 Cor. 16:22; Rev. 22:20). The thought is not that of seeing him, but of his succouring intervention and of a growing certainty which strengthens their faith (cf. CL 1 (d)).

4. In pregnant usage the word-group is found in the Bible only in the context of the revelation of Yahweh in the OT and of Jesus Christ in the NT. To speak of revelation in the fullest biblical sense is to speak of Jesus Christ. The words are never employed in connexion with the creation! The accent of the revelation-event rendered by epiphaneia lies on the soteriological character of God’s revelation. The words accordingly do not belong to a theory of knowledge which is independent of history but to NT soteriology. In view of God’s revelation in Jesus Christ the extension of knowledge is a trifling matter vis-à-vis salvation from blindness, lack of orientation and lostness. The mighty saving intervention of God has already occurred, but its fulfilment will take place only at the appearance of Jesus Christ. Thus believers live in the eschatological tension of being already reconciled but not yet redeemed (Rom. 8:23; → Reconciliation; → Redemption). In other words, they live in → hope.

B. Gärtner

5. The NT has a number of related words. For phainō and emphanizō → Light.

(a) The adj. phaneros, visible, clear, open, evident, is not a theological technical term, although it is used in some important theological contexts. It stresses what is visible to the sight. It is used in connexion with the messianic → secret (Mk. 3:12 par. Matt. 12:16): Jesus charged them not to make him known. Nevertheless, his name had become known (Mk. 6:14). It is used in Jesus' declaration that men do nothing in secret that shall not be made manifest (Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17). In Acts 4:16 the Jewish leaders are compelled to acknowledge that the apostles, Peter and John, had performed a notable deed in healing the lame man in the temple, and that this was manifest to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Similarly, the fact that Paul's imprisonment was for Christ had become known throughout the praetorian guard (Phil. 1:13). In all these instances there is the implication that God's truth will become visible and evident in God's good time, whether men try to hasten it or hinder it. The adj. has a non-technical sense in Stephen's speech which refers to Joseph making himself known to his brethren (Acts 7:13).

Rom. 1:19 declares that what may be known about God is made manifest to men in the natural order (see the discussion of revelation in nature below in Revelation in Contemporary Theology). In Rom. 2:28 the man who is a Jew outwardly (en tō phanerō), i.e. by possessing → circumcision and making a formal profession of the → law, is contrasted with the one who is a Jew inwardly (en tō kryptō) who has the real, spiritual circumcision of the heart (v. 29). Paul is arguing that true membership of the people of God does not consist of possessing the outward marks of → covenant membership; there must also be the inner spiritual reality. But where this is absent, as in the case of the unbelieving Jews, it does not nullify the faithfulness of God (Rom. 3:1–4, 31; cf. Ps. 51:4). God plans to use even the unbelief of the Jews to his glory, and wills their inclusion in the people of God by grafting them back through their turning to him on a massive scale (Rom. 9:1–11:36).

In the day of the Lord the works of all men – including believers – will come to light (1 Cor. 3:13; cf. 14:25; Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17; Judgment; → Present, art. hēmera). Indeed, the present dissensions within the church make it manifest who are genuine (1 Cor. 11:19). In Gal. 5:19 Paul draws attention to the self-evident character of the works of the flesh, as contrasted with the → fruit of the Spirit. Timothy is exhorted to practise the duties of his ministry so that his progress may be evident to all (1 Tim. 4:15). Similarly, the believer's attitude to sin makes it plain that he is a child of God (1 Jn. 3:10).

(b) The adv. phanerōs is used in the sense of “openly”, “publicly”, so that people can see (Mk. 1:45; Jn. 7:10). It is the opposite of en kryptō, “in secret”. In Acts 10:3 it means “plainly”.

(c) The vb. phanerōō, reveal, make known, show, manifest, is relatively frequent in the NT compared with the number of instances outside it (TDNT IX 4). Mk. 4:22 has the character of a proverbial saying (cf. above (a)). Elsewhere it occurs in the Synoptic Gospels only in the longer ending of Mk.: Mk. 16:12, 14 (on the longer ending see W. R. Farmer, The Last Twelve Verses of Mark, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 25, 1974).

It is, however, frequent in Jn. virtually as a synonym for → apokalyptō which is used only in the quotation from Isa. 53:1 in Jn. 12:38 (cf. its use in Matt. and Lk.). John the Baptist came baptizing with water that Jesus Christ might be revealed to Israel (Jn. 1:31). The sign at Cana “manifested his glory; and his disciples believed in him” (Jn. 1:11). Those who do evil hate the light and do not come to it. “But he who does what is true comes to the light, that it may be clearly seen that his deeds have been wrought in God” (Jn. 3:21). Jesus’ brothers urged him to go to Jerusalem, “For no man works in secret if he seeks to be known openly. If you do these things, show yourself to the world” (Jn. 7:4). But the words betray a lack of belief (v. 5), and Jesus rejected their counsel as his time had not yet come. On the other hand, their time – and their attitude which conformed to the world – is always here (v. 6). Jesus explained the blindness of the man blind from birth on the grounds that, “It was not that this man sinned, or his parents, but that the works of God might be made manifest in him” (Jn. 9:3). In his high priestly prayer Jesus declares: “I have manifested thy name to the men whom thou gavest me out of the world; thine they were, and thou gavest them to me, and they have kept thy word” (Jn. 17:6). In Jn. 21:1 and 14 the vb. is used of Jesus’ revelation of himself to his disciples.

The vb. also figures prominently in 1 Jn. In Jesus “the life was made manifest, and we saw it, and testify to it, and proclaim to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us” (1 Jn. 1:2). By contrast the action of unbelievers in quitting the community makes it manifest that they were not truly of the community (1 Jn. 2:19). In 1 Jn. 2:28 it is used of the coming of Christ. The epistle proceeds to develop the tension between the two manifestations of Christ and the implications that this has for the believer. “Beloved, we are God’s children now; it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know when he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is” (1 Jn. 3:2). “You know that he appeared to take away sins, and in him there is no sin” (1 Jn. 3:5). “He who commits sin is of the devil; for the devil has sinned from the beginning. The reason the Son of God appeared was to destroy the works of the devil” (1 Jn. 3:8). “In this the love of God was made manifest among us, that God sent his only Son into the world, so that we might live through him” (1 Jn. 4:9; cf. Jn. 3:16).

In Rev. 3:18 the church at Laodicea is counselled to buy white garments from the risen Christ to keep the shame of its nakedness from being seen. The allusion is to the lukewarm attitude of that church in its self-contented prosperity which blinded it to its true state (→ Cold, Hot, Lukewarm NT (c)). In Rev. 15:4 the song of those who have conquered celebrates the God who alone is holy and the fact that “All nations shall come and worship thee, for thy judgments have been revealed.”

Paul uses phaneroō and apokalyptō as synonyms (cf. Rom. 1:17 and 3:21 on the revelation of the → righteousness of God in Christ; Eph. 3:5 and Col. 1:26 on the revelation of the mystery hidden for ages). In Rom. 1:19 and 1 Cor. 4:5 phaneroō has the sense of “make visible”. The former passage refers to the revelation of God’s “eternal power and deity” in the creation (Rom. 1:20; see below on Revelation in Contemporary Theology). The latter refers to the coming → judgment when all the hidden things will be made manifest. For Paul this has the practical implication that he does not pronounce judgment before the time, being content to leave it to God, and equally he does not wish to have premature commendation for the same reason.

Paul uses phaneroō no less than 9 times in 2 Cor. especially in polemical contexts. He uses it of the revelation that comes about through his preaching (2 Cor. 2:14; 11:6). His own apostolic way of life is itself a paradoxical revelation of Christ, in a way comparable to Christ's own way of life. For men – including his adversaries – naturally expect God to manifest himself in success. But in fact it is otherwise. Paul's apostolic way has been one of affliction and suffering, "always carrying about in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our bodies. For while we live we are always being given up to death for Jesus' sake, so that the life of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh. So death is at work in us, but life in you" (2 Cor. 4:10 ff.). On the other hand, the existence of believing men and women in the church shows them to be a letter from Christ, a manifest attestation vindicating Paul's apostleship in contrast with the letters of accreditation vaunted by his opponents. The vb. is used of the appearance of all before the judgment seat of Christ (2 Cor. 5:10 f.; → Judgment, art. bēma). The vb. is used 3 times. Not only shall we appear (v. 10), but what we are is made manifest to God (v. 11a). To this Paul adds the hope that it is also manifest to the consciences of his readers (v. 11b). In 2 Cor. 7:12 Paul declares that his intention in writing as he did was "in order that your zeal for us might be revealed to you in the sight of God." Despite his lack of eloquence Paul expresses the hope that his apostleship and devotion to Christ have been made plain (2 Cor. 11:6). For further discussion of the vb. and the cognate noun in 2 Cor. see below (d).

Revelation takes place in proclamation (Col. 1:25 f.; 4:4; Rom. 16:25 ff.). In Eph. 5:13 Christian conduct is seen in terms of light. The thought of revelation is further developed in terms of mystery hidden for ages but now revealed in Christ (Col. 1:26; 3:4; 4:4; cf. Eph. 3:5; 6:19).

On the question of whether there is a conflict between Paul's claims about revelation (cf. also 1 Cor. 11:23; Gal. 1:12) and his insistence on having received his kerygma from tradition (1 Cor. 15:3) see G. E. Ladd, "Revelation and Tradition in Paul", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 223–30. Ladd sees Paul in 1 Cor. thinking of particular aspects of his gospel: the Lord's Supper, the saving death, the resurrection and the appearances of Jesus. These include facts and interpretations which Paul received from earlier Christians (→ Proclamation). However, in Gal. Paul is dealing with his apostolic authority and conversion. "Paul was not converted by Christian preaching but by an immediate confrontation by the exalted Christ. Neither did he receive his apostolic office from men. Both – his gospel and his apostolic office – came directly from the Lord, unmediated by men" (op. cit., 230).

1 Tim. 3:16 takes up the theme of mystery in quoting a primitive Christian hymn: "Great indeed, we confess, is the mystery of our religion: He was manifested in the flesh [hos ephanerōthē en sarki], vindicated in the Spirit, seen by angels, preached among the nations, believed on in the world, taken up in glory." On this subject see R. H. Gundry, "The Form, Meaning and Background of the Hymn Quoted in 1 Timothy 3:16", in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., op. cit., 203–22; J. T. Sanders, The New Testament Christological Hymns, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 15, 1971, 94 f.; M. Dibelius, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 322

1972, 61 ff.; and A. T. Hanson, Studies in the Pastoral Epistles, 1968, 21–28 (on the introductory clause). phaneroō here refers to the incarnation (cf. Rom. 1:3 f. and the use of the vb. elsewhere for the incarnate ministry of Jesus in Jn. 1:31; Heb. 9:26; 1 Pet. 1:20; 1 Jn. 1:2; 3:5, 8; and the use of sarx for the humanity of Jesus in Jn. 1:14; 6:51 ff.; Rom. 8:3; 10:5; Eph. 2:14; Col. 1:22; Heb. 5:7; 1 Pet. 3:18; 4:1; 1 Jn. 4:2; 2 Jn. 7; cf. Lk. 24:39). Gundry thinks that the clause refers to the entire earthly ministry right up to the ascension in view of (1) the use of sarx for human lifetime (Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22, 24; Heb. 5:7), (2) the generality of “manifested” instead of a more specific vb. like “born”, and (3) the synthetic relation to “taken up in glory” (op. cit., 209). ephanerōthē thus becomes a constative aorist indicating that the action is conceived of as a whole. The same vb. is also used of the significance of the incarnation in 2 Tim. 1:10 in concluding its definition of the → gospel in the power of God: “and now has manifested through the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus, who abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.” The incarnation is also in mind in the other reference to the vb. in the Pastoral Epistles, but it is now mediated by proclamation: “and at the proper time manifested in his word through the preaching with which I have been entrusted by command of God our Saviour” (Tit. 1:3).

The vb. occurs twice in Heb. 9 but with somewhat different meanings. In Heb. 9:26 the reference is to the incarnation, the purpose of which was to offer a sacrifice for sins which supersedes the OT → sacrifices and day of atonement ritual. The manifestation of Christ is unique and unrepeatable: “Nor was it to offer himself repeatedly, as the high priest enters the Holy Place yearly with blood not his own; for then he would have had to suffer repeatedly since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself” (Heb. 9:15 f.). Conversely, the author has earlier argued that the structure of the tabernacle (and by implication the → temple) and the prohibition of all but the high priest from entering the inner sanctuary is proof of the incompleteness of the religion and rites of the old covenant: “By this the Holy Spirit indicates [dēlountos] that the way into the sanctuary is not yet opened [pephanerōsthai] as long as the outer tent is still standing” (Heb. 9:8; → Tent). Whereas the RSV translates the vb. by “opened”, it would be consistent with the regular meaning of the vb. to translate it as “manifested”, “revealed” or “made known” (cf. NEB “remains unrevealed”).

The vb. also occurs twice in 1 Pet. again of Christ referring to his two manifestations in his historical life and at his second coming. “He was destined from the foundation of the world but was made manifest at the end of the times for your sake” (1 Pet. 1:20). “And when the chief Shepherd is manifested you will obtain the unfading crown of glory” (1 Pet. 5:4).

(d) Compared with the relative frequency of the vb. (49 times), the noun phanerōsis, revelation, manifestation, disclosure, occurs only twice. In 1 Cor. 12:7 it describes the → gifts of the → Spirit: “To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good.” In 2 Cor. 4:2 it is used in connexion with Paul’s preaching in a polemical passage replying to accusations: “We have renounced disgraceful, underhanded ways; we refuse to practise cunning or to tamper with God’s word, but by the open statement of the truth [tē phanerōsei tēs alētheias] we would commend ourselves to every man’s conscience in the sight of God. And even if our gospel is veiled [kekalymmenon], it is veiled [kekalymmenon] to them that are perishing” (2 Cor. 4:2

f.; → Hide, art. kalypō NT 3). C. K. Barrett takes the phrase to mean “by showing forth the truth, that is the Gospel, or word of God” (The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 129; cf. R. Bultmann, Exegetica, ed. E. Dinkler, 1967, 143). The passage may be compared with 2 Cor. 5:10 f. and the use of the vb. in 2 Cor. noted above (c). W. Schmithals sees Paul defending his rational, non-ecstatic method of proclaiming Christian truth as against gnostic criticism (Gnosticism in Corinth, 1971). But Barrett prefers to see Paul’s use of the vb. against the background of the law court, where it was used of appearances in court (2 Cor. 5:10; op. cit., 160, 164; cf. C. F. D. Moule, The Phenomenon of the New Testament, SBT Second Series 1, 1967, 92).

(e) The vb. phantazō, make visible, usually in the pass. to become visible, especially of extraordinary phenomena, is rare in secular Gk. and occurs only in Heb. 12:21 of → Moses on Sinai: “Indeed so terrible was the sight [to phantazomenon] that Moses said, ‘I tremble with fear’ ” (cf. Deut. 9:19). phantasma means an apparition or ghost (secular Gk. from Aesch. and Plato; cf. Job 20:8 v.l.; Wis. 17:14; Josephus, Ant. 1, 331 and 333; Matt. 14:26 par. Mk. 6:49, Lk. 24:37D, of the disciples’ mistaken impression of Jesus walking on the water). C. Brown

χρηματίζω	χρηματίζω (chrēmatisō), impart a revelation, injunction or warning; bear a name, be called or named; χρῆμα (chrēma), property, wealth, means, money; χρηματισμός (chrēmatismos), a divine statement or answer.
-------------------------	---

CL & OT chrēma is related to chrē, necessity, it is inevitable, and means affair, money in secular Gk. (B. Reicke, TDNT IX 480). It has the meaning of money, riches in the LXX and is so used in the NT (→ Possessions, art. chrēma). From chrēma in the sense of affair, business, the vb. chrēmatisō means to handle a matter (e.g. Thuc., 1, 87, 5). In the language of government and business in the Hellenistic world it came to denote taking up a matter, dealing with something, giving an answer, especially from an official point of view (TDNT IX 481). It can have this sense in the case of a deity giving an answer (Diod. Sic. 15, 10, 2; Josephus, Ant. 3, 212). In Jer. LXX it corresponds to the Heb. dibber, speak (26[33]:2; 29[36]:23; 30[37]:2) and šā’ag, roar (25[32]:30).

NT 1. In the NT chrēmatisō has 2 distinct senses, though the second sense may be a quite different vb. The first sense may be connected with chrēsmos, oracle, and the second with chrēmata, business (Moulton, Grammar, II, 265).

(a) In the infancy stories, the story of Cornelius and Heb. the vb. is used of the instruction of people by revelations. It is usually in the pass., and the recipient is regarded as an instrument of God. Often the vb. is in the imperative. Thus the wise men were warned in a → dream not to return to Herod (Matt. 2:12; → Magic, art. mageia NT 2(b)). Joseph was likewise warned not to go to Judea where Archelaus ruled and so withdrew to Galilee (Matt. 2:22). It was “revealed” to Simeon “by the Holy Spirit that he should not see death before he had seen the Lord’s Christ” (Lk. 1:26). In the account of the opening of the church to the Gentiles “Cornelius, a centurion, an upright and God-fearing man, who is well spoken of by the whole Jewish nation, was directed to send for you [Peter] to come to his house, and to hear what you have to say" (Acts 10:22). Heb. 11:5 speaks of the response of → Noah's → faith to the warnings of God, and Heb. 12:25 exhorts professing Christians: "See that you do not refuse him who is speaking. For if they did not escape when they refused him [Moses] who warned them on earth, much less shall we escape if we reject him [Jesus] who warns from heaven" (cf. Heb. 3:12; Exod. 19:18; 20:19).

(b) In two instances chrēmatisō means to appear as something, bear a name, be called or named. Thus "in Antioch the disciples were for the first time called Christians" (Acts 11:26c; → Jesus Christ, art. Christianos). A woman "will be called an adulteress if she lives with another man while her husband is alive" (Rom. 7:3a; → Marriage, art. moicheuō).

2. chrēmatismos is found in secular Gk. from Plato onwards in the sense of money-making (e.g. Rep. 2, 357c). But it is also a term for an official answer, instruction or decree and also a divine answer in Hellenism (TDNT IX 482). In the LXX it means dispatch (2 Macc. 11:17), oracle (Prov. 31:1; Isa. 13:1), and divine direction (2 Macc. 2:4). In the NT it is found only at Rom. 11:4: "But what is God's reply [chrēmatismos] to him [→ Elijah]? 'I have kept for myself seven thousand men who have not bowed the knee to Baal'" (cf. 1 Ki. 19:18). The instance affords a precedent and example for Paul to argue "So too at the present time there is a remnant, chosen by grace" (v. 5). The argument is concerned to show that God has not rejected altogether his ancient people, and that God's way of working now is the same as it was in time past under the old covenant. "In spite of the linguistic link between entynchanō and chrēmatismos Elijah is thought of, not as an attorney submitting written petitions, not as a mantic practising incubation, but as a man of God receiving revelations" (B. Reicke, TDNT IX 482).

C. Brown

Revelation in Contemporary Theology

The purpose of this note is to draw attention to some of the representative views of revelation of the past half-century. Two main streams have emerged: the one stresses revelation through the word, the other through history and events. They do so against a double background. On the one hand, the rise of critical historical scholarship has set a question mark against the possibility of treating the Bible without more ado as the written word of God. On the other hand, there is the question whether God does not reveal himself in nature and history, and within the Bible itself there are grounds for answering this in the affirmative.

1. Revelation through the Word. (a) In the 1920s and 1930s Karl Barth was a leading advocate of Dialectical Theology, and his commentary on Romans (1919) became a programmatic manifesto of this school of thought. Basic to it was the idea that God is Wholly Other. God exists on a different plane and in a different way from men. Consequently they can know him only as he reveals himself to them. But being Wholly Other there is a sense in which God remains hidden even in revelation. For when men saw Jesus with their eyes, they saw a man and not God. When they heard his words, they heard human words. The divine cannot be perceived directly; it can only be perceived indirectly. This view of God as Wholly Other had a double consequence for Barth's thinking. On the one hand, it meant that man's religion as a human quest for God was worthless and sinful. Indeed, in the light of God's revelation of himself in Jesus Christ we can see how misguided it really is. On the other hand, for the Barth of Dialectical Theology the words of Scripture are not themselves revelation but a witness to revelation. They point in human terms to that which cannot be expressed by man at all.

In the 1930s. Barth moved away from the strict position of Dialectical Theology in favour of a view which saw an analogical correspondence between the truth of our words about God and the reality of God himself (cf. CD I, 1, 279, cf. 274 ff.; II, 1, 223–54). For strictly speaking, if God is Wholly Other nothing at all can be said about him. He would be so different from our ways of speaking and thinking that nothing appropriate could be said. But in the light of the revelation in Scripture, Barth came to see a correspondence between our concepts and the reality of God in himself. Thus, if we call God our “Father” we do not mean that he is our father in the same way as our human fathers, who can be seen, heard, touched, and who bring children into the world by physical procreation. God is not a father in the literal sense. But there is a correspondence in the way in which he is the source of our life and in the way he cares for and guides us as his children.

In the Church Dogmatics Barth developed the concept of the threefold form of the Word of God (CD I, 1, 98–140). In the strictest sense of the word Jesus Christ himself is the Word of God (cf. Jn. 1:1, 14; Rev. 19:13; Heb. 1:2). He is the one who reveals the Father (Matt. 11:27 ff.; Lk. 10:22; Jn. 14:6–10; 1 Cor. 1:30). But there is also a sense in which Scripture is also the → Word of God. It is the Word of God as God speaks to men through it. Thus Barth conceives of Scripture not as something separate from God but as the vehicle through which God speaks to men. But it is revelation in so far as it reveals Christ, or rather, as Christ reveals himself through it. Barth speaks of Scripture as “the witness of the prophets and apostles”, i.e. as the witness of those who were specially commissioned by God to testify to him before and after the event of Christ. The former look forward to him, and the latter look back to him. The word “witness” has to be understood in the gospel sense of the term: “He who receives you receives me, and he who receives me receives him that sent me” (Matt. 10:40; cf. Lk. 10:16; Jn. 13:20). Just as those who received the disciples received Christ in and through them, so we today in receiving their written words also receive Christ, and with him also the Father. In addition to Christ and Scripture, Barth also thinks of proclamation as a form of the Word of God. The church’s preaching today is the concrete means of God revealing himself and of men receiving the Word of God. In practice these three forms of the Word of God are inseparable. There is no revelation apart from Christ, but no knowledge of Christ apart from the Scriptures. In practice we know Christ and the Scriptures through the proclamation of the church, but we must test that proclamation by Scripture.

For Barth there can be no external proof of the truth of revelation. For it is impossible to stand outside our human condition and look at God as he is in himself and look at our theologies and see them in a completely detached manner. There is no vantage point from which we could do this. Barth admits that his argument is circular (CD I, 2, 535), but it is not a vicious circle. We may step into the circle of truth and see its truth from a position of obedient faith. The truth of God is self-attesting. Therefore an extraneous “objective” proof is as impossible as it is irrelevant. The truth of the Bible on historical matters is of course open to corroboration by archaeology. But such corroboration would merely be on a human level. It would not tell us whether what the Bible says about God is true. This can only be known from within the self-attesting circle of revelation.

Two further observations may be made on Barth's position. On the one hand, it means that all knowledge of God is mediated in and through the person of Jesus Christ. On the other hand, this means that there is no true knowledge of God outside this revelation, which in turn means the rejection of religion as a subject of interest and value in its own right (whether in its Christian or non-Christian forms) and also of natural theology. Natural theology, as the attempt to discover certain truths about God by reflection on the natural world and certain human institutions like marriage and moral values, formed the subject of a debate between Barth and Emil Brunner in the 1930s (cf. their papers in Natural Theology; Comprising 'Nature and Grace' by Professor Emil Brunner and the Reply 'No!' by Dr. Karl Barth, 1946). Brunner argued that a knowledge of God from nature was a presupposition for the proclamation of the gospel and that it was the task of Protestant theology to construct a new natural theology. Barth ridiculed the proposition, but in so doing failed to give adequate weight to passages like Ps. 19:1 ff.; Acts 14 and 17; and Rom. 1:19 ff. Later on he recognized that the Bible speaks of a revelation in nature, but maintained that the natural man makes nothing of it (CD II, 1, 119 ff.), insisting that only the Spirit of God can reveal the deep things of God (1 Cor. 2:6–16). The knowledge of God by the Gentiles in Rom. 2:12–16 is not a general unaided response to natural revelation. Rather, it is the fulfilment of Jer. 31:31 ff. in the knowledge of God by the Gentiles under the new covenant. The Gentiles in question are Gentile believers (CD I, 2, 304; II, 242, 604; IV, 1, 33, 369, 395). For Brunner's view of revelation see Revelation and Reason; The Christian Doctrine of Faith and Knowledge, 1947; and Truth as Encounter: A New Edition, Much Enlarged, of The Divine-Human Encounter, 1964 (cf. also P. K. Jewett, Emil Brunner's Concept of Revelation, 1954).

For Barth the doctrine of the Trinity is grounded in revelation in so far as the Father reveals himself in the Son (who is the objective reality of revelation) through the power of the Holy Spirit (who is the subjective reality of revelation) (cf. Eph. 2:18; Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14). Hence, CD I, 1 which deals with the doctrine of the Word of God as the prolegomena to church dogmatics is also a massive treatise on the doctrine of the Trinity. For it is none other than the triune God himself who is active in revelation, and as such is also the underlying principle of Christian theology.

Barth's concept of inspiration stretches the concept from the idea of God-breathed scriptures ("All Scripture is inspired by God [pasa graphē theopneustos] and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness", 2 Tim. 3:16) to cover the whole process of illumination described in 1 Cor. 2:6–16 and 2 Cor. 3:4–18 (CD I, 2, 514 ff.). Within this general context Barth is willing to speak of the inspiration of scripture, and warns against saying anything different in the light of Matt. 5:17 f. At the same time, he insists that the Bible must not be detached from encounter with the living God. Otherwise, it becomes a "paper Pope". Barth's high view of Scripture does not preclude for him the possibility that the biblical writers were capable of error and that they spoke "the Word of God in their fallible and erring human word" (CD I, 2, 530; cf. 509, 528 ff.). The action of the Spirit does not suspend their human thought-processes. But he prefers to speak of a “capacity for errors” rather than actual errors, warning us not to attempt to play off one writer against another.

(b) In the 1920s Rudolf Bultmann was also associated with Dialectical Theology. But in subsequent years the gap between Barth and Bultmann widened into a chasm. It would be wrong to think of Bultmann entirely as an existentialist theologian. The existentialist element in his teaching is but one aspect. At its foundation lies the thought of the otherness of God. This means that God cannot be objectified. At the same time Bultmann espoused a much more radical view of the Bible than Barth in such works as The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921, ET 1963). Moreover, the thoughts of the biblical writers are couched in the language of obsolete mythical world views (→ Myth). Thus the message of the NT requires to be demythologized, not indeed to remove all offence, but to allow the real offence of the gospel to stand (cf. “New Testament and Mythology”; 1941, ET in Kerygma and Myth, ed. H. W. Bartsch, combined volume, 1972, 1–44; and Jesus Christ and Mythology, 1960). Christ is revealed in the kērygma of the cross and resurrection. “The word of preaching confronts us as the word of God. It is not for us to question its credentials. It is we who are questioned, we who are asked whether we will believe the word or reject it. But in answering this question, in accepting the word of preaching as the word of God and the death and resurrection of Christ as the eschatological event, we are given an opportunity of understanding ourselves. Faith and unbelief are never blind, arbitrary decisions. They offer us the alternative between accepting or rejecting that which alone can illuminate our understanding of ourselves” (Kerygma and Myth, 41 f.; → Resurrection, art. The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology 1 (a)).

There is both an eschatological and an existential note here which resounds throughout Bultmann’s teaching. The eschatological is the element of the transcendent breaking into time through the medium of the kērygma; the existential is the element of self-understanding which occurs in our response to it (cf. Theology of the New Testament, I, 1952, 3; The Gospel of John, 1971, 159 f.).

In so far as revelation is transcendent and eschatological it cannot be communicated. It is rather occasioned by the Christian kērygma as it meets the response of faith. Thus, if we ask Bultmann what has been revealed according to the NT, his reply is “Nothing at all, so far as the question concerning revelation asks for doctrines – doctrines, say, that no man could have discovered for himself – or for mysteries that become known once and for all as soon as they are communicated. On the other hand, however, everything has been revealed, insofar as man’s eyes are opened concerning his own existence and he is once again able to understand himself” (Existence and Faith, [1961] 1964, 100). “Revelation is an act of God, an occurrence, and not a communication of supernatural knowledge” (ibid., 102). Faith, for Bultmann, does not have an object. It “does not relate itself to historical or cosmic processes that could be established as free from doubt, but rather to the preaching behind which faith cannot go and which says to man that he must understand the cross as God’s act of salvation and believe in the resurrection” (ibid., 163).

(c) A somewhat older view which was in no way bound up with Bultmann’s demythologized existential kērygma was that of William Temple who rejected the idea of propositional revelation in words. “What is offered to man’s apprehension in any specific Revelation is not truth concerning God but the living God Himself” (Nature, Man and God, Gifford Lectures, 1934, 322). However, Temple went further than Bultmann in thinking that the truth of revelation could be formulated. "There are truths of revelation, that is to say, propositions which express the results of correct thinking concerning revelation; but they are not themselves directly revealed" (ibid., 317).

(d) A writer who rejects the idea of revelation altogether is F. G. Downing who claims that, "If God intended to 'reveal himself' in Christ, in the events of his life and death and resurrection and in his teaching, he failed. It seems more faithful to assume that this was not his intention. . . . A 'revelation' of what cannot now be seen is not a 'revelation'. We may believe, trust, that Christ has made 'the revealing of God' a possibility in some sort of future. It is surely nonsense, even pernicious nonsense, to pretend that it is a present fact" (Has Christianity a Revelation?, 1964, 238).

(e) By contrast with these positions stands the traditional orthodox and evangelical understanding of revelation, as represented by scholars like B. B. Warfield in the various articles collected in The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 1951, and J. W. Wenham in Christ and the Bible, 1972. This position is based on a detailed examination about what the Bible says about itself and especially Jesus' own attitude to → Scripture as the → Word of God. Thus Jesus came to endorse and fulfil the law and the prophets (Matt. 5:17 f.; → Fullness, art. pleroō; → Redemption, art. lyō NT6 (a) and 6 (d) for Jn. 10:35 f.). His life was governed by the fulfilment of Scripture (Matt. 11:10 par. Lk. 7:27; Matt. 21:42 par. Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17, cf. Ps. 118:22; Matt. 26:24 par. Mk. 14:21; Matt. 26:31 par. Mk. 14:27; cf. Zech. 13:7; Matt. 26:53–56 par. Mk. 14:49; Mk. 9:12 f.; Lk. 4:21; 18:31 ff.; 21:22; 24:25 ff., 44–47; Jn. 5:39–47; 13:18; cf. Ps. 41:9; Jn. 15:25; cf. Ps. 35:19; Jn. 17:12). He lived not by bread alone but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God (Matt. 4:4; cf. Deut. 8:3). The Scriptures are thus the expression of the will of God. The question "Have you not read. . .?" is virtually the equivalent of "Do you not know that God has said. . .?" (Matt. 12:3; 19:4; 21:16; 22:31; Mk. 2:25; 12:10, 26; Lk; 6:3). Similarly the word gegraptai, "It is written", carries with it the full weight of divine authority (Matt. 11:10; 21:13; 26:24, 31; Mk. 9:12 f.; 11:17; 14:21, 27; Lk. 7:27; 19:46). On occasion "Scripture" and "God" are even used interchangeably (Rom. 9:17, cf. Exod. 9:16; Gal. 3:8, cf. Gen. 12:3; 18:18; Matt. 19:4 f., cf. Gen. 2:24). This view involves the concept of the plenary inspiration of the Bible (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 1:23 ff.; 2 Pet 1:20 f.; 1 Thess. 2:13), though not necessarily the corollary that the Holy Spirit dictated the words of scripture in a way which involves the suspension of the normal thought-processes of the writers. Advocates of this view leave open the question of how the Spirit guided the biblical writers, but they recognize that this view commits them to propositional revelation. Thus God reveals himself to us today through the medium of words.

(f) In marked contrast with this position is the view set out by John Macquarrie in The Principles of Christian Theology, 1966. Macquarrie sees revelation as "the primary source for theology" and "a basic category for theological thinking" (op. cit., 6, 76). But he utterly rejects the notion of propositional revelation and indeed of a theistic view of God. Revelation is not concerned with acquiring new items of knowledge but with seeing things in a different way (op. cit., 80). "Because of its gift-like character, revelation is of a different order from our ordinary matter-of-fact knowing of the world" (op. cit., 6). But a basic pattern runs through experiences of revelation in the different religions which Macquarrie analyses as follows: "a mood of meditation or preoccupation; the sudden in-breaking of the holy presence, often symbolized in terms of the shining of a light; a mood of self-abasement (sometimes terror, sometimes consciousness of sin, sometimes even doubt of the reality of the experience) in face of the holy; a more definite disclosure of the holy, perhaps the disclosure of a name or of a purpose or a truth of some kind (this element may be called the 'content' of the revelation); the sense of being called or commissioned by the holy to a definite task or way of life" (op. cit., 6 f.). Macquarrie sees this pattern exemplified in the story of Moses and the burning bush (Exod. 3:1 ff.), the Gnostic writer who received the gospel of Poimandres (introduction), and Arjuna who received a theophany of the god Krishna (Bhagavadgita 11). If further distinctions are to be drawn, Macquarrie sees such revelations as "classic" or "primordial" which subsequently become paradigms or normative patterns for interpreting the later experience of the community (op. cit., 7). They are handed down by means of scriptures which are not themselves revelation but means (among others) of keeping the revelation alive (op. cit., 8).

In revelation one does not, according to Macquarrie, enter into an I-Thou encounter with a personal God (op. cit., 83 f.). For the idea of a personal God over against the universe is one to be rejected. Rather, one is grasped by being which pervades all beings, and is the condition of their being (op. cit., 94–110). "The expression which I prefer to use . . . to point to the characteristic of being as the condition that there may be any particular beings, is 'letting-be'. Being, strictly speaking, 'is' not; but 'lets be', and since letting-be is prior to particular instances of being, though other than these, we are justified in claiming that being is more beingful than any particular being that it lets be, and we have justification too for using, with proper care and qualification, the expression 'being is'" (op. cit., 103).

The significance of Macquarrie's approach here lies not so much in any intrinsic merits but in its interest as an example of a phenomenological approach to revelation which attempts to work out a philosophy of religion on the basis of an examination of religious phenomena in general. For one thing, "being" is hardly the "neutral" category that Macquarrie appears to imagine it to be (op. cit., 105). It is itself just as much an interpretation as the use of the words "holy" or "God"; and to understand, say, Exod. 3:1 ff. in terms of an experience of being is not an objective, detached, presuppositionless way of letting religious phenomena speak for themselves, but is itself an interpretation in terms of a framework of interpretation. Moreover, it is difficult to imagine how one can meaningfully speak of being as prior to beings from the logical, ontological or chronological standpoints. Similar difficulties attach to the concept of "being letting-be". But what is perhaps most striking from the standpoint of revelation is not how much Macquarrie's analysis of "primordial revelation" coincides with the Christian viewpoint but how little. Whilst there are parallels with certain events in the Bible, such as Isaiah in the temple (Isa. 6), Peter's confession of Christ (Matt. 16:17 par.), the transfiguration (Matt. 17:1–8 par.), Paul on the Damascus road (Acts 9:3–9; 22:6–11; 26:12–18), and perhaps the resurrection appearances, there is much more in the OT and the NT which is regarded as the meaningful self-disclosure of God. The proclamation of the prophets in terms of "Thus says the Lord. . ." and the dominical "But I say unto you. . .", the parabolic teaching of Jesus and the law and the proclamation of the gospel are all forms of disclosure. At the same time, the biblical writers are aware of a revelation in nature (cf.

Ps. 19:1 ff.; Rom. 1:19 ff.; Acts 14:17; see below 2 (a)) and in other religions and philosophies (Acts 17:26–29, quoting Epimenides and Aratus, Phaenomena 5; → God, art. theos NT 4 (b)).

2. Revelation in Nature and History. (a) We have already had occasion to note certain strands of biblical teaching which speak of a revelation in nature (see above 1 (a) and (f)). The passages in question maintain that man has an awareness of God apart from the special revelation given through Christ and Scripture, though this does not amount to a saving knowledge of God. Nor, despite Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theologiae 1 Q.2) do these passages entitle us to say that the existence of God can be proved from nature by such arguments as the cosmological and the teleological arguments which argue back from evidences of causation and purpose to a first cause or original designer. The Bible itself contains no such proofs. Rather the passages in question claim that reflection on nature indicates something of the kind of God that God is. Thus the heavens declare his glory (Ps. 19:1). On the other hand, the same Psalm proclaims that it is the law of God which revives the soul, and his testimony which makes the simple wise (v. 7). The thrust of Matt. 6:16 ff., 45; Acts 14:17; 17:26–29; Rom. 1:19 ff. is not to prove the existence of God but to point out lessons from the natural world that we can learn about God. Thus, God cares for the flowers and the birds; a fortiori he will care for his children. The fruits of the earth and the seasons testify to his providential concern. The pagan poets have an awareness that man's being is sustained by the invisible God; we ought not therefore to think of him in terms of idols, "a representation by the art and imagination of man" (Acts 17:29). Similarly, in Rom., God is not to be reduced to an image or idol (Rom. 1:23), for such things could not have wrought the created order that we live in. "For what can be known about God is plain to them, because God has shown it to them. Ever since the creation of the world his invisible nature, namely, his eternal power and deity, has been clearly perceived in the things that have been made. So they are without excuse; for although they knew God they did not honour him as God or give thanks to him, but they became futile in their thinking and their senseless minds were darkened. Claiming to be wise, they became fools, and exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man or birds or animals or reptiles" (Rom. 1:19–23).

G. Bornkamm has drawn attention to the parallels with the Stoic terminology and apologetic trains of thought that are characteristic of Hellenistic Judaism, especially Wis. 12 f. and Philo (in "The Revelation of God's Wrath (Romans 1–3)", Early Christian Experience, 1969, 50 ff.; cf. G. Kuhlmann, Theologia Naturalis bei Philon und bei Paulus, Neutestamentliche Forschungen I, 7, 1930; J. N. Sevenster, Paul and Seneca, Supplements to NovT 4, 1961). Thus, Cleanthes' Hymn to Zeus begins: "Greetings, most glorious of the immortals, of many names, almighty Zeus, ruler of nature, you who govern the universe according to law." It goes on to say: "For we Thine offspring are, and all created things that live and move on earth receive from Thee the image of the One" (ibid., lines 4 f.). The hymn concludes: "Therefore all-giving Zeus, clouded in darkness, powerful as lightning, save men from their miserable foolishness; banish it, O Father, from their souls and let them acquire reason, with which you rule all in justice, that we, so honoured by you, return to you the honour, for there is nothing higher for mortals and for gods than, as is proper always, to praise the all-governing law." There is an affinity between the Stoic concern for the law and Philo: "His exordium, as I have said, is one that excites our admiration in the highest degree. It consists of an account of the creation of the world, implying that the world is in harmony with the Law, and the Law with the world, and that the man who observed the Law is constituted thereby a loyal citizen of the world, regulating his doings by the purpose and will of Nature, in accordance with which the entire world itself is administered" (Op. Mund. 3; for further instances see Bornkamm, op. cit., 50–53).

But, as Bornkamm points out, there is a common feature of the Hellenistic doctrine of God which is lacking in Paul: in Paul one does not ascend from below to above (op. cit., 50). On the other hand, sin may distort this knowledge of God which comes from God through nature, but it does not completely destroy it (cf. Rom. 1:32). "If Paul speaks to man as he does in order that he may know about God's creative power, his law, the folly of idolatry, the sacrilege of a deification of the world, the error of the moral life and the legitimacy of the death sentence which comes as a consequence, he is saying that this knowledge does not represent a solution for him at all. Rather, it seals his lostness. Thus, the all-pervading intention of his statements and their difference from the parallel texts becomes fully clear. Therefore, Rom. 1:18 ff. is not an apologetic and pedagogical discussion, because the intention of the Apostle is not to infer God's being from the world, but to uncover the being of the world from God's revelation; not to prove the revelation of God before the judgment of the world, but to unveil the judgment of God over the world revealed in the law" (G. Bornkamm, op. cit., 58 f.).

(b) Alongside the theologies of the word developed by Barth, Bultmann and others in the mid-twentieth century a number of biblical scholars have elaborated theologies of revelation in history. G. Ernest Wright maintains that one of the distinctive features of the Bible is to see history and historical tradition "as the primary sphere in which God reveals himself" (God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital, SBT 8, 1952, 55). He goes on to say, "To be sure, God also reveals himself and his will in various ways to the inner consciousness of man, as in other religions. Yet the nature and content of this inner revelation is determined by the outward, objective happenings of history in which individuals are called to participate. It is, therefore, the objectivity of God's historical acts which are the focus of attention, not the subjectivity of inner, emotional, diffuse and mystical experience" (ibid.). Central to this idea is the concept of God's "election of a special people through whom he would accomplish his purposes" (ibid.). This in turn provides the framework not only for the exodus and the giving of the law but for prophetic eschatology and apocalyptic. It also contrasts with much of the surrounding religion in which historical events play little or no part (cf. also The Old Testament against its Environment, SBT 2, 1950).

An objection which has been levelled against Wright is that the language of the "God who acts" has been taken over from the realism of the biblical narrative itself. Unless one is willing to maintain that the events took place much as they are described, one is open to the charge of equivocation (cf. L. Gilkey, "Cosmology, Ontology and the Travail of Biblical Language", JR 41, 1961, 194–205; and Naming the Whirlwind, 1969). In later works Wright has tended to stress Israelite mental patterns, such as the covenant, rather than the underlying history (cf. The Old Testament and Theology, 1969), and this has raised a question mark in the minds of some scholars as to how seriously the idea of the "God who acts" is to be taken.

The work of G. von Rad also lays great stress on salvation history (cf. Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1966; Genesis, 1972²; Deuteronomy, 1966; Studies in Deuteronomy, SBT 9 1953). But by contrast with Wright who was more concerned with archaeology than exegesis of the text, von Rad laid great stress on literary analysis, form-criticism and tradition history, and in particular the kerygma of the various strata within the texts. Thus the OT proclaimed the actions of Yahweh in history. On the other hand, von Rad drew a distinction between this confession of history and the actual history as it was, even though the confession is rooted in the latter. It is this gap between the two histories that makes it difficult to accept the proclamation of salvation history. Moreover, von Rad held that this view fitted the Deuteronomistic outlook, but not the whole of the OT. The story of David is not included. Neither is the late OT tradition because of changes in the view of history and the law.

According to B. Albrektson, History and the Gods, 1967, the differences between Israel and other religions in the Near East have been overstressed, and J. Barr argues that the differences between Greek thinking and Hebrew thinking are also less clear cut than have been imagined (cf. Old and New in Interpretation: A Study of the Two Testaments, 1966, 34–64 and 65–102). Clearly not all the OT is historical in its outlook; some of its thought forms have been influenced by Greek thought. Moreover, in Hellenistic times when Hebrew thought came into contact with the Greek world it did not only not lose its historical sense but became even more interested in history.

In the sphere of NT studies Oscar Cullmann has made a major contribution with his stress on salvation history (Ger. Heilsgeschichte; cf. Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History, 1951; The Christology of the New Testament, 1959; and Salvation in History, 1967; for further discussion of his view → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1 (e)). Cullmann saw the NT understanding of time as a line formed by the joining together of decisive moments, constituted by the decisive acts of God in time. For Cullmann the eschatological acts of God are not so transcendent as to be hidden from view. They become objective in history, and as such become the object of faith. “Faith means that in humility I turn away from myself and look only to the radiant light of an event in which I am totally uninvolved, so that I can only fall down and worship him who has brought about this event (Rom. 1:21)” (Salvation in History, 321).

In the realm of systematic theology Wolfhart Pannenberg has reacted against both the theologies of the word and the more restricted view of salvation history in favour of a universal view of history (cf. Jesus – God and Man, 1968; Basic Questions in Theology, I–III, 1970–73; W. Pannenberg, ed., Revelation as History, 1969; and J. M. Robinson and J. B. Cobb, eds., Theology as History. New Frontiers in Theology III, 1967). Within the Bible there is a broadening perspective of history. “It is not so much the course of history as it is the end of history that is at one with the essence of God. But insofar as the end presupposes the course of history, because it is the perfection of it, then also the course of history belongs in essence to the revelation of God, for history receives its unity from its goal” (Revelation as History, 133). But this does not mean that we are left completely in the dark about the meaning of history. “With the resurrection of Jesus the end of history has already occurred, although it does not strike us in this way. It is through the resurrection that the God of Israel has substantiated his deity in an ultimate way and is now manifest as the God of all men. It is only the eschatological character of the Christ event that establishes that there will be no further self-manifestation of God beyond this event. Thus, the end of the world will be on a cosmic scale what has already happened in Christ" (op. cit., 142). Within this framework of universal history "The Word relates itself to revelation as foretelling, forthtelling and report" (op. cit., 152). The events themselves are revelatory and as such are "self-evident" (op. cit., 155). They are capable of being perceived by anyone without special revelation. The word of proclamation merely draws attention to the revelation in the event.

3. Towards a Synthesis. (a) The advocates of revelation in history have been accused of imprecision and ambiguity in their attitude to history. For many of them would be unwilling to regard as historical all the events in the Bible which are depicted as historical (cf. J. Barr, "Revelation in History", IDB Supplementary Volume 746 f.). Clearly, to regard an event as revelatory does not necessarily imply the suspension of all natural and historical causes. For God can work through them as well as apart from them. The revelation in such a case would consist in God's guidance of the event and in his making it clear by the nature of the event and its interpretation by the accompanying prophetic or apostolic word what its significance is. But it would be impossible to accept as revelation a story that was intended to refer to an event that had happened, if there is no historical basis for the event. This is not to say that the stylistic conventions of historical reporting at any given period are to be taken as a kind of photograph of the event taking place. Rather, the event has to be understood in terms of the form and style of the narrative in the light of the appropriate critical and hermeneutical procedures for understanding the text. But it is not the thought-patterns of ancient Israel which are the true foundation of a biblical theology but the revelation of God in and through them. A study of the thought-patterns alone might conceivably be a matter of antiquarian interest. The resultant theology would give an account of how the Israelites looked at life and history. But as such, it would not amount to revelation. Only if there is an apprehension of the living God in and through these thought-patterns can we speak of revelation. And if the ostensibly historical narratives have no historical basis, the concept of a revelation in history is a contradiction in terms. This is not to say that we must take a pessimistic view of the historicity of the OT and the NT. Rather, the reverse. But the advocates of the idea of biblical revelation must be prepared to defend the historicity of the events recorded in the Bible in the light of all the techniques of modern scholarship.

(b) Conservative scholars in the past have tended to base their case on the formal statements of Scripture itself about Scripture. We have noted already the charge of circularity in the argument and Barth's reply (see above 1 (a)). In the last analysis revelation must be self-authenticating. That is, there cannot be external proofs; it must carry with it its own validation by enabling the recipient of revelation to grasp the truth of the revelation and be grasped by it. On the other hand, the claim to revelation through the assertions of Scripture is, like the concept of historical revelation, open to falsification. If the truth claims of a purported revelation can be shown to be false on a factual level, we can hardly claim it to represent the truth about God and man on any other level.

(c) A view which is sometimes presented as an alternative to propositional revelation is the idea that revelation takes place through symbols and images. This has been argued by Austin Farrer (The Glass of Vision, 1948) and E. L. Mascall (Words and Images, 1957; and Theology and Images, 1963) within the context of an Anglican theism, and by Paul Tillich (see especially "The Meaning and Justification of Religious Symbols" and "The Religious Symbol" in S. Hook, ed., Religious Experience and Truth: A Symposium, 1962, 3–11 and 301–21) in the context of Tillich's anti-theistic view of God as the ground of being or being itself. Basically the symbol has two aspects, the symbolic material, i.e. the ordinary meaning of the word, the empirical reality of the person or object, and that to which this points. Through symbols one is pointed to a reality beyond the immediate empirical and material context and dimensions of reality are opened up which would be otherwise hidden or obscured. Symbols have also an integrating and even a disintegrating power (as in the case of the swastika as a symbol of hate and racism). Examples of biblical symbolism are the lamb of God, light, living water, the shepherd, the king, and the vine. Instances could readily be multiplied. In the thought-world of the Bible we do not remain with these concepts on a literal and empirical level; but neither can we dispense with them. Rather, by apprehending them in the contexts in which they are given we are enabled to grasp something of the reality which they represent. But it would be a mistake to think that images and symbols are simply given apart from any context whatsoever. In fact, they come within the context of history and language, and therefore symbolism is not an alternative to revelation in history and revelation through words but an aspect of both. It is as such that any future doctrine of revelation must take them into account.

(d) In addition to symbolism any future doctrine of biblical revelation must take into account the question of hermeneutics and the function of language in its many forms. (On these subjects see the articles on Explain and Word and the literature referred to there.) In order to penetrate the meaning of an utterance one has to study not only its grammatical and syntactical form; one has also to penetrate the thought-world out of which it comes and relate the utterance and the thought-world to our present-day world. Moreover, it has to be recognized that terms change and develop in meaning within Scripture. It would be an anachronism, for example, to read into the LXX use of ekklesia the later Pauline understanding of "church". On the other hand, our understanding is greatly enriched when we see organic connexions between the uses of words in their various contexts. It has also to be recognized that Scripture does not present us with a single, unified world-view which remains unchanged from Genesis to Revelation. Rather, we are given a series of inter-related world-views which are unified by their relationship to God himself who has spoken to men and dealt with them within concrete historical situations. The Christian view of revelation maintains that the God who spoke and acted then is the same God who speaks and acts now, and that the words, actions and symbolism of the past are media through which God speaks today in our contemporary situation. Without media of some form or other there is no revelation. In this life we do not perceive God directly but only indirectly (1 Cor. 13:12; cf. Matt. 5:8; Exod. 33:20 ff.). Thus there is a sense in which revelation involves a veiling of God in the media of revelation in all their concreteness and historicity in the selfsame act as the unveiling (cf. K. Barth, CD I, 1, 188). Our knowledge of God in his revelation of himself depends in part therefore on our understanding of the concrete media of revelation.

Revelation is frequently said to have an objective and a subjective side. The objective side consists of what is revealed: the media of revelation through which God makes himself known. The subjective side is the activity of God himself in opening man's eyes to see. Paul insists that this is the work of the → Spirit, and without it man cannot come into a personal, saving relationship with God (1 Cor. 2:4–16; 2 Cor. 3:6–4:15; cf. also Eph. 2:18; Matt. 16:17). In these passages Paul makes it plain that without the Spirit one cannot have a true knowledge of either Scripture or Christ.

From the philosophical standpoint of analyzing what happens in the process of understanding, I. T. Ramsey has spoken of “disclosure situations” (cf. Religious Language: An Empirical Placing of Theological Phrases, 1957; Christian Discourse: Some Logical Explorations, 1965; Models for Divine Activity 1973; and Christian Empiricism, ed. J. H. Gill, 1974, 59–142). Religious language represents a kind of model which is not identical with God, because of course it operates on the human plane. A model is not the same as the thing which it represents. On the other hand, by understanding it the mind is enabled to grasp something of the reality which it represents. Thus, by grasping the words and images of the revelation one is able to perceive something of the reality of God himself. When this happens a disclosure takes place.

This process does not apply solely to words and symbols; it applies also to history. Strictly speaking, a historical account is not a reconstruction of the original event. For that would strictly involve trying to re-enact the event on the same scale. Rather, the work of the historian (whether it is a matter of primary reporting or critical research) is more akin to that of the model maker who constructs something which is not identical with the original but which enables one to grasp what the original is like. Thus, the biblical historians do not attempt to give every detail. Rather, they give an interpretative picture through which one may grasp the significant activity of God and man. The function of this activity is not simply to provide information, although it does this. It is through the information that the recipient encounters the divine reality in the original event and also interprets his own existence. For the original events and pronouncements serve as paradigms or models for understanding our own situation. Thus, the exodus and exile serve as patterns for understanding the Christian's pilgrim walk (1 Pet. 1:1; 2:11). The priesthood is a model for understanding Christ's priesthood, although he was never technically and formally a priest, and of the believer's access to God (Heb. 9:11 ff.; 1 Pet. 2:9). To make this point is not to say that revelation has ceased at some point in the past. Indeed, there is a sense in which revelation is an on-going process. For in so far as God continues to have dealings with men, this is in fact a revelation of himself. Rather, the revelations of the past serve as paradigms for our understanding of God's dealings with us in the present.

To demand that revelation should be understood in terms of such alternatives as propositional revelation or revelation in history, or a general revelation or revelation through symbols, is to present false antitheses. Since words are part and parcel of history, they cannot be precluded from the concept of revelation in history. Conversely, in so far as the prophetic, dominical and apostolic words give interpretations of God's actions in history, we cannot say that the revelation resides exclusively in propositions. Moreover, language is more than propositions, making factual statements. The → parables, for example, do not function as interesting stories. They are designed to provoke an element of response in which disclosure of truth, personal commitment and encounter with God take place. Similarly, the imperatives of Scripture invite a response which has both horizontal and vertical dimensions, in that our response to our fellow man also involves our relationship with God (cf. 1 Jn. 4:20). Revelation cannot therefore be reduced simply to the intellectual apprehension of and mental assent to a series of propositions. On the other hand, the assertive element in revelation cannot be ignored either.

The pre-Reformation church made the great mistake of propounding the doctrine of transubstantiation to explain the action of God in the Lord's Supper, claiming that at the moment of consecration the whole substance of the bread and the wine were changed into the whole substance of the body and blood of Christ, although the accidents (the outward appearances) remained. The debate about revelation has tended to make the tacit assumption that a similar change takes place in the media of revelation when God reveals himself either in history or through Scripture as his Word. But in God's actions in history and his dealings with us today there is not necessarily a suspension of natural causes but the working of God in and through them. Similarly, the words of Scripture do not lose their historicity and concreteness, neither do they cease to be human words. They retain their human-ness, and all the specific character of their origins in particular situations at particular points in time. They have to be grasped in the light of grammar, syntax and semantics, history and the conceptual world of their age. And yet at the same time they are the vehicle of God's self-disclosure. It is factors such as these that future doctrines of revelation must take into account.

C. Brown

→ Explain, → Faith, → Reason, → Scripture, → Truth, → Word

(a). P. J. Achtemeier, An Introduction to the New Hermeneutic, 1969; K. Aland, The Problem of the New Testament Canon, 1962; B. Albrektson, History and the Gods, 1967; R. G. Alexander, "On the Language of the New Hermeneuticians", Lutheran Quarterly 20, 1968, 52–60; P. Althaus, Fact and Faith in the Kerygma Today, 1960; J. Baillie, Our Knowledge of God, 1939; and The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought, 1956; J. Baillie and H. Martin, eds., Revelation, 1927; J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language, 1961; Old and New in Interpretation, 1966; The Bible in the Modern World, 1973; "Revelation through History in the Old Testament and in Modern Theology", Princeton Seminary Bulletin 56, 1963, 4–14; "Jewish Apocalyptic in Recent Scholarly Study", BJRL 58, 1975, 9–35; "Revelation in History", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 746–49; and Fundamentalism, 1977; K. Barth, Church Dogmatics I, The Doctrine of the Word of God, Part 1 1975², Part 2 1956; H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth, combined volume 1972; W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, 1971; H. Bavinck, The Philosophy of Revelation, Stone Lectures 1908–9, 1953; G. R. Beasley-Murray, "New Testament Apocalyptic – A Christological Eschatology", Review and Expositor 72, 1975, 317–23; R. Beralot, "Revelation and Manifestation", SJT 15, 1962, 44–49; D. M. Beegle, The Inspiration of Scripture, 1963; G. C. Berkouwer, General Revelation, 1955; and Holy Scripture, 1975; E. Bevan, Symbolism and Belief, 1938; J. G. Bishop, "Psychological Insights in St Paul's Mysticism", Theology 78, 1975, 318–24; R. A. Bohlmann, Principles of Biblical Interpretation in the Lutheran Confessions, 1968; T. Boman, Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, 1960; C. E. Braaten, History and Hermeneutics, 1966; J. Bright, The Authority of the Old Testament, 1967; G. Bornkamm, "The Revelation of God's Wrath (Romans 1–3)", in Early Christian Experience, 1969, 47–70; C. E. Braaten, History and Hermeneutics, 1966; C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 1967; C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith: Four Exploratory Studies, 1976; Philosophy and the Christian Faith, 1974²; and "Bultmann Revisited", The Churchman 88, 1974, 167–87; N. Brox, "Revelation", EBT II 770–75; F. F. Bruce, The New Testament Documents. Are they Reliable? 1960²; Tradition Old and New, 1970; "A Reappraisal of Jewish Apocalyptic Literature", Review and Expositor 72, 1975, 305–15; and "Was Paul a Mystic?", Reformed Theological Review 34, 1975, 66–75; F. F. Bruce and E. G. Rupp, eds., Holy Book and Holy Tradition, 1968; E. Brunner, The Word and the World, 1931; Revelation and Reason: The Christian Doctrine of Faith and Knowledge, 1947; Truth as Encounter: A New Edition, Much Enlarged, of The Divine-Human Encounter, 1964; and with K. Barth, Natural Theology: Comprising 'Nature and Grace' by Professor Emil Brunner and the Reply 'No!' by Dr. Karl Barth, 1946; R. Bryant, The Bible's Authority Today, 1968; R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, 1935; Jesus Christ and Mythology, 1960; Theology of the New Testament, I–II, 1952–55; The Gospel of John, 1971; Existence and Faith, (1961) 1964, see especially the essay on “The Concept of Revelation in the New Testament”, (1920) 67–106; Essays Philosophical and Theological, 1955; History and Eschatology, 1962; and Faith and Understanding: Collected Essays, 1969; deleō, TDNT II 61 f.; R. Bultmann and D. Lührmann, phainō etc., TDNT IX 1–10; J. Burnaby, In What Sense is the Bible Inspired?, 1960; J. T. Burtchaell, Catholic Theories of Inspiration since 1810, 1969; F. W. Camfield, Revelation and the Holy Spirit: An Essay in Barthian Theology, 1933; H. von Campenhausen, The Formation of the Christian Bible, 1972; B. S. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis, 1970; G. H. Clark, Religion, Reason and Revelation, 1961; G. Cope, Symbolism in the Bible and in the Church, 1959; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History, (1951) 1964³; “The Tradition”, in The Early Church, 1956, 59–105; The Christology of the New Testament, 1959; and Salvation in History, 1967; R. E. Davies, The Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers, 1946; and Religious Authority in an Age of Doubt, 1968; W. D. Davies, Christian Origins and Judaism, 1962; M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972; H. Diem, Dogmatics, 1959; F. W. Dillistone, ed., Myth and Symbol, SPCK Theological Collections 7, 1966; C. H. Dodd, The Authority of the Bible, 1935; According to the Scriptures, 1952; and The Bible and the Greeks, 1954; F. G. Downing, “Revelation in the New Testament and among its Expounders”, StudEv II (TU 87) 183 ff.; and Has Christianity a Revelation?, 1964; G. Ebeling, The Nature of Faith, 1961; The Problem of Historicity, 1967; Theology and Proclamation, 1966; and Word and Faith, 1963; E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 1957; and “The Authority of the Bible: Critical Judgments in Biblical Perspective”, EQ 39, 1967, 196–204; C. F. Evans, Is 'Holy Scripture' Christian? and Other Questions, 1971; D. D. Evans, The Logic of Self-Involvement, 1963; A. M. Fairweather, The Word as Truth: A Critical Examination of the Christian Doctrine of Revelation in the Writings of Thomas Aquinas and Karl Barth, 1944; H. H. Farmer, Revelation and Religion: Studies in the Theological Interpretation of Religious Types, 1954; A. Farrer, A Rebirth of Images: The Making of St John's Apocalypse, 1949; G. Florovsky, Bible, Church, Tradition: An Eastern Orthodox View, 1972; R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament: His Application of Old Testament Passages to Himself and His Mission, 1971; H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative, 1974; and The Identity of Jesus Christ, 1975; C. J. Friedrich, Jr., ed., Authority, 1958; E. C. Fudge, “Language, Revelation and Illumination”, SJT 26, 1973, 1–23; D. P. Fuller, Easter Faith and History, 1965; R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic and the Word of God, 1966; L. Gaussen, Theopneustia, 1840; L. D. Gilkey, “Cosmology, Ontology and the Travail of Biblical Language”, JR 41, 1961, 194–205; Naming the Whirlwind: The Renewal of God-Language, 1969; A. Galloway, Wolfhart Pannenberg, 1973; C. Gore, “The Holy Spirit and Inspiration”, in C. Gore, ed., Lux Mundi: A Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation, 1889, 313–62; and The Doctrine of the Infallible Book, 1924; P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic, 1975; P. Helm, “Revealed Propositions and Timeless Truths”, Religious Studies 8, 1972, 127–36; and The Varieties of Belief, 1973; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation and Authority, I–IV, 1976–; C. F. H. Henry, ed., Revelation and the Bible, 1958; L. Hodgson et al., On the Authority of the Bible, 1960; S. Hook, ed., Religious Experience and Truth: A Symposium, 1962; D. Jenkins, Tradition and Spirit, 1951; J. Jeremias, The Problem of the Historical Jesus, Facet Books, 1964; P. K. Jewett, Emil Brunner's Concept of Revelation, 1954; F. E. Johnson, Religious Symbolism, 1955; E. Käsemann, “The New Testament Canon and the Unity of the Church”, in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 1964, 95–107; C. W. Kegley, ed., The Theology of Emil Brunner, 1962; and The Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, 1966; C. W. Kegley and R. W. Bretall, eds., The Theology of Paul Tillich, 1966; D. H. Kelsey, The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology, 1975; S. Kierkegaard, On Authority and Revelation, 1966; K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic, SBT Second Series 22, 1972; W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems, 1972; G. E. Ladd, The New Testament and Criticism, 1967; and “Revelation and Tradition in Paul”, in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 223–30; R. B. Laurin, ed., Contemporary Old Testament Theologians, 1970; A. L. Lilley, Religion and Revelation, 1932; H. Lindsell, The Battle for the Bible, 1976; R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975; H. D. McDonald, Ideas of Revelation: An Historical Study A.D. 1700 to A.D. 1860, 1959; and Theories of Revelation: An Historical Study 1860–1960, 1963; J. G. Machen, Christianity and Liberalism, 1923; R. A. F. MacKenzie, Faith and History in the Old Testament, 1963; J. Macquarrie, Principles of Christian Theology, 1966; I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977; E. L. Mascall, Words and Images, 1957; and Theology and Images, 1963; J. Moltmann, "Eschatology and Revelation", in Theology of Hope: On the Ground and Implications of a Christian Eschatology, 1967, 37–94; J. W. Montgomery, ed., Crisis in Lutheran Theology, I–II, 1967; and God's Inerrant Word: An International Symposium on the Trustworthiness of Scripture, 1974; G. Moran, Theology of Revelation, 1967; and God Still Speaks: The Basis of Christian Education, 1967; J. Moreau, Language and Religious Language, 1961; L. Morris, I Believe in Revelation, 1976; P. Munz, Problems of Religious Knowledge, 1959; S. Neill, The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1961, 1964; H. R. Niebuhr, The Meaning of Revelation, 1960; A. Oepke, apokalyptō, apokalypsis, TDNT III 563–92; J. Orr, Revelation and Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, 1946; H. W. Robinson, ed., Record and Revelation, God and Man, 1968; Basic Questions in Theology, I–III, 1970–73; Theology and the Philosophy of Science, 1976; W. Pannenberg, ed., Revelation as History, 1969; C. H. Pinnock, Biblical Revelation – The Foundation of Christian Theology, 1971; R. Preus, The Inspiration of Scripture: A Study of the Theology of the Seventeenth Century Lutheran Dogmaticians, 1957²; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; K. Rahner, Inspiration in the Bible, 1964; K. Rahner and J. Ratzinger, Revelation and Tradition, 1966; B. Ramm, Special Revelation and the Word of God, 1961; J. K. S. Reid, The Authority of Scripture: A Study of the Reformation and Post-Reformation Understanding of the Bible, 1957; A. Richardson, A Preface to Bible Study, 1954; The Bible in the Age of Science, 1961; History – Sacred and Profane, 1964; A. Richardson and W. Schweitzer, eds., Biblical Authority for Today, 1951; H. W. Robinson, Redemption and Revelation in the Actuality of History, 1942; and Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament, 1946; H. W. Robinson, ed., Record and Revelation, 1938; J. M. Robinson and J. Cobb, eds., The Later Heidegger and Theology. New Frontiers in Theology I, 1963; and Theology as History. New Frontiers in Theology III, 1967; H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic: A Study of Jewish and Christian Apocalypses from Daniel to the Revelation, 1944; and The Unity of the Bible, 1957; K. Runia, Karl Barth's Doctrine of Holy Scripture, 1962; E. F. Scott, The New Testament Idea of Revelation, 1935; W. Sanday, The Oracles of God, 1891; and Inspiration, 1896; J. Sanders, Torah and Canon, 1972; E. Schillebeeckx, Revelation and Theology, 1967; A. Schweitzer, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, 1931; W. Schmithals, An Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann, 1968; J. Smart, The Interpretation of Scripture, 1961; H. P. Smith, Inspiration and Inerrancy, 1893; A. Snell, Truth in Words, 1965; D. G. Spriggs, Two Old Testament Theologies: A Comparative Evaluation of the Contributions of Eichrodt and von Rad to our Understanding of the Nature of Old Testament Theology, SBT 30, 1975; N. B. Stonehouse and P. Woolley, eds., The Infallible Word, 1946; A. Sundberg, The Old Testament of the Early Church, 1964; L. J. Swindler, ed., Scripture and Ecumenism, 1965; G. H. Tavard, Holy Writ or Holy Church: The Crisis of the Protestant Reformation, 1959; M. C. Tenney, ed., The Bible – The Living Word of Revelation, 1968; A. C. Thiselton, "The Parables as Language-Event. Some Comments on Fuchs's Hermeneutics in the Light of Linguistic Philosophy", SJT 23, 1970, 437–68; "The Use of Philosophical Categories in New Testament Hermeneutics", The Churchman 87, 1973, 87–100; "The Theology of Paul Tillich", The Churchman 88, 1974, 86–107; "Kierkegaard and the Nature of Truth", The Churchman 89, 1975, 85–107; "The New Hermeneutic", in I. H. Marshall, op. cit., 308–33; and New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description: Issues in New Testament Hermeneutics with Special Reference to the Use of Philosophical Description in Heidegger, Bultmann, Gadamer and Wittgenstein (Dissertation, Sheffield), 1976; L. S. Thornton, Revelation and the Modern World, Being the First Part of a Treatise on the Form of a Servant, 1950; P. Tillich, "The Meaning and Justification of Religious Symbols" and "The Religious Symbol", in S. Hook, ed., op. cit., 3–11 and 301–21; and Systematic Theology, I, 1953; J. G. S. Thomson, The Old Testament View of Revelation, 1960; E. F. Tupper, The Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg, 1974; H. E. W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth, 1954; J. H. Walgrave, Unfolding Revelation: The Nature of Doctrinal Development, 1972; H. Wansbrough, Event and Interpretation, 1973; J. F. Walvoord, ed., Inspiration and Interpretation, 1957; B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 1948; J. W. Wenham, Christ and the Bible, 1972; G. E. Wright, The Old Testament against its Environment, SBT 2, 1950; God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital, SBT 8, 1952; and The Old Testament and Theology, 1969; E. J. Young, Thy Word is Truth, 1950.

(b). M. Albertz, Die Botschaft des Neuen Testaments, I, 1947, 16 ff.; P. Althaus, "Offenbarung als Geschichte und Glaube", TLZ 87, 1962, 321 ff.; F. Baumgärtel, "Das Offenbarungszeugnis des Alten Testaments im Lichte der religionsgeschichtlich-vergleichenden Forschung", ZTK 64, 1967, 393 ff.; A. Bea, De Inspiratione et Inerrantia Sacrae Scripturae, 1954; H. Benkert, "Offenbarung", EKL II 1652 ff.; O. Betz, Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte, 1960; H. Diem, Das Problem des Schriftkanons, 1952; and Was heisst Schriftgemäss?, 1958; U. Duchrow, "Die Klarheit der Schrift und die Vernunft", KuD 15, 1969, 1–17; C. M. Edsman, W. Eichrodt, E. L. Dietrich, L. Richter, G. Gloege, "Offenbarung", *RGG*³ IV 1597 ff.; H. Fries, "Offenbarung", LTK VIII 1106 ff.; G. Gloege, "Offenbarung und Überlieferung", TLZ 79, 1954, 213 ff., H. Gollwitzer, Gottes Offenbarung und unsere Vorstellung von Gott, 1965³; M. Haag, "'Offenbarung' in der hebräischen Bibel", ThZ 16, 1960, 251 ff.; H. H. Huber, Der Begriff der Offenbarung im Johannesevangelium 1934; Jörg Jeremias, Theophanie. Die Geschichte einer alttestamentlichen Gattung, 1965; H. Kahlefeld, Die Epiphanie des Erlösers im Johannesevangelium, 1954; D. Lührmann, Das Offenbarungsverständnis bei Paulus und in paulinischen Gemeinden, WMANT 16, 1965; W. Mundle, "Das Problem der Offenbarung bei Paulus", Deutsches Pfarrblatt, 1938, 567 ff.; and "Jesus Christus, die Mitte des neutestamentlichen Zeugnisses von der Offenbarung", Lutherischer Rundblick 12, 1964, 114 ff.; R. Rendtorff, "Geschichte und Wort im Alten Testament", EvTh 22, 1962, 621 ff.; W. Schmauch, Orte der Offenbarung und der Offenbarungsort im Neuen Testament, 1956; R. Schnackenburg, "Zum Offenbarungsgedanken in der Bibel", BZ Neue Folge 7, 1963, 1 ff.; H. Schulte, Der Begriff der Offenbarung im Neuen Testament, EvTh Beihefte 13, 1949; W. Zimmerli, "'Offenbarung' im Alten Testament", EvTh 22, 1962, 15 ff.

Reville, Blaspheme, Slander

The use of speech gives us a certain control over objects. Words produce concepts of the things to which they refer and are thus important, in affecting our relationship with things. For this reason the word came, in the thought of primitive peoples, to be invested with magical powers, since it could, as it were, conjure up or alter the object named. This fact enables us to understand the original meaning and function of abuse, slander and calumny (→ Curse). In the NT, a whole range of terms is found which seem in part to be synonymous, but which, on closer examination, reveal different emphases. The strongest form of calumny, which is very near to a curse, is expressed by the words of the blasphēmēō group. In the NT, this group of words almost always refers directly or indirectly to an attitude towards God. katalalēō, on the other hand, means to slander; it denotes a hostile attitude towards a fellow man. The words of the loidoreō group are not religious in origin, and mean rather to abuse (probably, at first, to make fun of). In some passages the meaning is close to that of blasphēmēō.

Certain other terms should be mentioned, which belong to this category, but are not treated in separate articles. oneidizō and oneidismos refer to a reproach thrown against someone (originally against the gods!). In the NT, for instance, Jesus reproached or upbraided the cities of Galilee (Matt. 27:44 par. Matt. 11:20); but the same word refers to the reviling of Jesus (Mk. 15:32) and his disciples (Matt. 5:11; Lk. 6:22; cf. 1 Pet. 4:14). In the longer ending of Mk. Jesus upbraided the unbelief of the eleven (Mk. 16:14). On Heb. 11:26 and Rom. 15:3 (cf. 1 Tim. 3:7) → Possessions, art. thesauros NT 3. The vb. also occurs at Jas. 1:5 and the noun at 1 Tim. 3:7; Heb. 10:33; 13:13. oneidos, reproach, insult, disgrace occurs only at Lk. 1:25 (cf. Gen. 30:23; Isa. 4:1), of Elizabeth's joy at being pregnant, the Lord having taken away the disgrace of being childless. In Matt. 5:11 and Lk. 6:22 the meaning of oneidizō comes near to that of empaizō, which originally meant to behave childishly, to make fun of, and then to ridicule. empaizō, ridicule, make fun of, mock, occurs only in the Synoptic Gospels, and in 11 out of 13 instances refers to the mocking of Jesus during his passion (Matt. 20:19 par. Mk. 10:34, Lk. 18:32; Matt. 27:29, 31, 41 par. Mk. 15:20, 31; Lk. 22:63; 23:11, 36). In Lk. 14:29 it occurs in the parable of the tower of those who mock the man's inability to complete it. But in Matt. 2:16 it means to deceive or trick, of Herod by the magi. 2 Pet. 3:3 sees empaigmōnē, mocking, i.e. mockers, or scoffing as a sign of the last days. Luke uses ekmyktērizō, ridicule, sneer, instead (Lk. 16:14; 23:35). Ridicule is here the rejection, in foolish arrogance, of the bearer of revelation. myktērizō (have a nose bleed) means to turn up the nose at, treat with contempt. It occurs at Lk. 23:35 D, and in the pass. of God who is not mocked (Gal. 6:7; cf. Jer. 20:7, of the prophet).

βλασφημέω	βλασφημέω (blasphēmēō), slander, defame, blaspheme; βλασφημία (blasphēmīa), slander, defamation, blasphemy; βλάσφημος (blasphēmos), slanderous, blasphemous, a blasphemer.
-----------	---

CL blasphēmēō (Plato onwards) is simplified from blaps(i)phēmēō, speak harm, being derived from blapsis (cf. blaptō), harm, and phēmi, speak, and means generally to bring into ill repute, slander, blaspheme. blasphēmīa (a noun of action) means profane language, slanderous speech, or slander, defamation, by which another person is damaged. blasphēmos expresses the quality of the action or the doer. Like empaizō, loidoreō, myktērizō, and oneidizō, blasphēmēō expresses the slandering of a person; it is the strongest expression of personal defamation.

In cl. Gk. false representations of the deity, for instance in anthropomorphic terms, can be described as blasphemy (e.g. in Plato, Rep. 2 381e; Vettius Valens 58:12; 67:20); so too can doubts about the authority of the deity (cf. H. W. Beyer, TDNT I 621).

OT These words appear relatively seldom in the LXX (22 times, predominantly in 2 Macc.), and, where there is a basis in the MT, without any consistent Heb. equivalent. blasphēmēō, blasphēmīa and blasphēmos are always in the LXX either directly or indirectly against the majesty of God; and, with a few exceptions, (blasphēmos in Isa. 66:3 for nā'aš, contempt, spurn; Wis. 1:6; Sir. 3:16), they refer to the reviling of the people of Israel by heathen enemies. Thus in a comparison with the king of Assyria, Yahweh is written off as powerless, "reviled" (2 Ki. 19:4 [yākaḥ, rebuke], 6, 22 [gāḏaḏ, revile, blaspheme]); when Israel is under attack, Yahweh is blasphemed against (2 Macc. 8:4; 9:28; 10:4, 34); the Edomites rejoice over the fall of Jerusalem and in so doing blaspheme against Yahweh (Ezek. 35:12 f. [LXX blasphēmīa; MT ne'āšāh, contempt]). In Isa. 52:5 (nā'aš) the lament of the rulers over the continual despising of God's name through the exile is the basis for Yahweh's saving intervention (cf. v. 6). The God of Israel is not as a rule a source of hope and help, or even of fear, for the heathen; and this fact alone is enough to earn them the title in general of blasphemers (blasphēmīa, Dan. 3:29[96] Theodotion, Aram. šālāh or šālū). The LXX clearly reinterprets Lev. 24:16 in a Judaistic sense (cf. Sanhedrin 7:5): "He who blasphemes the name of the LORD [onomazōn to onoma kyriou; lit. "names the name of the LORD] shall be put to death" (Lev. 24:16). The MT has nāqab, curse. Even to name the → name of Yahweh is blasphemy, since the Name of Yahweh may not be pronounced at all (→ God, art. theos OT 2). This does not apply to blasphemy by Israelites only (which is hedged about with the most various stipulations), but also to blasphemy uttered by heathen, which may be requited by God with death (cf. 2 Ki. 19:6 blasphēmēō; 2 Macc. 9:28 blasphēmos). In Judaism the religious use of the words, as in the LXX, is in the main retained. Other instances are: blasphēmēō (Tob. 1:18 v.l.; Add. Dan. Bel Theodotion 9); blasphēmia (Tob. 1:18; 1 Macc. 2:6; 2 Macc. 10:35; 15:24); blasphēmos (2 Macc. 9:28; 10:4).

The concept is sometimes found in the OT even where the technical terms for blasphemy are lacking. It is blasphemy to make use of the name of God for evil ends such as magic and unlawful cursing: "You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that takes his name in vain" (Exod. 20:7; cf. Deut. 5:11). Similarly the king or priest was not to bring discredit upon his sacred office (1 Sam. 3:13; 2 Sam. 12:14), oppose God's chosen (Num. 16:30), break the covenant (Deut. 31:20; Isa. 1:4), or doubt Yahweh's power either in judgment or salvation (Num. 14:11, 23; 20:10 ff.; 2 Ki. 18:30–35; 19:4, 6, 22; 2 Chr. 32:13 ff.; Isa. 5:24; 10:8 ff.; 36:18 ff.; 37:10 ff.). Blasphemy is closely linked with cursing. Job's wife and Satan expected Job to curse God and thus blaspheme (Job 1:11; 2:5, 9). On the other hand, his friends regarded his protestations of innocence as blasphemy (Job 15:2–6; 34:35 ff.). To mock or oppose God's people is blasphemy (Isa. 52:5; Ezek. 35:12 f.; cf. 1 Macc. 2:6; 2 Macc. 8:4; 10:34; 12:14; 15:24).

These are numerous passages in which the innocent appear to reproach Yahweh, but this is not regarded as blasphemy. It is more like a confession of faith expressing utter dependence on him to act (Exod. 5:22; Num. 11:11 ff.; Jos. 7:7; Isa. 38:13; Jer. 12:1–5; 15:16–21; 20:7–10; Lam. 3:10 f.; Job 9:12–20; 19:6–21; 30:18–23; 38:2; 40:2, 8). On the other hand, genuine blasphemy is a transgression which merits death and is punished by human judges (Lev. 24:10–16; 1 Ki. 21:13) or by God himself (Exod. 20:7; Num. 16:30; Deut. 5:11; 1 Sam. 4:11; 2 Ki. 19:7; 2 Chr. 32:21; Isa. 37:36 ff.; 2 Macc. 9:4, 12, 38). The forms of the penalties suggest the extermination of the guilty party.

NT Words of the blasphēmēō group are found in the NT altogether 56 times (the vb. alone 34 times), without any special concentration in any of the NT books. As in the OT and in Rab. Judaism (cf. SB I 1009 f.), the terms are used in the NT in a religious sense, i.e. with direct or indirect reference to God (with the exception of Jude 9). Blasphemy against God amounts to words or conduct injurious to God's honour and holiness.

1. This sin against God's majesty can consist of blasphemy against God himself (Acts 6:11; Rev. 13:6; 16:11, 21 → Animal, art. thērion), against his → name (Rom. 2:24; 1 Tim. 6:1; Rev. 16:9, where the name is a circumlocution for God himself), against the → word of God (Tit. 2:5), or against God's → angels (2 Pet:10 ff.).

Since Jesus claims for his words and actions messianic authority, and at the same time assumes rights and powers (e.g. to forgive sins, Lk. 5:21), which in the view of the religious Jews and scribes belong to God alone, he is regarded in these circles as a blasphemer (Matt. 9:3 par. Mk. 2:7; Jn. 10:36). The sentence of death against him is therefore based, among other things, on a charge of blasphemy (Matt. 26:65 par. Mk. 14:64). In 1st century Judaism, blasphemy was still an offence deserving death (cf. SB I 1009 ff. on Exod. 22:27 and Num. 15:30 f.). According to Sanhedrin 7:5, the blasphemer is not culpable unless he pronounces the divine name itself (cf. Lev.

24:10 ff.); the judges were to rend their garments on hearing the evidence. The egō eimi ("I am") of Jesus has been understood by some scholars to be a claim to the divine name, implying that Jesus was guilty in Jewish eyes of the crime in Sanhedrin 7:5 (for literature and discussion see D. R. Catchpole, The Trial of Jesus: A Study in the Gospels and Jewish Historiography from A.D. 1770 to the Present Day, 1971, 132 ff.; J. C. O'Neill, "The Charge of Blasphemy at Jesus' Trial before the Sanhedrin", in E. Bammel, ed., The Trial of Jesus, SBT Second Series 13, 1970, 72–77).

2. From the NT point of view, the real blasphemers are those who deny the messianic claims of Jesus, and therefore revile and mock at him like those by the cross who said, "You who would destroy the temple and build it in three days, save yourself! If you are the Son of God, come down from the cross" (Matt. 27:39 f. par. Mk. 15:29; Lk. 22:65; cf. Matt. 26:61; Mk. 13:2; 14:58; Jn. 2:19; Acts 6:14). He who impugns the dignity of the one sent commits an offence against God himself.

3. Since, however, the church of Christ and its members bear witness by their existence to Christ himself, they also undergo the abuse which is directed against their Lord (1 Pet. 4:4; Rev. 2:9). Thus Paul must suffer as Christ's disciple (Acts 13:45; 18:6) what he previously inflicted on the Christians as their persecutor (1 Tim. 1:13). To revile the church which bears Christ's name, can be to mock Christ and thus, indirectly, to blaspheme against God.

4. Christians for their part must take care that they do not, by their own conduct, give cause for blasphemy against God or against his word (1 Tim. 6:1; Tit. 2:5). Indeed, the behaviour of Christ's disciples (even towards each other) should contribute to the glory of the Father (Matt. 5:16). This is probably the sense in which we should interpret the lists of → sins, in which we repeatedly find prohibitions of blasphemy (cf. Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; 1 Tim. 6:4; 2 Tim. 3:2). The disciple is not "to deny . . . the presence of the Spirit by his life" (H. Conzelmann, NTD 8, 82); therefore he is given in these lists of sins explicit instructions about his conduct. Blasphemy is mentioned in them, as being a characteristic of the heathen and of apostate Christians. By contrast Rom. 2:24 adapts Isa. 52:5 LXX (cf. 2 Pet. 2:2). The MT of Isa. 52:5 refers to the reviling of God's name by the oppressors of Israel. The LXX interpretation lays the cause for this with Israel himself.

5. Even the sin of blasphemy can be forgiven (Matt. 12:31 par. Mk. 3:28; Lk. 12:10), including (according to Matt. and Lk.) blasphemy against the Son of man. Only blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is unforgivable (Matt. 12:32 par. Mk. 3:29, Lk. 12:10). This statement has been the subject of much questioning. Obviously the reference here is not to the naming of the Holy Spirit in a blasphemous utterance, for in Matt. 12:32 even blasphemy against the Son of man can be forgiven. Among the many attempts at exegesis, the most convincing is the suggestion that the man who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit is he who has recognized that God is working through the Holy Spirit in the actions of Jesus, and who quite consciously "misrepresent faith in God as faith in the devil. This saying is an extremely serious warning against the demonic and scarcely conceivable potential in man: To declare war on God. This is not done in weakness and doubt, but by one who has been overcome by the Holy Spirit and who knows very well on whom he is declaring war" (E. Schweizer, The Good News according to Mark, 1971, 87; cf. H. W. Beyer, TDNT I 624; O. E. Evans, "The Unforgivable Sin", ExpT 68, 1956–57, 240–44). This is the blasphemer who does it deliberately, after encounter with the God of grace, as the context shows (→ Satan, art. Beelzeboul). For Jesus has just been accused of casting out demons by Beelzebul, the prince of demons. “Therefore he who blasphemes the Spirit is no longer speaking against a God who is distant, about whom he entertains mere foolish thoughts, but against the one who makes evident to him his gracious work, and confirms it with his manifest, divine seal. He is a man who ought to give thanks, not to blaspheme” (A. Schlatter, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, Erläuterungen zum Neuen Testament I, 1962, on Matt. 12:32).

W. L. Lane draws attention to Sifre on Deut. 32:38 (end): “The Holy One, blessed be he, pardons everything else, but on profanation of the Name [i.e. blasphemy] he takes vengeance immediately” (The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 145; cf. M. Smith, Tannaitic Parallels to the Gospels, 1951, 48 f.; E. Lövestam, Spiritus Blasphemia. Eine Studie zu Mk 3, 28 f. par., 1968). Lane goes on to comment: “This is the danger to which the scribes exposed themselves when they attributed to the agency of Satan the redemption brought by Jesus. The expulsion of demons was a sign of the intrusion of the Kingdom of God. Yet the scribal accusations against Jesus amount to a denial of the power and greatness of the Spirit of God. By assigning the action of Jesus to a demonic origin the scribes betray a perversion of spirit which, in defiance of the truth, chooses to call light darkness. In this historical context, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit denotes the conscious and deliberate rejection of the saving power and grace of God released through Jesus’ word and act” (ibid.). Thus blasphemy here is much more serious than the taking of the divine name in vain which a believer may have done before coming to repentance and faith. It may be said to those who have been tormented by fear that they have committed the unforgivable sin that their concern is itself a sign that they have not committed the sin envisaged in Jesus’ teaching here. Lane’s interpretation also helps to explain the distinction drawn between blasphemy against the Son of man and blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The distinction suggests that “while an attack on Jesus’ own person, as Son of Man and therefore ‘hidden’, is pardonable, any speaking against the power by which he works (i.e. the divine endowment for his messianic ministry) will not be pardoned” (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 218). For such an action would be deliberately to attribute to Satan the action of God himself.

This interpretation fits the historical context of the Gospels themselves much better than to posit a situation which reflects the Spirit-filled community, in which to speak against the Spirit after → Pentecost is unpardonable whereas to speak against Jesus as the messiah before it was pardonable (cf. K. Stendahl, in Peake’s Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley, 1962, 785).

6. Another passage which is the subject of debate is Jude 9: “But when the archangel Michael, contending with the devil, disputed about the body of Moses, he did not presume to pronounce a reviling judgment on him [ouk etolmēsen krisin epenenkein blasphemias], but said, ‘The Lord rebuke you [epitimēsai soi Kyrios].’” The false teachers are compared with the men of Sodom and Gomorrah (v. 7), and are accused of defiling the flesh, rejecting authority (kyriotēta; cf. the use of Kyrios in v. 9) and reviling the glorious ones or glories (doxas de blasphemousin) (v. 8). The latter are probably angels (cf. J. N. D. Kelly, The Epistles of Peter and of Jude, BNTC, 1969, 263 f., who notes that according to Irenaeus, Haer. 1, 25, 1 f., certain gnostics despised angels as the agents of the inferior creator-God who brought the universe into being, though there are no grounds for seeing such views here). On the agency of → angels see Acts 7:53 and Gal. 3:19, and on Michael → Angel, art. Michaël. The story alluded to here does not appear in the OT which merely records that “he [i.e. Yahweh] buried him [i.e. Moses] in the valley of the land of Moab opposite Beth-peor” (Deut. 34:6). Kelly notes that the LXX tried to eliminate the offensive anthropomorphism by changing the vb. to the plur. “they buried” (op. cit., 265). However, Philo records that “immortal angelic powers buried him” (Vit. Mos. 2, 291). Several early Christian writers attribute Jude’s account to the Assumption of Moses, a Pharisaic work of the early 1st cent. which was soon translated into Gk. (Clement of Alexandria, Adumb. in ep. Iud.; Origen, De prin. 3, 2, 1; Didymus of Alexandria, In ep. Iud. enarr.; Gelasius of Cyzicus, Hist. Eccl. 2, 20, 7). But this story is missing from the Lat. fragment that has survived.

Kelly thinks that krisin . . . blasphemias is best translated as “a reviling judgment” rather than “a judgment on his reviling”, as this would fit the context better. The archangel was deputed to bury the body of → Moses, though Satan did his best to prevent him, claiming as lord of the material order that the body was his, and threatening to accuse Moses of murdering the Egyptian (cf. Exod. 2:12). The point of the observation is that even the archangel Michael did not respond with like reviling but committed the responsibility for rebuking Satan to God, using an imprecation found in Zech. 3:2. Perhaps we may see in the background the old conception that man should beware, as in making a → curse, so also in reviling, of challenging a power too great for him to cope with. The text goes on to say “But these men revile whatever they do not understand, and by those things that they know by instinct as irrational animals do, they are destroyed” (Jude 10; cf. 1 Cor. 2:7–16). There is in the passage the implication that the unspiritual not only fail to understand but even blaspheme God in the process. Thus the sense may be comparable with that in the Synoptic Gospels (see 5, above). On the other hand, there may also be the sense in which the believer should leave judgment to God (cf. Rom. 12:19; cf. Deut. 32:35).

7. blasphēmos, evil-speaking, slanderous, blasphemous, occurs at Acts 6:11; 2 Tim. 3:2; 2 Pet. 2:11; and as a noun, blasphemer, at 1 Tim. 1:13.

H. Währisch, C. Brown

καταλαλέω	καταλαλέω (katalaleō), speak evil of, rail at, slander;
	καταλαλιά (katalalia), evil speech, railing, slander;
	κατάλαλος (katalalos), slanderer, railer, defamer.

CL & OT katalaleō, to speak evil against, slander, is rare in cl. Gk., but occurs as early as Aristophanes (5th century B.C.). In the LXX it is found chiefly for forms of dāḅar, say, speak (Num. 12:8; 21:5, 7; Pss. 50[49]:20; 78[77]:19; 119[118]:23; Hos. 7:13; Mal. 3:13, 16), and also for gāḏāp, revile, blaspheme (Ps. 44[43]:16), kālam, humiliate (Job 19:3), lāṣan, slander (Ps. 101[100]:5), and at Prov. 20:13 and Mic. 3:7. The noun katalalia, slander, is found only in the Bible (in LXX, Wis. 1:11) or in texts depending on it. katalalos, slanderer, is found for the first time at Rom. 1:30, and then in Hermas (Sim. 6, 5, 5).

In the LXX kataialeō expresses hostility of speech, whether against God (Num. 21:5, 7; Ps. 78:19; Hos. 7:13 etc.), against his servant Moses (Num. 12:8; 21:7), or against other men, e.g. when Job is reproached by his friends (Job 19:3), or in cases of slander against one's brother or one's neighbour (Pss. 50:20; 101:5). The words are also found several times in Test. XII, and often in the Apostolic Fathers (e.g. Test. Gad 3:5; 5:4; 1 Clem. 30:1, 3; Hermas, Mand. 2:2 f.; 8:3).

NT In the NT katalaleō is not used of blasphemy against God (→ blasphēmēō); but slanderers (katalalous) are among the sinners whom Paul mentions in Rom. 1:30 as typical examples of paganism. It is linked with psithyristas, whisperers, tale-bearers (v. 29). The cognate nouns psithyrismos, gossip, tale-bearing, and katalalia are again linked in 2 Cor. 12:20 and 1 Clem. 30:3; 35:5. Similarly katalaliai, slanders, are among the sins which Paul fears he will encounter in the rebellious church of Corinth (2 Cor. 12:20): the fellowship of the community is destroyed by this sin. But the Christian churches are themselves the victims of such evil speech: it is the result of the hostile attitude taken up towards them by the heathen world around. Christians ought, therefore, for their part to be so much the more concerned to show by their "good behaviour in Christ" that the slanders against them are groundless (1 Pet. 2:12; 3:16). As "newborn babes", i.e. those born again, who know the kindness of their Lord, Christians should put away malicious slander along with other sins (1 Pet. 2:1–3). The letter of James, too, with its particular censure of sins of the tongue (3:3 ff.; → Word, art. glōssa), emphatically forbids Christians to indulge in evil speaking. It is not only an expression of arrogance and disregard for one's brother, but also a slight to God's law and God himself as the one Lawgiver and Judge of all (Jas. 4:11 f.). Thus the apostolic injunctions show us what the outworking of Jesus' love-commandment should be in the life of the Christian churches.

W. Mundle

λοιδορέω	λοιδορέω (loidoreō), insult, abuse, revile; λοιδορία (loidoria), insult, abuse, railing; λοιδορός (loidoros), railing, abusive, a reviler; ἀντιλοιδορέω (antiloidoreō), abuse or revile in turn.
----------	--

CL The group of words connected with loidoreō (probably related to Lat. ludus, game), is frequently found in cl. Gk. In general it is not used in a religious sense. It was rather in the political and social life of the Greeks that importance came to be attached to slander, insult and disparagement of an opponent, e.g. as a weapon of the orator in a political dispute, or of the Homeric heroes.

OT In the LXX the words are found comparatively seldom (altogether 21 times). The vb. normally renders the Heb. rîḥ (Exod. 17:7; 21:18; Num. 20:3, 13; Deut. 33:8), to quarrel, accuse, strive; but also for the Heb. gā'ar, to rebuke (Jer. 29[36]:27). It is without equivalent at Gen. 49:23; 2 Macc. 12:14. loidoria translates dibbâh, slander (Prov. 10:18), and formations from rîḥ (Exod. 17:7; Num. 20:4; Prov. 20:31), and in the Apocrypha is without Heb. equivalent (Sir. 22:24; 23:8; 27:21; 29:6). loidoros translates māḏōn or midyān, strife, contention (Prov. 25:24; 26:21; 27:15), and is without equivalent in Sir. 23:8. Apart from some slight shifts of emphasis due to the meaning of the Heb., the use of the words in the LXX follows that of cl. Gk.

NT In the NT the words occur altogether only 9 times, of which 1 Cor. and 1 Pet. have 3 instances each. They retain the meaning which they have in cl. Gk., although they are used chiefly in religious contexts. If for the Greek it was one of the arts of life to know how to insult others or bear insults against oneself, for the believer the suffering of slander and insults is evidence of the cross the Christian disciple is called to bear (1 Pet. 2:23; 1 Cor. 4:12; cf. Mk. 14:65; 15:16–19, 29–32 par. Matt. 27:39–44; Lk. 23:35–39; and also Isa. 53:7; → Cross; → Disciple). In the Christ-hymn cited at 1 Pet. 2:23, it is a matter of more than simply imitating Christ. The disciple, as one who has been freed in order to obey, is constantly encountering the unredeemed character of the world, and shares his Lord's suffering in it. There is more to this than the keeping of standards: rather it is a question of maintaining the faith in the form of love even towards one's enemies, as we see from the formal statements in 1 Pet. 3:9 and 1 Cor. 4:12. When reviling is answered with → blessing, we have to do not with an art of living that can be learned, but with the evidence of the power of Jesus Christ and of the gospel to overcome the world, which has to be worked out in faith.

We therefore find loidoros twice in lists of sins, indicating conduct not becoming to the Christian (1 Cor. 5:11; 6:10).

Neither must the Christian himself give any cause for evil gossip (1 Tim. 5:14): the reason for this is that his life should be a testimony to his Lord. He will, however, have to endure reviling for his Lord's sake (cf. Jn. 9:28).

The case is different in Acts 23:4 f. loidoreō is here used in the same way as → blasphēmēō. Paul utters a prophetic → curse, pronouncing God's judgment on the high priest, because he is misusing the authority given to him by God. Paul's statement that he did not know he was addressing the high priest should probably be understood as ironical: Ananias was not behaving like a high priest in the way he executed his office. If he had behaved in a proper manner, the curse would have been blasphemy. (On this passage → Black, White, Red, art. leukos NT; → Priest, art. hiereus NT 2 (a).)

H. Währisch

→ Anger, → Blessing, → Curse, → Laugh, → Swear, → Virtue

(a). G. Bertram, myktērīzō etc., TDNT IV 796 ff.; and paizō etc., TDNT V 625–36; H. W. Beyer, blasphēmēō etc., TDNT I 621–25; S. H. Blank, "Men against God", JBL 72, 1953, 1–13; and "The Curse, the Blasphemy, the Spell, and the Oath", Hebrew Union College Annual 23, 1950–51, 73–95; J. Blinzler, The Trial of Jesus, 1959 (fuller Der Prozess Jesu, 1969⁴); D. R. Catchpole, The Trial of Jesus: A Study in the Gospels and Jewish Historiography from A.D. 1770 to the Present Day, Studia Post-Biblica 18, 1971; O. E. Evans, "The Unforgivable Sin", ExpT 68, 1956–57, 240–44; H. Hanse, loidoreō etc., TDNT IV 293 f.; G. Kittel, katalaleō etc., TDNT IV 3 ff.; W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974; J. C. O'Neill, "The Charge of Blasphemy at Jesus' Trial before the Sanhedrin", in E. Bammel, ed., The Trial of Jesus. Cambridge Studies in Honour of C. F. D. Moule, SBT Second Series 13, 1970, 72–77; J. Scharbert, "Blasphemy", EBT I 67 ff.; J. Schneider, oneidos etc., TDNT V 238–42; E. Schweizer, The Good News according to Mark: A Commentary on the Gospel, 1971.

(b). H. Conzelmann, "Der Epheserbrief", in Die kleineren Briefe des Apostels Paulus, NTD 8, 1968³, 81 f.; E. Lövestam, Spiritus Blasphemia. Eine Studie zu Mk 3, 28 f. par., 1968; SB I 1006–20; J. Scharbert, "‘Fluchen’ und ‘Segnen’ im Alten Testament", Biblica 39, 1958, 1–26.

Right, Worthy

The terms and groups of words dealt with in this article are used, each in its own way and with its own shade of meaning, to express appropriate, suitable behaviour or a corresponding state (negative forms expressing the opposite, viz. unsuitable, incorrect, etc.). axios is a relative term, comparing two entities (persons or things) by measuring the lesser against the greater. If the lesser comes up to the standard of the greater, it is worthy; otherwise it is unworthy. artios and its derivatives contain the idea of straightening, equipping and preparing for a specific purpose, which requires corresponding appropriateness, suitability, usefulness or aptitude. orthos is the plainest and most unequivocal term: the root meaning is upright, straight; it connotes the virtue of right, i.e. honest and straightforward, behaviour.

ἄξιος

ἄξιος (axios), of like value, fit, worthy, worth; ἀξίως (axiōs), worthily, in a manner worthy of, suitably; ἀνάξιος (anaxios), unworthy; ἀξιόω (axioō), consider or think worthy, make worthy; καταξιόω (kataxioō), deem worthy, consider worthy.

CL axios (Homer onwards) meant originally tipping the scales, counter-balancing, of like value (TDNT I 379). The term compares two entities, either of the same or of different (anaxios) weight (e.g. Prov. 3:15 where the LXX has axios: “all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared” with wisdom). The meaning of axios is then extended to cover the relation between persons or things which correspond (or do not correspond) to one another: i.e. fit, appropriate (cf. Hdt. 4, 28). Since this relation of fitness implies corresponding worth, axios comes finally to mean worthy, worth. The adv. axiōs is especially used in this sense (e.g. worthy of the truth, Diod. Sic. 1, 51, 7). anaxios is the negative form of expression, not suitable, unworthy (Sophocles onwards; cf. Epictetus, 2, 8, 18). The vb. axioō (Hdt. onwards) means: (1) to think worthy, think suitable (Eur., Medea 962); (2) to request, ask (Xenophon, Memorabilia 3, 11, 12). kataxioō (Aesch. onwards) has the same meaning, intensified: to deem worthy; pass. to be held worthy (Polybius, 12, 10, 8; cf. Diod. Sic. 2, 60, 3).

OT In the LXX this group of words has no great significance. Instead the Heb. zākāh, to be morally pure (e.g. Job 15:14; LXX amemptos) is used in Judaism for the concept of merit (→ Reward). axios gains the meaning of deserving, e.g. “Here is a man who is worthy of the Holy Spirit” (SB I 129). In relation to God, axios lost its character in Judaism as a relative term showing correspondence to a standard; it became a quality, a merit belonging to the zealous keeper of the law, who uses it as the foundation of a claim on God (2 Macc. 7:20; 4 Macc. 17:18 ff.; SB II 254).

NT In the NT the majority of instances is found either in the Synoptic Gospels, or in the Pauline and a few other epistles.

1. In radical contrast to the Judaistic concept of merit, the parable of the prodigal son makes it clear that man can make no claim upon God: “I am not worthy to be called your son” (Lk. 15:19, 21; cf. also Jn. 1:27; Acts 13:25). The centurion from Capernaum, who in the Jewish view deserved Jesus’ help, because he had built a synagogue, did not even consider himself worthy for Jesus to be troubled with him, “but say the word, and my servant will be healed” (Lk. 7:7). Instead, it is the grace of God in the gospel that imparts worth, and makes men worthy of fellowship with God. In Lk. 20:35, Acts 5:41 and 2 Thess. 1:5 it is the undeserved gift of salvation which is expressed by kataxiōō. The worth of a man before God is decided by whether he comes into contact with the message of Christ and is obedient to it: "He who does not take his cross and follow me is not worthy of me" (Matt. 10:38; cf. vv. 11, 13, 37; 22:8).

2. In the epistles axios frequently has the meaning of fitting, in accord with. This is especially evident in the use of the adv. axiōs in exhortations demanding the right manner of life to accord with the gospel of Christ (Phil. 1:27), the Lord (Col. 1:10; 1 Thess. 2:12), or our calling (Eph. 4:1). Similarly in 1 Cor. 11:27 Paul warns against celebrating the → Lord's Supper in an unworthy manner (anaxiōs). He is not requiring moral quality in the participants, but looking for a manner of life which accords with the gospel, i.e. mutual love (cf. the context, 1 Cor. 11:17–34).

axios also describes the value of human actions. A much-quoted proverb says, "The labourer is worthy of his hire" (1 Tim. 5:18; cf. Lk. 10:7; Matt. 10:10; cf. Did. 13:1; 1 Cor. 9:14). Sinners do things for which they deserve (axioi) to die (Rom. 1:32); Paul's enemies can find nothing in his behaviour deserving death, with which to accuse him (Acts 25:11, 26). Christians are worthy to be clothed in white in the age to come (Rev. 3:4; → Black, White, Red, art. leukos).

At Rom. 8:18 Paul uses axios in its original sense of a comparison between two entities. The → sufferings of this present time are not axia, i.e. do not stand comparison with, the future → glory.

At Rev. 4:11 axios is even used in reference to the exalted Lord. None is worthy of such glory and honour as → God and the → Lamb (because of creation [Rev. 4:11], or Christ's sacrificial death [Rev. 5:12]); and the Lamb alone is worthy to be entrusted by God with the execution of his plans of salvation and of kingship (5:2, 4, 9).

E. Tiedtke

ἄριος

ἄριος (artios), suitable, complete, capable, sound; καταρτίζω (katartizō), put in order, restore, make complete, prepare; καταρτισμός (katartismos), preparation, equipment; κατάρτισις (katartisis), being made complete, completion; προκαταρτίζω (prokatartizō), get ready, arrange in advance; ἐξαρτίζω (exartizō), finish, complete, equip, furnish.

CL artios and its derivatives come from the root ar- which indicates appropriateness, suitability, usefulness, aptitude (cf. artyō, to arrange, season; artyō, to put in order; Lat. aptare, adaptare, congruere). artios accordingly means suitable, appropriate, fitting a situation or requirements; hence also respectively, normal, perfect, sound in physical, intellectual, moral and religious respects. In mathematics it is used to describe what is straight and to denote even numbers (as against perissos, odd).

The oldest derivative in cl. Gk. (apart from the Homeric artyō) is the vb. katartizō, to put in order, restore, furnish, prepare, equip. These various meanings have a common origin in the basic meaning to make suitable, make fitting. katartismos and katartisis mean restoration.

OT The LXX uses katartizō 19 times, and it stands for no fewer than 9 different Heb.

words. On 7 occasions the vb. renders the Aram. kʿal, to complete. It is found in this sense only in Ezr. in connexion with the building of the wall and the temple by the post-exilic community (Ezr. 4:12 f., 16; 5:3, 9, 11; 6:14). The various meanings of the vb. range from to set up, establish, in a literal sense (Ps. 74[73]:16; Heb. kûn); and of the righteous man's steps to hold fast to Yahweh's paths, human "goings" (Ps. 17[16]:5; Heb. tāmak); to sayings about God's activity, to equip (Ps. 40[39]:6 RSV), to restore (Ps. 68[67]:9; Heb. kûn). Frequently Yahweh is the subject of sentences which refer to his work of establishing and founding. Other instances are Exod. 15:17 (Heb. pā'al, make); Ps. 8:2 (Heb. yasaḏ, found, establish); Ps. 11(10):4 (Heb. šāt, foundation); Ps. 18(17):33 (Heb. šawāh, make like); Ps. 29(28):9 (Heb. hūl, whirl); Ps. 68(67):28 (Heb. pā'al); Ps. 80(79):15 (Heb. kānan, cf. kûn); Ps. 89(88):37 (Heb. kûn). artiōs is used in the LXX only as a temporal adv. meaning until now (2 Sam. 15:34).

NT Of this group of words only katartizō is used at all frequently in the NT (13 times), while artios (2 Tim. 3:17), katartisis (2 Cor. 13:9), and katartismos (Eph. 4:12) occur only once each.

1. At Matt. 4:21 and Mk. 1:19, katartizō is found in the secular sense of repairing fishing nets. In addition to this, the NT also uses katartizō in the same way as the LXX: the meaning here is to prepare (Heb. 10:5, a citation of Ps. 40:6; Matt. 21:16, citing Ps. 8:3 LXX; Rom. 9:22), to establish, to form (Heb. 11:3), to equip (Heb. 13:21; 1 Pet. 5:10). As in the OT, God is the subject of sentences which express his power to strengthen and establish.

2. Of particular importance are those passages in which artios and its derivatives are used in connexion with the preparation and equipment of the believer and the church, for the service of God and their fellow-men. The adj. artios occurs only at 2 Tim. 3:17, together with the perfect pass. participle exértismenos. In the OT → scriptures the church of the New Testament has an indispensable, God-given guide to living, through which the man of God may achieve an appropriate state, viz. be equipped for every work of love: "so that the man who belongs to God may be efficient and equipped for good work of every kind" (NEB). artios here does not imply perfection, as was originally thought, doubtless because of the variant reading teleios, perfect, in Codex D. Rather it refers to the state of being equipped for a delegated task. So too, in Eph. 4:12 katartismos refers to the preparation of the church for becoming perfect, but not to this perfection itself, as can be seen from the use of teleios (complete, mature; → Goal), hēlikia (stature; → Age, Stature), and plērōma (→ fullness) in v. 13 (cf. also 1 Cor. 1:10). The terms artios and katartismos thus have not so much a qualitative meaning as a functional one. This standard, hortatory use of artios and its derivatives arises from the fact that all imperatives are founded on the one indicative, i.e. the firm promise of salvation. The life of the saints is to correspond to the grace given, and this itself is the standard to which they are to aspire. It is on this ground that in Gal. 6:1 and 2 Cor. 13:11 katartizō can mean to restore; in 1 Thess. 3:10 to make up, to put in a fit state, to perfect. katartisis in 2 Cor. 13:9 also comes into this category. Like the verbal form in v. 11, it should be translated with the NEB, "that all may be put right with you", as a reference to the restoration and perfection of the church.

3. At 2 Cor. 9:5 prokatartizō is used of arranging or gathering and making ready the collection (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4); and at Acts 21:5 we find exartizō in egeneto hēmas exartisai tas hēmeras, “our time was up” (Arndt, 273), or ended as prescribed (cf. G. Delling, TDNT I 476).

R. Schippers

ὀρθός	ὀρθός (orthos), upright, straight, right; ὀρθῶς (orthōs), rightly, correctly; διόρθωσις (diorthōsis), improvement, reformation, new order; ἐπανόρθωσις (epanorthōsis), correcting, restoration, improvement; ἐπανορθόω (epanorthōō), set up again, correct; ὀρθοτομέω (orthotomeō), cut straight, lead in a straight way, rightly handle; ὀρθοποδεύω (orthopodeō), walk uprightly, act rightly, be straightforward.
--------------	---

CL orthos means lit. standing upright, continuing in a straight direction; fig. right, true. In cl. Gk. orthos is used in a fig. sense of ethically correct behaviour (Pindar, Pythian Odes 10, 68, nous orthos, a right mind; Plato, Phaedrus 73a; Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 11, 19). Both in the classical period and for the Stoics, the word refers to an objective quality or virtue. diorthōsis denotes the straightening of what has become disordered, correct ordering, right treatment (Plato, Laws 642a); then fig. correction of a mistake (Polybius, 3, 58, 4; not in the LXX). epanorthōsis (from epanorthōō, to set up again, correct) means lit. restoration (e.g. of what has been destroyed); fig. improvement (e.g. of the laws, Demosthenes, Or. 24, 22).

OT In the LXX orthos is also used in the sense of upright (Mic. 2:3, “with your head upright”, i.e. haughtily), and in a straight direction (Jer. 38:9 LXX, on a straight path). orthos has, however, a special use in the Wisdom literature. Here it is used for Heb. yāšār and means right, correct, true (Prov. 8:6, 9, right words; 11:6, an honest man; 16:25, a right way; etc.). Occasionally nāhōn, understanding (from bîn, to understand), is also translated by orthos (Prov. 15:14, an understanding heart). Thus in the Wisdom literature orthos is used to refer to the kind of right attitude, speech, and action, that accords with a proper relationship to Yahweh. It does not describe a virtue so much as a relationship. The adv. orthōs occurs at Gen. 4:7; 40:16; Exod. 18:17; Deut. 5:25[28]; 1 Sam. 16:17 (in connexion with ṭōb, good, well); and at Num. 27:7(6); Prov. 14:2; 16:5 etc.

NT 1. In the NT the group of words which goes with orthos has no particular part to play. In the epistles none of the words occurs more than once or twice; in the Gospels they are not found at all, with the exception of the adv. orthōs, which is used to confirm the correctness of a speech or answer (Lk. 10:28; 20:21). Only at Acts 14:10, where Paul heals a lame man by calling “stand upright on your feet”, is orthos found in its lit. sense. Heb. 9:10 speaks of the time of a right and better order (diorthōsis), which has begun with the coming of Christ and is contrasted with the provisional nature of the OT covenant.

2. The other instances belong to the sphere of NT ethics and exhortation.

(a) Heb. 12:13 exhorts a church which has become weary not to lose sight of the risen Lord and the goal towards which it is moving. The “straight paths” (a citation of Prov. 4:26 LXX) refer to the direction set for the wandering people of God. Thus orthos is here interpreted in the sense of an eschatological alignment for the Christian church.

(b) Gal. 2:14 deals with the delicate question of Peter's right behaviour (orthopodeō) towards the Gentile Christians of Antioch, when he came to them from → Jerusalem. By right behaviour, or walking uprightly, Paul means obedience towards the gospel of Christ in its freedom from the law.

(c) 2 Tim. 3:16 lists the uses of Holy Scripture in ethical and didactic categories. They serve progressively (1) to convert; (2) to restore and improve (epanorthōsis); and (3) to instruct in righteousness.

3. orthotomeō is found elsewhere only at Prov. 3:6 and 11:5, where it is used in connexion with cutting a path in a straight direction. It is connected with temnō, cut. The idea is that of cutting a path through a forest or difficult terrain so that the traveller may go directly to his destination (Arndt, 584). The vb. occurs only at 2 Tim. 2:15 where the RSV has: "Do your best to present yourself to God as one approved, a workman who has no need to be ashamed, rightly handling [orthotomounta] the word of truth." The phrase may be compared with Plato, Laws 7, 801E: "to proceed along the way of legislation which has been cleared [tetmēmenēn hodon] by our present discourse." Arndt suggests that the meaning in 2 Tim. is to guide the word of truth along a straight path, like a road that goes straight to its goal. Other interpretations are to teach the word aright, expound it soundly, shape rightly, and preach fearlessly (cf. Moulton-Milligan, 456 f.).

4. orthopodeō occurs only at Gal. 2:14: "But when I saw that they were not straightforward [ouk orthopodousin] about the truth of the gospel, I said to Cephas before them all, 'If you, though a Jew, live like a Gentile and not like a Jew, how can you compel the Gentiles to live like Jews?'" Here the question turns on → circumcision and the ambiguous stance adopted by Peter in the face of the circumcision party. Arndt give the meaning "be straightforward" (583), but notes other interpretations: progress or advance in the direction of the truth (C. H. Roberts, JBL 40, 1939, 55 f.); cf. also the phrase noted by J. G. Winter in a 3rd cent. papyrus orthopodei to paidion, the child is getting on or growing up (HTR 34, 1941, 161 f.); "They were not on the right road toward the truth of the gospel", G. D. Kilpatrick, in Neutestamentliche Studien für Rudolf Bultmann, 1954, 269–74). R. Klöber → God, → Ready, → Virtue

W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, 1972; G. Delling, artios etc., TDNT I 475 f.; J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament: An Inquiry into the Character of Earliest Christianity, 1977; W. Foerster, axios etc., TDNT I 379 f.; H. Preisker, orthos etc., TDNT V 449 ff.

Righteousness, Justification

δικαιοσύνη	δικαιοσύνη (dikaïosynē), righteousness, uprightness; δίκαιος (dikaïos), upright, just, righteous; δικαίω (dikaïōō), justify, vindicate, treat as just, acquit, pronounce or treat as righteous, make or set free from; δικαίωμα (dikaïōma), regulation, requirement, commandment, righteous deed; δικαίως (dikaïōs), justly, in a just manner, uprightly; δικαίωσις (dikaïōsis), justification, vindication, acquittal. For ἀδικία (adikia), unrighteousness, and cognates → Sin.
-------------------	---

CL All the words in this group are derived from dikē (→ Punishment). According to

H. Frisk, the original root-noun meant “instructress” or “instruction” (Studien zur griechischen Wortstellung, Göteborgs Högskolas Årsskrift 39, 1, 1933; but cf. the discussion by G. Schrenk in TDNT II 178 ff.). The sense of “instructress” is supported by Hesiod (Works 256 ff.): Dike is the daughter of Zeus who shares in his government of the world. The concept of “instruction” is also supported by Hesiod (ibid., 275 ff.): Zeus put a difference between beasts and men: to the former he gave a nomos (→ law, i.e. that they should devour one another), while to the latter, in order to make human life possible, he gave dikē, whose implacable enemy is biē, violence. In its basic religious sense, therefore, and in common with all things divine in Gk. religion, dikē is an elemental cosmic force which men feel to be superior to themselves. It is not a standard imposed upon the world by God, but something immanent, inherent in the very nature of being, and related to men’s living together in society. In post-Homeric times it was also regarded as expiation or punishment, or as the goddess of punishment who pursued wrongdoers. In the arguments that preceded the creation of the polis (→ People, art. polis) dikē and its derivatives were first of all battle-cries, and then later became concepts basic to the whole ideas of the polis. Of overriding importance in this connexion was the thought that justice prevails when every man does that which is fitting for him (Plato: ta heautou prattein). For Plato dikaiosynē is basic to the structure of the state (Rep. 1–4) and the human soul (Rep. 4, 443c ff.), and for Aristotle (who devoted Eth. Nic. 5 to the subject) it is the chief of human virtues (5, 3, p. 1129b, 27). To Plato and those who followed him, it was right and proper to accept the existence of utterly diverse social ranks with their accompanying degrees of power, and to take upon oneself that which befitted one’s own station. In other words, dikē acquired the status of the axiomatic, unshakable foundation of all human life.

1. Hence, the righteous man (dikaios) was originally one whose behaviour fitted into the framework of his society and who fulfilled his rightful obligations towards the gods and his fellow-men (Homer, Od. 13, 209), his observance of such obligations serving to differentiate him from the unrighteous (dyssebēs) (Aesch., Sept 598; → Godliness). Hybris and uncivilized behaviour were out of keeping with the character of a righteous man (Od. 9, 175), therefore the term dikaia zoē (righteous life) was applied to a civilized way of life, i.e. one which, unlike barbarism, adhered to the rules of an orderly society; while in Od. 14, 90 dikaiōs mnasthai refers to wooing one’s bride “in a fitting manner”. At a later period the meaning was extended to cover the idea of conforming to a given standard, so that harma dikaion was a smoothly running carriage; dikaia basanos an impartial examination; and tō dikaiotatō tōn logōn the most appropriate way of speaking. Undoubtedly, however, the legal and ethical aspect was of supreme importance, dikaios meaning righteous vis-à-vis the law, conforming to the existing, static, social order. It is particularly common as a neuter noun in the sense of “that which is [legally and ethically] right”, e.g. to dikaion to nomikon kai to ison (Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 1129a, 34); ouden tōn dikaiōn poiein tini, to do nothing that is right and just to someone, i.e. treat someone unjustly; ta dikaia lambanein, to take what is one’s due. Hence to dikaion comes to mean a legal claim, while ta pros allēlous dikaia means the contracts and obligations existing between men.

2. The noun dikaiosynē (-synē indicating an abstraction) is a later formation

(since Theognis 1, 47: en de dikaiosynē syllēbdēn pasa aretē estin). On the one hand, it denotes the quality of the righteous man (dikaiosynē dikastikē being righteousness according to the law), but, on the other hand, it is in itself the standard which a judge is required to uphold, and which it must be his aim constantly to restore. Thus it is impartial justice, described by Aristotle as hōs ho nomos, as the law (Rhet. 1, 9p, 1366b, 9 ff.). It is one of the four cardinal virtues, along with phronēsis (prudence), sōphrosynē (temperance) and andreia (fortitude).

From the time of Pindar and Aeschylus, the corresponding and derivative verb dikaioō is used, meaning: (a) to put right (e.g. the law on violence, Fragment 169, 3); (b) to demand as a right, regard as being right, pass sentence; (c) to give someone his due, either in the sense of to punish (Herodotus 1, 100) or, from the LXX onwards, to declare righteous, to justify.

3. Finally, two other nouns from the same stem express either the result of human action, or the application of justice to a given person:

dikaiōma (since Plato and Aristotle) which means: (a) right action; (b) judgment, either of condemnation or acquittal; (c) (from the LXX onwards) ordinance, decree; (d) legal documents, credentials.

dikaiōsis (since Thucydides), which means: (a) condemnation, punishment; (b) acquittal; (c) just claim; (d) discretion, judgment as to what is just or unjust.

OT The noun dikaiōma is frequently found in the LXX in the context of → law meaning ordinance or statute. It translates the Heb. hōq or huqqāh some 70 times (e.g. Gen. 26:5; Exod. 15:25 f.; Lev. 25:18; Num. 27:11; 30:17; 31:21; 35:29; Deut. 4:1, 5 f., 8, 14, 40, 45; 5:1, 28[31]; 6:1 f., 17, 20, 24; 7:11; 8:11; 10:13; 11:1; 17:19; 26:16 f.; 27:10; 28:45; 30:10, 16; 2 Sam. 22:23; 2 Ki. 17:8, 13, 19, 34, 37; 23:3; 2 Chr. 19:10; 33:8; Pss. 18[17]:22; 50[49]:16; 89[88]:31; 105[104]:45; 119[118]:5, 8, 12, 16, 23, 26, 33, 48, 54, 56, 64, 68, 71, 80, 83, 112, 117 f., 124, 135, 145, 155, 171; 147:19[8]; Mic. 6:16; Ezek. 36:27). It translates the Heb. mišpāt, judgment, ordinance, some 40 times (e.g. Exod. 21:1, 9, 31; 24:3; Num. 15:16; 36:13; Deut. 7:12; 33:10; 1 Sam. 2:13; 8:3, 9, 11; 10:25; 27:11; 30:25; 1 Ki. 3:28; 8:45, 59; 2 Chr. 6:35; Ps. 119[118]:20; Prov. 2:8; 19:28; Mal. 3:22[4:4]; Ezek. 5:6 f.; 11:20; 18:9, 21; 20:11, 13, 16, 18, 19, 21, 24 f.). It is also found for sundry other words (2 Sam. 19:29[28]; 1 Ki. 2:3; Job 34:27; Pss. 19[18]:8; 119[118]:27, 56, 93 f., 141; Prov. 8:20; Ezek. 18:21; 43:11) and has no corresponding Heb. term at Deut. 6:3; Ruth 4:7; Ps. 119[118]:24; Sir. 4:17; Bar. 2:12, 17, 19; 4:13; Hos. 13:1; Ezek. 20:13; 44:24; 1 Macc. 1:13, 49; 2:21, 40; 4 Macc. 18:6.

Apart from this, the dikaios word-group translates words belonging to the Heb. šdq word group on 462 out of a possible 476 times. There is thus a considerable semantic overlap between the two groups. diakaiosynē normally renders the Heb. sēdāqāh and less frequently šedeq (some 220 times; for instances see discussion below), although there are 11 other terms it is used to translate, and it also occurs occasionally for other formations from šdq. These include ‘met, truth, faithfulness (Gen. 24:49; Jos. 24:14; Isa. 38:19; 39:8); mišpāt, judgment (Prov. 17:23; Mal. 2:17; Isa. 61:8; Ezek. 18:17, 19, 21); hesed, loving kindness, grace, covenant fidelity (Gen. 19:19; 20:13; 21:23; 24:27; 32:11[10]; Exod. 15:13; 34:7; Prov. 20:28; Isa. 61:7).

The adj. dikaioi occurs some 180 times for šaddīq, although it also translates 17 other terms and expressions, including yāšār, right, correct, straightforward, upright (e.g. Num. 23:10; Prov. 3:32; Job 1:1, 8) and nāqî and nāqî', innocent (e.g. Job 9:23; 17:8; Prov. 6:17; Joel 4:19; Jon. 1:14). Its use to translate yāšār may suggest Hellenistic influence on the part of the translator, giving dikaïos the sense of "virtuous" (cf. D. Hill, Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 105).

The vb. dikaioō is used 23 times to translate šādaq (Gen. 38:26; 44:16; Exod. 23:7; Deut. 25:1; 2 Sam. 15:4; 1 Ki. 8:32; 2 Chr. 6:23; Job 33:22; Pss. 19[18]:9; 51[50]:4; 82[81]:3; 143[142]:2; Isa. 5:23; 42:21; 43:9, 26; 45:25[26]; 50:8; 53:11; Jer. 3:11; Ezek. 16:51 f.). It also translates bāḥan, try (Ezek. 21:18[13]); zākāh, be clean (Ps. 73[72]:13; Mic. 6:11); rîb, contend, conduct a legal case (Mic. 7:9; Isa. 1:17); and šāpaṭ, judge (1 Sam. 12:7). It occurs without Heb. equivalent at Tob. 6:11 f. v.l.; 12:4; Sir. 1:21; 9:12; 10:29; 13:22; 18:2, 22; 23:11; 26:29; 31(34):5; Ezek. 44:24.

1. Righteousness in the OT is not a matter of actions conforming to a given set of absolute legal standards, but of behaviour which is in keeping with the two-way relationship between God and man. Thus the righteousness of God appears in his God-like dealings with his people, i.e. in redemption and salvation (Isa. 45:21; 51:5 f.; 56:1; 62:1). His righteous acts are extolled from the earliest times onward (Jdg. 5:11; 1 Sam. 12:7; Isa. 45:24; Mic. 6:5; Ps. 103[102]:6; Dan. 9:16). He who longs for → redemption calls upon God's righteousness, i.e. he pleads for God's intervention (Pss. 71[70]:2; 143[142]:11). Israel's enemies, by contrast, find God's righteousness to be the root of their downfall (Isa. 41:10 f.; 54:17; Ps. 129[128]:4 f.). For Israel's sake, even the very land itself may be restored through the gift of God's righteousness (Hos. 10:2; Joel 2:23; Isa. 32:15 ff.; 48:18 f.). Dwelling in the land as he does, Israel partakes of God's righteousness (Ps. 24[23]:5) and such righteousness may actually be referred to in spatial terms (Pss. 89[88]:16; 69[68]:28).

2. In the pre-exilic period, little is said about individual righteousness, the main concern being that men should remain within the national righteousness referred to above. Access to it is denied to anyone whose life falls short of God's standards (Pss. 15[14]; 24[23]:3 ff.), the righteousness of God being, in effect, salvation per se; hence the OT never identifies righteousness with condemnation. On a purely human level, therefore, judgment is pronounced not in terms of "the guilty man is justly punished", but rather "the just man is made just and the guilty man made guilty" (Deut. 25:1). In general before the exile, a man's righteousness is not so much in relation to God as in relation to his fellow-men, his behaviour being regulated on the one hand by human relationships (e.g. between members of the same family, Gen. 38:26; or between the king and one of his officers, 1 Sam. 24:15), and on the other by the law of God (Zeph. 2:3); Amos 5:7 and 6:12 each refers to both of these aspects. On the other hand, Amos 5:4, 6, 14 and the book of Hosea testify generally to a concern for righteousness before God, through inter-personal relationships.

The exile, however, marks a turning-point in the history of ideas, and thereafter the OT has no hesitation in speaking of the devout individual's righteousness before God. Before the exile the pledge of God's presence among the people was their free, independent possession of the land, with his righteousness covering both the people and the land they owned. Afterwards, however, God's pledge is his gift of the law, which provides clear terms of reference for righteousness between man and man, and at the same time the framework within which a man may share, and go on sharing, in Yahweh's righteousness. Hence, when the Psalmists refer to themselves as "righteous" (Pss. 7:9; 17[16]:1-5; 18[17]:22-24; 26[25]:1-6), they are appealing to their membership of that nation which Yahweh has permitted to partake of his righteousness, for, as the religion of Israel had long since made clear, God alone can pronounce a man righteous. Such a claim on the part of the Psalmists is, therefore, an act of testimony. The fact that a man joins in public worship is evidence that he is not cut off from the righteousness of God. Furthermore, the law is considered easy to keep, therefore in claiming to be righteous, men are joyfully acknowledging the law to be the well-spring of their daily life (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 381 f.). Here and there, however, the note is already heard that in the eyes of God one's own righteousness counts for nothing (Ps. 143[142]:1; Job 4:17), and that men are dependent on his mercy alone (Dan. 9:18). Thus in the intertestamental period, "righteousness" takes on increasingly the character of "goodness" (→ grace), which counterbalances the strictly impartial judgment of God (cf. G. von Rad, op. cit., 370-83; F. Horst, *RGG*³ II 1403 ff.).

H. Seebass

3. D. Hill contends that the original significance of the root šdq appears to be irretrievably lost and that the study of parallels in other languages does not allow us to attribute with confidence any single primary meaning to it (Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 82 f.). Outside specifically theological contexts in the OT it is used in connexion with weights and measures, indicating conformity to the proper standards (Lev. 19:36; Deut. 25:15; Ezek. 45:10), and correct sacrifices which have been offered in accordance with the prescribed ritual (Deut. 33:19; Pss. 4:6; 51:21 MT). Hill sees Judah's remark about Tamar ("She is more righteous than I") as not making a moral judgment so much as making an observation about the strength of her case in terms of the levirate marriage law (op. cit., 84; → Marriage, art. gameō OT 5). Similarly a righteous person in the law is one who is "in the right" (cf. Exod. 23:7; with 1 Sam. 24:17; Ezek. 16:52).

The standard of righteousness is not provided simply by custom. Hill endorses W. Eichrodt's verdict that it is to be seen against the wider background of the → covenant relationship with Yahweh: "It may therefore be said that in the case of Yahweh his righteousness implies the same kind of right conduct which in Israel upholds the law by means of judicial procedure; the justice appropriate to Israel on her side is determined by her position as the covenant people, in virtue of which she can count on the intervention of the divine assistance in any danger which threatens that position" (Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 241 f.; cf. Hill, op. cit., 86). Eichrodt points out that "In the early period of Israel's history God's righteousness seems only to have been spoken of in connection with his help against outside enemies. Yahweh watches over the 'justice' of his people in that he safeguards their existence by his victories over their foes, and Israel's triumphs in war are therefore proofs of the righteousness of God, šidqōt yhwh" (ibid.; cf. Jdg. 5:11; 11:27; Mic. 6:5; 1 Sam. 12:7; 2 Sam. 18:31; Deut. 33:21). Some scholars see a background of Canaanite influence, reflecting a deity or agent of God in Pss. 85, 89 and 97, where righteousness is thought to be hypostatized (cf. Hill, op. cit., 86), though the argument seems tenuous in the context of the Psalms (cf. A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, 1972, II, 613, 637 f., 687). Righteousness is there a divine attribute, occasionally personified. Thus, Anderson sees the expression, "He loves righteousness and justice" (Ps. 33[32]:5) as meaning that Yahweh "loves to perform righteous and just deeds (cf. 99:4; Jer. 9:24). This may also imply that God is concerned to do and to uphold righteousness and justice. 'Righteousness' (š'dāqâh) is a term of relationships, denoting that kind of conduct which serves to maintain the established ties" (op. cit., I, 262). In certain contexts this amounts to "deliverance" (Pss. 22:31 [MT 32]; 40:9 [MT 19]; 51:14 [MT 16]; 65:5 [MT 6]), "salvation" (Ps. 69:27 [MT 28]), "victory" (Isa. 41:2). "vindication" (Ps. 103:6), "righteous help" (Ps. 71:24), "healing" Ps. 40:10 [MT 11]), and perhaps even "reward" (Ps. 106:31). Negatively, it means punishment of the wicked (Ps. 119:75). Anderson also sees a covenant background in the sense of "faithfulness to the obligations stipulated by the Covenant, but in general it may imply a behaviour which is right according to the standards accepted by the community" (ibid.).

Because the nation found its focus in the king, it depended on him for its right-ordering and well-being, and thus the king has a special place in maintaining righteousness in Israel (cf. Hill, op. cit., 87 ff.; 2 Sam. 15: 1–6; Ps. 72). "As judge, Yahweh supremely distinguishes between those who are 'in the right' and those 'who are in the wrong': he condemns the latter and 'puts in the right' (Hiph'il of šdq = declare to be in the right) the former [Gen. 18:25; Exod. 23:7; 1 Ki. 8:32; Hos. 14:8 f.; Ps. 7:7–11; Jer. 11:20; Zeph. 3:5; Ezra 9:15]. Just as the righteous judgment of the king took on a special character when it was directed towards the poor and needy, so in establishing š'dāqâh in the land, Yahweh has a particular concern for the cause of the poor and outcast, the widow and orphan" (Hill, op. cit., 89 f.; cf. Amos 2:6 f.; 5:12–15; Mic. 3:2; Isa. 5:7). Within the righteousness of Yahweh there is a place for punishment and for deliverance. Thus, in the destruction of Jerusalem the city confesses: "The LORD is in the right [šaddîq]: I have rebelled against his word" (Lam. 1:18). On the other hand, Yahweh may still deliver Israel, giving sentence in his favour because of the character of Yahweh himself (Isa. 46:12 f.; cf. 51:5–8, 17).

Hill rejects the idea that the prophets gave an ethical content to a religion which was previously non-ethical, insisting that "we may regard the prophetic teaching as essentially a recalling of Israel to the covenant and to the standards and way of life which should characterise national and individual existence within the covenant" (op. cit., 94). On many occasions in the Psalms he sees the individual righteous as "those who, in humility and faithfulness, trust in Yahweh, despite persecution and oppression; those who seek to live uprightly and without pride of heart, depending on Yahweh for protection and vindication. 'Righteousness' here is not ethical perfection, but that obedience and uprightness of the faithful who plead with Yahweh for a favourable decision, not always in order to be 'justified' against an adversary, but often, in an absolute manner, to be accepted and saved" (Hill, op. cit., 94 f.; cf. Ps. 24:3 ff.). Isa. 56–59 form a section which begins with the call: "Keep justice, and do righteousness, for soon my salvation will come, and my deliverance be revealed" (Isa. 56:1). Righteousness is the key to national recovery (Isa. 58:8 ff.; cf. 60:17, 21) and will ultimately spread to the nations (Isa. 61:10). This righteousness depends on Yahweh's gift (Isa. 46:12 f.; 50:9; 52:13–53:12); but it calls for a corresponding righteousness in the national and individual lives of the people (cf. Deut. 6:20 ff.; 24:13).

Commenting on the LXX usage of the dikaios word-group, D. Hill observes that it underwent a considerable change through being consistently used to render the Heb. group formed from šdq, especially as compared with cl. Gk. "(1) The words were employed to refer to God's character and actions [in the LXX]. In Classical Greek usage, dikaios, etc., were not terms used of the divine, except at a very early date. (2) In the Classical Greek usage of the terms the idea of conformity to a standard was present and the standard was primarily that of social obligation. In the Old Testament use of š'ḏāqâh the standard implied possesses divine authority and often is the demands of the covenant law. Through being used consistently as the means of translating the Hebrew word, dikaiosynē gained this new dimension of reference (i.e. the divine requirement) in biblical Greek. (3) Through being drawn into the covenant terminology the word dikaiosynē was supplied, from time to time, with a content which is related to that of 'mercy' (when translating hesed) and of 'loyalty' and 'trustworthiness' (when translating 'met). The verb dikairoō is not found with its secular Greek meanings in the LXX: it has to be interpreted in terms of the Hebrew root it renders. When it translates the root šdq (and even other roots as well), the forensic sense is almost always present. The only possible exceptions we have found are in Pss. 19(18):10 and 73(72):13" (op. cit., 108 f.).

4. In the apocryphal books dikaios is used as in the LXX except that there are no instances of it meaning "in the right" and "innocent" (D. Hill, op. cit., 109). Righteous is applied to God, man and actions (Tob. 3:2; 14:9; Wis. 2:10; 3:1; Sir. 10:23). The meaning "just" occurs at Wis. 12:15 and 2 Macc. 9:18; cf. 1 Macc. 7:12; 11:33; 2 Macc. 11:14; 13:22. In Pss. Sol. dikaios denotes the upright man who trusts in God and keeps the law, as distinct from sinners (2:34; 3:4–8; 15:6). When applied to God it describes his attitude in discriminating between the upright and the sinner (2:10, 18, 32, 34; 5:1; 8:8; 9:2; 10:5). It is also applied to the messiah in this sense (17:32).

In the apocryphal writings dikaiosynē is the righteousness or righteous conduct which makes a man acceptable to God (Tob. 12:9; 14:11; Wis. 1:15). It denotes God's righteousness in discerning good and evil, and saving the good and punishing the evil among men (Wis. 5:18; 12:16). In Wis. 15:3 knowledge of God constitutes righteousness. In Sir. 42:2 dikairoō means to do justice to, punish, and in Sir. 7:5; 10:29; 13:22 it means to recognize or declare to be right or righteous. Otherwise the vb. frequently occurs in the passive, meaning to be declared innocent or to acquit, and even accept (18:22). In Pss. Sol. it means to recognize as just or righteous (2:15; 3:3, 5; 4:9; 8:7, 23, 26; 9:2; cf. D. Hill, op. cit., 110). C. Brown

5. In rabbinic Judaism righteousness was completely identified with conformity to the → law. Many of the laws, particularly the ceremonial ones, were no longer relevant as they stood, but, according to the rabbis, were intended to train men in obedience and, in particular, to provide a way for men to acquire merit in the sight of God. The passion for obedience now became transformed into a striving for merit, to ensure one's part in the kingdom of God. Works of charity and works of mercy were considered especially meritorious, the former (š'ḏāqâh) comprising everything that could be done by material expenditure, such as feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, giving drink to the thirsty, etc., while works of mercy were those requiring a moral effort, such as mourning with mourners, comforting the broken-hearted and visiting those who were sick or in prison (cf. Matt. 25:35 f.). However, there are many examples to show the power of trust in God, quite apart from meritorious works; e.g. at the time of Israel's exodus from Egypt, Moses' faith alone sufficed for God to divide the sea. Very few qualified for the designation "a righteous man" (principally biblical figures, cf. R. Mach, Der Zaddik in Talmud und Midrasch, 1957, 242 ff.); it was believed that no one, not even the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, could achieve righteousness apart from God's grace, but that on the other hand "God helps those who help themselves". Eventually merits will be weighed against demerits in the day of judgment; if a man's merits preponderate, he will be deemed a righteous man; if the opposite is the case, he will be deemed an evil-doer. Should there be an even balance, then according to one view the persons concerned will go to hell, emerging therefrom later when their purification is complete, while others believed that God will make use of his own great riches and of the merits of the righteous, in order to render the mediocre righteous (cf. R. Mach, op. cit.; A. Marmorstein, The Old Rabbinic Doctrine of God, 1922). For further discussion and data D. Hill, op. cit., 115–20; J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul: A Linguistic and Theological Enquiry, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 20, 1972, 112–27.

6. The Qumran community seems to have been deeply aware of its own guilt and of the transitoriness of life, hence their recurring appeals to justification by God: "As for me, my justification [mišpāt] is with God"; "he will wipe away my transgression through his righteousness"; "his righteousness is the source of my justification"; "if I stumble and fall because of the guilt of my flesh, my justification shall arise through the righteousness of God which endures for ever" (1QS 11:2, 3, 5, 12). "Righteousness, I know, is not of man, nor is a perfect walk of the son of man. To the most high God belong deeds of righteousness [= grace 11, 18; 16, 9]; but the way of man will not stand, save by the spirit which God created for him" (1QH 4, 30). But impressively like Paul as such statements are at first sight, it should be noted that righteousness is based not simply upon the law (as it is in Judaism generally), but in particular upon the radical doctrines of the Teacher of Righteousness. "This concerns all those who observe the Law in the House of Judah, whom God will deliver from the House of Judgment because of their suffering and because of their faith in the Teacher of Righteousness" (1QpHab 8: 1–3 on Hab. 2:4). The title Teacher of Righteousness occurs in CD 1:11; 20:32; 1QpHab 1:13; 2:2; 5:10; 7:4; 11:15; 1QpMic frag. 10. There are a number of other possible allusions (cf. J. A. Ziesler, op. cit., 91). For when the members of the community are called the "sons of righteousness" (1QS 9, 14) or the "elect of righteousness" (1QH 2, 13), this implies one thing only, namely, that they follow their Teacher's doctrine, and it would appear that the justifying grace of God is seen essentially in the fact that this doctrine of radical legal piety has been revealed (cf. G. Jeremias, Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, StUNT 2, 1963, 308 ff.; F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1957). On Qumran teaching see further D. Hill, op. cit., 110–115; J. A. Ziesler, op. cit., 91–103; O. Betz, "Rechtfertigung in Qumran", in J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann and P. Stuhlmacher, eds., Rechtfertigung. Festschrift für Ernst Käsemann, 1976, 17–36.

NT The NT uses the words of this group in many different ways. The adj. dikaïos occurs in almost all NT books, most often in Matt. and Paul (17 times each), while its related words are predominantly Pauline, occurring with particular frequency in Rom. It will make for greater clarity if the usage of each writer is examined, the more straightforward passages being left on one side.

1. Matthew. The adj. dikaïos is applied to Christ (Matt. 27:19, 24 v.l.), to righteous men (Matt. 1:19; 5:45; 9:13; 10:41; 13:17, 43, 49; 23:28 f., 35; 25:37, 46), and to things (Matt. 20:4; 23:35; 27:4 v.l.). dikaïosynē occurs at Matt. 3:15; 5:6, 10, 20; 6:1, 33; 21:32; and dikaïoō at Matt. 11:19; 12:37.

Matt.'s doctrine of righteousness is central to his message. Even the work of John the Baptist is described in these terms, for he came "in the way of righteousness" (Matt. 21:32), i.e. calling all → Israel to repentance and → baptism. In insisting that no one had any claim upon God (Matt. 3:9), John was acting, said Jesus, in the name of God, who was even then bringing in his → kingdom. So in order "to fulfil all righteousness" (Matt. 3:15), Jesus submitted to John's baptism. They are blessed, therefore, who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Matt. 5:6); for whether they live according to the law or not (Matt. 1:19), their one desire is that God may justify them.

In the light of such righteousness, Jesus was particularly concerned to address sinners rather than the righteous (Matt. 9:13; cf. Mk. 2:17) who imagined that they had no need of it. Admittedly, he did not dispute the righteousness of such men (in the sense that they formally fulfilled the → law), for, in the rabbinic tradition, he could speak of the righteous men who were exemplars to Israel (Matt. 10:41; 13:17; 23:15, 29; note that when these are mentioned, it is always in conjunction with the → prophets). The conflict with the → Pharisees and scribes who fancied that they were in the way of righteousness (Matt. 23:27 f.) arose only because they could not see their righteousness as the free gift of God, and so did not submit to John's baptism (Matt. 21:32). They murmured because God's calling of men was in the nature of a free gift and had nothing to do with just rewards (Matt. 20:13–15). They adopted towards other men a "holier than thou" attitude, but Jesus taught that separation between the wicked and the righteous was something reserved for the final → judgment of God (Matt. 13:49).

In teaching this, however, Jesus was not seeking to soften the demands of God's revealed will; on the contrary: "Unless your righteousness exceeds that of the scribes and Pharisees, you will never enter the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:20). Jesus intensified the torah or repealed it (Matt. 5:21 ff.), depending on the character and work of God, who, as the baptism of John reveals, loves his enemies and therefore sends rain upon the just and the unjust (Matt. 5:44 f.; v. 45 is a typically rabbinic utterance).

Should the practice of such righteousness bring about a conflict with the letter of the law, then that man is blessed who, like Jesus himself, is persecuted for righteousness' sake (Matt. 5:10). "Seek first the kingdom of God and his [God's] righteousness", exhorts Jesus (Matt. 6:33). But this righteousness is not to be displayed before the eyes of men (Matt. 6:1); to do so is to seek a → reward from men and not from God, as do the Pharisees who, like whitewashed tombs, appear righteous in the eyes of men, but within (and so in God's sight) are full of unclean thoughts (Matt. 23:27 f.; → Black, White, Red, art. leukos).

2. The Lucan Writings. The adj. dikaios is applied to Christ (Lk. 23:47; Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14), to righteous men (Lk. 1:6, 17; 2:25; 14:14; 15:7; 18:9; 20:23; 23:50; Acts 10:22; 24:15), and to things (Lk. 12:57; Acts 4:19). The adv. dikaiōs occurs only in the Gospels at Lk. 23:41 in the remark of the penitent thief who observed that he and the other thief were suffering justly, but Jesus had done no wrong. The noun dikaiōma occurs in the Gospels only at Lk. 1:6 of Zechariah and Elizabeth who walked “in all the commandments and ordinances of the law blameless.” The noun dikaiosynē occurs at Lk. 1:75; Acts 10:35; 13:10; 17:31; 24:25; and the vb. dikaioō at Lk. 7:29; 10:29; 16:15; 18:14; Acts 13:38 f.

In the Lucan writings the word-group is important as one of the means whereby Christianity is shown to be the legitimate development of Judaism, the latter being a religion tolerated by the Romans and having the status of a religio licita. Hence, special mention is made of devout observers of the Jewish law (dikaioi) who came into contact with Jesus: Zechariah and Elizabeth, Simeon, Joseph of Arimathea (Lk. 1:6; 2:25; 23:50), to whom is added the Roman centurion, Cornelius (anēr dikaios, Acts 10:22; cf. v. 35). The beginning of Lk.’s Gospel is marked by references to Jewish eschatological hopes regarding the return of → Elijah who will turn the disobedient to the wisdom of the just (Lk. 1:17) and to similar hopes of a life whose characteristics throughout will be righteousness and → holiness (Lk. 1:75). Lk. sees this returning Elijah in the person of John the Baptist; tax-gatherers and public sinners justified God (edikaiōsan, Lk. 7:29) by being baptized by John, while the → scribes and → Pharisees deceived themselves into thinking they could pass themselves off before men as righteous (Lk. 20:20), or indeed that they were already righteous (Lk. 16:15). This is vividly portrayed in the parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Lk. 18:9–14), in form a perfect rabbinic example of false self-confidence (cf. SB II 210 f.).

But in → heaven there is more joy over one sinner who repents than over ninety-nine righteous (Lk. 15:7). Lk. does not deny that there is joy in heaven over the righteous; but the greatest joy is over those who turn from sin (→ Conversion). For the wonderful thing about Jesus is that by his word he makes new life possible for men who are so depraved and sinful as to suffer social and religious ostracism (Lk. 5:32); and this applies not only to Jews but to Gentiles too (Acts 10:22, 35). Jesus himself is therefore the very exemplar of a righteous man (a fact mentioned only incidentally in Matt. 27:19). His righteousness is openly recognized by the Roman centurion at Jesus’ death (Lk. 23:47), after which it becomes fundamental to Christian preaching (Acts 3:14; 7:52; 22:14). As the righteous one he has been raised by God from the dead, in advance of the general → resurrection of the righteous and unrighteous (Acts 24:15), and has been commissioned to judge the whole world in righteousness (Acts 17:31). This being the climax of Luke’s message, he records the pointed way in which the question of righteousness was handled by the apostles when face to face with the Jewish authorities: “Whether it is right in the sight of God to listen to you rather than to God, you must judge” (Acts 4:19).

3. Mark. By contrast with the other Synoptic Gospels the only instance of the word-group in Mk. is the use of the adj. at Mk. 6:20 in describing Herod’s reluctance to have John the Baptist executed on account of Herodias: “for Herod feared John, knowing that he was a righteous and holy man, and kept him safe. When he heard him, he was much perplexed; and yet he heard him gladly.” The usage is in line with Jewish concepts of righteousness; but the general absence of the word-group is indicative of Mk.'s tendency to avoid technical language.

4. The Johannine Writings. The adj. dikaios is applied to the Father by Jesus in his high priestly prayer (Jn. 17:25) and also in 1 Jn. 1:9 and Rev. 16:5; to Jesus (1 Jn. 2:1, 29; 3:7), though 1 Jn. 3:7, like Rev. 22:11, may apply to men. It applies to Jesus' just judgment (Jn. 5:30); and the Jews are likewise urged to "judge with right judgment" (Jn. 7:24). The adj. is also used impersonally in 1 Jn. 3:12; Rev. 15:3; 16:7; and 19:2. The noun dikaiosynē occurs only at Jn. 16:8; Rev. 19:11; 22:11 (where the only instance of dikaioō in the Johannine writings occurs as a v.l.); though dikaiōma also occurs at Rev. 15:4; 19:8.

(a) The sole instance of dikaiosynē in the Gospel of Jn. is used in a significant passage: the Paraclete (→ Advocate) will convince the world of sin and of righteousness and of judgment (Jn. 16:8). Jesus is seeking to show that righteousness will be manifested by his returning to the Father (Jn. 16:10), for it is not to be found in the world itself, not even in the world's best and most worthy representatives; the Father alone is its source and fountain-head. Jesus must therefore go away from his disciples, in order that their hopes might not be set upon him in any "this-worldly" fashion, but might be centred upon the Father with whom the Son is one.

(b) 2 and 3 Jn. do not use these words, but 1 Jn. sounds a note peculiar to itself. There are two mutually exclusive spheres: "Little children, let no one deceive you. He who does right is righteous, as he [Christ] is righteous. He who commits sin is of the devil; for the devil has sinned from the beginning" (1 Jn. 3:7 f.; cf. 3:10). In other words, a man can belong only to one of these two spheres, and bears the stamp of one or the other: "If you know that he [Christ] is righteous, you may be sure that every one who does right is born of him" (1 Jn. 2:29). Since there is only one person who is completely righteous, namely, Jesus (1 Jn. 2:1), and only one who has sinned from the beginning (1 Jn. 3:8), it is crucial whose side a man is on, i.e. whether he recognizes and confesses his sin (1 Jn. 1:9–2:2) or not. The sharpness of the distinction (cf. also 1 Jn. 3:12) is probably explained by the fact that many Christians had such a sense of communion with God as to imagine that they no longer belonged to this world but were already in heaven (1 Jn. 1:8), and were therefore beyond the reach of → sin.

(c) dikaiosynē is used of the rider on the white horse, Christ, who is called "Faithful and True, and in righteousness he judges and makes war" (Rev. 19:11; → Black, White, Red, art. leukos). In the concluding visions of Rev. there is a great separation between the righteous and the evil doers: "And he said to me, 'Do not seal up the words of the prophecy of this book, for the time is near. Let the evil doer still do evil, and the filthy still be filthy, and the righteous still do right, and the holy still be holy'" (Rev. 22:11). The thought is comparable with Dan. 12:9 f. dikaiōma means a judgment in Rev. 15:4 and a righteous deed in Rev. 19:8.

5. Paul. The adj. dikaios is applied by Paul to God (Rom. 3:26), Christ (2 Tim. 4:8), men (Rom. 1:17; cf. Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38; Rom. 2:13; 3:10; 5:7, 19; 1 Tim. 1:9; Tit. 1:8), and things (Rom. 7:12; Eph. 6:1; Phil. 1:7; 4:8; Col. 4:1; 2 Thess. 1:5 f.). The noun dikaiosynē occurs in Rom. 1:17; 3:5, 21 f., 25 f.; 10:3; cf. 2 Cor. 5:21; Phil. 3:9; Rom. 4:3, 5, 9, 22; cf. Gal. 3:6; Jas. 2:22; Gen. 15:6; Rom. 4:6, 11, 13; 5:17, 21; 6:13, 16, 18; 8:10; 9:30 f.; 10:4 ff., 10; 14:17; 1 Cor. 1:30; 2 Cor. 3:9; 5:21; 6:7, 14; 9:9 f.; 11:15; Gal. 2:21; 3:21; 5:5; Eph. 4:24; 5:9; 6:14; Phil. 1:11; cf.

Heb. 12:11; Jas. 3:18; Phil. 3:6, 9; 1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22; 3:16; 4:8; Tit. 3:5. dikaiōma occurs in Rom. 1:32; 2:26; 5:16; 8:4; and the only instances of dikaiōsis in the NT are to be found in Rom. 4:25; 5:18. The adv. dikaiōs occurs in 1 Cor. 15:34; 1 Thess. 2:10; Tit. 2:12. The vb. dikaiōō occurs in Rom. 2:13; 3:4, 20; cf. Gal. 2:16; Rom. 3:24, 26, 28, 30; 4:2, 5; 5:1, 9; 6:7; 8:30, 33; 1 Cor. 4:4; 6:11; Gal. 2:16 f.; 3:8, 11, 24; 5:4; 1 Tim. 3:16; Tit. 3:7.

Paul thus makes the most frequent use of this whole word-group, and gives it its widest range of meanings. Of all NT writers, he it is who establishes the closest connexion with the OT, when speaking of God's righteousness and God's justification of sinners. God's righteousness is essentially his covenant dealings with his people, who are thereby constituted a new humanity, a new → Israel comprising both Jews and Gentiles. This divine righteousness is revealed by the fact that God's purposes are not foiled by man's sin; rather he remains almighty both as Lord and Saviour in spite of man's rebellion. Since man's sin has been so radically dealt with, the demarcation between Israel and the Gentiles can be swept away so that the new people of God may come into being. The transgression and unbelief of the one man (→ Adam; Gen. 3) brought unbelief into the world, with the result that all men fell under God's condemnation. But now the righteous act (dikaiōma) of the one man (Christ), his absolute trust in him who justifies the ungodly, has defied the curse of → sin by bringing into the world the possibility of a similarly implicit trust in God. The result, at the appearing of Christ, will be the acquittal (dikaiōsis), the declaring righteous of all who are members of the new humanity (dikaioi katastathēsontai hoi polloi, "many will be made righteous"; Rom. 5:16–19). The following strands of teaching may be distinguished:

(a) By the works of the law, i.e. on the basis of perfect obedience, no man can be justified (Rom. 3:20, 28; Gal. 2:16; 3:11). Indeed, there would have been no need for Christ to die if dikaioσynē were by the law (Gal. 2:21; cf. 3:21). Henceforth, he who would be justified by the → works of the law shows that he has fallen from grace (Gal. 5:4). Thus men who pursue the righteousness of the law come to grief upon a stumbling stone (Rom. 9:32; → Offence, art. proskomma; → Rock, art. lithos). For through Christ this law has lost its absolute validity (Rom. 10:4; → Goal, art. telos NT 1 (a)), because by its own standards, he who knew no sin was made sin for us (2 Cor. 5:21; → Reconciliation, art. katallassō NT 4). Rom. 2:13 seems to contradict this: the doers of the law are justified, not the hearers (cf. 10:5). But it was precisely in the matter of doing the law that Israel had failed (Rom. 9:31), for a man can only do the will of God when he is grasped by the righteousness of God and completely taken up by it. Otherwise sin usurps the law (Rom. 7), and man is powerless against it because sin is not primarily evil deeds or evil inclinations, but man's striving for his own righteousness and justification (Rom. 10:3). Hence, only the man who has died to sin and so is justified (Rom. 6:7) can do God's will (Rom. 6:10).

(b) From this Paul concludes that man can be justified only by → faith in Christ (Rom. 3:26, 28; 5:1; Gal. 2:16), i.e. by trusting utterly and only in God's grace, which by definition must be a free gift (Rom. 3:24). Jews and Gentiles are justified in the same way: the circumcised (Israel) on the ground of their faith and the uncircumcised (the nations) because of their faith (Rom. 3:30; cf. Gal. 3:8). Here Paul appeals to the testimony of Scripture concerning → Abraham, who trusted in the God who justifies the ungodly (Rom. 4:5, 9, 11; Gal. 3:6; cf. E. Käsemann, "The Faith of Abraham in Romans 4”, in Perspectives on Paul, 1971, 79–101; A. T. Hanson, “Abraham the Justified Sinner”, in Studies in Paul’s Technique and Theology, 1974, 52–66; C. K. Barrett, “The Allegory of Abraham, Sarah, and Hagar in the Argument of Galatians”, in J. Friedrich, W. Pöhlmann and P. Stuhlmacher, eds., Rechtfertigung. Festschrift für Ernst Käsemann, 1976, 1–16). Similarly, in the light of the transition between Rom. 3:20 and 3:21 ff., dikaiosynē in the latter passage must be taken as meaning the way in which God justifies. Rom. 3:20 says: “Therefore by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified in God’s sight”; Rom. 3:21 f. continues: “But now the righteousness of God has been manifested. . . , the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ. . . .” The outcome of this righteousness of God is therefore being “justified freely by his grace” (v. 24). Vv. 25 f. take up the same idea and may be paraphrased as follows: “[Christ Jesus] has God put forward as an expiation [or propitiation] by his sacrificial death [→ blood], an expiation which becomes a reality through faith [→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai NT 4]. This took place to show his righteousness, because in the time of his forbearance he had passed over former sins [→ Patience, art. anechomai NT 2]; it was to prove at the present time that he himself is righteous, that he might be just and the justifier of him who lives by faith in Jesus Christ”. Christ’s atoning work is viewed from three different aspects. First, it is experienced as a reality only by → faith, since it was Christ’s faith in him who justifies the ungodly (Phil. 2:8) which enabled him to be “made sin”, i.e. treated as an ungodly man. To faith, therefore, Christ’s atonement is something objectively real, for it is only through faith that we can die with Christ. Second, the sacrificial death of Christ atones for sin because it is proof of God’s righteousness, i.e. it was not intended to atone for Christ’s alleged offence of blasphemy (→ Revile, art. blasphēmeō), but to procure justification for all believers (cf. 1 Cor. 1:30). Third, this justification anticipates Christ’s return in that it is already revealed; it enables God to be just, for he does not plunge men into sin so that they may experience his grace (see Rom. 3:5 ff.), but, in spite of the alienation between himself and men, he enables men even now to exercise believing trust and thereby, even before the manifestation of “the age to come”, to enter into newness of life (Rom. 5:17). The manner in which God justifies the sinner is expressed by the following phrases: dikaiosynē pisteōs “righteousness of faith” (Rom. 4:11, 13); dōreas tēs dikaiosynēs “free gift of righteousness” (Rom. 5:17); dikaiosynēn tēn ek pisteōs “righteousness through faith” (Rom. 9:30; 10:6, 10; Phil. 3:9).

(c) Since the believer has died with Christ to → sin and is now justified (Rom. 6:7), he lives only for God (6:11). This can be expressed in the words of Rom. 6:18: “Thanks be to God that. . . , having been set free from sin, you have become slaves of righteousness” (cf. v. 19). Paul can therefore speak of being subject to the righteousness of God (Rom. 10:4 cf. E. Käsemann, “‘The Righteousness of God’ in Paul”, in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 168–82). All such phrases, however, are but variations on the theme of the Christian belonging exclusively to God; see Rom. 6:13, 22: “But now being made free from sin and having become slaves of God . . . do not yield your members to sin as instruments of wickedness, but yield yourselves to God as men who have been brought from death to life, and your members to God as instruments of righteousness.” Similarly Paul can speak of the service of righteousness (2 Cor. 3:9; cf. 11:15) and of its → weapons (Eph. 6:10–17), since the righteousness of God is the way in which he reveals himself and the only way in which he can be approached (Rom. 1:16 f.). On 1 Cor. 4:4 → Conscience, art. syneidēsis NT 4. On Rom. 1:17; 3:21; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 8:38; cf. Hab. 2:4 see below, 6 (b).

(d) As the → resurrection anticipates the universal manifestation of God's kingdom, in the same way righteousness at the present time (Rom. 3:26) anticipates the final revelation of God's righteousness at the parousia of Christ, for believers "through the Spirit, by faith, wait for the hope of righteousness" (Gal. 5:5; cf. 2:17; Rom. 5:19). Otherwise, however, Paul always speaks of believers having been justified (dikaïousthai), i.e. in the past tense. The connecting link between present and future righteousness is the fact that, while believers have already become a people for God's own possession, he is still at enmity with the world as a whole ("all men", Rom. 5:18).

Hence, the justification of the individual springs entirely from that of all men (Rom. 5:19), so that it is not we who possess righteousness but righteousness which possesses us; we are its servants (Rom. 6:18; 2 Cor. 3:9). Our justification both comes from and extends into the future.

(e) Paul's doctrine of God's righteousness was so alien to the early church that Col. makes no use whatsoever of these words; Eph. has them merely in certain echo-like phrases (4:24; 5:9; 6:14), while the Pastorals speak of them entirely in terms of Hellenistic virtues: 1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 2:22: "Aim at righteousness..."; Tit. 1:8 (listing the virtues of a → "bishop"); 2:12: God's saving grace trains us "to live sober, upright and godly lives in this world". Similarly Scripture is profitable "for training in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3:16), and the law is considered to be only for the lawless and profane, not for the righteous who by their virtues far surpass the law (1 Tim. 1:9). So the Lord, the righteous judge (cf. Rev. 19:12) will award the crown of righteousness to his apostle when the latter has finished his course (2 Tim. 4:7 f.). The preaching of virtue is made possible, however, by our being "justified by his [Christ's] grace" (Tit. 3:7), for God "saved us, not because of deeds done by us in righteousness, but in virtue of his own mercy" (3:5).

6. The Epistle to the Hebrews. The adj. dikaïos occurs at Heb. 10:38 in the quotation from Hab. 2:4 "my righteous one shall live by faith". dikaïosynē occurs at Heb. 1:9 (quoting Pss. 45[44]:7; 5:13; 7:2; 11:7 (of → Noah); 11:23; 12:11 (cf. Jas. 3:18; Phil. 1:11), and dikaïōma at Heb. 9:1, 10. The vb. dikaïoō is not found at all in Heb.

(a) Heb. shows scarcely any Pauline influence, righteousness being seen as the result of faith in the invisible God. This is the sense in which the epistle speaks of righteousness kata pistin "according to faith" (Heb. 11:7; cf. vv. 4, 33 f.; → Faith). God's discipline (paideia; cf. Heb. 12:5–11; Prov. 3:11 f.) leads to this righteousness, and for those made perfectly righteous he has prepared a place in heaven (Heb. 12:23). The Son, as the antitype of → Melchizedek (Heb. 7:2) is the King of Righteousness (cf. 1:8, 9). The ordinances of the old covenant are described in Heb. 9:1 by the word dikaïōma, and in Heb. 9:10 are further characterized as "ordinances of the flesh", i.e. those of a merely temporary nature – particularly, no doubt, those relating to the sacrificial system. H. Seebass

(b) Whilst Heb. does not use the vb. to justify, and relates faith in Heb. 11 directly to the invisible God, drawing its examples from the OT, there are certain parallels with Pauline thought. For Paul likewise is concerned to show that his understanding of salvation is entirely in line with that in the OT. The burden of the argument of Rom. 4 is to show from the example of → Abraham and → David that justification under the old covenant was by faith (cf. Gal. 3:15–18, where Paul stresses that it is by → promise and not by works, with Heb. 6:13 ff.). Similarly, Paul's teaching on Jesus' propitiatory death is paralleled in Heb. by the argument that Jesus as our perfect high → priest has offered himself in → sacrifice, fulfilling the day of atonement ritual and thus inaugurating the new → covenant, thereby superseding the old covenant, its priesthood and sacrifices (Heb. 7–10). The new element is the way in which the thought of the day of atonement ritual is carried through, so that the believer has his sins dealt with and gains access to God through Jesus' priestly and sacrificial act on the cross and his exaltation: "Therefore, brethren, since we have confidence to enter the sanctuary by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he opened for us through the curtain, that is, through his flesh, and since we have a great high priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10:19–22; cf. Lev. 16; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 244–52). J. A. T. Robinson goes even further and sees the death of Jesus in Heb. 10:19 as "the new Encaenia or Dedication (enekainisen)" (Twelve New Testament Studies, SBT 34, 1962, 172). Robinson suggests that the author of Heb. is "conflating the two ideas that the Cross is the dedication (a) of the new covenant (cf. 9:18: 'Even the first covenant hath not been dedicated (enekainistai) without blood') and (b) of the new temple (the Encaenia as a technical term [cf. John 10:22] goes back to the rededication of the Temple in I Macc. 4:54–9, and the whole argument of chapters 9 and 10 leads to the climax that Jesus has now 'opened' the new sanctuary in the temple of his body)" (ibid.).

The writer proceeds to apply this teaching to the need for patience, which he supports with a quotation from Hab. 2:3 f.: "For yet a little while, and the coming one shall come and shall not tarry; but my righteous one shall live by faith [ho de dikaios mou ek pisteōs zēsetai], and if he shrinks back my soul has no pleasure in him" (Heb. 10:37 f.). The prophet Habakkuk lived in the latter part of the 7th cent. B.C. at a time of oppression, crying out for vindication of divine righteousness. Yahweh replied by telling him to be patient, for the oppressor would reap his due judgment, and the righteous man would be preserved by his loyal trust in God: "For the vision awaits its time; it hastens to the end – it will not lie. If it seems slow, wait for it; it will surely come, it will not delay. Behold, he whose soul is not upright in him shall fail, but the righteous shall live by his faith [MT w^ešaddîq be^emûnâto yihyeh]" (Hab. 2:3 f.). In the LXX version the words are given a different emphasis with various changes of detail: "For the vision is for a time yet to come. But it will spring up at last and will not be in vain. Though he may tarry, wait for him; for he will assuredly come and will not fail. If any one draw back my soul hath no pleasure in him. But the just [or "righteous one"] shall live by faith in me [ho de dikaios ek pisteōs mou zēsetai]." This reading follows the B text of the LXX, but the A text and C group of MSS change the place of the possessive pronoun and thus give a significantly different sense: ho de dikaios mou ek pisteōs zēsetai, "but my righteous one will live by faithfulness]" (cf. F. F. Bruce, op. cit., 273). Codex A has the mou ("my") in both positions, but this is evidently a secondary reading. Most editors prefer the B text, and it has even been suggested that the A reading has been influenced by the text of Heb. (cf. B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961, 231). But the A reading has been defended by T. W. Manson ("The Argument from Prophecy", JTS 46, 1945, 129 ff.) claiming that it makes better sense in the context of the argument. God's righteous one will live by faithfulness. By contrast the leader who plays the coward "eo ipso shows that he is not God's chosen. The genuine choice of God, God's righteous one, will be faithful to his God, his people, and his task, and so he will win life."

If this is correct, the LXX gives an interpretation which focuses on one individual, God's chosen one, and on the element of faithfulness. The author of Heb. further interprets this, applying it to the second coming of Christ. The introductory clause ("for yet a little while") is not taken from any attested text of Hab., but may derive from Isa. 26:20. Heb. places a definite article before the participle "coming", so as to give the messianic title "the coming one" (cf. Matt. 11:3 par. Lk. 7:19). But Heb. also inverts the two parts of the verse: "my righteous one" is applied to the believer who may be tempted to lose patience and doubt the second coming, and thus shrink back. "My righteous one" thus becomes the subject for both parts of the verse. At the same time, the author of Heb. may not, like various commentators, feel compelled to choose between the two alternative interpretations of pistis, i.e. as "faith" and "faithfulness". For in living by faith one becomes faithful in the sense of loyal to the promises of God, enduring temptation and hardship. And this is, in fact, the theme of ch. 11 with its many examples of faith which enabled the heroes of faith to endure (cf. also Heb. 12:1 f.).

The interpretation of Hab. 2:3 f. was discussed by the rabbis. Rabbi Simlai (c. A.D. 250) claimed that the 613 commandments received by Moses had been summed up by David in eleven commandments (Ps. 15), by Isaiah in six (Isa. 33:15 f.), by Micah in three (Mic. 6:8), by Isaiah again in two (Isa. 56:1), and finally by Amos in one (Amos 5:4), but Rabbi Nachman ben Isaac (c. A.D. 350) substituted Hab. 2:4b for Amos 5:4 as the summary in one commandment (Makkoth 23b; cf. C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975, 101; SB III 542 ff.). The Qumran community applied the passage to those who were loyal to the Teacher of Righteousness: "Interpreted, this concerns all those who observe the Law in the House of Judah, whom God will deliver from the House of Judgement because of their suffering and because of their faith in the Teacher of Righteousness" (1 QpHab 8:1-3; for Qumran exegesis see R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Age, 1975, 40 ff.; J. A. Ziesler, op. cit., 103).

Hab. 2:4 is quoted and interpreted twice by Paul as a testimonium laying the foundation for his doctrine of justification by faith. In Rom. 1:16 Paul declares that he is "not ashamed of the gospel: it is the power of God for salvation to every one who has faith, to the Jew first and also to the Greek." He then adds: "For in it the righteousness of God is revealed through faith for faith; as it is written, 'He who through faith is righteous shall live'" (RSV; cf. RSV mg. "The righteous shall live by faith"; ho de dikaios ek pisteōs zēsetai). In Gal. 3:11 Paul argues: "Now it is evident that no man is justified before God by the law; for 'He who through faith is righteous shall live'" (RSV; cf. RSV mg. "the righteous shall live by faith"; ho dikaios ek pisteōs zēsetai). There is also an echo of the thought in Phil. 3:9, where Paul declares it his aim to be found in Christ "not having a righteousness of my own, based on law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness from God that depends on faith.”

C. H. Dodd suggests that the quotation was current as a testimonium to the coming of Christ in primitive Christian times, and that it was used independently by both Paul and the author of Heb. He thinks that Paul quoted it in Gal. as an ad hominem argument based on common acceptance of the testimonium by himself and his opponents (According to the Scriptures, 1952, 50 f.). F. F. Bruce sees no fundamental difference between Paul’s use of the text and that of Heb. (op. cit., 274). A. Feuillet argues that Paul’s meaning is not simply that “the just shall live by faith.” Because Paul attaches ek pisteōs to zēsetai, dropping altogether the possessive pronoun (mou, “my”, which occurs in the LXX and Heb.), Feuillet contends that Paul’s thesis is “he who is just in virtue of faith will live” (“La Citation d’Habacuc II.4 et les Huit Premiers Chapîtres de l’Épître aux Romains”, NTS 6, 1959–60, 52–80). He further argues that this is the thesis that Paul develops in Rom. 1–8. His argument is adopted by J. A. Ziesler who endorses the forensic and ethical meaning of dikaios: “the believer is really righteous because he is in Christ, though this righteousness is not and never becomes his own. This is the righteousness acceptable to God which enables the man of faith to live. This life is probably eschatological salvation, understood forensically and in terms of eternal life, cf. Rom. 5:17; Ezek. 18:27” (op. cit., 177). C. E. B. Cranfield relates zēsetai (“will live”) to Rom. 2:7; 4:17; 5:17, 18, 21; 6:4, 10, 11, 13, 22, 23; 7:10; 8:2, 6, 10, 13; 10:5; 12:1 (op. cit., 101).

Paul is giving a selective interpretation of Hab. which asserts a fundamental identity between the righteous in Israel and the righteous in the Christian community (E. E. Ellis, Paul’s Use of the Old Testament, 1957, 120). The Heb. ’mûnâh means both faithfulness and faith (op. cit., 177), the former denoting the quality of character produced by faith. The hiphil form of the corresponding vb. h’myn b (cf. Num. 14:11), means both “to show steadfastness in” and “to believe in”. As the argument of Rom. shows, the faith that Paul is contending for is never a bare faith which does not issue in a life of faithfulness (cf. Rom. 6:1 ff.). On the other hand, faithfulness springs from faith and not vice versa.

C. E. B. Cranfield argues against the numerous exegetes who link ek pisteōs (“by faith”) with the vb. zēsetai (“will live”) on the grounds that this reflects the MT and LXX (op. cit., 101 f.). Paul is giving an interpretation of Hab. But to argue that, if Paul had meant to link “by faith” with “the just”, he would have written ho de ek pisteōs dikaios zēsetai, fails to appreciate that Paul is quoting and not formulating something independently. Moreover, to claim that zēsetai alone without the support of ek pisteōs is weak, is to fail to recognize the significance of the word-group associated with “live” in Rom. Cranfield advances three positive arguments for linking “the just” (ho dikaios) with “by faith” (ek pisteōs). (i) The context requires it, for Paul’s thesis is not immediately concerned with living by faith but with righteousness by faith. (ii) The structure of the epistle requires it: Rom. 1:18–4:25 expounds the meaning of “the just by faith”, while Rom. 5:1–8:39 expounds the meaning of the promise that the man who by faith is righteous “will live”. (iii) The connexion between righteousness and faith is made explicit by Rom. 5:1 (“therefore being justified by faith”) which summarizes the argument of the previous section, and also by 4:11 (“seal of righteousness by faith”), 4:13 (“the righteousness of faith”), 9:30 (“righteousness through faith”), and 10:6 (“the righteousness based on faith says”).

7. James. The adj. dikaïos occurs in Jas. 5:6 (“you have killed the righteous man”) and Jas. 5:16 (“The prayer of a righteous man has great power in its effects”). The noun dikaïosynē is found at Jas. 1:20 (“for the anger of man does not work the righteousness of God”); 2:23 quoting Gen. 15:6 (“and the scripture was fulfilled which says, ‘Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness’; and he was called the friend of God”); cf. Rom. 4:3; Gal. 3:11; Isa. 41:8; 51:2; 2 Chr. 20:7; Dan. 3:35); and 3:18 (“And the harvest of righteousness is sown in peace by those who make peace”). The vb. dikaioō also occurs three times: “Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he offered his son Isaac upon the altar?” (Jas. 2:21); “You see that a man is justified by works and not by faith alone” (Jas. 2:24; cf. v. 23 quoted above); “And in the same way was not also Rahab the harlot justified by works when she received the messengers and sent them out another way?” (Jas. 2:25; cf. Jos. 2:1–21).

There has been a considerable debate on whether James is actually contradicting Paul and in the past Jas. 2:14–26 has been a major battleground in the conflict between Protestant and Catholic apologists in the debate on justification by faith (for a brief survey and literature see M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James: A Commentary on the Epistle of James, Hermeneia, 1976, 174–80; see also the bibliography below). Dibelius and Greeven see as the background a basically Jewish exposition of scripture (op. cit., 161–67), and point out that the example of Abraham must be seen in the light of the Jewish tradition about him (cf. Midrash Rabbah on Genesis; Sir. 44:19 ff.; 1 Macc. 2:52 [“Was not Abraham found faithful when tested, and it was reckoned to him as righteousness?”]; Philo, Abr. 167 on the offering of Isaac [“For I might almost say that all the other actions which won favour with God are surpassed by this”]; Rer. Div. Her. 94; Leg. All. 3, 228; Dibelius and Greeven, op. cit. 168–74; B. Beer, Leben Abrahams nach Auffassung der jüdischen Sage, 1859; P. Billerbeck, “Abrahams Leben und Bedeutung nach Auffassung der älteren Haggada”, Nathanael. Zeitschrift für die Arbeit der evangelischen Kirche an Israel 15, 1899, 43 ff.; ibid. 16, 1900, 33 f.; O. Schmitz, “Abraham im Spätjudentum und im Urchristentum”, Aus Schrift und Geschichte, Festschrift A. Schlatter, 1922, 99–123; S. Sandmel, Philo's Place in Judaism: A Study of Conceptions of Abraham in Jewish Literature, 1956).

James’ position presupposes the radically non-Jewish separation of faith and works wrought by Paul. Dibelius and Greeven think that James was not attacking Paul as such, but it was Paul’s fate to be misunderstood and James lacked the depths of spiritual experience which lay behind the Pauline slogan of “faith without works” (op. cit., 180 f.). But the context of James’ remarks argues against this. The situation is one in which the rich could be indifferent to the starving and ill-clad, content with their own spirituality (Jas. 2:14–18; 3:13 ff.; cf. 5:1 ff.), and in which church members saw no inconsistency between their spirituality and gossip and slander (Jas. 3:1 ff., 11 ff.). It was a situation which was not without its parallels in the church at Corinth with its factions, moral laxity and complacent attitudes in the face of Paul’s collection for the → poor. In such a situation Paul himself did not preach justification by faith but the need to do something.

James introduces the problem by asking: “What does it profit, my brethren, if a man says he has faith but has not works? Can his faith save him?” Faith here could mean either notional assent to a doctrine such as justification by faith, or preoccupation with or uncritical acceptance of an attitude without asking about its practical implications. It is not the wholehearted trust and self-commitment which Paul speaks of. Similarly, the works which justify a man are not the works envisaged by Paul. For Paul faith signifies implicit trust and works man's attempt to procure favour with God by his own merits. With James the contrast is between holding something to be true without acting upon it and acknowledging a truth which is worked out in daily life. James' use of "righteousness" (1:20; 3:18) and the "righteous" (3:5; 5:6, 16) shows that he is standing in the Jewish tradition (cf. also his address in 1:1). At the same time he is appealing within that tradition to a strand of interpretation which complements rather than contradicts Paul.

For in both Paul and James dikaioō means to pronounce righteous, though in the case of James it concerns evidence that can be seen by men whereas in Paul it is the eschatological verdict pronounced by God on the unrighteous. Paul bases his argument on Gen. 15:6, where Abraham believes the promises of God and is declared righteous. Although James quotes the same passage, he illustrates his point not from that passage but from the subsequent story of the offering of Isaac (Jas. 2:21; cf. Gen. 22:1–14). This enables him to draw the conclusion: "You see that faith was active along with his works, and faith was completed by works" (2:22); "For as the body apart from the spirit is dead, so faith apart from works is dead" (2:26). A bare lifeless faith is like a corpse; but the works which animate it are not the self-righteous acts which supposedly accrue merit with God, but the acting out of the word of God, as is illustrated by the way Abraham and Rahab acted out the word of God which came to them. Thus, Paul and James are fighting on different fronts. Paul is attacking self-righteous legalism, and James self-righteous indifference.

8. 1 and 2 Peter. The adj. dikaios occurs in 1 Pet. 3:12 ("For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous", quoting Ps. 34:16); 3:18 ("For Christ also died once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh but made alive in the spirit"); 4:18 ("And 'If the righteous man is scarcely saved, where will the impious and sinner appear?' " quoting Prov. 11:31 LXX); 2 Pet. 1:13 ("I think it right"); and 2:7 f. ("And if he rescued righteous Lot, greatly distressed by the licentiousness of the wicked [for by what that righteous man saw and heard as he lived among them, he was vexed in his righteous soul day after day with their lawless deeds], then the Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trial, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment until the day of judgment"; cf. Gen. 19:16, 29). The adv. dikaiōs occurs in 1 Pet. 2:23 ("When he was reviled, he did not revile in return; when he suffered he did not threaten; but he trusted to him who judges justly"). The vb. dikaioō does not occur at all. But the noun dikaioσynē is found twice in 1 Pet. and 4 times in 2 Pet.: "He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, that we might die to sin and live to righteousness. By his wounds you have been healed" (1 Pet. 2:24); "But even if you do suffer for righteousness' sake, you will be blessed. Have no fear of them, nor be troubled" (1 Pet. 3:14). The concept figures in the opening address of 2 Pet.: "Simon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to those who have obtained a faith of equal standing with ours in the righteousness of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet. 1:1). 2 Pet. 2:5 speaks of → Noah as "a herald of righteousness", and 2 Pet. 2:21 describes the Christian faith and life as "the way of righteousness" in its dire warning against falling away: "For it would have been better for them never to have known the way of righteousness than after knowing it to turn back from the holy commandment delivered to them.” Finally it occurs in 2 Pet. 3:13: “But according to his promise we wait for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells.”

There is the sense in which a righteous person is a member of the righteous community, but in none of these passages is the notion a bare formality. Righteousness takes its character from God himself (1 Pet. 2:23; cf. Rev. 16:5), and salvation is grounded in righteousness (1 Pet. 3:18; cf. 2:24 ff.) which finds its expression in right behaviour (1 Pet. 2:24; cf. 3:12; 4:18). He who is called to suffer for righteousness’ sake is blessed (1 Pet. 3:14), and in so doing lives out the righteousness of Christ. Thus the Christian faith and way of life can be called “the way of righteousness” (2 Pet. 2:11), and the goal of life can be described in terms of righteousness (2 Pet. 3:13).

9. Contemporary Interpretations of Righteousness. Traditionally the question of justification has been a divisive issue since the time of the Reformation. The Roman Catholic view set out at the Council of Trent regards justification as both an acquittal and a making righteous, and can even speak of an increase of justification (Session VI, Canon 24). On the Catholic side it is pointed out that Scripture never speaks of justification by faith alone, and support for the ethical interpretation is found both in the OT and in Jas. At the same time, it has been argued that the Council of Trent insists that works are entirely the fruit of grace, and Hans Küng has argued that there is a fundamental agreement between the Reformed and Catholic understanding of justification (Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, 1964). Perhaps typical of the more traditional Catholic exegesis is the view of F. Amiot: “God considers just those whom he has rendered just, and implicitly declares them to be so. But he does not, strictly speaking, pronounce a judgment. The judgment is reserved for the day of the appearance before the judgment seat of Christ. . . . Then it is that God will finally declare just those who are just, having remained faithful to the end” (The Key Concepts of St Paul, 1962, 124). For K. Kertelge, justification is forensic but not merely so; it is a real rather than an imputed righteousness (“Rechtfertigung” bei Paulus, 1967, 115–20).

Against the Catholic position it has been pointed out that the distinction between “real” and “imputed” righteousness is a false antithesis. For the notion of imputation is no mere legal fiction. Because the believer is in Christ, he is really righteous, since he has the righteousness of Christ (cf. E. J. Goodspeed, “Some Greek Notes: III Justification”, JBL 73, 1954, 86–91; cf. also G. W. Bromiley, “The Doctrine of Justification in Luther”, EQ 24, 1952, 91–100; E. G. Rupp, The Righteousness of God, 1953, 177–83; and J. A. Ziesler, op. cit., 1–16 for a survey of interpretations).

Karl Barth defines the righteousness of God as that which is revealed by the gospel according to Rom. 1:16 f.: “There it is made clear that the gospel is the revelation of dikaiosynē, also called dikaiōsis (Rom. 4:25 and 5:18) and dikaiōma (Rom. 5:16) – i.e. the revelation of the final righteous decision of God, which, for everyone who acknowledges it in faith, is the power of God unto salvation – dynamis Theou eis sōterian” (Christ and Adam: Man and Humanity in Romans 5, SJT Occasional Papers 5, 1956, 1; cf. “The Justification of Man”, § 61, CD IV, 1, 514–642; and for a brief discussion C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message, 1967, 130–9). Accordingly, justification is construed as “conforming to the decision about them that has already been made in Him" (Christ and Adam, 3). "In sovereign anticipation of our faith God has justified us through the sacrificial blood of Christ" (ibid., 2). Underlying Barth's approach is his view of the covenant which he understands as the partnership between God and man generally in view of the union of divine and human nature in Jesus Christ. There is a sense in which all God's dealings with man take place in him. He is the elect for all and the reprobate for all. On the cross he bore the wrath of God for all, so that the wrath of God is a thing of the past. The resurrection of Jesus is God's verdict on man in view of Christ's death in his place. Thus the justification of man takes place objectively in Christ, and is appropriated subjectively as men come to faith in him. The difference between believers and unbelievers lies in the fact that the former consciously enjoy their justification and live it out, whereas the latter do not. Barth's position has been criticized from various angles. On the one hand, it has been questioned on the grounds that his view of the covenant is a piece of speculation based on a biblical core of ideas. On the other hand, his exegesis of Rom. requires him to treat dikaiosynē, dikaiōsis and dikaïōma as synonyms which identify the justifying act of God with the righteousness of God, making it take place entirely outside man as God's verdict, whereas for Paul one cannot speak of justification apart from faith. In so doing Barth makes justification and atonement identical (→ Reconciliation; → Redemption).

R. Bultmann holds that dikaioō means to make righteous, because it normally renders the Heb. in the hiphil and thus must be causative. But the term righteous means "in a right relationship" and not "ethically upright". It is forensic and eschatological, in that righteousness is already imputed to man in the present on the presupposition that he has faith, but as such it is also eschatological in that the saving event has ended the old course of the world and has introduced the new aeon (cf. Systematic Theology, I, 1952, 270–78; "DIKAIOSYNĒ THEOU", JBL, 12–16). C. K. Barrett takes a similar view of dikaioō (The Epistle to the Romans, BNTC, 1957, 74 ff.). Alan Richardson argues that the righteous man actually is righteous but only eschatologically (An Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament, 1958, 236 ff.).

Ernst Käsemann rejects the view that God's righteousness is a property of the divine nature, as deriving from the Greek speculative tradition and as being in conflict with the OT and Jewish tradition. For him it is both a power and a gift ("The Righteousness of God' in Paul", in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 168–82; cf. also "Justification and Salvation History in the Epistle to the Romans", in Perspectives on Paul, 1971, 60–78; and An die Römer, HNT 8a, 1973). It is "a power which brings salvation to pass" (New Testament Questions of Today, 181), "the rightful power with which God makes his cause to triumph in the world which has fallen away from him and which yet, as creation, is his inviolable possession" (ibid., 180). Käsemann sees the phrase dikaiosynē theou as a fixed term which existed independently of Paul (cf. Matt. 6:33; Jas. 1:20) which can be traced back to Deut. 33:21 ("The LORD executed righteousness [dikaiosynēn kyrios epoïesen] and his judgment with Israel" LXX; cf. ibid., 172). It is found in Test. Dan 6:10 ("Depart therefore, from all unrighteousness, and cleave unto the righteousness of God") and 1QS 11:12 ("If I stumble by reason of the wickedness of my flesh, my justification lies in the righteousness of God").

Käsemann refrains from drawing an over-sharp distinction between the gift-like character of righteousness, its juridical application and its character as power (ibid.). But C. Müller eliminates the forensic element and thinks of it as eschatologically making real God's rightful power in the world (Gottes Gerechtigkeit und Gottes Volk. Eine Untersuchung zu Römer 9–11, FRLANT 86, 1964). P. Stuhlmacher sees it as a technical term and a basic theme in apocalyptic, the demonstration of the creator's power that establishes justice (Gottes Gerechtigkeit bei Paulus, FRLANT 87, 1965).

Against Käsemann it has to be said that the grounds for asserting that "the righteousness of God" is a Jewish formula are not very substantial. Deut. 33:21 appears to be concerned with God as the punishing judge, though there may be grounds for seeing it as a technical term at Qumran (cf. 1QS 10:25; 11:12; IQM 4:6). Within the teaching of Paul it appears as power (2 Cor. 3:9; Rom. 10:3; 6:13 ff.), a designation for Christ (1 Cor. 1:30), a possible synonym for God's glory (Rom. 3:21 ff.), and a possible description of God's covenant faithfulness (Rom. 3:5). Käsemann makes an important point when he warns against understanding God's righteousness in too narrowly an individualistic way. He has performed a service in drawing attention to the aspect of righteousness as the power of God, and in warning against seeing the term anachronistically and abstractly in terms of a speculative understanding of the divine attributes. On the other hand, it must be said that the righteousness of God is God acting righteously. As such, God is acting in power. As such, his action is a free gift. And in the light of the context of judgment, which Paul develops, e.g. in Rom. 1 and 2 and Gal. 3, God's righteousness has a forensic context.

J. A. Ziesler sees the vb. as essentially relational or forensic and the noun and adj. as describing behaviour within the relationship (op. cit., 212). But the distinction seems to oversimplify. Perhaps it is safer to say with him that the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith is relational or forensic: "God accepts us as we are, he acquits us despite our lack of deserving, he forgives us. It all rests entirely on his grace, our faith being not the ground but the means by which justification operates, though the expressions may vary, cf. ek pisteōs in Rom. 5:1 and dia pisteōs in Gal. 2:16. This entire dependence on grace is not only initially, at baptism or conversion, but remains. Even after a lifetime of Christian service, the believer has no works on which to rely. Justification is always by grace through faith, now, and before God's judgment throne, cf. Rom. 3:30; 5:1" (op. cit., 168). Moreover, there is a corporate and ethical aspect to it. "The believer enters not just a private relationship to Jesus, but a new humanity, in which he becomes a new kind of man. Thus there are not only social or corporate implications, but also ethical ones, for he now shares in the risen life of Christ, which means power, including ethical power" (op. cit., 168 f.). This righteousness is the righteousness of Christ which he participates in and receives as a gift. He never possesses it outright as his own, but only in Christ as Christ lives in him (cf. Gal. 2:20). This faith-righteousness means the end of law-righteousness, which in fact was never a real righteousness at all. "True righteousness does not consist in law-fulfilment, for the Christian has died to the Law both as the way to justification and as the way to righteousness. Yet if God looks on believers only as they are found in Christ, he may properly declare them righteous, for in him – and only in him – they are righteous, and therefore ought to be acquitted. There is nothing fictional here" (op. cit., 169).

C. Brown

→ Cross, → Forgiveness, → Judgment, → Law, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Sin

(a). E. R. Achtemeier, "Righteousness in the OT", IDB IV 80–5; P. J. Achtemeier, "Righteousness in the NT", IDB IV 91–9; F. Amiot, The Key Concepts of St. Paul, 1962; J. A. Baird, The Justice of God in the Teaching of Jesus, 1963; C. K. Barrett, The Epistle to the Romans, BNTC, 1957; and From First Adam to Last, 1962; G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Justification, 1954; K. Barth, "The Justification of Man", § 61, CD IV, 1, 514–642; and Christ and Adam: Man and Humanity in Romans 5, SJT Occasional Papers 5, 1956; M. Barth, Justification: Pauline Texts Interpreted in the Light of the Old and New Testaments, 1971; M. Black, Romans, New Century Bible, 1973; C. Blackman, "Romans 3 26b: A Question of Translation", JBL 87, 1968, 203 f.; G. Bornkamm, "The Revelation of Christ to Paul on the Damascus Road and Paul's Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation", in R. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 90–103; and Paul, 1971, 109–239; J. A. Bollier, "The Righteousness of God", Interpretation 8, 1954, 404–13; G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963; J. F. Botteroff, "The Relation of Justification and Ethics in the Pauline Epistles", SJT 26, 1973, 421–30; G. W. Bromiley, "The Doctrine of Justification in Luther", EQ 24, 1952, 91–110; F. F. Bruce, The Teacher of Righteousness in the Qumran Texts, 1957; The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964; The Epistle of Paul to the Romans, TC, 1963; and "Justification by Faith in the Non-Pauline Writings of the New Testament", EQ 24, 1952, 66–77; and Paul: Apostle of the Free Spirit, 1977; J. Buchanan, The Doctrine of Justification: An Outline of its History in The Church and of its Exposition from Scripture, (1867) 1961; A. Büchler, Studies in Sin and Atonement in the Rabbinic Literature of the First Century, 1928; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, I–II, 1952–55; "Adam and Christ according to Romans 5", in W. Klassen and C. F. Snyder, eds., Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation, 1962, 143–65; and "ΔΙΚΑΙΟΣΥΝΗ ΤΗΘΥ", JBL 83, 1964, 12–16; L. Cerfaux, Christ in the Theology of St. Paul, 1959²; H. Conzelmann, "Paul's Doctrine of Justification: Theology or Anthropology?", in F. Herzog, ed., Theology of the Liberating Word, 1971, 108–23; C. E. B. Cranfield, "St. Paul and the Law", SJT 17, 1964, 43–68; and The Epistle to the Romans, ICC, I, 1975; A. Cronbach, "Righteousness in Jewish Literature, 200 BC–AD 100", IDB IV 85–91; W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism, 1955²; M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James: A Commentary on the Epistle of James, Hermeneia, 1976; K. P. Donfried, "Justification and Last Judgment in Paul", Interpretation 30, 1976, 140–52 (fuller form in ZNW 67, 90–110); J. W. Drane, Paul – Libertine or Legalist? A Study in the Theology of the Major Pauline Epistles, 1975; E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 1957; and Paul and his Recent Interpreters, 1961; R. Y. K. Fung, Righteousness and Faith in the Thought of Paul, (Dissertation, Manchester), 1975; and "The Forensic Character of Justification", Themelios 3, 1977, 16–21; V. P. Furnish, Theology and Ethics in Paul, 1968, 135–61; T. F. Glasson, "Dying and Rising with Christ", London and Holborn Quarterly Review, 1961, 286–91; E. J. Goodspeed, "Some Greek Notes: III. Justification", JBL 73, 1954, 86–91; W. Grundmann, "The Teacher of Righteousness of Qumran and the Question of Justification by Faith in the Theology of the Apostle Paul", in J. Murphy-O'Connor, ed., Paul and Qumran: Studies in New Testament Exegesis, 1968, 85–114; A. T. Hanson, "Abraham the Justified Sinner", in Studies in Paul's Technique and Theology, 1974, 52–66; H. W. Heidland, logizomai, TDNT IV 284–92; R. T. Herford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, 1903; D. Hill, "ΔΙΚΑΙΟΙ as a Quasi-Technical Term", NTS 11, 1964–65, 296–302; and Greek Words and Hebrew Meanings: Studies in the Semantics of Soteriological Terms, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 5, 1967, 82–162; E. G. Hirsch, "Right and Righteous", in I. Singer, ed., The Jewish Encyclopedia, X, 1905, 420–24; Z. C. Hodges, "Light on James Two from Textual Criticism", Bibliotheca Sacra 120, 1963, 341–50; A. M. Hunter, Paul and his Predecessors, 1961²; J. Jeremias, "Paul and James", ExpT 66, 1954–55, 368–71; and The Central Message of the New Testament, 1965, 51–66; S. E. Johnson, "Paul and the Manual of Discipline", HTR 48, 1955, 157–65; C. Johnston, "The Controversy between St. Paul and St. James", Constructive Quarterly 3, 1915, 603–19; E. Käsemann, "The Righteousness of God in Paul", in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 168–82; and "Justification and Salvation History in the Epistle to the Romans", in Perspectives on Paul, 1971, 60–78; G. Klein, "Righteousness in the NT", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 750 ff.; W. L. Knox, "Abraham and the Quest for God", HTR 28, 1935, 55–60; H. Küng, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, 1964; A. R. C. Leaney, "The Righteous Community in St. Paul", StudEv II, TU 87, 441–46; W. F. Lofthouse, "The Righteousness of Jahveh", ExpT 50, 1938–39, 341–5; and "The Righteousness of God", ibid., 441–5; R. N. Longenecker, Paul, Apostle of Liberty, 1964; and Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975; S. Lyonnet, "Pauline Soteriology", in A. Robert and A. Feuillet, eds., Introduction to the New Testament, 1965, 820–65; T. W. Manson, "The Argument from Prophecy", JTS 46, 1945, 129 ff.; A. Marmorstein, The Doctrine of Merits in Old Rabbinic Literature, 1920; and The Old Rabbinic Doctrine of God, I–II, 1927–37; L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross, 1960²; and The Cross in the New Testament, 1967; C. F. D. Moule, "Obligation in the Ethic of Paul", in W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule and R. R. Niebuhr, eds., Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to John Knox, 1967, 389–406; and "Fulfillment-words in the New Testament", NTS 14, 1968, 293–320; J. Murray, The Epistle to the Romans, I–II, NLC, 1960–65; F. Nötscher and P. Bläser, "Righteousness (justice)", EBT II 780–92; J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, I–IV (in 2 volumes), 1926–40; T. G. Pinches, E. J. Thomas, A. R. Gordon, W. C. Allen, J. Denney, A. F. Simpson, A. M. Blackman, P. Shorey, A. B. Keith, J. Abelson and B. C. de Vaux, "Righteousness", ERE X 777–811; G. Quell and G. Schrenk, dikē, dikaios, etc., TDNT II 174–225; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I–II, 1962–65; "Faith Reckoned as Righteousness", in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1966, 125–30; and "Righteousness' and 'Life' in the Cultic Language of the Psalms", ibid., 243–66; B. Reicke, The Epistles of James, Peter, and Jude, 1964; J. Reumann and W. Lazareth, Righteousness and Society, Ecumenical Dialog in a Revolutionary Age, 1967; A. Ritschl, A Critical History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, 1872; and The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, 1900; C. J. Roetzel, Judgement in the Community: A Study of the Relationship between Eschatology and Ecclesiology in Paul, 1972; J. H. Ropes, The Epistle of St. James, ICC, 1916; and "Righteousness' and 'The Righteousness of God' in the Old Testament and in St. Paul", JBL 22, 1903, 211–27; H. J. Schoeps, Paul: The Theology of the Apostle in the Light of Jewish Religious History, 1961; W. Schmithals, Paul and James, SBT 46, 1965; H.-H. Schrey, H. H. Walz, and W. A. Whitehouse, The Biblical Doctrine of Justice and Law, 1955; A. Schweitzer, Paul and his Interpreters, 1912; and The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle, 1931; C. A. A. Scott, Christianity according to St. Paul, 1927; R. Scroggs, The Last Adam: A Study in Pauline Anthropology, 1966; and "Romans vi. 7 ho gar apothanōn dedikaiōtai apo tēs hamartias", NTS 10, 1963–64, 104–8; J. Skinner, "Righteousness in OT", HDB IV 272–81; N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament, 1944; and "Justice and Immortality", SJT 17, 1964, 309–24; G. B. Stevens, "Righteousness in NT", HDB IV 281–4; and The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, 1905; W. A. Stevens, "The Forensic Meaning of dikaiosynē", American Journal of Theology 1, 1897, 443–50; R. C. Tannehill, Dying and Rising with Christ, BZNW, 32, 1967; V. Taylor, Forgiveness and Reconciliation: A Study in New Testament Theology, 1946²; R. B. Ward, "The Works of Abraham: James 2:14–26", HTR 61, 1968, 283–90; N. M. Watson, "Some Observations on the Use of ΔΙΚΑΙΟΟ in the Septuagint", JBL 79, 1960, 255–66; D. E. H. Whiteley, The Theology of St. Paul, 1974²; J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul: A Linguistic and Theological Enquiry, Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series 20, 1972 (see also the review by N. M. Watson in NTS 20, 1973–74, 216–28).

(b). B. Bartmann, St. Paulus und St. Jacobus über die Rechtfertigung, 1897; E. Beaucamp, "La justice de Jahvé et l'Economie de l'Alliance", Stud. Bibl. Francisc. Liber Annus 11, 1960–61, 1–55; J. Becker, Das Heil Gottes. Heils- und Sündenbegriffe in den Qumrantexten und im Neuen Testament, StUNT 3, 1964; K. Benz, "Dikaiosynē beim Apostel Paulus", ThQ 94, 1912, 590 ff.; J. Böhmer, "Der 'Glaube' im Jakobusbriefe", Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 9, 1898, 241–6; G. Bornkamm, "Die Frage nach der Gerechtigkeit Gottes (Theodizee und Rechtfertigung)", in Das Ende des Gesetzes, 1958, 196 ff.; and "Theologie als Teufelskunst, Römer 3, 1–9", in Geschichte und Glaube, II, BEvTh 53, 1971, 140–8; H. Brunner, "Gerechtigkeit als Fundament des Thrones", VT 8, 1958, 426 ff.; J. Cambier, "Justice de Dieu, Salut de tous les Hommes et Foi", RB 71, 1964, 537–83; "Péchés des Hommes et Pêché d'Adam en Rom. v. 12", NTS 11, 1964–65, 217–55; and "La Doctrine Paulinienne de la Justice de Dieu, Principe d'Unité dans l'Eglise et Source de Paix dans le Monde", in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin, 1970, 159–70; H. Cazelles, "A propos de quelques Textes difficiles relatifs à la Justice de Dieu dans l'Ancien Testament", RB 58, 1951, 169–88; K. Cramer, "Der Begriff der s'dāqāh bei Tritojesaja und bei Amos", ZAW 27, 1907, 77 ff. and 146 ff.; H. Cremer, Die Rechtfertigungslehre im Zusammenhange ihrer geschichtlichen Voraussetzungen, 1899; G. Dalman, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im Alten Testament, 1897; A. Descamps, Les Justes et la Justice dans les Evangiles et le Christianisme primitif hormis de la Doctrine proprement Paulinienne, 1950; and "La Justice de Dieu dans la Bible Grecque", Studia Hellenistica 5, 1948, 69–82; E. von Dobschütz, "Die Rechtfertigung bei Paulus, eine Rechtfertigung des Paulus", ThStKr 85, 1912, 38–67;

A. Dünner, Die Gerechtigkeit nach dem alttestamentlichen seḏeq, (Dissertation, Bonn) 1963; J. Dupont, La Réconciliation dans la Théologie de Saint Paul, 1953; G. Eichholz, Jakobus und Paulus. Ein Beitrag zum Problem des Kanons, ThEH Neue Folge 39, 1953; and Glaube und Werke bei Paulus und Jakobus, ThEH Neue Folge 88, 1961; K. H. Fahlgren, ṣ̣ḏāqāh, nahestehende und entgegengesetzte Begriffe im Alten Testament, 1932; A. Feuillet, "La Citation d'Habacuc ii. 4 et les Huit Premiers Chapitres de l'Épître aux Romains", NTS 6, 1959–60, 52–80; G. Fitzer, "Der Ort der Versöhnung nach Paulus", ThZ 22, 1966, 161–83; N. Gäumann, Taufe und Ethik. Studien zu Römer 6, BEvTh 47, 1967; E. Gerstenberger, Wesen und Herkunft des "apodiktischen Rechts", Wissenschaftliche Monographien 20, 1965; W. Grundmann, "Gesetz, Rechtfertigung, und Mystik bei Paulus", ZNW 32, 1933, 52–65; T. Häring, DIKAIOSYNĒ THEOU bei Paulus, 1896; H. W. Heidland, Die Anrechnung des Glaubens zur Gerechtigkeit, 1936; N. J. Hein, F. Horst, E. Schweizer, "Gerechtigkeit Gottes", *RGG*³ II 1402 ff.; F. Horst, Gottes Recht. Gesammelte Studien zum Recht im Alten Testament, 1961; A. Jepsen, "ṣ̣ādaq und ṣ̣ḏāqāh im Alten Testament", in Gottes Wort und Gottes Land, Festschrift H. W. Hertzberg, 1965, 78 ff.; G. Jeremias, Der Lehrer der Gerechtigkeit, StUNT 2, 1963; J. Jeremias, "Die Gedankenführung in Röm. 4. Zum paulinischen Glaubensverständnis", Analecta Biblica 42, 1970, 51–65; E. Jünger, Paulus und Jesus, Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie 2, 1962, 33–70; O. Kaiser, "dikē und ṣ̣ḏāqāh. Zur Frage nach der sittlichen Weltordnung. Ein theologisches Präludium", Neue Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie und Religionsphilosophie 7, 1965, 251–73; E. Käsemann, An die Römer, HNT 8a, 1973; E. Kautsch, Über die Derivate des Stammes ṣ̣āq im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch, 1881; K. Kertelge, "Rechtfertigung" bei Paulus. Studien zur Struktur des paulinischen Rechtfertigungsbegriffs, NTAbh Neue Folge 3, 1967; G. Klein, "Gottes Gerechtigkeit als Thema der neuesten Paulus-Forschung", Rekonstruktion und Interpretation, BEvTh 50, 1969, 225–36; K. Koch, ṣ̣āq im Alten Testament, (Dissertation, Heidelberg) 1953; ṣ̣āq, THAT II 507–30; and "Wesen und Ursprung der Gemeinschaftstreue in der Königszeit", ZEE 5, 1961, 72–90; W. Kokenmüller, Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes in den Psalmen, (Dissertation, Jena) 1936; A. Klöpffer, "Die Erörterung des Verhältnisses von Glauben und Werken im Jakobusbriefe (cap. 2, 14–26)", ZWT 28, 1885, 280–319; P. Kölbinger, "Dikaiosynē Theou in Röm. 1. 17", ThStKr 68, 1895, 7–17; H.-J. Kraus, Die prophetische Verkündigung des Rechts in Israel, 1957; E. Kühl, Die Stellung des Jakobusbriefes zum alttestamentlichen Gesetz und zur paulinischen Rechtfertigungslehre, 1905; O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief übersetzt und erklärt, 1957; R. Leivestad, Guds straffende Rettferlighed, 1946; E. Lohse, "Glaube und Werke. Zur Theologie des Jakobusbriefes", ZNW 48, 1957, 1–22; and "Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes in der paulinischen Theologie", in Die Einheit des Neuen Testaments, 1973, 209–27; S. Lyonnet, "Notes sur l'Exégèse de l'Épître aux Romains", Biblica 38, 1957, 35–61; "Justification, Jugement, Rédemption, principalement dans l'Épître aux Romains", Recherches Bibliques 5, 1960, 166–84; "De 'Justitia Dei' in Epistula ad Romanos i. 17 et iii. 21, 22", Verbum Domini 25, 1947, 23–34, 118–21, 129–34, 193–203, 257–63; R. Mach, Der Zaddik in Talmud und Midrasch, 1957; E. Ménégos, "Etude comparative de l'Enseignement de Saint Paul et de Saint Jacques sur la Justification par la Foi", in Etudes de Théologie et d'Histoire, 1901, 121–50; O. Michl, Der Brief an die Römer, KEK 4, 1966¹³; C. Müller, Gottes Gerechtigkeit und Gottes Volk. Ein Untersuchung zu Römer 9–11, FRLANT 86, 1964; W. Nagel, "Gerechtigkeit – oder Almosen?", Vigiliae Christianae 15, 1961, 141–5; F. Nötscher, Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei den vorexilischen Propheten, 1915; A. Oepke, "DIKAIOSYNĒ THEOU bei Paulus in neuer Beleuchtung", TLZ 78, 1953, 257–64; and Der Brief des Paulus an die Galater, Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament 9, 1965³; H. van Oyen, "Biblische Gerechtigkeit und weltliches Recht", in Die Basel 6, 1950, 270 ff.; E. Pax, "Studien zum Vergeltungsproblem der Psalmen", Stud. Bibl. Francisc. Liber Annuus 11, 1960–61, 56–112; T. Preiss, "Die Rechtfertigung im johanneischen Denken", EvTh 16, 1956, 289 ff.; P. Schanz, "Jakobus und Paulus", ThQ 62, 1880, 3–46, 247–86; H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Galater 7, 1971¹⁴; G. Schwarz, "Jak. 2, 14–26", ThStKr 65, 1891, 704–37; H. H. Schmid, Gerechtigkeit als Weltordnung, 1968; S. Schulz, "Zur Rechtfertigung aus Gnaden in Qumran und bei Paulus", ZTK 56, 1959, 155–85; G. Strecker, Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit. Untersuchung zur Theologie des Matthäus, FRLANT 82, 1966²; P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus, FRLANT 87, 1965; T. Tieleman, "Versuch einer neuen Auslegung und Anordnung des Jakobusbriefes", NKZ 5, 1894, 580–611; H. Thyen, Studien zur Sündenvergebung im Neuen Testament und seinen alttestamentlichen und jüdischen Voraussetzungen, FRLANT 96, 1970; E. Tobac, Le Problème de la Justification dans St. Paul, 1941; L. Usteri, "Glaube, Werke und Rechtfertigung im Jakobusbrief", ThStKr 62, 1889, 221–56; R. Walker, "Allein aus Werken. Zur Auslegung von Jakobus 2, 14–26", ZTK 61, 1964, 155–92; H. H. Walz und H. H. Schrey, Gerechtigkeit in biblischer Sicht, 1955; W. Weiffenbach, Exegetisch-theologische Studie über Jak. 2, 14–26, 1871; A. H. van der Weijden, Die Gerechtigkeit in den Psalmen, (Dissertation, Rome) 1952; H. D. Wendland, “Zur kritischen Bedeutung der neutestamentlichen Lehre von den beiden Reichen”, TLZ 79, 1954, 321 ff.; U. Wilckens, Rechtfertigung als Freiheit. Paulusstudien, 1974; G. Wildeboer, “Die älteste Bedeutung des Stammes šdq”, ZAW 26, 1906, 167 ff.; O. Zänker, “Dikaiosynē Theou bei Paulus”, ZST 9, 1931–32, 398–420.

Rob, Steal

Robbing implies the idea of violence, but the distinction from stealing, with its over-tone of secrecy, is not always preserved.

ληστής	ληστής (lēstēs), robber, highwayman, bandit, revolutionary; κλέπτω (kleptō), steal; κλέπτεις (kleptēs), thief.
--------	---

CL The use of kleptō (Lat. clepere) emphasises the secrecy, craft, and cheating involved in the act of stealing or embezzlement (cf. Eng. stealth). By contrast, lēstēs, which derives from the same root as leia, booty, and apolauō, to take advantage of, includes the element of violence, though not necessarily of dishonesty: a soldier exercising his right to seize plunder could be termed lēstēs. But the word usually meant robber, bandit, pirate.

OT In the LXX kleptō regularly translates the Heb. gānāb, which like the Gk. vb. includes the sense of stealth. Theft is a sin against God. The LXX uses kleptō without further definition in the Decalogue (Exod. 20:15; Deut. 5:19) and its echoes (Lev. 19:11; Jer. 7:9). What is stolen may include objects of value (Gen. 44:4; Exod. 22:6), animals (Gen. 30:33), men (Gen. 40:15; Exod. 21:16), things devoted to God (Jos. 7:11), household gods (Gen. 31:19), and genuine words of God, stolen by false prophets (Jer. 23:30). To be guilty of theft incurs punishment (Exod. 22:1 f.; Deut. 24:7). Even when prompted by need or poverty, stealing dishonours God (Prov. 30:9; cf. 6:30). To ascribe to men something which is the work of God is said by Philo to be thieving (Leg. All. 3:32 f.). The sense of stealth is brought out in Tob. 1:18, where bodies are said to be buried secretly (kleptōn). The noun lēstēs, which seldom occurs in the LXX, translates three Heb. words, all associated with violence: gē dūd (raider, Jer. 18:22), from gādād, to cut, used of lightly armed troops suddenly cutting into the enemy; pārīš (robber, Jer. 7:11), from paraš, to break; and šōdēd (plunderer, Obad. 5) from šādād, to act violently. Rab. Judaism transmuted the Gk. lēstēs into lēstēs, lēstyā', and lēstāyūt. The Mishnah also used gannāb for theft and gāzal (flay, snatch) for robbery. By referring to both bandits and Zealots as lēstai, Josephus and the rabbis reveal their opposition to the methods employed by the nationalists.

NT The requirements of the Decalogue, including mē klepsēs, still apply in the Christian era. This commandment is quoted by Jesus to the rich young ruler (Matt. 19:18; Mk. 10:19; Lk. 18:20), and by Paul (Rom. 13:8), and alluded to in 1 Cor. 6:10 and 1 Pet. 4:15. As the breaking of a divine commandment, theft is an offence against God's will, and in terms of human relationships, an activity which is loveless:

it betrays fellowship (Jn. 12:6). On the other hand, the positive fulfilment of this commandment, as of the other commandments in the second table, is brought about by love to one's neighbour (Rom. 13:9 f.; Matt. 22:39). In practical terms, the thief must stop stealing and instead do honest work, so that he can serve not his own selfish ends but the needs of those who lack (Eph. 4:28). In Matt. 6:19 f. (cf. Lk. 12:33 f.) Jesus warns against reliance upon accumulated wealth, because of the activity of thieves who can easily break through (lit. dig through) house-walls made of mud-brick and steal property. By contrast, treasures in heaven, i.e., what wins divine approval and reward in the coming kingdom, are beyond the reach of thieves or inflation.

In Matt. 27:64 the Jews fear that the disciples may quietly steal (klepsōsin) the body of Jesus, and in 28:13 they decide to put it about that this explains the empty tomb. The vb. kleptō and the noun kleptēs are used to describe the sudden arrival without warning of the messianic age. As by keeping alert the householder is able to forestall a thief approaching secretly, so the disciple needs to be on the watch for the parousia of the Lord (Matt. 24:43; Lk. 12:39). The same simile illustrates the unexpected moment of the Lord's coming in 1 Thess. 5:2, 4; 2 Pet. 3:10; Rev. 3:3; 16:15.

The Fourth Gospel's discourse on the Good Shepherd opens with a description of a prospective sheepstealer as kleptēs kai lēstēs, i.e., using stealth or force as required to get into the sheepfold, and not the proper entrance (Jn. 10:1). Judas, who pilfered money, was a kleptēs (Jn. 12:6); Barabbas, who was implicated in violence, was a lēstēs (Jn. 18:40). The plural phrase kleptai kai lēstai, used by Jesus in Jn. 10:8 to define all who came before him, is not intended to include the godly of earlier days, but refers to false messiahs, such as Theudas and Judas the Galilean (Acts 5:36 f.). "All who came" alludes to the tech. term for the messiah, the "coming one" (Matt. 11:3; Mk. 11:9; Lk. 7:19; Rom. 5:14). The purpose of the coming of the kleptēs was to destroy life in furthering his own ends. By contrast, Jesus had come to give life, even at the expense of his own, and abundant life at that (Jn. 10:10).

In the story of the Good Samaritan the term lēstai (Lk. 10:30, 36) may not refer to bandits in the general sense, but bear the rabbinic meaning of Zealots. The victim is a Jew. But he is not killed, and his injuries could have been due to his resisting the attack. When Zealots robbed to raise supplies for themselves, they are known not to have taken more than was necessary from their own countrymen. If the lēstai in the story are Zealots, this adds point to Jesus' response to the scribe's question about the neighbour, for the Pharisees were constantly pressing Jesus to declare his attitude towards the nationalistic movement (Matt. 22:15 ff.). At the cleansing of the → temple, Jesus charged the merchants trafficking there with making God's house of prayer (Isa. 56:7) into a den of robbers (Jer. 7:11; → spēlaion). Apart from the opportunities of profiting from sharp practice, the Jews' market in the forecourt robbed the Gentile nations (Mk. 11:7) of the only area in the temple which was available to them as a place of prayer (Matt. 21:13; Lk. 19:46). If lēstēs also has the tech. sense of Zealot, Jesus is saying that by their activities the temple authorities were opening the way for the building to be turned into a Zealot stronghold, as happened in the rebellion of A.D. 68–70 (G. W. Buchanan, "Mark 11, 15–19: Brigands in the Temple", Hebrew Union College Annual 30, 1959, 169–77).

At the arrest in Gethsemane, Jesus ironically demands to know whether his enemies, armed to the teeth as they are, now take him for a lēstēs, a bandit or in-surrectionist who would sell his life dearly (Matt. 26:55; Mk. 14:48; Lk. 22:52). The two men crucified with Jesus are described as lēstai (Matt. 27:38, 44; Mk. 15:27), probably to be translated bandits rather than revolutionaries in view of the use of kakourgoi, criminals, in the parallel passage Lk. 23:33. A later scribe added the apPOSITE quotation from Isa. 53:12: He was numbered with the transgressors (Mk. 15:28 AV), but this is omitted by the best MSS. Paul includes lēstai, highwaymen, among the perils he faced on his travels (2 Cor. 11:26). N. Hillyer

συλλάω

συλλάω (sylaō), plunder, rob; συλαγωγέω (sylagōgeō), rob, carry off as booty or captive.

CL & OT sylaō, or sometimes syleuō, means to strip off the arms from a fallen enemy, strip bare, deprive; to take a bow out of its case or the lid off a quiver, esp. with the notion of violence or suddenness; to despoil secretly, i.e., cheat; to rescue, as in the formula used at Delphi in the manumission of slaves. In the LXX sylaō occurs only in Ep. Jer. (Bar. 6:18), referring to burglary, for fear of which priests bolt and bar their temples.

NT sylaō occurs only at 2 Cor. 11:8. By a bold military metaphor Paul dramatizes the fact that his ministry at Corinth was at no cost to the Christians there, because he had, as it were, plundered (esylēsa) other churches by accepting financial support (opsōnion, ration money, soldier's pay) from them, rather than expecting the Corinthians to keep him.

sylagōgeō, rob, carry off as booty or captive, is not found before the NT, and even there occurs only once. In Col. 2:8 the verb is used fig. of drawing someone away from the truth of Christ into the slavery of error. Paul warns the converts at Colossae against the threat of being seduced from the Lord. His verb gives the picture of prisoners being led away with a rope around their necks, like the long strings of captives portrayed on Assyrian monuments. N. Hillyer ἀποστερέω (apostereō), rob, defraud, deprive.

ἀποστερέω

CL apostereō means to refuse to pay a debt or return property or money deposited with another for safe-keeping; defraud; become a defaulter; withdraw from a person or thing, i.e., break off relations; bereave; in logic, to draw a negative conclusion.

OT apostereō translates two Heb. words, gāra' and 'āšaq. In Exod. 21:10 a husband who takes a second wife is warned not to deprive (gāra') the first of food, clothes, or conjugal rights. In Deut. 24:14 the law requires an Israelite not to exploit a poor labourer by keeping back ('āšaq) wages due to him. Mal. 3:5 threatens judgment against those who oppress ('āšaq) the wage-earner.

NT In Mk. 10:19 the commandment mē aposterēsēs, do not defraud, is quoted by Jesus to the rich young ruler. The clause is omitted from the parallel passages Matt. 19:18 and Lk. 18:20, perhaps because a scribe noticed that with this exception all the other commandments are drawn straight from Deut. 5:16–20. The words are probably intended to summarize the tenth commandment, not otherwise mentioned here, for he who covets what belongs to another has in his heart already deprived (apostereō) him of it.

In 1 Cor. 6 Paul censures the Corinthians for engaging in lawsuits with one another before heathen courts. As those who should know the law of love, and probably Christ's teaching in Matt. 5:39 ff., they ought rather to accept being defrauded (apostereisthe, 6:7), and certainly not actively defraud others (apostereite, 6:8). "To say then that the wronged man goes to law before wrongdoers is nothing else than to say that he desires to retaliate and wishes to do wrong to the second in return, which is likewise to do wrong also himself" (Clem. Alex., Strom. 7, 14). Paul uses the verb again in 1 Cor. 7:5. Because a married couple belong to each other, an attempt by one partner to spiritualize marriage amounts to fraud, a withholding of what is due. Abstention can be lawful only if it is by mutual consent, for a good purpose (prayer is Paul's example), and as a temporary measure. In 1 Tim. 6:3–5 he assails those who taught that an outward show of religion could be made a means of gain. Such were depraved in mind and bereft (apesterēmenōn) of the truth. Once they had known the truth in Jesus, but had allowed conceit to defraud them of the treasure (cf. 4:1). Having lost the centre of agreement with fellow Christians, they now knew only wrangling. N. Hillyer ἀνδραποδιστής (andrapodistēs), slave-dealer, kidnapper.

ἀνδραποδιστής

CL andrapodistēs was never used as an ordinary term in connexion with slavery. It derives from the verbal idea of catching a man (andra-) by the foot (pod-) and crudely distinguished human chattels from quadrupeds.

NT 1 Tim. 1:9 f. refers to those who disregard God's law in general and break God's laws in particular, as set out in the Decalogue. Paul describes those guilty of breaking the eighth commandment as andrapodistai, slave-dealers, kidnappers, lit. men-stealers (cf. Exod. 21:16; Deut. 24:7). The term could include those who broke into Christian homes to carry off any belonging to the Way (Acts 9:1 f.), and, by extension, those who by false teaching (1 Tim. 1:3–7) drag away believers from their rightful place before God and rob them of their liberty in Christ. N. Hillyer

σπήλαιον

σπήλαιον (spēlaion), cave, den.

CL & OT spēlaion (from Plato onwards) is derived from speos, speios (Hom.), all three words meaning cavern, grotto. Almost always the LXX uses spēlaion to translate the Heb. m^eārāh, cave: as a place of refuge (Gen. 19:30; Jos. 10:16; 1 Sam. 22:1; Josephus, Ap. 1, 292); as a tomb (Gen. 23:9; Test. Reub. 7:2); or as a robber's hideout (Jer. 7:11; Josephus, Ant. 14, 415).

NT In Matt. 21:13 (= Mk. 11:17; Lk. 19:46) Jesus, as Lord of the temple (Matt. 12:6), protests that the Jerusalem authorities have degraded God's house of prayer (Isa. 56:7) into a den (spēlaion) of thieves (→ lestēs), robbing the helpless while themselves enjoying the safe refuge of privilege. Their nefarious trading activities betrayed an insensitivity to the holiness of the outer court, and denied Gentiles the right of access to the only part of the temple area permitted to them for quiet worship. Jer. 7:11, alluded to here, had correctly forecast the destruction of the land in Jeremiah's day, in a similar context of the denial of the rights of aliens. The sale of animals in the temple forecourt was apparently a recent innovation by Caiaphas the high priest (c. A.D. 30), to compete against the four traditional markets on the Mount of Olives (V. Eppstein, ZNW 55, 1964, 42–58). So unpopular among ordinary Jews was the temple trading, because of the greed of those in charge, that a popular uprising three years before Jerusalem was destroyed in A.D. 70 swept away the “bazaars of Annas” (W. Hendriksen, Matthew, 768–771). Heb. 11:38 and Rev. 6:15 describe refugees seeking shelter in spēlaia, caves, a feature of the limestone rocks of Palestine (cf. 1 Macc. 2:28; 2 Macc. 6:11; 10:6). Natural caves could also be adapted as burial places (Baba Bathra 6:8; SB I 1049–51), as in the case of Lazarus (Jn. 11:38).

N. Hillyer

→ Possessions, → Punishment, → Snatch

H. Preisker, kleptō, kleptēs, TDNT III 754 ff.; K. H. Rengstorf, lēstēs, TDNT IV 257–62.

Rock, Stone, Corner-Stone, Pearl, Precious Stones

πέτρα πέτρα (petra), rock; πέτρος (petros), stone, rock, Peter; Κηφᾶς (kēphas), Cephas (Aram. kēpā', rock), the Aram. form of the name given to Peter.

CL petra means rock, a mass of rock, boulder, and stone as material; it is used as early as Homer for a symbol of firmness (Od. 17, 463), and from the 5th cent. B.C. onwards of hard-heartedness (Aesch., PV 2, 244; Eur., Andromache 537). petros, likewise attested from earliest times, means a (broken off) piece of rock, stone (→ lithos). A strict distinction of meaning cannot however be maintained: petros can mean, rock, and petra, stone (cf. Homer, Od. 9, 243; Hesiod, Theog. 675; Soph., OC 1595; O. Cullmann, petra TDNT VI 95; and Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr, A Historical and Theological Study, 1962², 20).

OT In the LXX petros is found only at 2 Macc. 1:16 and 4:41, in the sense of stone; petra, rock, is mostly used to translate the Heb. šûr, rock, large piece of rock, or sela', rock, crag, cliff (e.g. Exod. 17:6; Num. 20:8), and twice for kēp (Job 30:6; Jer. 4:29; which also occurs at Sir. 40:14), occurring in all about 100 times. In a secular sense it is found in various contexts (e.g. Exod. 33:21; Job 39:28). In particular, rocks provide a refuge for animals (Ps. 104[103]:18; Prov. 30:26), and also for men (1 Sam. 13:6). On the day of Yahweh men will creep into the clefts of the rocks to escape from the terrible majesty of God (Isa. 2:19). Since a rock affords protection and therefore also strength, God himself is described as the Rock (2 Sam. 22:2; cf. Gen. 49:24); the LXX avoids the word petra in translating these passages, and makes use of circumlocutions (cf. also Pss. 31:4; 62:7). As the site of the cultus, the rock is also the scene of divine revelation (Jdg. 6:20, 21; 13:19). The numinous character of the divine revelation is evident in the way rocks are torn assunder by God or by his word

(1 Ki. 19:11; Jer. 23:29; Nah. 1:6). The memory of the miracle recorded in Exod. 17:1–6, Num. 20:1–13, where → Moses brought water out of the rock by striking it at God's command, remained alive at a later period (e.g. Neh. 9:15; Ps. 78[77]:15 f.). A similar miracle, the feeding of the people with honey from the rock, is recorded at Deut. 32:13 and Ps. 81(80):16. In a transferred sense the rock is also a symbol of firmness and resolution (Isa. 50:7; Ezek. 3:9), and of stubborn resistance (Jer. 5:3).

Later the rabbis, taking up Isa. 51:1, 2, describe → Abraham as a rock (SB I 731). In the Qumran texts the eschatological community is compared to a building with foundations on the rock; the image of the corner-stone (→ gōnia) which we find in the NT is likewise present in these writings: "It shall be that tried wall, that precious corner-stone, whose foundations shall neither rock nor sway in their place" (1QS 8:7 f.; cf. 1QH 6:26; 7:8; cf. A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, 217 ff.). In 1QS 8:7 f. the reference is to the Council of the Community.

NT In the NT petros is found 154 times, but in all but one of the instances (Jn. 1:42) it is used as a second name for Simon, whose biography goes beyond the scope of the present article (see the bibliography below for studies of Peter in contemporary theology). petra occurs 15 times: in the parable at the end of the Sermon on the Mount it is said that the man who hears and does the → word of Jesus is like one who builds his → house upon a rock, i.e. on a firm, sure foundation (Matt. 7:24 f.; → firm art. themelios NT 1; cf. also Deut. 28:15, 30). In the parable of the sower, Lk. 8:6, 13 speaks of the seed which falls on the rock; Matt. 13:5, 20 and Mk. 4:5, 16 speak of "rocky ground" (petrōdēs). "As for what was sown on rocky ground, this is he who hears the word of God and immediately receives it with joy; yet he has no root in himself, but endures for a while, and when persecution arises on account of the word, immediately he falls away" (Matt. 13:20 f.). According to Matt. 27:51, the death of Jesus is accompanied by earthquakes and the splitting of the rocks; Joseph of Arimathea laid the corpse of Jesus in a tomb hewn out of the rock (Matt. 27:60; Mk. 15:46). In the last events of Revelation men will hide themselves in the caves and the rocks of the mountains; behind the portrayal of this in Rev. 6:15–17 lies not only Isa. 2, but a recollection of Hos. 10:8.

Three sets of passages merit particular attention: Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:8; 1 Cor. 10:3 f.; and Matt. 16:18.

1. Two passages refer to the stone of stumbling which is interpreted christologically: "As it is written, 'Behold, I am laying in Zion a stone that will make men stumble, a rock that will make them fall [lithon proskommatos kai petran skandalou]; and he who believes in him will not be put to shame'" (Rom. 9:33; → Offence); "and 'A stone that will make men stumble, a rock that will make them fall [lithos proskommatos kai petra skandalou]'"; for they stumble because they disobey the word, as they were destined to do" (1 Pet. 2:8). The words take up the thought of Isa. 8:14: "And he will become a sanctuary, and a stone of offence, and a rock of stumbling to both houses of Israel, a trap and a snare to the inhabitants of Jerusalem." This is further developed in Isa. 28:16 to that of the corner-stone (→ gōnia) which, according to Ps. 118(117):22 was rejected by the builders. Isa. 8:13 ff. promises that Yahweh will be a sanctuary to those who → fear him; but those who disdain him will break themselves on him. For rabbinic messianic interpretations of the idea of the stone see J. Jeremias, lithos, TDNT IV 272 f.; SB III 506. In Rom.

9:33 Paul sees a fulfilment of Isa. 8:14 in the Jewish rejection of Christ, and in particular because Israel pursued a righteousness based on law and works and not on faith (cf. vv. 31 f.). On the other hand, the Gentiles who did not pursue righteousness have found it through faith (v. 30). In 1 Pet. 2:8 the passage underlines the contrast between the disobedient (i.e. the old Israel which rejected Christ) and the “spiritual house” of God, the “holy priesthood” which offers spiritual sacrifices (v. 5) (i.e. the church, the body of believers, cf. v. 7). C. H. Dodd holds that the quotation is from an independent testimonium which was current in the early church and which differs slightly from the LXX (According to the Scriptures: The Sub-structure of New Testament Theology, [1952] 1965, 41 ff.). (For further discussion of the OT background see S. H. Hooke, “The Corner-Stone of Scripture”, in The Siege Perilous: Essays on Anthropology and Kindred Subjects, 1956, 235–49.)

2. In 1 Cor. 10:3 f. Paul makes reference to the Exodus miracle of Exod. 17 and Num. 20. The fathers in the wilderness “all ate the same spiritual food and all drank the same spiritual drink. For they drank from the spiritual Rock which followed them, and that Rock was Christ.” By comparing Exod. 17 and Num. 20 the rabbis had already come to the conclusion that the rock which provided the water had followed the Israelites on their journey (SB III 406); but Judaism does not know a messianic interpretation of the passage. Paul is the first to interpret the OT miracle in the light of the → Lord’s Supper, which is spiritual food and spiritual drink having its origin in Christ. This OT narrative is in the apostle’s view a type foreshadowing the Christ-event. For clarification of the passage attention has been drawn to Jn. 7:37; but the sayings of the Johannine Christ about the bread of life should also be noted, since these likewise allude to the miraculous feeding in the wilderness (manna, Jn. 6:35–58; → Bread). The early fathers of the church interpreted this passage with reference to the Lord’s Supper. On this passage → further Hunger, art. pinō NT 4 (a).

3. (a) In Matt. 16:18 Jesus calls Peter the rock on which he will build his → church: “And I tell you, you are Peter [petros] and on this rock [petra] I will build my church, and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it” (→ Gate; → Hell). The basis here is play on the words petros and petra. According to Mk. 3:16 and Jn. 1:42, Jesus himself gave Simon the name of Peter. In Matt. Simon already bears this name when he is mentioned for the first time in 4:18; many commentators conclude from this that in Matt. 16:18 he is not given the name, but rather that the name is interpreted. Paul mostly uses the Aram. form Cephias kēpā’, rock, stone (1 Cor. 1:12; 3:22; 9:5; 15:5; Gal. 1:18; 2:9, 11, 14; cf. 1 Clem. 47:3). In Jn. 1:42, the only place in the NT where the noun petros is used in its normal sense, it is stated that the name Kēphas means petros: “He [Andrew] brought him [his brother, Simon] to Jesus. Jesus looked at him, and said, ‘So you are Simon the son of John? You shall be called Cephias’ (which means Peter).” Both the Aram. transliteration and the Gk. translation, kēphas/petros, can mean rock, and therefore petra in Matt. 16:18 can be translated as rock. The assonance of the words makes it immediately evident that Peter is the “rock-man”, the foundation on which Jesus will build his church. O. Cullmann suggests that the sense would require petra in both halves of the pronouncement (cf. Jer. 4:29; Job 30:6 LXX), but since petra is a fem. noun, the NT chooses the less usual Gk. word which has the masc. ending -os for the masc. name (Peter, 20).

Cullmann’s interpretation does more justice to the text than the reconstruction of

Max Wilcox who thinks that the original saying behind Matt.'s text referred to Jesus as the rejected stone of Ps. 118(117):22 f. which was linked with the rock-stone testimonia of Isa. 8:14; 28:16; and possibly Dan. 2:34; 7:13 ("Peter and the Rock: A Fresh Look at Matthew xvi. 17–19", NTS 22, 1975–76, 73–88). Wilcox attributes the petra-Petros link to the evangelist, though the original saying may well go back to Jesus himself. Despite the "primacy" given to Peter (cf. Matt. 10:2), the purpose is not to glorify Peter (cf. the rebuke of Matt. 16:23). But it accords with the fact that Peter is regularly associated in Matt. with the themes of church, authority, discipline and rulings on disputed points (cf. Matt. 15:15; 17:1, 4, 24; 18:21; 19:27; 26:33–75; see G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, 1946, 95 f.). This latter point in no way militates against Cullmann's argument. In fact, it helps to show how the "primacy" of Peter is to be understood. (For Cullmann's arguments about the authenticity of the use of the term ekklesia, church, and the authority of the keys → Open, art. kleis NT3.)

(b) But in what sense is Peter the rock? The saying is recorded only by Matt. and is added after the confession that Jesus is the Christ, which is also recorded in Mk. 8:29 and Lk. 9:20 (cf. Jn. 6:68, 69). The other evangelists do not have the saying about the rock-man of Matt. 16:18. This is, however, no reason for denying the authenticity of the saying, as is often done. In the opinion of E. Dinkler, for example, the early church put the saying in the mouth of our Lord in order to mark out Peter, on the ground of his Easter experience (1 Cor. 15:5), as the one appointed by Jesus to be leader of his church (*RGG*³ V 248). The theory remains, nevertheless, hypothetical. The form Kēphas, which is a transliteration of the Aram. and is attested by Paul, shows us that the tradition stems from the earliest days of the church. Moreover, parallels in the Qumran texts make it appear likely that Matt. 16:18 is of Palestinian origin; though it cannot be concluded from this that the Qumran sect influenced the writing of the Gospel, for Jesus describes Peter and not, like the Qumran tradition, the community as the rock.

But what does this saying of Jesus mean? It is probable that as early as the beginning of the 3rd cent. A.D. the Roman pope was using it to support his claim to be head of the church, asserting that this position had been given to him by Christ as the successor of Peter. The Gospel account, however, makes no mention of Peter's successors. Indeed, some Protestant commentators of today deduce from the text that Peter was accorded a position of unique significance in the church, a position given to him alone and limited to the duration of his own life. Peter may have no significance as far as the work of building is concerned, but he is of great importance in the laying of the foundation (O. Cullmann, TDNT VI 107 ff.; J. Schniewind, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus, NTD 2, 1968¹⁵, ad loc.). It may be doubted, however, whether such an explanation is satisfactory: in Matt. 16:18 Jesus is not speaking of the laying of foundations, but of the building of the church. It is important to observe further that Paul, who acknowledges the apostleship of Peter (Gal. 2:8), and himself appears in his letters as the standard exponent of apostolic authority, states clearly in Gal. 2:14 that "the truth of the gospel" stands as the norm binding on all apostles, even on Peter. It is this truth again which underlies the conferring of apostolic authority on Peter in Matt. 16:18. It is implied in the confession that Jesus is the Christ, for like the gospel itself this confession is based upon divine → revelation (Matt. 16:17; Gal. 1:12). This confession, which is the source of all apostolic authority, points us to Christ as the true foundation of the church. Seen in this light, the words of Matt. 16:18 are simply an interpretation of the confession of Christ in Matt. 16:16 par., and there is no reason why this interpretation should not be attributed to Jesus himself. This view accords in the main with that of the Reformers. They had no wish to found their church on the person of Peter, and certainly not on his subjective act of faith: for them the rock foundation on which Christ would build his church was the eternal, unchangeable truth of the confession of Christ. It is not, of course, the act of confession on which attention is focused, but its content: the eternal Christ, upon whom the church is founded in every age. The church founded upon this rock is covered by Christ's promise even today, that the gates of hell will not prevail against it.

W. Mundle

(c) Matt. 16:18 has been a crucial passage in the interpretation of claims to papal supremacy and indeed in the question of whether there should be a pope at all (for a review of the arguments down the ages see H. Burn-murdoch, The Development of the Papacy, 1954; and for relevant documents see E. Giles, Documents Illustrating Papal Authority A.D. 96–454, 1952; C. Mirbt, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des römischen Katholizismus, I Von den Anfängen bis zum Tridentinum, revised by K. Aland, 1967⁶; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de Rebus Fidei et Morum, revised by A. Schönmetzer, 1965³³). The term pope derives from the Lat. papa, father. In the ante-Nicene church there were such "fathers" at Alexandria and Antioch, but already in the 2nd cent. Rome was claiming an ascendancy.

By the time of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage (248–58), papal primacy was a burning issue. In his treatise On the Unity of the Catholic Church Cyprian affirmed: "No doubt the others were all that Peter was, but a primacy is given to Peter, and it is [thus] made clear that there is but one Church and one Chair. So too, if they are all shepherds, we are shown but one flock which is to be fed by all the Apostles in common accord. If a man does not hold fast to this oneness of Peter, does he imagine that he still holds the faith? If he deserts the Chair of Peter upon whom the Church was built, has he still confidence that he is in the Church?" (Cyprian, De Lapsis and De Ecclesiae Catholicae Unitate, edited by M. Bévénat, 1971, 63 ff.). However, in the second edition of the work this position was somewhat modified. "No doubt the other Apostles were all that Peter was, endowed with equal dignity and power, but the start comes from him alone, in order to show that the Church of Christ is unique. Indeed this oneness of the Church is figured in the Canticle of Canticles when the Holy Spirit, speaking in the Lord's name, says: 'One is my dove, my perfect one: to her mother she is the only one, the darling of her womb.' If a man does not hold fast to this oneness of the Church, does he imagine that he still holds the faith?" (ibid.; cf. Cant. 6:9[8]). The difference between the two texts is best explained by attributing the revision to Cyprian's quarrel with Pope Stephen which caused him to modify his own allegiance to Rome, whilst still maintaining the visible unity of the church (cf. Bévénat, op. cit., xiii ff.). Nevertheless, it illustrates the kind of primacy that was already an issue in the 3rd cent.

In the Middle Ages Boniface VIII promulgated the Bull Unam Sanctam (1302) which concludes: "Further, We declare, say, define, and pronounce that it is absolutely necessary for the salvation of every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer § 875). This umbrella statement of universal papal authority was, of course, made against the background of the conflict of temporal and ecclesiastical power in which the Holy Roman Emperors vied with the medieval popes. Nevertheless, it is clearly felt to be a source of embarrassment to ecumenically minded Catholic theologians who are uneasy about the irreformability of Catholic dogma (cf. G. Baum, "The Magisterium in a Changing Church", Concilium 1, 3, 1967, 34–42).

In The First Dogmatic Constitution of the Church of Christ (1870) Vatican I appealed to Jn. 1:42; Matt. 16:16–19; Jn. 21:15 and 17 to establish the apostolic primacy of Peter: "We teach and declare, therefore, according to the testimony of the Gospel that the primacy of jurisdiction over the whole Church of God was immediately and directly promised to and conferred upon the blessed Apostle Peter by Christ the Lord" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer § 3053). The Constitution then went on to argue for the continuation of this primacy in the bishops of Rome (Denzinger-Schönmetzer §§ 3056 ff.) and its extension not only to the whole church but also to the entire world in order to fulfil Christ's charge to feed his flock (Denzinger-Schönmetzer §§ 3059–64). Finally the Council defined papal infallibility: "that the Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, that is, when, acting in the office of shepherd and teacher of all Christians, he defines, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, doctrine concerning faith or morals to be held by the universal Church, possesses, through the divine assistance promised to him in the person of St. Peter, the infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed his Church to be endowed in defining doctrine concerning faith or morals; and that such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are therefore irreformable because of their nature, not because of the agreement of the Church" (Denzinger-Schönmetzer § 3074).

In view of such claims it was perhaps inevitable that Protestant apologists should seek to deny that Peter was the rock, and claim that the rock that Jesus had in mind was either his faith or his confession (for a review of interpretations see Cullmann, Peter, 164–76). The fathers were by no means unanimous that the rock was Peter. Thus, Augustine held that the rock was Christ himself (Sermons 76; 147; 149; 232; 245; 270; 295; cf. Retractationes 1, 21, 1). However, in the light of the arguments of 3 (a) above, it seems most likely that the original word that Jesus used for both petra and Petros was the Aram. kēpā', and that the difference in the Greek was due to the appropriateness of giving Peter a masc. form of the word for "rock". Although petros can mean a detached rock or stone and petra a mass of living rock, the two words could be used interchangeably. Without further clear indication it is impossible to build any firm argument on the distinction between the two words.

If, therefore, the rock is Peter himself, the passage gives no grounds for thinking that Jesus gave him this name in virtue of his stable character. In fact, his vacillation under pressure gives a certain irony to the name (cf. Matt. 26:30–35 par. Mk. 14:26–31; Lk. 22:31–34; Matt. 26:57–75 par. Mk. 14:53–72; Lk. 22:54–71; Gal. 2:11 ff.). Moreover, as Cullmann points out, "On exegetical grounds we must say that the passage does not contain a single word concerning successors of Peter" (op. cit., 213). It would seem that Peter was the rock in the sense that he was the first member of the → church proper. In the context of Christ's pronouncement Peter is the representative spokesman of the disciples, the first to confess Jesus as the Christ, the Son of the living God. As such, he is assured that flesh and blood has not revealed this to him but the Father in heaven (Matt. 16:16 f.). He used the keys of the kingdom (Matt. 16:19; cf. 23:13; Rev. 1:18; 3:7; Isa. 22:22; Rev. 21:25; Matt. 18:18; Jn. 20:23; → Open, art. kleis) in opening the church first to the Jews (Acts 2) and then to the Gentiles (Acts 10) by proclaiming the gospel to them. He exercised leadership in the appointment of Matthias to the apostolic band in replacement of Judas (Acts 1) and discipline in the case of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1–11). He figured prominently in the early days of the church in bearing witness before the Jews and their leaders (Acts 4:8 ff.; 5:15, 29; 9:32).

However, once the church was thus opened and established, Peter's foundational rôle is essentially over. After his imprisonment (Acts 12) he began to occupy a less prominent place. His work was confined to the Jewish mission (Gal. 2:8). In the first great council of the church depicted in Acts 15 it was James, the Lord's brother, who presided (Acts 15:19 ff.). Although Peter played an important part in the debate (Acts 15:7 ff.), it was James who delivered the decisive judgment. Moreover, nowhere in the NT does Peter lay claim to primacy. In the opening verses of the two epistles of Peter, the author describes himself as an apostle, and this is how Paul views him (1 Cor. 9:5).

It would seem that there were tensions in the apostolic church which centred on personalities, and this may explain certain passages in which Paul counterbalances possible claims by a Petrine faction. In 1 Cor. 1:12 he rebukes those who claim to belong to Paul, Cephas or Apollos rather than to Christ. Baptism into Christ precludes such factious divisions (v. 13). 1 Cor. 3:11 may in this light also be a counter to a partisan understanding of the foundational rôle of Peter: "For no other foundation can any one lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (→ Firm, art. themelios). Perhaps Paul's subsequent remarks may also be influenced by this: his warning about what one builds on the foundation which will be tried by fire (vv. 12–15); and the reminder "Do you not know that you are God's temple and that God's Spirit dwells in you? If any one destroys God's temple, God will destroy him. For God's temple is holy, and that temple you are" (vv. 16 f.; → Temple). In Gal. 2:9 there is a certain irony in the allusion to James, Cephas and John "who were reputed to be pillars [hoi dokountes styloi einai]" which is underlined by Peter's vacillation in the face of the Jewish → circumcision party (vv. 11–21). Eph. 2:20 allows a foundational rôle to the → apostles and → prophets but insists with the Gospels that Christ is the → gōnia: believers constitute "the household of God, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief cornerstone" (Eph. 2:19 f.). Similarly the new → Jerusalem in Rev. 21:14 is built on the foundation of the apostles. This theme is taken up by Peter himself when he describes believers as "living stones . . . built into a spiritual house" (1 Pet. 2:5). There is no thought of the foundation of Peter continuing right through the building. Neither the epistles nor Acts give any hint of a permanent primacy and jurisdiction of Peter, still less of such authority being handed on to possible successors.

As Cullmann says, the command to Peter to feed Christ's lambs (Jn. 21:16 ff.) "is certainly limited by his martyrdom" (op. cit., 214). In itself the passage indicates the kind of task to which Peter was commissioned; not his place in the hierarchy of the church. The promise that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church pictures Hades as the abode of the dead and the ekklēsia as the people of God wandering (like ancient Israel) before it through a land occupied by hostile powers which it cannot avoid, but which it will assuredly overcome. Not even the armed fortress of death through which Christ and his people must pass will be able to prevent them from attaining their goal (→ Gate; → Hell, art. Hades). On the powers promised to Peter → Bind; → Open, art. kleis NT 3. Whilst it seems probable that Peter visited Rome (cf. 1 Pet. 5:13), there is no hint that Peter was ever bishop of Rome. Indeed, the primary document for the church at Rome in the sub-apostolic age is 1 Clement, but this letter seems to know nothing of the primacy of a bishop of Rome. The church of Rome at that time seems to be governed by a college of presbyters. The letter was sent in the name of the church, and is attributed to Clement personally only by a variant ending preserved in some later manuscripts. Such considerations undermine not only the idea of a special teaching primacy vouchsafed to Peter but also the idea of a hierarchical teaching magisterium formally vested in the episcopal office of the church (cf. C. Brown, "The Teaching Office of the Church", The Churchman 83, 1969, 184–96).

C. Brown

γωνία

γωνία (gōnia), corner; κεφαλὴ γωνίας (kephalē gōnias), corner-stone or keystone; ἀκρογωνιαῖος (akrogōniaios), lying at the extreme corner, corner-stone or capstone.

CL & OT 1. gōnia is found in secular Gk. from Hdt. onwards and also in the LXX meaning corner. Theological interest lies in the expression kephalē gōnias in Ps. 118(117):22: "The stone which the builders rejected has become the chief corner-stone [MT l'roš pinnâh; LXX eis kephalēn gōnias]." This cultic Psalm which was performed at the temple gates (vv. 19 f., 26 f.) celebrates the victory and salvation which Yahweh gives in his righteousness (vv. 10–21), and Yahweh's steadfast love (vv. 1–4, 28 f.) in the face of distress (vv. 5 ff.). It is probably pre-exilic (cf. A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, II, 1972, 797 ff.). Anderson sees v. 22 as "in all probability a proverbial saying, that what appeared to be worthless has now taken the place of honour. This was also the experience of the singer in verses 5–21: at one point he was hard pressed and near death; now he is delivered by Yahweh and recognized as righteous or victorious" (op. cit., 802). The Heb. rōš pinnâh means lit. (like the Gk.) "head of [the] corner". It was not necessarily the only such stone, but one of the most important parts of the building. Anderson sees it as either one of the large corner-stones which bind together two rows of stones especially in the foundations or the keystone which completes an arch or structure.

2. The word akrogōniaios has the same meaning. It occurs first in Isa. 28:16: "Therefore thus says the Lord God, 'Behold, I am laying in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tested stone, a precious corner-stone [MT 'āben 'ēben bōhan pinnat yiqraṭ mūsād mūsād; LXX lithon polytelē eklekton akrogoniaion entimon eis ta themelia]: "He who believes will not be in haste."'" The saying comes in the context of a woe-pronouncement on the dissolute and unbelieving nobles who had evidently made a treaty with → Egypt, invoking the protection of pagan gods in the hope of being saved from the Assyrian armies. Isaiah denounces this as a "covenant with death" (v. 15), death (Heb. māweṭ) being the name of the Canaanite god of the underworld and infertility, alluding perhaps to the comparable Egyptian deities (Osiris and Seth?). But this will be of no avail "when the overwhelming scourge passes through"

(v. 15). The scheming politicians should have known better than to pin their hopes to such tangible but in fact flimsy shelter. The true refuge is the building which Yahweh has founded in Zion, the corner-stone of which is faith and which is built in accordance with justice and righteousness (vv. 16, 17a). The bohan stone is an Egyptian word, denoting a hard type of stone suitable for carving (Koehler-Baumgartner, 117). It bears the inscription "He who believes [i.e. trusts] will not be in haste [i.e. alarmed]" (cf. 7:9; 28:12; 30:15). Isaiah can hardly be thinking of this building as the → temple, even though it was rich in association for him (Isa. 6). For the temple was already erected. It is more likely that he is thinking of Yahweh's purposes for the Davidic monarchy with the promises which he sees attached to it, but which was discounted by the mighty of the land as being unable to save in the situation.

The mention twice of themelia, foundation, suggests that akrogōniaios means a foundation stone (→ also lithos OT 2 (d)). Probably the word is a biblical coinage, as there is no clear evidence of its use in secular Gk.

NT 1. gōnia is used in Matt. 6:5 of a street corner in Jesus' warning not to be like the "hypocrites" who "love to stand and pray in the synagogues and at street corners, that they may be seen by men. Truly, I say to you, they have their reward." In Jesus' day prayer in the synagogue was led by a member of the congregation standing before the ark of the law. But at times of public fasting, and perhaps in response to the call to prayer at the time of the afternoon temple sacrifice, prayers could be offered in the streets (Taanith 2:1 f.; cf. D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 133). Jesus' criticism is not directed at the practice of prayer but at ostentation.

In Acts 26:26 Paul reminds Festus that King Agrippa knows what has happened to Paul, "for this was not done in a corner", i.e. in secret. In Rev. 7:1 the seer sees four angels from the four corners of the earth; the ancient East regarded the world as a quadrilateral (so in Jer. 49:36 four winds come from the four ends of heaven). Rev. 20:7 ff. recalls Ezek. 38 f. and describes how Satan leads forth Gog and Magog, the Gentile hosts, from the four corners of the earth to do battle against "the beloved city". This struggle ends with the destruction of these powers that are hostile to God.

2. All 5 NT passages which refer to the kephalē gōnias are derived from Ps. 118:22. The corner-stone as the most important stone in the foundation is laid first. Because of its position it could be "a stone of offence and a rock of stumbling", as 1 Pet. 2:8 says (lit. translated), referring to Isa. 8:14 (→ Offence). The kephalē gōnias of v. 7 certainly here means the corner-stone. Presumably the same is true of Matt. 21:42 par. and Acts 4:11, since these also refer back to Ps. 118:22.

However J. Jeremias has proposed another interpretation. He suggests that kephalē gōnias should, like akrogōniaios, mean not the corner-stone, but the keystone which was placed over the entrance of the temple (see bibliography). But none of the evidence that Jeremias cites for this interpretation is earlier than the second half of the 2nd cent. A.D. That is true of Symmachus' translation of the OT, which translates the Heb. kōteret (capital) of 2 Ki. 25:17 with akrogōniaion, and of the Testament of Solomon 22:7 ff. which Jeremias adduces as of the first importance for his view; it is an apocryphal Christian document of the 3rd/4th cents. A.D. See also 1QM 8:4 ff. (For details of evidence of a top corner-stone → lithos OT 2 (d).) The "stone of offence and rock of stumbling" in 1 Pet. 2:8 cannot refer to the keystone at the top of the building; hence we must set aside Jeremias' interpretation, since firm evidence for it is lacking in the NT period. This interpretation of the stone of Ps. 118:22 (Isa. 28:16) arose later; perhaps it goes back to Eph. 1:22. Here Christ is said to have been made "the head over all things for the church". This concept may have replaced that of "the head of the corner" (Ps. 118:22) on the grounds that this was no longer clearly understood. It was transferred to the keystone which forms the → "head" of the spiritual building, the church. ([Ed.] This seems barely plausible in view of the other OT allusions in Eph. including the wandering people of God, the reference to covenants, law and the temple in Eph. 2:11–22.)

In essence the point of the statements in the NT about the corner-stone is the same. The builders who have rejected the stone are the Jewish nation and its leaders; they have rejected Christ, but through his saving action in Christ's death and resurrection God has made this same Christ into the corner-stone of a new building, the → church. The likening of the community to a building is found elsewhere in the NT (e.g. Matt. 16:18; 1 Cor. 3:9 ff.; 14:12; → House). According to Matt. 21:42 par. Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17, Jesus himself directed his Jewish opponents' attention to Ps. 118:22. But, according to 1 Pet. 2:8, what applies to them also applies to all who do not accept the message of Christ. If Jesus is for unbelievers the cause of their judgment, the stone of offence and rock of stumbling, he is for Christians the "living stone" which is chosen and precious (1 Pet. 2:4, 6). The description of Christ as the corner-stone thus expresses most pregnantly the truth that man's eternal destiny is decided in him. For further discussion see R. J. McKelvey, "Christ the Corner-stone", NTS 8, 1961–62, 352–59.

3. The word akrogōniaios, corner-stone, occurs in the NT only in Eph. 2:20 and 1 Pet. 2:6. In both passages the saying of Isa. 28:16 is given a christological interpretation. This messianic view of the passage is visible already in Rom. 9:33 and we can see that it was widely held in early Christianity (→ petra NT 1). The juxtaposition in Eph. 2:20 of "foundation" and "corner-stone" shows that the apostle has the Isa.-passage in mind. In Christ the prophetic utterance finds its fulfilment. The foundation upon which the community is built is the apostles and prophets, the corner-stone is Jesus Christ. Upon this foundation the community grows into a holy temple in the Lord, into whom Christians, through the Holy → Spirit, are also built. The statement in 1 Cor. 3:11, in which Christ is spoken of as the foundation of the church (→ Firm, art. themelios), thus takes on a subtle shade of meaning. In 1 Pet. 2:6 the akrogōniaios is identical with the kephalē gōnias of vv. 4, 7. This confirms that the stone is a corner-stone. The living stone which is chosen by God and is precious is Jesus Christ. Christians need to join him in order to be themselves built in as "living stones" (v. 5) into the spiritual house, the church. This is the original meaning of the word edification, whose biblical sense we constantly need to remember.

W. Mundle

λίθος

λίθος (lithos), stone; λίθινος (lithinos), of stone; μύλος (mylos), mill, millstone; μυλικός (mylikos), belonging to a mill; μύλινος (mylinos), belonging to a mill.

CL lithos (Homer onwards) means stone, lithinos (Pindar, Hdt. onwards) of stone. In general lithos can describe stones of every sort (cf. Lucian, Hermotimus 81: ho theos ouk en ouranō estin, alla dia pantōn pephoitēken: hoion xylōn kai lithōn kai zōon, God is not in heaven, but goes about permeating all things, bits of wood, stones and living creatures). In particular one can distinguish building stones (Diog. Laert., 2, 72; Diod. Sic., I, 66, 3, lithoi kaloi, fine stones, here works of marble) and precious stones (together with gold, silver, pearls, etc., lithoi timioi, jewels, are mentioned, e.g. in Herodian, 5, 2, 4).

OT 1. Usually the LXX translates the Heb. 'ēben by lithos. The Heb. uses a further 10 words to specify different sorts of stone like mill-stones, boundary-stones, stone pillars, piles of stones, precious stones, emeralds, diamonds, etc. These the LXX also translates by lithos, usually without differentiating them. The most important of the numerous occurrences of this word (which is found some 350 times) are those passages in which lithos occurs in a theological context and which are occasionally taken up in the NT.

2. (a) In a threatening passage (Isa. 8:11–15) the prophet Isaiah warns his people not to free themselves from the danger of an Assyrian invasion through self-sufficient and faithless exertions. He testifies that the real danger for Judah is not the Assyrians, but the proximity of God their judge, who will become a “stone of offence” and a “rock of stumbling” (Isa. 8:14). “Just as someone wandering in the night suddenly stumbles over a stone and falls to the ground, or on a mountain steps upon a loose fragment of rock and falls, the people of the covenant . . . will be smitten unexpectedly by the judgment of God” (O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, 1972, 118).

(b) Isa. 28:16a uses the image of the building of a house and the foundation-stone. In contrast to the Jerusalem rulers’ policy of alliances against Assyria, a policy that is doomed to fail, for they make alliances with death (v. 16), Yahweh is laying in Zion a firm foundation-stone, which gives a stable base for the foundation, its walls and the whole building. Possibly there is a comparison here with the Jerusalem temple. However, the interpretation, “He who believes will not be confounded” (v. 16b), interprets the foundation-stone, upon which the building of the nation and state is to be erected, as faith and trust in Yahweh’s help, which makes the anxious search for alliances superfluous. On this passage → gōnia CL & OT 2.

(c) Likewise Psalm 118:22 cites what looks like a proverb about a corner-stone (→ art. gōnia OT 1). The one who offers the prayer thanks Yahweh for the salvation which he shares. He likens his existence threatened by death to a stone which the builders discarded as useless and his rescuing by Yahweh to a corner-stone or keystone of a building.

(d) Zechariah prophesies the completion of the building of the post-exilic → temple by Zerubbabel: “‘What are you, you great mountain? Before Zerubbabel, be a plain! He will pull out the keystone [MT hā'ēben hārō'šāh, lit. ‘the head stone’; LXX ton lithon tēs klēronomias, lit. ‘the stone of inheritance’] to shouts of: Blessings on it, blessings on it!’ The word of Yahweh was addressed to me as follows. ‘The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation [MT yiss'qū; LXX ethemeliōsan] of this Temple; his hands will finish it. (And you will learn that Yahweh Sabaoth has sent me to you.) A day for little things, no doubt, but who would dare to despise it? People will rejoice when they see the chosen stone [MT hā'ēben habb'qīl; LXX ton lithon ton kassiterinon] in the hands of Zerubbabel’ ” (Zech. 4:7–10 JB). The great mountain is not to be taken literally (cf. J. G. Baldwin, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, TC, 1972, 121; cf. Isa. 40:4; 41:15). The thought is that the mountains of opposition to God's work cannot impede it. A. Petitjean claims that Zechariah means a foundation stone in v. 7 (Les Oracles du Proto-Zacharie, 1969, 243–51; cf. ANET, 340 f.). But Baldwin holds that the sense of the passage requires it to mean a completion stone, for the promise concerns the completion of the building (cf. v. 9). The completion is symbolic of the victory of God's Spirit (cf. v. 6). Miss Baldwin notes parallels in Babylonian Chronicles where the king proclaims that he has raised the head of the temple to its height (op. cit., 122). The expression hā'eben habb'qīl (v. 10) means lit. "the stone the tin". RSV has plumbline (cf. the LXX), although plumbines were normally made of lead. NEB has "the Stone called Separation", parallel with the stone of inheritance or possession (v. 7). This follows the Syriac which sees the noun connected with the vb. bāḏal, to separate (cf. G. R. Driver, "Babylonian and Hebrew Notes", Die Welt des Orients 2, 1954, 22). This translation would symbolize the separated, holy nature of the Jewish community, and from this it is but a short step to "the chosen stone" (JB). "The cause of rejoicing, therefore, is the placing of this last ceremonial stone, the crown of all their work, on the height of the Temple walls, by Zerubbabel" (Baldwin, op. cit., 123). A top corner-stone has, in fact, been discovered in Jerusalem (cf. B. Mazar, The excavations in the Old City of Jerusalem near the Temple Mount, Preliminary Report of the Second and Third Seasons, Institute of Archaeology, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, The Israel Exploration Society, Jerusalem, 1971, 2, see also figs. 1 and 3).

(e) Dan. 2:34 f. tells of Nebuchadnezzar's → dream in which he saw a stone break off from a mountain without any human agency and shatter the great image on its feet of iron and clay. The image was dispersed without trace. "But the stone that struck the image became a great mountain and filled the whole earth." In Dan. 2:44 f. the dream is interpreted as the establishment of God's kingdom which will crush the image, i.e. all other kingdoms: "And in the days of those kings the God of heaven will set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, nor shall its sovereignty be left to another people. It shall break in pieces all these kingdoms and bring them to an end, and it shall stand for ever; just as you saw that a stone was cut from a mountain by no human hand, and that it broke in pieces the iron, the bronze, the clay, the silver, and the gold. A great God has made known to the king what shall be hereafter. The dream is certain, and its interpretation is sure." (For interpretations of the kingdoms see J. A. Montgomery, The Book of Daniel, ICC, 1927, 165–92; E. W. Heaton, The Book of Daniel, 1956, 130–35; N. W. Porteous, Daniel, 1965, 44–51; and E. J. Young, The Prophecy of Daniel, 1949, 71–80, cf. 295–306.)

3. In late Judaism various OT sayings about stones were given a messianic interpretation. Already in the LXX an ep' autō ("in him") has been added to the ho pisteuōn ("he who believes") of Isa. 28:16. Similarly the stones in Isa. 8:14 (San. 38a), Zech. 4:7 (Tg. ad loc.), Zech. 4:10 (Tanh. Toledot 20) and Dan. 2:34 ff. (Num. R. 13:14 on 7:13) are given messianic interpretations (cf. Targum Ps. 118:24; Zech. 3:8 f.; detailed evidence in J. Jeremias, TDNT IV 272 f.). Judaism expected a glorification or renewal of the temple (SB I 1003 f.; but cf. Jesus in Lk. 13:35). The Qumran community regarded itself as the eschatological Israel, as God's true temple, and cited Isa. 28:16 as evidence (1QS 8:7 f.).

NT In the NT most instances of the word lithos are in the Synoptic Gospels, especially Matt.; it occurs only occasionally in Paul, in 1 Pet. and in Rev. It is used lit. of a mill-stone (Lk. 17:2), a boulder (Matt. 27:60 par. Mk. 15:46; Matt. 28:2 par. 16:3 f.; cf. Lk. 24:2; Jn. 20:1) or a precious stone (Rev. 18:12, 16; 21:11, 19). Its fig. use is chiefly in connexion with OT quotations which are given a messianic interpretation.

1. (a) The saying about the stones crying out (Lk. 19:40) is to be understood against an OT and Jewish background, where we occasionally get references to the accusing cry of lifeless objects (Gen. 4:10; Hab. 2:11; 2 Esd. 5:5; cf. SB II 253). J. Jeremias gives this interpretation to Jesus' saying: "If my disciples were to withhold their acclamation, the stones by the wayside would cry out and accuse them" (loc. cit. 270).

(b) It is doubtful whether John the Baptist's saying, that "God can raise up children of Abraham from these stones" (Matt. 3:9; Lk. 3:8), is citing Isa. 51:1 f. (taking → Abraham as the rock; so Jeremias, loc. cit. 271). For those whom the Baptist addresses certainly ought not to appeal to the descent of the whole nation from one man (which is emphasized in that passage) as God can make children of Abraham from stones. The offensive saying means that God can fashion a new → Israel from men who can claim no qualifications (like descent, etc.) of their own (cf. Rom. 4:9–25).

(c) On the saying of Jesus about no stone of the temple being left standing on another (Mk. 13:2 par.) → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (a).

2. (a) Occasionally Jesus is likened to a stone. Mk. 12:10; Lk. 20:17 f. cites Ps. 118:22 in connexion with the parable of the husbandmen: the stone rejected by the builders has become the corner-stone or keystone. He who is rejected by men is the One exalted by God (J. Schniewind, ad loc.). According to Acts 4:10 f., this exaltation has already taken place in Jesus' resurrection. Eph. 2:20–22 also makes Jesus the akrogōniaios, the corner-stone or keystone, which holds the whole building together (→ gōnia NT 3), while the apostles and prophets form the foundation.

(b) On the other hand, Jesus is likened in Lk. 20:18 to a destroying stone which will crush its opponents, an allusion to Dan. 2:34 (cf. above, OT 2 (e)). In Rom. 9:32 f. Paul quotes Isa. 8:14 and interprets the stone of offence of Christ who has been the undoing of the Jews (→ petra NT 1).

(c) In Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:4–8 (cf. also Lk. 2:34) the positive interpretation of Jesus as the corner-stone or keystone is combined with the negative one of him as the destructive stone of offence by combining different OT quotations (→ petra NT 1). This serves to show the dialectical significance of Jesus as gospel and law, as salvation and disaster. It is the faith of individual men that decides whether Christ the stone has a vital (1 Pet. 2:4) or a fatal (Lk. 20:18) effect (cf. the citation of Isa. 28:16 in Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:6 f.).

3. In 1 Pet. 2:5 Christians are likened to "living stones": "as living stones be built up into a spiritual house" (cf. Eph. 2:20). The inanimate image of the building here is inadequate for the truth expressed. Because Christ lives, the foundation and thus the entire building is living; and because Christians live with and through him they can be addressed as "living stones". (See further N. Hillyer, "'Rock-Stone' Imagery in I Peter", TB 22, 1971, 58–81.)

H.-G. Link, E. Tiedtke

4. The word mylos, mill, is found in secular Gk. and the LXX (cf. Exod. 11:5; Deut. 24:6; Isa. 47:2; Sib. 8:14). It consisted of two round, flat stones, and figures in Jesus' warning about the suddenness of the parousia and how unprepared some will be for it: "Two women will be grinding at the mill; one is taken and one is left" (Matt. 24:41; cf. Num. 11:8). The fact that "the sound of the millstone shall be heard no more" is one of the vivid ways of expressing judgment on → Babylon, i.e. godless civilization (Rev. 18:22). This follows the event described in Rev. 18:21: "Then a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone and threw it into the sea, saying, 'So shall Babylon the great city be thrown down with violence, and shall be found no more.'" The judgment on Babylon recalls Jer. 51:60–63 (cf. 7:34; 16:9; 25:10), and the destruction by a stone is reminiscent of Dan. 2:34 f. (see above OT 2 (e)). In Jdg. 9:53 Abimelech was killed by a millstone thrown by a woman as he besieged the tower at Thebez. "For some of John's readers this passage would have awakened more recent memories of that August night in A.D. 79 when the lamps and gaiety of Pompeii and Herculaneum were extinguished for ever by a pall of volcanic ash. It is not after all the heroic sins that bring the downfall of cities, but sheer heedlessness of approaching disaster" (G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St. John the Divine, BNTC, 1966, 231). Babylon is thus as unprepared as the woman in Jesus' saying. There is an irony in the contrast between the lithon hos mylinon Megan of v. 21 and the phonē mylou of v. 22. The latter denotes a harmless and necessary activity; the former becomes the instrument of destruction as it is in the saying of Jesus, "Whoever causes one of these little ones who believes in me to sin, it would be better for him if a great millstone were hung round his neck and he were thrown into the sea" (Mk. 9:42 par. Matt. 18:8, Lk. 17:1 f.; → Offence, art. skandalon NT 3). The mylos onikos of Matt. and Mk. means lit. a "donkey stone"; Lk. has lithos mylikos, stone belonging to a mill (cf. Mk. 9:42 v.l.; Rev. 18:21 v.l.). It signifies a large stone worked by donkey power. W. L. Lane draws attention to its context in Mk., where it follows Jesus' rebuke of the disciples for forbidding the unknown exorcist. "The stern warning has immediate relevance for those who had sought to prevent the exercise of faith in Jesus' name, and corresponds in severity to the word addressed to Peter when he sought to turn Jesus from the path of obedience (Ch. 8:33). Verse 42 performs the same function as Ch. 8:33: it serves to expose a grievous misconception and by graphic language to impress the seriousness of the matter indelibly upon the hearers' hearts" (The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 345). C. Brown

→ Apostle, → Bind, → Church, → Firm, Foundation, → Offence, → Open, → Punishment

μαργαρίτης

μαργαρίτης (margaritēs), pearl.

CL margaritēs, pearl, is that rarest phenomenon, a certain translation of an ancient term for a gemstone (from Theophrastus, 4th cent. B.C.). In a rare flight of poesy, Pliny describes how pearls originate as dewdrops falling into open oysters (Nat. Hist. 9, 106–23).

OT There are no certain references to pearls in the OT, and margaritēs does not occur in the LXX. The "pearl" of Job 28:18a AV (Heb. gābîš) is probably crystal.

RSV translates p̄nīnīm in Job 28:18b as pearls, but elsewhere always as jewels, costly stones. The use of pearls for the gates of new Jerusalem was a familiar messianic picture (Baba Bathra 37:1; Sanhedrin 100, 1; Mid. Ps. 87; Exod. R. 15, 114, 4).

NT In Matt. 7:6 Jesus urges discrimination in offering “what is holy”, that which stands in special relation to God, to the irresponsible and unappreciative, an action tantamount to casting costly pearls before swine. The saying is quoted in Did. 9:5 and by Tertullian (De praesc. 41) against the admission of the unbaptized to the Lord’s Supper. Pearls are mentioned in 1 Tim. 2:9; Rev. 17:4 as extravagances of feminine finery, and in Matt. 13:45 f.; Rev. 18:12, 16 as articles of merchandise.

Each gate of the heavenly city is a gigantic pearl, some 200 feet across (Rev. 21:21; cf. Isa. 54:12). On each gate is inscribed the name of one of the tribes of Israel (21:12). It is less likely that this implies that there is one particular entrance for a man assigned to any given tribe, than that the large number of gates suggests free and ample access to the city. The names of the 12 tribes on the gates should be related with the names of the 12 apostles on the foundations (21:14). The implication is that the true children of God under the old covenant and under the new alike share in the heavenly city. The gates of the city are not intended to stand against assault – indeed, they are always open (21:25). The angels on duty (21:12) are not armed (cf. Gen. 3:24) but a guard of honour. Pearl is not utilitarian, but only for decoration, beauty, ornament.

In the parable the prudent merchant was prepared to sell all that he had to acquire a single pearl of great price (Matt. 13:46). It is suggestive that alone among precious stones the pearl is the product of a living organism. More precisely, the pearl results from an injury done to a living organism. A foreign body invading the shell of an oyster is covered by layers of nacre, until the pearl is formed. The pearl of great price in the parable can be taken to represent the church which Jesus purchased with his own blood (Acts 20:28). For the substance of the gates of the heavenly city to be described as pearl, therefore, is apt, for entrance into the Father’s presence is only by way of the work of Jesus himself (Jn. 14:6).

N. Hillyer

Precious Stones in the Apocalypse

Systematic mineralogy was not established as a science until c. 1780. Today, identifying a gemstone by the use of optical and other instruments still involves a careful process of elimination. Even so, nomenclature often remains confused: topaz is a term loosely used for many yellow or sherry-brown stones which have only their colour in common; none is the same as ancient topaz, usually thought from contexts to be green (modern peridot). The uncertainty surrounding the names of precious stones in antiquity is therefore not surprising, especially since most of the corresponding Heb. roots simply mean glitter, sparkle, gleam, and the like. Furthermore, many stones are found in a great variety of colours.

The problem can be highlighted with one illustration. The first gemstone in Rev. 21:19 is iaspis, usually translated jasper. The Gk. noun is used in the LXX to render three different Heb. words: (a) yāšpēh, Ezek. 28:13; from an unused root meaning to polish (iaspis and jasper simply transliterate the Heb.); (b) yah^alōm, Exod. 28:18;

36:18 (39:11); something hard, derived from hālam, to strike down with force; (c) kaḏkōd, Isa. 54:12; sparkling, from kāqad, to strike fire from metal. Even as early as the Mishnah, the meaning of kaḏkōd was the centre of an argument (Baba Bathra 75a). Modern translators propose agate, red jasper, or ruby. Pliny has a long discussion about precious stones in Nat. Hist. 37. He refers to iaspis as a translucent green, with a Persian variety in sky-blue. The reference in Rev. 21:11 to crystal suggests translucence, but present-day jasper cannot be meant since that is opaque. J. S. Harris concludes that iaspis is a variety of quartz, found in red, brown, green, or yellow, occasionally in blue or black, and rarely in white. According to L. Ginzberg, the iaspis was Benjamin's stone: "This stone changes colour even as Benjamin's feelings towards his brothers changed."

Recent translations of the Bible offer the following possibilities for the 12 precious stones of the wall of New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19–21): iaspis, jasper, diamond; sappheiros, sapphire, lapis lazuli; chalkēdōn, agate, chalcedony, turquoise; smaragdōs, emerald, crystal; sardonyx, onyx, sardonyx, agate; sardion, carnelian, cornelian, ruby, sardius; chrysolithos, chrysolite, gold quartz, yellow quartz; bēryllos, beryl, malachite; topazion, topaz; chrysoprasos, chrysoprase, emerald, chalcedony; hyakinthos, jacinth, turquoise, sapphire; amethystos, amethyst.

Although in a different order, the names of the precious stones in Rev. 21 closely resemble those on the high priest's breastplate in Exod. 28:17–20 LXX (= Ezek. 28:13 LXX). Eight of the LXX names recur in Rev. 21. Of the stones in Exod. 28, anthrax (Heb. nōpēh), ligyrion (lešem), achatēs (šḥō), and onychion (yāš'pēh) are replaced in Rev. 21 by chalkēdōn, chrysoprasos, hyakinthos, and sardonyx, none of which appears in the LXX as the name of a precious stone. W. Bousset (Die Offenbarung Johannis, 1906) shows that the variations between Revelation and Exodus can be explained, so we may safely assume that John intended to reproduce the OT list. But Bousset is unable to account for the order of the stones, which in fact differs widely in all the lists (Exod. 28; Ezek. 28 MT; and ibid., LXX).

Rev. 17:4 is part of a picture of depravation and decadence in the description of the woman on a scarlet beast representing "Babylon the great, mother of harlots and of earth's abominations" and "bedeckt with gold and jewels and pearls" (chrysiō kai lithō timiō kai margaritais), an expression which sounds like a perversion of the high priest's breastplate.

The Samaritan Targum on Exod. 28:17–20; 39:10–13 (dated to the Roman period) indicates that the stones on the high priest's breastplate gave three variations of four basic colours: red, bright red, intense red; and similarly with black, green, and white. This grouping by shades appears a more likely explanation of the biblical lists, since 12 totally different colours in gemstones, even if known to the ancients, would almost certainly have presented violent clashes of colour (J. S. Harris, ALUOS 5, 1965, 58–62).

Philo (Vit. Mos. 2, 122–35) regards the gemstones on the breastplate as symbolic of the months of the year, or of the signs of the Zodiac. Josephus (Ant. 3, 166–71; War 5, 233–5) also associates the stones with the Zodiac (though he enumerates them differently in the two writings). So too does Clem. Alex. (Strom. 5, 38, 4). The Mishnah associates the 12 tribes with the 12 constellations (Berakoth 32b), and this prompts A. Farrer (A Rebirth of Images, 1949, 216–44) to attempt to match tribes with zodiacal signs. Since such signs are depicted in mosaics in synagogues in Palestine, it is clear that Judaism was prepared to make use of pagan symbols in the cause of Jewish ideas. Such symbolism was extremely primitive and widespread. The architecture of the city of the gods, according to Babylonian mythology, was marked by cosmic symbols. The city rested on four columns covered by jewels (= stars), had 12 foundation stones and 12 gates (12 signs of the Zodiac), and was traversed by a golden street (the Galaxy).

R. H. Charles (ICC, 1920) suggested that the gemstones in Rev. 21 represent the signs of the Zodiac arranged in the reverse order to which the sun travels through the Zodiac, thus indicating that Christianity and the New Jerusalem are opposed to religions of sun-worship (cf. Rev. 22:5). The 12 signs of the Zodiac had jewels allocated to them, beginning with amethyst and ending with jasper. John reversed the order "to attack astrology", a suggestion since followed by other commentators (e.g. G. B. Caird, The Revelation of St John, 1966). But this is an odd way to attack astrology (T. F. Glasson, JTS ns 26, 1975, 95): no constellations are mentioned in Rev. 21; any zodiacal reference is obscure, though John is quite capable of making his points forcibly. The best method of attack would have been to scramble the order, not to adopt correspondences to the Zodiac. Charles had relied on Athanasius Kircher (1602–80), but Glasson exposes the latter as a fraud.

A. Farrer (Revelation of St John, 1964, 219) suggests that John simply compiles his list in general correspondence with Exodus, but euphoniously. The writer arranges the Gk. terms to emphasize a division by three. Nine of them end with s sounds, and the three exceptions end with n sounds, as if to underline the points of division: iaspis, sappheiros, chalkedōn; smaragdos, sardonyx, sardion; chrysolithos, bēryllos, topazion; chrysoprasos, hyakinthos, amethystos. John has already listed the 12 tribes in Rev. 7:5–8. The stones represent the tribes, according to Exod. 28:21. But there is no need to repeat woodenly the stones in the exact order of the tribes.

Although the stones on the high priest's breastplate are usually assumed to have been set in four rows of three, some early writers suggest that the arrangement was in the form of a square (Mid. R. 2:7 on Num. 2:2; Clem. Alex., Strom. 5, 38, 4), corresponding to the position of the tribes around the tabernacle (Num. 2) and the gates of the city (Ezek. 48:30; Rev. 21:13). It is also possible that, like the 12 gates of the city (Rev. 21:12), the 12 stones not only symbolize the 12 apostles (21:14), but also relate to the 12 tribes of Israel (A. M. Farrer, A Rebirth of Images, 1949, 216 ff.). A convincing identification of individual stones with tribes is unlikely, with one possible exception. iaspis, at the head of the list of precious stones adorning the wall, may stand for the first tribe in John's list, Judah (7:5), and its corresponding apostle (21:14). iaspis is also the general material of the city (21:11). Jesus the messiah is of the tribe of Judah (Lk. 3:26; Heb. 7:14; Rev. 5:5), termed apostle (Heb. 3:1) and the chief corner-stone (Eph. 2:20; cf. 1 Pet. 2:6, 8). It is from him that the church acquires the substance and colour of the divine glory (Rev. 4:3). The wall of the city is associated with both tribes and apostles (Rev. 21:12, 14). The symbolism is of a perfect city of God in which all the saints of both the old and the new covenants alike have their portion. As 12 tribes represent the chosen people of God in completeness, so 12 apostles represent the apostolic company in totality. Discussion as to whether Judas is excluded or Paul included has no place in this symbolism.

The main outline of the description of the heavenly city in Rev. 21 is foreshadowed in Isa. 54:11 f. (cf. Tob. 13:16–18). Precious stones are frequently connected with theophanies (e.g., Ezek. 1; Rev. 4), probably because of their quality of reflecting light and emitting radiance. A midrash on Isa. 54:11 f. from Qumran represents the community of the elect as precious stones and their priests as lapis lazuli or sapphires (4QpIsa). But in Revelation the focus of attention is on God himself.

The constant mention of transparency indicates that the heavenly city is designed to transmit the glory of God in the form of light without hindrance. In Rev. 4:3, 6 the presence of God is likened to the appearance of iaspis and sardion, the rainbow around the throne to smaragdin (cf. Ezek. 1:26–28; 10:1), and the sea before the throne to krystallos, rock-crystal. Rev. 21 suggests a scene of indescribable beauty, with the light of the heavenly city playing upon the layers of multi-coloured stones built one upon the other, each layer extending all round the city. The city is a blaze of light (from the Lamb, 21:23) and its radiance compared to the brightness of iaspis, a term used for stones of various colours, but here qualified by timiōtatō, most costly, and krystallizonti, translucent like rock-crystal (21:11) – costly to man but used lavishly in the new Jerusalem (21:19) for the purpose of manifesting the glory of God. The believer in Christ does not generate the light of Christ, but should both reflect and transmit its glory without blurring the beauty and loveliness of Christ.

N. Hillyer

On petra, gōnia and lithos etc.:

- (a). Arndt, 167, 475, 660 f.; A. A. Anderson, The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I–II, 1972; G. Bornkamm, “The Authority to ‘Bind’ and ‘Loose’ in the Church in Matthew’s Gospel: The Problem of Sources in Matthew’s Gospel”, Perspective 11, 1970, 37–50; C. Brown, “The Teaching Office of the Church”, The Churchman 83, 1969, 184–96; R. E. Brown, “Peter”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 65–57; R. E. Brown, K. P. Donfried and J. Reumann, eds., Peter in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars, 1974; F. F. Bruce, “The Corner Stone”, ExpT 84, 1972–73, 231–35; O. Cullmann, petra, TDNT VI 95–99; Petros, Kēphas, TDNT VI 100–12; and Peter: Disciple, Apostle, Martyr, 1962³; M. Dahood, “Is ‘eben yiśrā’el a Divine Title (Gn. 49, 24)?”, Biblica 40, 1959, 1022–7; B. van Elderen, “Peter, Simon”, ZPEB IV 733–39; F. V. Filson, “Peter”, IDB III 749–57; J. K. Elliott, “Kēphas: Simon Petros; ho Petros: An Extension of New Testament Usage”, NovT 14, 1972, 241–56. R. H. Fuller, “The ‘Thou art Peter’ Pericope and the Easter Appearances”, McCormick Quarterly 20, 1967, 309–15; L. Gaston, No Stone on Another: Studies in the Significance of the Fall of Jerusalem in the Synoptic Gospels, Supplements to NovT 23, 1970; M. D. Goulder, Midrash and Lection in Matthew, 1974, 383–94; C. N. Hillyer, “‘Rock-Stone’ Imagery in I Peter”, TB 22, 1971, 58–81; S. H. Hooke, “The Corner-Stone of Scripture”, in The Siege Perilous: Essays in Biblical Anthropology and Kindred Subjects, 1956, 235–49; J. Jeremias, gōnia, akrogōniaios, kephalē, gōnias, TDNT I 791 ff.; and lithos, lithinos, TDNT IV 268–80; O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12, 1972; and Isaiah 13–39, 1974; A. S. Kapelrud, ‘eben’, TDOT I 48–51; O. Karrer, Peter and the Church: An Examination of Cullmann’s Thesis, Quaestiones Disputatae 8, 1963; G. D. Kilpatrick, “Galatians 1:18: historesai Kēphan”, in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1959, 144–49; B. Mazar, The Excavations in the Old City of Jerusalem, Preliminary Report of the Second and Third Seasons 1969–1970, Institute of Archaeology, Hebrew University of Jerusalem, The Israel Exploration Society, 1971; R. J. McKelvey, “Christ the Cornerstone”, NTS 8, 1961–62, 352–59; C. F. D. Moule, “Some Reflections on the ‘Stone’ Testimonia in Relation to the Name Peter”, NTS 2, 1955–56, 56 ff.; R. T. O’Callaghan, “Vatican Excavations and the Tomb of Peter”, BA 16, 1953, 70–87; D. W. O’Connor, Peter in Rome, 1969; K. L. Schmidt, kaleō, TDNT III 487–91; O. J. F. Seitz, “Upon this Rock: A Critical Re-examination of Matt. 16, 17–19”, JBL 69, 1950, 329–40; J. W. Wenham, “Did Peter Go to Rome in AD 42?”, TB 23, 1972, 94–102; M. Wilcox, “Peter and the Rock: A Fresh Look at Matthew xvi. 17–19”, NTS 22, 1975–76, 73–88.
- (b). O. Betz, “Felsmann und Felsengemeinde (Eine Parallele zu Mt 16, 17–19 in den Qumranpsalmen)”, ZNW 48, 1957, 49–77; H. Clavier, petros kai petra, in Neutestamentliche Studien für Rudolf Bultmann, BZNW 21, 1954, 101 ff.; O. Cullmann, “Petrus, Werkzeug des Teufels und Werkzeug Gottes. Die Stellung von Mt. 16, 17–19 in der ältesten Überlieferung”, in Vorträge und Aufsätze, 1966, 202–13 (French version in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., op. cit., 94–105); G. Beer, Steinverehrung bei den Israeliten, 1921; E. Dinkler, "Petrus", *RGG*³ V 247 ff.; E. von Dobschütz, "Matthias als Rabbi und Katechet", ZNW 27, 1928, 338–48; J. Dupont, "La Révélation du Fils de Dieu en Faveur de Pierre (Mt 16, 17) et de Paul (Ga 1, 16)", RSR 52, 1964, 411–20; K. Galling, "Serubbabel und der Wiederaufbau des Tempels in Jerusalem", in Festschrift für W. Rudolph, 1961, 67–96; H. Gressmann, "Der Eckstein", Palästina-Jahrbuch 6, 1910, 38 ff.; E. Haenchen, "Petrus-Probleme", NTS 7, 1960–61, 187–97; H. W. Hertzberg, "Der heilige Fels und das Alte Testament", The Journal of the Palestine Oriental Society 11, 1931, 32 ff.; R. Hirzel, Die Strafe der Steinigung, (1909) 1967; J. Jeremias, "Der Eckstein", Angelos 1, 1925, 65 ff.; Golgotha, 1926; and Kephale gōnias – Akrogoniaios, ZNW 29, 1930, 264 ff.; H.-J. Kraus, Psalmen, BKAT 15/2, 1966³; W. G. Kümmel, "Jesus und die Anfänge der Kirche", StTh 7, 1953, 1–27 (reprinted in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, 1965, 289–309); H. Lehmann, "Du bist Petrus. . .", EvTh 13, 1953, 44 ff.; W. Marxsen, "Der Fels der Kirche", in Der "Frühkatholizismus" im Neuen Testament, BSt 21, 1958, 39–54; F. Obrist, Echtheitsfragen und Deutung der Primatstelle Mt. 16, 18 f. in der deutschen protestantischen Theologie der letzten dreissigen Jahre, NTAbh 21, 3/4, 1960 (with extensive bibliography); G. Sass, Der Fels der Kirche, 1957; K. T. Schäfer, "Zur Deutung von akrogoniaios Eph. 2, 20", in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze, Festschrift J. Schmid, 1963, 218 ff.; H. Schlier, Christus und die Kirche im Epheserbrief, BHTh 6, 1930, 47 ff.; G. Schulze-Kadelbach, "Die Stellung des Petrus in der Urchristenheit", TLZ 81, 1956, 1 ff.; A. Schwarzenbach, Die geographische Terminologie im Hebräischen des Alten Testaments, 1954, 118–22; G. Stählin, Skandalon, 1930, 187 ff.; A. Vögtle, "Messiasbekenntnis und Petrusverheissung: zur Komposition Mt 16, 13–23 Par.", in Das Evangelium und die Evangelien. Beiträge zur Evangelienforschung, 1971, 137–70; A. S. van der Woude, sur, THAT II 538–43.

On margaritēs and Precious Stones:

- (a). E. Burrows, "The Pearl in the Apocalypse", JTS 43, 1942, 177–9; G. R. Driver, "Jewels and Precious Stones", in *HDB*², 496–500; A. Farrer, A Rebirth of Images, 1949, 216–44; L. Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews, 1946–61, vol. 3; T. F. Glasson, "The Order of Jewels in Revelation XXI. 19–20: A Theory Eliminated", JTS ns 26, 1975, 95–100; J. S. Harris, "An Introduction to the Study of Personal Ornaments of Precious, Semi-Precious and Imitation Stones used throughout Biblical History", Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society 4, 1962–3, 49–83; and "The Stones of the High Priest's Breastplate", idem., 5, 1963–5, 40–62; E. F. Jourdain, "The Twelve Stones of the Apocalypse", Expt 22, 1910–11, 448–50; G. F. Kunz, The Curious Lore of Precious Stones, 1913; G. C. Morgan, The Parables and Metaphors of our Lord, 1943 (ch. 13).
- (b). H. Quiring, "Die Edelsteine im Amtsschild des jüdischen Hohenpriesters und die Herkunft ihrer Namen", Sudhoffs Archiv 39, 1954, 193–213.

Rule, Standard, Measure

κανών	κανών (kanōn), rule, standard, norm.
-------	---

CL & OT The Gk. word kanōn is a loan word from Semitic, where its original meaning was reed, cane, stalk of grain. kanōn, attested from Homer onwards, means anything that can be held against something else in order to stretch, roll up or measure it. The idea of measurement became predominant and from the 5th cent. B.C. kanōn meant above all a measuring line, measuring rod, balance arm, fixed rule, norm. In mathematics, astronomy and history kanōn means list or table; in art a guideline. Polyclitus' "Spearbearer" was called the kanōn by his contemporaries (Pliny, Natural History 34, 55). In philosophy kanōn denotes the criterion of judgment.

In this sense kanōn also occurs in 4 Macc. 7:21, while in Jud. 13:6 it stands for something like the supporting frame of a bed. In that almost unintelligible verse, Mic. 7:4, kanōn seems to be a meaningless and recent conjecture with no Heb. equivalent. For the thoughts expressed by kanōn the OT has neither terms nor understanding. The nearest Heb. is qānêh, reed.

NT 1. The word kanōn is rare in the NT; only Paul uses it. He employs it in the sense of norm or standard. kanōn is thus both the rule for the individual Christian's life and the standard by which to judge others. "Peace and mercy be upon all who walk by this rule, upon the Israel of God" (Gal. 6:16). With the phrase "by this rule [tō kanoni toutō]" Paul sums up all that he has previously said. kanōn is a rule of life, the content of which is the death of Christ on the cross, which gives a new relationship to God and with it a new basis for existence. The kanōn determines what is to be done, what is to be rejected and what is to be accepted; it establishes a new scale of values, which is distinguished from everything which is to be found outside the salvation given by Christ. It is a rule which is to be applied in the everyday conduct of life; the "new creation" (Gal. 6:15) corresponds to it. "Walking by this rule" means that the new being, shaped by Christ's saving work, manifests itself in the processes of thought and action. Whoever lives by the rule of Christ belongs to the "Israel of God".

2. kanōn occurs in some variant readings of Phil. 3:16 which in the RSV reads: "Only let us hold true to what we have attained." Here Paul speaks of being taken hold of by Christ, an experience which enables him to press towards the goal of his heavenly calling. These readings introduce the word kanōn in the same sense as in Gal. 3:16. It is the norm of conduct to which all have yielded with a common attitude. (On the variety of readings see Metzger, 615.)

3. kanōn is used three times in 2 Cor. 10:13–16: "But we will not boast beyond limit [ouk eis ta ametra], but will keep to the limits God has apportioned to us [alla kata to metron tou kanonos hou emerisen hēmin ho theos metrou], to reach even you. For we are not overextending ourselves, as though we did not reach you; we were the first to come all the way to you with the gospel of Christ. We do not boast beyond limit [ouk eis ta ametra], in other men's labours; but our hope is that as your faith increases, our field among you may be greatly enlarged [en hymin megalyntēnai kata ton kanona hēmōn eis perisseian], so that we may preach the gospel in lands beyond you, without boasting of work already done in another's field [en allotriō kanoni]." The RSV thus interprets kanōn in a geographical sense, i.e. the area of work measured out or allotted to Paul. But interpreters differ on this. In the opinion of the present writers kanōn stands for the rule that Paul is active wherever the gospel has not yet been proclaimed (cf. Rom. 15:20 f.). A. Schlatter says of v. 13 that, "The measure, metron, is measured by the measuring-rod, kanōn" (Paulus der Bote Jesu, 1962, 624). But C. K. Barrett rejects this and translates kanōn as "province": "If Paul is going to boast at all, he will do so not in terms of what he himself has done, but of what God has done through him in the evangelization of hitherto untouched territory" (The Second Epistle to the Corinthians, BNTC, 1973, 265). "The geographical reference here [i.e. in Rom. 15:23 f. which was probably written while Paul was in Corinth] confirms the view of measure and province (metron and kanōn) taken above against Käsemann . . . though he may well be right in thinking that it was Paul's adversaries who first employed these words; and they may have used them in a different way" (op. cit., 268; cf. E. Käsemann, "Die Legitimität des Apostels", ZNW 41, 1942, 56–61; reprinted as a separate work, 1956, 43–51).

J. Guhrt, H.-G. Link

4. In later church usage the term canon stands for the rule of faith and especially for the list of writings recognized by the church as documents of divine revelation.

The church took over the OT Scriptures of the LXX, but there is no clear evidence that those books were widely regarded as canonical which were not in the Heb. By the time of Jesus there was widespread agreement as to the content of the canon with regard to those books which we know as the OT. In the 2nd cent. A.D. Melito sent to Palestine to discover the content of the Heb. Bible, because it was assumed that this was the norm for the church.

After the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 an assembly of Jewish religious teachers was established at Jamnia, a city some 13 miles south of Joppa. This body was regarded to some extent as replacing the Sanhedrin. Among the questions discussed by the rabbis was the status of certain books like Est., Prov., Eccles., Cant. and Ezek. H. E. Ryle suggested that a particular synod held around A.D. 100 settled the extent of the Jewish canon (The Canon of the Old Testament, 1892). But although this view is widely assumed, there is no evidence to confirm it. The Roman Catholic church accepted among the canonical Scriptures the books included in the LXX, and this was confirmed by the Council of Trent (Session IV, 1546).

E. Käsemann has argued that it is not the NT canon that establishes the unity of the church but the different confessions ("The Canon of the New Testament and the Unity of the Church", in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 95–107). He holds that there was a variety of confessions in the early church and that we must not imprison God arbitrarily. On the other hand, it must be pointed out that the concept of the canon was not something that was ever formally pronounced upon by a general council of the church. Thus it would be wrong to say that the church has given us the canon of Scripture. Rather, it was a matter of recognizing which books the Spirit was speaking through. The earliest list of NT writings which corresponds exactly to the NT canon which we have today occurs in the 39th Festal Letter of Athanasius in A.D. 367 to guard the church against heretics and their writings. The reason why the Scriptures are distinguished from other writings is that they are "springs of salvation"; they are "god-inspired" (theopneustos; cf. 2 Tim. 3:16) in a way which other writings are not; and they have been handed down "by those who were eye-witnesses . . . of the word from the beginning." However, the authority of the four Gospels, Acts and the Pauline epistles was generally recognized early in the 2nd cent.

The earliest known canon of the NT was that of the heretic Marcion who was excommunicated c. A.D. 144. He excluded everything except ten Pauline epistles and the Gospel of Luke, the latter in a mutilated form. The church's canon was formulated in response to the appeal by heretical groups to secret books and tradition and the emergence of a large number of apocryphal works (cf. E. Hennecke and W. Schneemelcher, eds., New Testament Apocrypha, I–II, 1963–65; → Hide). The recognition of the authority of the canonical writings depended on whether they could be traced to an apostle or alternatively had some kind of apostolic backing. And this was coupled with the intrinsic authority of the books themselves in which the church heard God speaking. This recognition constituted an extension of the authority of the kērygma (→ Proclamation). But already in the NT itself Paul could "thank God constantly for this, that when you received the word of God which you heard from us, you accepted it not as the word of men but as what it really is, the word of God, which is at work in you believers" (1 Thess. 2:13). 2 Pet. 3:15 f. brackets the "letters" of Paul with "the other scriptures".

By the close of the 2nd cent. all the NT books were generally accepted, apart from James, 2 Pet., 2 and 3 Jn., Heb. and Rev. Sometimes the Shepherd of Hermas and the Didache were regarded as Scripture. The first decision on the subject of scripture by a church council was probably made at Laodicea in A.D. 363. A list similar to Athanasius's was confirmed by the Synod of Carthage (A.D. 397). It was through the influence of Jerome and Augustine that the western church was finally persuaded of the authority of some of the doubted books. C. Brown

μέτρον

μέτρον (metron), measure; ἀμετρος (ametros), without measure; μετρέω (metreō), take the dimensions of, measure, give out, deal out, apportion.

CL metron (Homer onwards) means a measure, as that with which one measures and that which is measured, a proportion, order, and measure in verse. In philosophy it is significant as the measure by which all things are measured (Protagoras, Frag. 1). Plato identifies the measure with God (Leg. 4, 716c; cf. also Plotinus, Enneads 1, 8, 3; 6, 8, 18; 5, 5, 4). The vb. metreō (also from Homer) means to measure, traverse, evaluate, judge.

OT metron stands chiefly for middâh. In theological contexts it is used of cultic measurements of the tabernacle and temple (especially Ezek. 40–48); weights and measures which stand under Yahweh's surveillance (Lev. 19:35; Deut. 25:14 f.; 2 Chr. 23:29; Prov. 25:14 f.; Amos 8:5); the measures of the world in connexion with creation (Job 11:9; 28:25; 38:5; Wis. 11:20); and in pronouncements of judgment and salvation (2 Ki. 21:13; Isa. 5:10; Ezek. 4:11, 16; Lam. 2:8; Ps. 80[79]:5; Zech. 1:16; 5:6 ff.). metreō is used for māḡad (e.g. Exod. 16:18).

NT In the NT the noun and the vb. are found particularly in contexts of judgment and the gift of grace allotted to believers.

1. Both the noun and the vb. occur in Matt. 7:2: "For with the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and the measure you give will be the measure you get" (cf. par. Mk. 4:24; Lk. 6:38). This is "not simply a recommendation to be moderate in judgment on others. The meaning is that, if you condemn, you exclude yourself from God's pardon" (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 146). The saying in the second half of the v. may be proverbial. The Mishnah tractate on the adulteress states: "With what measure a man metes it shall be measured to him again: she bedecked herself for transgression – the Almighty brought her to shame; she laid herself bare for transgression – the Almighty laid her bare; she began transgression with the thigh first and afterwards with the belly – therefore the thigh shall suffer first and afterward the belly; neither shall aught else of the body go free" (Sotah 1:7). It may be that Jesus was citing a common proverb to bring home a truth of judgment from which no man is exempt. Whereas the rabbis formulated criteria of judgment, Jesus drew the conclusion: "Judge not, that you be not judged" (Matt. 7:1). It is the reverse side of the exhortation to forgive (Matt. 6:14 ff.). And it is on a par with the other exhortations in the Sermon on the Mount to leave everything to God, whether it be rewards (Matt. 6:1 ff.), petitionary prayer (Matt. 6:7 ff.), or concerns for worldly needs and cares (Matt. 6:19–34). Lk. 6:38b contains the statement:

“For the measure you give will be the measure you get back.” In Lk. this follows exhortations not to judge and also to give.

In the context of condemnation for shedding the blood of the prophets, Jesus declares: “Fill up then the measure of your fathers” (Matt. 23:32). K. Stendahl sees in the v. a change to the style of the apocalyptic oracle (Peake’s Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley, 1962, 793). D. Hill sees here an allusion to the Jewish view that the final judgment will come only after men have reached the absolute nadir of sinfulness (op. cit., 314; cf. SB I 939 f.).

2. Jn. 3:34 states: “For he whom God has sent utters the words of God, for it is not by measure that he gives the Spirit.” Leon Morris notes three possible interpretations: (a) The Father gives the Spirit to the Son without measure, i.e. there is perfect communion between them, and no limit to the gift; (b) The Son gives the Spirit to believers without measure; (c) The Spirit does not give by measure, i.e. when the Spirit gives, he does so liberally (The Gospel according to John, NLC, 1971, 246). In the light of the first half of the v. the first of these interpretations best fits the context. Elsewhere John speaks of the Spirit as given by the Father (Jn. 14:26), but also by the Son (Jn. 15:26).

The noun metrētēs, meaning a liquid measure, occurs only in the account of the wedding at Cana, where each of the jars is said to contain between two and three measures apiece. This is estimated as equivalent to the Heb. bat which the RSV renders as “twenty or thirty gallons”.

3. metron occurs 4 times in Paul. In Rom. 12:3 Paul writes: “For by the grace given to me I bid every one among you not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think with sober judgment, each according to the measure of faith which God has assigned him.” C. E. B. Cranfield suggests that the phrase metron pisteōs means “‘a standard (by which to measure himself), namely (his) Christian faith’. But since the all-important thing in Christian faith is not the activity of the believer but the Object believed in, to say that the Christian is to measure himself and all things by his faith is really to say that he is to measure himself and all things by Jesus Christ. The metron pisteōs is really Jesus Christ himself as the Standard and Norm. For the Christian Jesus Christ himself – and he alone – is the true panōn chrēmātōn metron” (“metron pisteōs in Romans xii. 3”, NTS 8, 1961–62, 351).

In Eph. metron occurs in connexion with → gifts: “But grace was given to each according to the measure of Christ’s gift” (Eph. 4:7); “until we all attain to the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, to mature manhood, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ” (Eph. 4:13; → Age, Stature, Maturity, art. hēlikia NT 3); “from whom the whole body, joined together by every joint with which it is supplied, when each part is working properly [kat’ energeian en metrō henos hekastou merous], makes bodily growth and upbuilds itself in love” (Eph. 4:16 RSV). M. Barth sees the phrase as meaning “according to the needs of each single part”: “the church is not treated by her head as a collective of mutually exchangeable individuals who are as equal as drops in a bucket of water or grains of sand in a pile” (Ephesians, II, Anchor Bible, 1974, 449).

On metron in 2 Cor. 10:13 → kanōn NT 3. It takes up the use of the vb. in v. 12 in connexion with Paul’s opponent: “Not that we venture to class or compare ourselves with some of those who commend themselves. But when they measure themselves by one another, and compare themselves with one another, they are without understanding.” The action of these opponents contrasts with Jesus’ teaching on measuring. The adj. ametros, without measure, occurs also only in this passage (2 Cor. 10:13, 15).

4. Otherwise the noun and the vb. occur only in Rev. In Rev. 11:1 f. Jn. is given a measuring rod like a staff (kalamos homoios rhabdō) and is told: “Rise and measure the temple of God and the altar and those who worship there, but do not measure the court outside the temple; leave that out, for it is given over to the nations, and they will trample over the holy city for forty-two months.” The vision takes up the theme of Ezek. 40–48, where the measuring was with a view to the reconstruction of the new temple after the destruction of the old. Here the people are also measured. It symbolizes the separation of the church, the new temple of God, from the rest of the world, with the implied promise that God will preserve it. (See further G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation, New Century Bible, 1974, 181 f.) Rev. 21:15, 17 again take up the measuring in Ezek. in connexion with the dimensions of the new Jerusalem with its perfect proportions (→ Number, art. dōdeka). C. Brown → Book, → Revelation, → Scripture

(a). K. Aland, The Problem of the New Testament Canon, 1962; G. W. Anderson, “Canonical and Non-Canonical”, in P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans, eds, The Cambridge History of the Bible, I, 1970, 113–58; W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity, 1971; H. W. Beyer, kanōn, TDNT III 596–602; H. von Campenhausen, The Formation of the Christian Bible, 1972; C. E. B. Cranfield, “metron pisteōs in Romans xii. 3”, NTS 8, 1961–62, 345–51; R. M. Grant, The Formation of the New Testament, 1965; and “The New Testament Canon”, in P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans, eds., op. cit., 284–307; K. Deissner, metron etc., TDNT IV 632 ff.; E. Käsemann, “The Canon of the New Testament and the Unity of the Church”, in Essays on New Testament Themes, SBT 41, 95–107; A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966; S. Z. Leiman, The Canonization of Hebrew Scripture: The Talmudic and Midrashic Evidence, 1976; B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha, 1969³; H. M. Orlinsky, “The Canonization of the Bible and the Exclusion of the Apocrypha”, in Essays in Biblical Culture, 1974, 257–86; H. Ridderbos, “The Canon of the New Testament”, in C. F. H. Henry, ed., Revelation and the Bible: Contemporary Evangelical Thought, 1959, 187–202; H. E. Ryle, The Canon of the Old Testament, 1904²; J. A. Sanders, Torah and Canon, 1972; A. Souter, The Text and Canon of the New Testament, revised by C. S. C. Williams, 1954; E. J. Young, “The Canon of the Old Testament”, in C. F. H. Henry, ed., op. cit., 153–68.

(b). N. Appel, Kanon und Kirche, Konfessionskundliche und kontroverstheologische Studien 9, 1964; H. Braun, W. Andersen and W. Maurer, Die Verbindlichkeit des Kanons, Fuldaer Hefte 12, 1960; E. Fuchs, “Kanon und Kerygma”, ZTK 63, 1966, 410 ff.; S. Greidanus, Bizondere Canoniek van de Boeken van het Nieuwe Testament, I–II, 1947–49; O. Joest, “Erwägungen zur kanonischen Bedeutung des Neuen Testaments”, KuD 12, 1966, 27 ff.; E. Käsemann, ed., Das Neue Testament als Kanon. Dokumentation und kritische Analyse zur gegenwärtigen Diskussion, 1970; W. G. Kümmel, “Notwendigkeit und Grenze des neutestamentlichen Kanons”, ZTK 47, 1950, 277–313 (reprinted in Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte. Gesammelte Aufsätze 1933–1964, 1965, 230–59); W. Marxsen, “Das Problem des Kanons aus der Sicht des Exegeten”, Neue Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie 2, 1960, 137 ff.; H. Oppel, KANON. Zur Bedeutungsgeschichte des Wortes und seiner lateinischen Entsprechungen, Philologus, Suppl. Band 30, Heft 4, 1937.

S

Sabbath, Lord's Day

σάββατον

σάββατον (sabbaton), sabbath, the seventh day of the week in the Jewish calendar which was set aside as a day of rest and for worship of Yahweh; παρασκευή (paraskeuē), preparation, the day of preparation.

OT 1. Origin of the Term. The Gk. sabbaton transliterates the Heb. šabbāṭ. It is found in the sing. and also the plur. (sabbata) for a single sabbath day. The derivation of the Heb. word is still uncertain. Etymologically the most likely explanation still seems to be that it is derived from the vb. šāḇaṭ, to cease, to pause. This is the explanation implied in Gen. 2:2 f.: "And on the seventh day God finished his work which he had done, and he rested [wayišbōṭ] on the seventh day from all his work which he had done. So God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, because on it God rested [šāḇaṭ] from all his work which he had done in creation" (cf. Exod. 20:8–11). Attempts to derive the observance of the OT sabbath from Babylonian, Canaanite (F. Delitzsch, Babel and Bible, 1903, 40 f.) or Kenite sources (H. H. Rowley, "Moses and the Decalogue", BJRL 34, 1951–52, 81–118; reprinted in Men of God: Studies in Old Testament History and Prophecy, 1963, 1–36), have not proved fruitful. There does not seem to be any difference in meaning between the sing. and plur. forms of the Gk. equivalent in the LXX.

2. The Sabbath in the OT. The sabbath is mentioned in all parts of the law and in the conjectured source strata (Exod. 34:21[J]; 23:12[E]; 31:12–17; 35:1–3[P]; Lev. 23:1–3[H]). No other commandment is so strongly emphasized as this, showing what great importance it held in Israel's history and carrying the death penalty for its infringement (Exod. 31:14; cf. 35:3; Num. 15:32–36). The rite of → circumcision was performed on the sabbath if it fell on the eighth day after the boy's birth (Lev. 12:3; cf. Jn. 7:22). It is not necessary to insist, as some have, that its origin lay in a settled agricultural community; it would be equally possible for it to have been practised among a nomadic people (E. Lohse, sabbaton etc., TDNT VIII 3). It may well go back to a pre-Mosaic period (H. H. Rowley, Men of God, 27–32), and have been known to the Hebrews when they were in Egypt or even earlier (B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel, SBT 37, 1962, 52).

Sabbath observance is strongly emphasized in both versions of the Decalogue, though in a slightly different form and with a different reason suggested. "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days you shall labour, and do all your work; but the seventh day is a sabbath to the LORD your God; in it you shall not do any work, you, or your son, or your daughter, your manservant, or your maidservant, or your cattle, or the sojourner who is within your gates; for in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day; therefore the LORD blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it” (Exod. 20:8–11). “Observe the sabbath day, to keep it holy, as the LORD your God commanded you. Six days you shall labour, and do all your work; but the seventh day is a sabbath to the LORD your God; in it you shall not do any work, you, or your son, or your daughter, or your manservant, or your maidservant, or your ox, or your ass, or any of your cattle, or the sojourner who is within your gates, that your manservant and your maidservant may rest as well as you. You shall remember that you were a servant in the land of Egypt, and the LORD your God brought you out thence with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; therefore the LORD your God commanded you to keep the sabbath day” (Deut. 5:12–15). Thus the Exod. form is linked with creation and the Deut. form with redemption from bondage in → Egypt. In both cases it is for the benefit of man and for calling to mind the fact that man owes everything to God who provides for all his needs. The sabbath is included in the so-called cultic Decalogue: “Six days you shall work, but on the seventh you shall rest; in ploughing time and in harvest you shall rest” (Exod. 34:21).

The emphasis on the aspect of rest from labour in both forms of the Decalogue and in Exod. 34:21 shows that its main purpose was the cessation of ordinary work for one day in seven. In the Exodus form of the Decalogue this is based on the claim that in creation God rested on the seventh day from his activity. Because of this he blessed the day and set it apart as holy. The same view is taken in the account of the creation in Gen. 1:1–2:3. Here, though the noun “sabbath” is not used, the vb. šābaṭ occurs together with the exact words used in the commandment: “God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it.” As the creation story in Gen. 1 centres on the creation of man on the sixth day, the author evidently intends the inauguration of the sabbath to be seen as the climax of the creation process as it applied to the man who had been formed (B. S. Childs, Exodus, 1974, 416). As Eichrodt has pointed out, this shows that the day was regarded as a source of blessing of universal significance and not merely for Israel, and as being coeval with the human race (W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 133).

The day then was looked on as a cessation from labour, a pause, a rest, but this with a view to its being dedicated to God, an opportunity for getting to know God and for worshipping him.

Most writers have claimed that a different reason is given for its observance in the Deuteronomic decalogue, emphasizing the strongly humanitarian aspect, which elsewhere marks Deuteronomy. Certainly the command includes the slave and the stranger, as Exod. 20:10 does. It underlines the fact by the comment, “that your manservant and your maidservant may rest as well as you.” But the primary reason for the commandment is given in the next verse; and as B. S. Childs rightly points out, it is basically theological (Exodus, 417). God’s people had been slaves in Egypt, but God mightily delivered them. The sabbath was to be kept holy, because Israel was a redeemed people. The Deuteronomic version then includes a second reason for its observance. Creation and redemption are both motives for its observance, the one for all men, the other especially for Israel.

This second aspect appears also in the law under another form. In Exod. 31:17 the sabbath is looked at as a sign between God and Israel. As B. S. Childs points out,

“the sabbath as a sign is a reminder both to God and Israel of the eternal covenant relationship which was the ultimate purpose of creation” (Exodus, 416).

In Lev. 23:1–3 the sabbath is included in the → feasts of the Lord. The feasts were commemorations, days set apart so that Israel might spend time in meditation on different aspects of God’s good hand over the nation. Included in their observance were “holy convocations”, public acts of worship. Both for the individual and for the community the sabbath then was to be a day of public worship as well as an opportunity for a joyful observance of the day in the home. This was so in pre-exilic times (Hos. 2:11; Amos 8:5; Isa. 1:13). It was a suitable time for consulting a prophet (2 Ki. 4:23).

On the sabbath special sacrifices were to be offered (Num. 28:9), and with them the renewal of the → Bread of the Presence (Lev. 24:8); thus linking the sabbath with the official ritual of tabernacle and temple. It seems that special Psalms were appointed (cf. the title of Ps. 92).

The insistence on the laying aside of work, even in the busiest times of ploughing and harvest (Exod. 34:21), and the infliction of the death penalty for its breach (Num. 15:32; Exod. 31:14), show the supreme importance attached to this command in the life of Israel.

Yet it was to be looked at, not as a burden, but as a joyful feast, a delight, “holy to the LORD” (Isa. 58:23). Special blessings were attached to its observance (Isa. 56:2).

After the exile, in the disordered state of the nation, it is natural to find that it is emphasized strongly in Nehemiah’s reforms (Neh. 10:32; 13:15–22).

To summarize, the OT attitude to the sabbath was to regard it as a divine ordinance which was universal, but especially relevant to Israel as a redeemed people. Negatively it was observed by a cessation of labour; positively it was a feast of the Lord, an opportunity to concentrate in private and in public on the things of God. Its atmosphere was to be that of a joyful festival; its observance to be taken very seriously by all.

3. The Sabbath in the Intertestamental Period. During this period Judaism gradually began to divide into two types. In Palestine itself and in Mesopotamia a more rigid and legal attitude emerged; while in other parts of the diaspora a more liberal attitude prevailed. Both sections insisted on the observance of the sabbath as a divine institution and, with → circumcision, as one of the signs of the → covenant. Synagogue worship on the sabbath was a regular feature of both types (S B IV, 1, 153–88).

In Hellenistic circles a more mystical and spiritual attitude to the sabbath emerged. Philo insisted that it was not meant for argia, emptiness, but should be dedicated to the study of the spiritual (Decal., 100). On that day the slave became a free man. With the translation of the OT into Greek, while the word itself was transliterated, anapausis (rest) was given as its meaning (Josephus, Ant. 1, 33; Philo, De Cherubim, 87).

Palestinian Judaism tended towards a more literal and rigid attitude. In order to safeguard its observance, a “hedge” came to be set round the commandment. Traditions of how it was to be observed began to crystallize. To protect it from loose Gentile influences, a stereotyped code of what could or could not be done on the sabbath came into existence. Jub. 2:17–33 is the earliest record. Much the same occurs in the Damascus Document (CD). Even the rescue of an animal from death on the sabbath was forbidden (CD 10:14–11:18). The traditions, later incorporated into the Mishnah, became codified. The first tractate of the second division of the Mishnah is devoted to the Sabbath. In Shabbath 7:2 the main classes of work forbidden on the sabbath are given as “forty save one”. However, under certain circumstances, the sabbath law could be superseded. These included the service of the priests in the temple, the saving of life in emergency and circumcision on the eighth day.

Yet in spite of these burdensome regulations the sabbath was welcomed with joy. It was to be celebrated at home as rest and refreshment and corporately in public worship (Shabbath 119a). On the day before, the Preparation, everything was to be got ready and the lamps lit as the sabbath commenced at sunset. A meal extra to the normal two was added and the best clothes worn (Shabbath 16:2). Guests would be invited (cf. Mk. 14:3). Half the day was to be spent in eating and drinking and half in instruction in the things of God (Babylonian Talmud Pesahim 68).

The noun paraskeuē, which is found in secular Gk. from Hdt. onwards, means preparation, but in Christian literature it is used only of the day of preparation for a festival or sabbath. According to Jewish usage, it was the Friday on which everything had to be prepared for the sabbath (Josephus, Ant. 16, 163; Synesius, Epistola 4, p. 161D; cf. Matt. 27:62; Mk. 15:42; Lk. 23:54; Jn. 19:31, 42). In the Didache it is regarded as a fast day, marking the death of Jesus (Did. 8:1).

NT 1. The Gospels. The Palestinian attitude to sabbath observance is in evidence in the Gospels. Christ's conflicts with the Jews, mentioned in all four Gospels, centre on the question of what was or was not permissible on the sabbath. In each case Jesus or his disciples are challenged over this. In all but one of these it is a question of healing on the sabbath day. The other occasion is when the disciples plucked the ears of corn as they passed through the field.

R. Bultmann has suggested that the sayings attributed to Jesus on some, if not all, these occasions are in fact the thoughts of the early church as it grappled with the problems of the situation in which it found itself (Jesus and the Word, 1958, 14). But it seems most unlikely that in this case, in the process of abandoning the seventh day sabbath observance, it would have put into Jesus' mouth words which make no decisive pronouncement. Is it not much more likely that, particularly in Luke, there would have been an outright condemnation of Jewish sabbath observance, if this were the case? It may well be that the authors of the Gospels, in selecting their material, did have the immediate problems of the church in view, but unlikely that their choice was limited to this. It seems reasonable then to take the words of Jesus in these controversies as authentic.

Taking the six recorded confrontations with the Jews over the sabbath question, the replies of Jesus will offer some clues as to whether he was in fact abrogating a day of rest or merely challenging the restrictions which in their traditions the rabbis had imposed.

(a) Mk. 2:23–26; Matt. 12:1–8; Lk. 6:1–5. These par. accounts relate the incident of the plucking of the ears of corn on the sabbath day. According to the → Pharisees, this was breaking the law. In Matt.'s account the reason given is that the disciples were hungry. This is not mentioned in Mark, though the answer seems to assume it. Jesus claims that, as in the case of → David and his men (1 Sam. 21:1–6; cf. 2 Sam. 8:17; Deut. 23:25), human need overrides the ritual law, in this case the sabbath law (cf. Exod. 23:12; Deut. 5:4). The law itself is not challenged, but Jesus claims an overriding factor.

(b) Mk. 3:1–6; Matt. 12:9–14; Lk. 6:6–11. These passages describe the healing of the man with the withered hand. In this case, before healing him, Jesus asks the Jewish leaders whether it is lawful on the sabbath day, “to do good or to do harm, to save life or to kill?” Again there is no challenge to the law itself; in fact the wording assumes its relevance. The right use of the law, the salvation, the making whole of man, is the great object behind that law and therefore the healing is justified.

(c) Lk. 13:10–17 relates the story of a woman bowed down with infirmity. She came into the synagogue and Jesus restored her. This roused the anger of the ruler of the synagogue. Jesus’ reply includes two points. What he had done was an act of mercy such as they themselves would have allowed to an animal. It was also the destruction of a work of → Satan. There is no hint that the principle of a day of rest was being questioned, but merely the right use of the day.

(d) Lk. 14:1–6. In this case Jesus again opens the discussion by asking the Pharisees whether it is right to heal on the sabbath day or not. To this they offered no reply. This is a particularly important incident, as the question was addressed to those who were expert in the law (nomikous). Jesus proceeded to heal the man and then explained that healing the sick is in fact just as much an act of mercy as the pulling out of an animal from a well. The fact that the experts could offer no reply suggests that they agreed that Jesus was not challenging the sabbath law.

(e) Jn. 5:1–9, 16, 17; 7:22. Here the man who had been infirm for thirty-eight years was healed by Jesus on the sabbath day and told to take up his bed and walk, possibly a part of the complete healing. The Jews persecuted Jesus. He replied, “My Father is working up till now and I am working.” In other words, he is continuing, in the healing, the work that the Father has all the while been doing. The Jews then plotted to kill him, because he was breaking the sabbath and making himself equal to → God. Some commentators take this as being the view of the author that Jesus was in fact annulling the sabbath (E. Lohse, TDNT VII 27); but it seems best, after what has been said in the other controversies, to take it that it was the view of his accusers. This is confirmed by the words in Jn. 7:22, where Jesus explains that the law of circumcision overrides the law of the sabbath. Had he been annulling the sabbath law, he would hardly have argued in this way, and again the words “until now [heōs arti]” suggest that, all the while that the sabbath command was in force, God was in fact working. In other words, the sabbath command does not mean doing nothing (argia), but the doing of the work of God. This was in fact what Christ had been doing in the healing of the infirm man.

(f) Jn. 9. In the case of the man born → blind, no words are spoken by Christ to defend his action, but in the answer to the disciples’ question in v. 2, Christ claims the sabbath healing was “that the works of God might be made manifest.”

(g) In addition to these incidents there is the reference in Lk. 4:16 to Jesus’ attendance at the synagogue “as was his custom”. The natural meaning of this expression is that Jesus followed the ordinary habits of Jewish worship on the sabbath day. This certainly had been the pattern of his boyhood (Lk. 2:22, 41). It may be significant that, at his trial before the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:57–68 par. Mk. 14:53–65; Lk. 22:54–71; Jn. 18:13–24), while the accusation of destroying the temple is included, there is no mention of an annulling of the sabbath law.

(h) In Matt. 24:20, Christ's followers are told to pray that in the coming destruction of Jerusalem their flight should not occur in the winter or on the sabbath day. This need not imply that Christ foresaw his followers continuing to observe the sabbath, but merely that it would be impossible to get help or buy what was needed in the emergency on a sabbath day in the vicinity of Jerusalem.

We may conclude then, that though Jesus broke through the rabbinic traditions about the sabbath, there was no annulling of the observance of the day.

(i) Turning now to Mk. 2:27, there is a positive statement of Christ's about the sabbath. Here its institution is stated to have been made for man's good and it would seem that there is at least an indirect reference to the account in Gen. 2:1, 2 (J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology, I, 1971, 208). It would then imply that the ordinance was not merely for Israel, but had a pre-Israelite, worldwide, humanitarian, implication. This is followed by the claim, mentioned in the other two Gospels, that Jesus was "Lord of the sabbath". In other words, he has the authority to decide about its observance. Far from suggesting that, though a benefit to man, it was to be annulled, it would suggest that the manner of its observance was under the control of Christ himself.

The paraskeuē, lit. preparation, i.e. day of preparation, is mentioned only in the Gospels in connexion with chronology (Matt. 27:62; Mk. 15:42; Lk. 23:54; Jn. 19:14, 31, 42). The corresponding vb. paraskeuazō which has the general meaning of to prepare occurs in Acts 10:10; 1 Cor. 14:8; 2 Cor. 9:2 f.

2. The Acts of the Apostles. Turning to the Acts of the Apostles, we find that in the decrees of the Jerusalem Council in ch. 15 no mention is made of the sabbath. This would imply that it was not a point of disagreement between Jewish and Gentile Christians. Paul on his missionary journeys seized the opportunity to preach as occasion arose in the synagogues on the sabbath day and this was his custom (Acts 13:5, 14, 44; 14:1; 16:13; 17:2, 17; 18:4; 19:8). Yet we find him meeting with the Christians on the → first day of the week, although he was at Troas for seven days (Acts 20:7; cf. 1 Cor. 16:2; → kyriakē).

3. The Epistles. There are three significant passages in the Epistles of Paul, where the Christian attitude to the sabbath is dealt with.

(a) Rom. 14:5 f. There is no direct reference here to the sabbath, but the passage touches on this theme. It deals with the weak Christian, one who still is influenced by the letter of the law. In the case of days, instead of thinking of one day as being specially sacred, the strong Christian considers all days as God's days. All days are to be lived to God. No day in itself has any special sanctity.

(b) Gal. 4:10. Paul is addressing Gentile converts who now, after their conversion, are turning to a scrupulous observance ("you observe [paratēreisthe!"]) of Jewish ritual, special days, new moons, feasts and the yearly observances enjoined in the Levitical regulations. They are taking on themselves the Jewish law. Paul will not countenance a reversal to Jewish practices for Gentile Christians.

(c) Col. 2:16. Here Paul argues that the Jewish law (the legal demands) were cancelled in the death of Christ (v. 14), and therefore the Jewish food regulations and religious calendar are not binding on the Christian. Included in this ritual was the Jewish sabbath observance. These observances, Paul claims, pointed to a spiritual reality fulfilled in Christ.

(d) There remains one other passage bearing on the sabbath. This is Heb. 4:9;

“there remains a keeping of sabbath [sabbatismos] to the people of God.” Here the rest typified by the sabbath is seen as the rest of heart, provided in Christ (cf. Matt. 11:28) to be realized partially now and fully in the life to come.

4. Theological Insights. As the rest of God after creation did not exclude the idea of the sabbath day each week, but included it, may it not well be that the rest of heart remaining to the people of God still includes the foretaste of the final rest in the weekly rest day? Or are we to take it that in this spiritual conception of a sabbath rest to the people of God, clearly not limited to one day, the practical observance of a day of rest and worship has been annulled? We have seen that the sabbath concept includes both a national aspect as part of the covenant relationship with the Jews, and a universal aspect as a spiritual and humanitarian benefit for mankind as a whole. The end of the sabbath, as a sign of the covenant with Israel, does not necessarily involve the abolition of the concept of a weekly day of rest. From Christ’s words in Mk. 2:27 it would seem that such an outward enjoyment of a sabbath rest was an integral part of the inward heart rest, of which the sabbath under the old covenant had been a shadow. The fact that before the close of the NT an analogous day for Christians, the Lord’s Day, had already come into being suggests that this is the right solution of the problem.

W. Rordorf has suggested that Christians did not look upon the Christian Sunday as a day of rest, the sabbath ideal, until the decree of Constantine in A.D. 321 (Sunday: The History of the Day of Rest and Worship in the Earliest Centuries of the Christian Church, 1962). Until that time they had made use of the first day as a day on which they worshipped, without considering it a day of rest. Apart from the unlikely suggestion that a pagan emperor would order a day of rest which had never been practised before, and that day not the Jewish sabbath, there is evidence against this view in pre-Constantine patristic texts. (For detailed discussion see W. Stott, The Theology of the Christian Sunday in the Early Church, Dissertation, Oxford, 1966.)

W. Stott

κυριακή

κυριακή (kyriakē), the Lord’s (day).

OT 1. The Origin of the Word kyriakē in Secular Literature and in the NT. kyriakē, belonging to the Lord, is an adj. derived from kyrios, → Lord. It is doubtful if the word was used in LXX. In 2 Macc. 15:36 it is more probable that Syriakē is the right reading. It occurs in inscriptions and papyri from 68 B.C. with the meaning of belonging to, or connected with the lord, the proprietor, and officially of the emperor.

It is used only once in the NT besides the reference in Rev. 1:10. This is in 1 Cor. 11:20 kyriakon deipnon, the → Lord’s Supper. Here it would mean “the supper instituted by the Lord” or “belonging to the Lord”. In patristic writings it is used of “the words” of Christ, the covenants, the people, the house, the cross, but most commonly of the Lord’s Day.

2. Its Use in Rev. 1:10. While it has been claimed that it refers to the last day, or even to Easter, it seems certain that the expression is the name which had come to be given to the first day of the week. From Ignatius (Mag. 9:1) onwards this is its meaning in patristic writers (cf. W. Stott, "A Note on the Word KYRIAKĒ in Rev. 1:10", NTS 12, 1965–66, 70–75).

It may be taken for granted that the adj., rather than the genitive of the noun, was used to differentiate it from "the day of the Lord" (2 Thess. 2:2). In the versions it is translated by an adj. and not a genitive. But as the word had already been attached to the supper in Pauline literature, and there it hinted at a special connexion with Christ in its institution, it may well carry something of this meaning as it is used here in Rev. 1:10.

3. The Theological Deductions. If, as we have suggested, "the Lord's Day" referred to the Christian Sunday, the first day of the week, in order to see its theological significance it will be necessary to examine other passages which refer to the first day of the week. The earliest reference is in 1 Cor. 16:2, where Paul asks the Corinthian Christians to lay something aside on each first day of the week. It seems unlikely that this was a pay-day and more likely that, while the laying aside was at home, the day's connexion with Christian worship would make it easy to remember this duty. This suggests that the first day was becoming the regular day of worship. In Acts 20:7 also we find Paul meeting with the Christians at Troas to break bread, probably the Eucharist, on the first day of the week, although he was with them for seven days. By the time of the Didache this was certainly the regular day of worship for the church. The strong emphasis on the first day of the week, as the day on which Christ rose from the dead in all four Gospels, suggests that the theological reason for the change from the seventh to the first day was the resurrection of our Lord (Matt. 28:1; Mk. 16:2, 9; Lk. 24:1; Jn. 20:1).

From what we have seen of the institution of the sabbath in the OT with its humanitarian and spiritual advantages, of Christ's insistence that it was made for man, of Paul's insistence that no day in itself has any special sacredness, nor are we to be involved in the Jewish ritual calendar, we may fairly assume that the Christian church was guided by the Holy Spirit to attach the same privileges and blessings of one sacred day of rest in seven to the new Lord's Day. This was the day on which Christ in his resurrection was revealed as Lord, and the day would be celebrated with this thought in view.

W. Stott

→ Present, → Redemption (for sabbatical year), → Time, → Work

- (a). N.-E. A. Andreasen, The Old Testament Sabbath: A Tradition-Historical Investigation. Society for Biblical Literature Dissertation Series, 7, 1972; J. N. Andrews, History of the Sabbath and First Day of the Week, I–II, 1876; N. A. Barak, A History of the Sabbath, 1965; A. Barry, "Lord's Day", Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, II, 1880, 1042–53; K. Barth, CD, III, 4, 47–72; J. B. Bauer, "Lord's Day", EBT II 513–18; R. T. Beckwith and W. Stott, This is the Day: The Biblical Doctrine of the Christian Sunday in its Jewish and Early Church Setting, 1977; E. J. Bickerman, Chronology of the Ancient World, 1968; J. Brown, "Karl Barth's Doctrine of the Sabbath", SJT 19, 1966, 409–25; K. Budde, "The Sabbath and the Week", JTS 30, 1929, 1–15; W. W. Cannon, "The Weekly Sabbath", ZAW 49, 1931, 325 ff.; F. H. Colson, The Week, 1926; P. Cotton, From Sabbath to Sunday: A Study in Early Christianity, 1933; R. Cox, The Literature on the Sabbath Question, I–II, 1865; J. Daniélou, The Bible and the Liturgy, 1960, 222–86; D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 67–71; A. Deissmann, "Lord's Day", EB III 2813–16; G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, 1945, 303–83; S. R. Driver, "Sabbath", HDB IV 317–23; C. W. Dugmore, The Influence of the Synagogue upon the Divine Office, 1944; and "The Lord's Day and Easter", in Neotestamentica et Patristica in Honorem Sexagenarii O. Cullmann, 1962, 272–81; M. G. Glazebrook, "Lord's Day", ERE XII 103–11; J. van Goudoever, Biblical Calendars, 1961², 164–73; R. M. Grant, "The Decalogue in Early Christianity", HTR 40, 1947, 1 ff.; M. Greenberg et al., "Sabbath", Encyclopaedia Judaica, XIV, 1971,

557–72; C. B. Haynes, From Sabbath to Sunday, 1928; A. J. Heschel, The Sabbath: Its Meaning for Modern Man, 1951; J. A. Hesse, Sunday, its Origin, History and Present Obligation, 1860; E. Hilgert, “Jubilees and the Origin of Sunday”, Andrews University Seminary Studies 1, 1963, 44–51; E. G. Hirsch et al., “Sabbath, Sabbatical Year and Jubilee”, Jewish Encyclopedia, X, 1905, 587–608; W. Hodgkins, Sunday: Christian and Social Significance, 1960; S. T. Kimbrough, Jr., “The Concept of Sabbath at Qumran”, Revue de Qumrân 5, 1966, 483–502; W. Kornfeld, “Sabbath”, EBT III 797–800; E. G. Kraeling, “The Present Status of the Sabbath Question”, American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 49, 1932, 218–28; R. A. Kraft, “Some Notes on Sabbath Observance in Early Christianity”, Andrews University Seminary Studies 3, 1965, 18–33; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Ancient Israel, 1966, 76–88; F. Landsberger, “Ritual Implements for the Sabbath”, Hebrew Union College Annual 27, 1956, 387–415; S. Langdon, Babylonian Menologies and the Semitic Calendars, 1935; J. Z. Lauterbach, Rabbinic Essays, 1951, 437–72; J. W. Leitch, “Lord also of the Sabbath”, SJT 19, 1966, 426–33; E. Levine, “The Sabbath Controversy according to Matthew”, NTS 22, 1975–76, 480–83; J. and H. Lewy, “The Origin of the Week and the Oldest West Asiatic Calendar”, Hebrew Union College Annual 17, 1942–43, 1–152; E. Lohse, sabbaton, sabbatismos, paraskeuē, TDNT VII 1–35; A. A. McArthur, The Evolution of the Christian Year, 1953, 13–29; S. V. McCasland, “The Origin of the Lord’s Day”, JBL 49, 1930, 65–82; L. L. McReavy, “The Sunday Repose from Labour”, Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 12, 1935, 291–323; A. E. Millgram, Sabbath: The Day of Delight, 1944; G. F. Moore, Judaism, II, 31–39; J. Morgenstern, “Sabbath”, IDB IV 135–41; R. North, “The Derivation of Sabbath”, Biblica 36, 1955, 182–201; R. L. Odom, Sunday in Roman Paganism, 1944; H. B. Porter, The Day of Light: The Biblical and Liturgical Meaning of Sunday, Studies in Ministry and Worship 16, 1960; G. von Rad, “There Remains Still a Rest for the People of God: An Investigation of a Biblical Conception”, in The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays, 1965, 94–102; F. A. Regan, Dies Dominica and Dies Solis: The Beginnings of the Lord’s Day in Christian Antiquity, (Dissertation, Washington) 1961; H. Riesenfeld, “The Sabbath and the Lord’s Day in Judaism, the Preaching of Jesus and Early Christianity”, in The Gospel Tradition, 1970, 111–38; W. Rordorf, Sunday: The History of the Day of Rest and Worship in the Earliest Centuries of the Christian Church, 1968; H. H. Rowley, “Moses and the Decalogue”, BJRL 34, 1951–52, 81–118 (reprinted in Men of God: Studies in Old Testament History and Prophecy, 1963, 1–36); B. E. Shafer, “Sabbath”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 760 ff.; W. Stott, “A Note on the Word KYRIAKĒ in Rev. i. 10”, NTS 12, 1965–66, 70–75; and The Theology of the Christian Sunday in the Early Church, (Dissertation, Oxford) 1966; K. A. Strand, “Another Look at ‘Lord’s Day’ in the Early Church and in Rev. i. 10”, NTS 13, 1966–67, 174–81; W. E. Straw, Origin of Sunday Observance in the Christian Church, 1940; S. Talmon, “The Calendar Reckoning of the Sect from the Judean Desert”, Scripta Hierosolymitana 4, 1958, 162–99; W. B. Trevelyan, Sunday, The Oxford Library of Practical Theology, 1902; M. Tsevat, “The Basic Meaning of the Biblical Sabbath”, ZAW 84, 1972, 447–59; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 475–83; G. H. Waterman, “Sabbath”, ZPEB V 181–89; N. J. D. White, “Lord’s Day”, HDB III 138–41; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament, 1974, 135–42; G. Yamashiro, A Study of the Hebrew Word Sabbath in Biblical and Talmudic Literatures, (Dissertation, Harvard) 1955; F. H. Yost, The Early Christian Sabbath, 1947. (b) J. Bauer, “Vom Sabbat zum Sonntag”, BuL 23, 1955–56, 106–10; J. Beckmann, “Der Sonntag in der Geschichte der Kirche”, in Verlorener Sonntag? Kirche im Volk 22, 37–60; G. Beer, Sabbath, 1908; and “Sabbat”, Pauly-Wissowa Ia, 1920, 1551–57; J. Boehmer, Der christliche Sonntag nach Ursprung und Geschichte, 1931; F. Bohn, Der Schabbat im Alten Testament und im altjüdischen religiösen Aberglauben, 1903; B. Botte, “Les Dénominations du Dimanche dans la Tradition Chrétienne”, Le Dimanche. Lex Orandi 39, 1965, 7–18; G. J. Botterweck, “Der Sabbat im Alten Testament”, ThQ 134, 1954, 134–47; K. Budde, “Antwort auf J. Meinholds ‘Zur Sabbathfrage’”, ZAW 48, 1930, 138–45; C. Callewaert, “La Syntaxe eucharistique à Jérusalem, Berceau du Dimanche”, Ephemerides Theologicae Lovanienses 15, 1938, 34–73; H. Chirat, “Le Dimanche dans l’Antiquité Chrétienne”, Etudes de Pastorale Liturgique, 1944, 127–48; Y.-M. Congar, “La Théologie du Dimanche”, Le Jour du Seigneur (Papers read at the Liturgical Congress, Lyons, 1947), 1948, 131–80; D. Correns, Die Mischna Schebit (vom Sabbatjahr), (Dissertation, Göttingen) 1954; O. Cullmann, “Sabbat und Sonntag nach dem Johannesevangelium. Heōs arti (Joh. 5, 17)”, in Memoriam E. Lohmeyer, 1951, 127–31; J. Daniélou, “La Doctrine Patristique du Dimanche”, in Le Jour du Seigneur (papers read at the Liturgical Congress in Lyons, September 1947), 1948, 105–30; and “La Typologie millénariste de la Semaine dans le Christianisme primitif”, Vigiliae Christianae 2, 1948, 1–16; F. J. Dölger, “Die Planetenwoche der griechisch-römischen Antike und der christliche Sonntag”, Antike und Christentum

6, 1941, 202–38; E. Dublanchy, “Dimanche”, Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique, IV, 1, 1911, 1308–48; H. Dumaine, “Dimanche”, Dictionnaire d’Archéologie et de Liturgie, IV, 1921, 858–994; and Le Dimanche Chrétien, ses Origines, ses Principaux Caractères, 1922; B. D. Eerdmans, “Der Sabbath”, Vom Alten Testament, Festschrift K. Marti, 1925, 79–83; I. Ellbogen, “Eingang und Ausgang des Sabbats nach talmudischen Quellen”, Festschrift zu I. Lewys 70. Geburtstag, 1911, 173–87; and Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1931³, 107–22; H.-M. Fêret, “Les Sources Bibliques”, Le Jour du Seigneur, 1948, 39–104; G. Förster, “Die christliche Sonntagsfeier bis auf Konstantin den Grossen”, Deutsche Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht 16, 1906, 100–13; “Römisch-rechtliche Grundlagen der Sonntagsruhe”, Deutsche Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht 20, 1910–11, 211–71; “Alttestamentliche Grundlagen der Sonntagsfeier. Der Sabbath”, ibid. 21, 1911–12, 349–85; J. Froger, “Histoire du Dimanche”, Le Huitième Jour. Vie Spirituelle 76, 1947, 502–22; M. Goguel, “Notes d’Histoire Évangélique. Appendix I: Le Dimanche et la Résurrection au troisième Jour”, RHR 74, 1916, 29 ff.; E. Haupt, Der Sonntag und die Bibel, 1878; J. Hehn, Siebenzahl und Sabbat bei den Babyloniern und im Alten Testament, Leipziger Semitische Studien 2, 5, 1907; and “Zur Sabbatfrage”, BZ 14, 1917, 198–213; E. W. Hengstenberg, Über den Tag des Herrn, 1852; O. Henke, “Zur Geschichte der Lehre von der Sonntagsfeier”, Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 5, 1894, 727–60; E. Hertzsch, “Sonntag”, *RGG*³ VI 140 ff.; J.-P. Hild, “Jour d’Espérance et d’Attente”, Le Huitième Jour. Vie Spirituelle 76, 1947, 592–603; “La Mystique du Dimanche”, Dimanche et Célébration Chrétienne. La Maison-Dieu 9, 1947, 7–37; and Dimanche et Vie Pastorale, 1949; H. Huber, Geist und Buchstabe der Sonntagsruhe. Eine historisch-theologische Untersuchung über das Verbot der knechtlichen Arbeit von der Urkirche bis auf Thomas von Aquin, Studia Theologiae Moralis et Pastoralis 4, 1958; A. R. Hulst, “Bemerkungen zum Sabbatgebot”, in Studia Biblica et Semitica. Festschrift Th. C. Vriezen, 1966, 152–64; A. Hülster, “Die ältesten patristischen Zeugnisse für die Sonntagsheiligung”, Theologie und Glaube 1, 1909, 211 ff.; E. Jenni, Die theologische Begründung des Sabbatsgebotes im Alten Testament, Theologische Studien 46, 1956; A. Jülicher, “Sonntag im Urchristentum”, *RGG*¹ V 735–38; J. A. Jungmann, “Beginnt die christliche Woche mit Sonntag?”, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 55, 1931, 605–21; W. Kornfeld, Der Sabbath im Alten Testament: Der Tag des Herrn. Die Heiligung des Sonntags im Wandel der Zeit, 1958; E. Kutzsch, “Sabbat”, *RGG*³ V 1258 ff.; G. Kunze, “Die gottesdienstliche Zeit”, Leiturgia. Handbuch der evangelischen Gottesdienstes, I, 1954, 438–534; P. Leupin, “Der Sonntag in der Kirchengeschichte”, Schweizerische theologische Umschau 31, 1961, 18–34; E. Lohse, “Sabbat und Sonntag im Neuen Testament”, Verlorener Sonntag? Kirche im Volk 22, 1959, 25–36; and “Jesu Worte über den Sabbat”, in Judentum – Urchristentum – Kirche. Festschrift für J. Jeremias zum 60. Geburtstag, BZNW 26, 1960, 79–89; W. Lotz, “Sabbath und Sabbathjahr”, RE XVII 283–95; E. Mahler, “Der Sabbath”, ZDMG 62, 1908, 33–79; and Handbuch der jüdischen Chronologie, 1916; J. H. Meesters, Op Zoek naar de Oorsprong van de Sabbat, 1966; J. Meinhold, Sabbat und Woche, FRLANT 5, 1905; “Sabbat und Sonntag”, Wissenschaft und Bildung 45, 1909; “Die Entstehung des Sabbats”, ZAW 29, 1909, 81–112; and “Zur Sabbatfrage”, ZAW 36, 1916, 108 ff.; “Zur Sabbatfrage”, ZAW 48, 1930, 121–28; Le Jour du Seigneur (papers read at the Liturgical Congress at Lyons, 1947), 1948; R. Naz, “Dimanche”, Dictionnaire de Droit Canonique, IV, 1949, 1227–31; J. Nedbal, Sabbat und Sonntag im Neuen Testament, (Dissertation, Vienna) 1956; J. M. Nielsen, Das Zeichen des Herrn. Sabbat und Sonntag in biblischer und urchristlicher Bezeugung, 1940; W. Nowack, Schabbat, 1924; H. Peichl, ed., Der Tag des Herrn. Die Heiligung des Sonntags im Wandel der Zeit, 1958; F. Pettirsch, “Das Verbot der Opera Servilia in der Heiligen Schrift und in der altkirchlichen Exegese”, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 69, 1947, 257–327 and 417–44; A. Preßeren, “Die Beziehungen der Sonntagsfeier zum 4. Gebot des Dekalogs”, Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 37, 1913, 563–603 and 709–59; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung, 1945, 125–89; H. Riesenfeld, “Sabbat et Jour du Seigneur”, in A. J. B. Higgins, ed., New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1959, 210–18; W. Rordorf, “Der Sonntag als Gottesdienst- und Ruhetag im ältesten Christentum”, Zeitschrift für evangelische Ethik 7, 1963, 213–24; K. Rudolf, ed., Der christliche Sonntag. Probleme und Aufgaben, 1956; H. Rüscher, Sabbat und Sonntag im Lichte des Neuen Testaments, 1913; SB II 613–30; D. Schick, “Die historischen Voraussetzungen der Sonntagsfeier”, Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift 5, 1894, 727–60; G. Schrenk, “Sabbat oder Sonntag”, Judaica 2, 1946, 169–89; E. Schürer, “Die sieben tägige Woche im Gebrauche der christlichen Kirche der ersten Jahrhunderte”, ZNW 6, 1905, 1–66; G. Schwaborn, “Das älteste patristische Zeugnis über die Sonntagsruhe”, Theologie und Glaube 1, 1909, 381 ff.; F. Steinmetzer, “Arbeitsruhe”, RAC I 590–95; H. Stockar, Sonntagsgesetzgebung im alten Zürich, (Dissertation, Zürich) 1949; F. Stolz, šbt, THAT II 863–69; H. W. Surkau, “Sonntagsruhe”, *RGG*³ VI 142 ff.; A. Szabó, “Sabbat und Sonntag”, Judaica 15, 1959, 161–72; W. Thomas, Der Sonntag im frühen Mittelalter, (Dissertation, Göttingen) 1929; N. H. Tur-Sinai (Torczyner), “Sabbat und Woche”, Bibliotheca Orientalis 8, 1951, 14–21; E. Vogt, “Hat Sabbat im Alten Testament den Sinn von Woche?”, Bibliotheca 40, 1959, 1008 ff.; J. Vuilleumier, Le Jour du Repos à travers les Âges, 1936; E. Wetzel, Über den Ursprung der christlichen Sonntagsfeier, 1874; T. Zahn, Geschichte des Sonntags, vornehmlich in der alten Kirche, 1878 (reprinted in Skizzen aus dem Leben der alten Kirche, 1894, 196–240); H. Zimmern, “Sabbat”, ZDMG 58, 1904, 199–202; and “Nochmals Sabbat”, ibid., 458 ff.; O. Zöckler, “Sonntagsfeier”, RE XVII 521–29.

Sacrifice, First Fruits, Altar, Offering

Sacrifice, which forms a part of all cultic religions, is a ritual action intended to influence unseen powers, and in certain cases render their malignant activities innocuous by offering them satisfaction and so effecting positive blessings. The general import of sacrifice can be most easily characterized by the ancient Roman formula do ut des (“I give, so that you may give”). However, the sacrifices of the Israelite cultus are to be seen within the context of Israel’s → covenant relationship with Yahweh. In the NT the idea of sacrifice plays an important rôle, where it is a category for the interpretation of the → death of Jesus. It is also found, as in general in the ancient world, pictorially and in ethical contexts. The regular, general term for sacrifice in the Gk. world is thysia. The special form of the gift of the first fruits, aparchē, is dealt with in its own individual section on linguistic and material grounds. See also → Cross, → Death, → Gift, → Lord’s Supper.

ἀπαρχή

ἀπαρχή (aparchē), the gift of the first fruits, offering, gift.

CL aparchē, used since Soph. and Hdt., is a technical term of sacrificial language and denotes the first fruits of any sort, e.g. of natural products or of livestock, which were sacred to the deity and had to be consecrated to it before the whole could be given over to profane use (Hdt., 1, 92). In religious contexts there is also occasional mention of the offering of individual men or of whole groups to the deity (Plut., De Pythiae Oraculis 16; Quaestiones Graecae 35). This is mainly a question of the dedication of men to life-long service in the sanctuary (hierodouloi, temple slaves). Later the meaning of aparchē grew to include the payment of regular taxes in the secular sphere, such as death-duty to the state (cf. Josephus, Ant. 16, 172).

OT In the LXX aparchē translates initially the Heb. rēšîṭ, lit. beginning, chief, first (of fruits etc.), meaning the offering of the first fruits of natural products, such as wine and cereals, which were consecrated to Yahweh, the giver of fruitfulness (Num. 18:2; Deut. 18:4; 26:2, 10; 2 Chr. 31:5). It is also found at Exod. 23:19; Lev. 2:12; 23:10; Num. 15:20 f.; Deut. 33:21; 1 Sam. 2:29; Neh. 10:3; 12:44; Pss. 78(77):51; 105(104):36; Ezek. 20:40; 44:30. But most commonly aparchē renders t’rûmâh, contribution, offering, which denotes the contribution of natural products or money to the cult for the → priests and → Levites (Exod. 25:2 f.; Deut. 12:11, 17; 2 Chr. 31:10, 12, 14), which is similarly understood as a thank-offering to Yahweh. Other instances are: Exod. 35:5 f.; Lev. 22:12; Num. 5:9; 18:8, 11; 31:29; 2 Sam. 1:21; 2 Esd. 8:25; Neh. 10:40(39); 13:5; Mal. 3:8; Ezek. 20:40; 44:30; 45:1, 6 f., 13, 16; 48:8 ff., 12, 18, 20 f. This cultic practice is supported by the Israelite belief in → creation: Yahweh is the glory and owner of human, animal and plant life. The gift of the first fruits of everything living therefore belongs to him (Num. 18:15 [Heb. b'qôr, LXX prōtotokos]; Exod. 23:19; → First).

aparchē also renders hēlēb, fat (Num. 18:12, 29 f., 32), ma'šer, tenth part, → tithe (Deut. 12:6 v.l.), and nūpāh, offering (Exod. 38:24[39:1]), a term which is also used of the wave-offering. It is without Heb. equivalent at Exod. 22:28(29); Num. 18:1; 1 Sam. 10:4; Tob. 1:6; Jud. 11:13; Sir. 7:31 v.l.; 24:9 v.l.; 35(32):8; 45:20; Ezek. 20:31.

NT In the NT aparchē occurs only 9 times, of which 7 instances are in Paul.

1. In Rom. 11:16 Paul takes up the thought of Num. 15:17–21: “If the dough offered as first fruits is holy, so is the whole lump; and if the root is holy, so are the branches.” Admittedly, there is a certain difference between the OT example and Paul’s conclusions. In the case of the Israelites, the rest of the dough could be put to profane use. On the other hand, as M. Black points out, “By offering the ‘first fruits’ of the dough, i.e. probably the first loaf baked, the whole mass of dough is consecrated (Num. 15:17 ff.) Israel, as a whole, is consecrated through the Patriarchs (the ‘holy root’; and cf. verse 28)” (Romans, New Century Bible, 1973, 144). By means of this exegesis, which is not untypical of rabbinic thought, Paul argues that the first fruits of Israel, the faith of the patriarchs (e.g. of → Abraham, Rom. 11:28), guarantee the rôle in salvation history of the nation as a whole. For the analogy of the root and branch → Olive.

2. aparchē has a similar figurative sense in Rom. 16:5, where Paul speaks of Epäenetus as the first fruits (“the first convert”, RSV) of the province of Asia. Similarly, in 1 Cor. 16:15 the household of Stephanas is called the first fruits of Achaia. They were the first Christian converts as a result of the evangelization of these provinces. The same thought is found in the v.l. of 2 Thess. 2:13: “But we are bound to give thanks to God always for you, brethren beloved by the Lord, because God chose you from the beginning [ap' archēs; v.l. “as the first fruits”, aparchēn] to be saved, through sanctification by the Spirit and belief in the truth.” The similarity of form explains the difficulties in copying. Perhaps “first fruits” is to be preferred, by analogy with the other Pauline passages, and because Paul nowhere else uses the phrase “from the beginning” (cf. Metzger, 636 f.).

More generally, James addresses his readers as the first fruits of God’s creation: “Of his own will he brought us forth by the word of truth that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures” (Jas. 1:18). According to Philo, the people of Israel were set apart “as a kind of first fruits to the Maker and Father” (Spec. Leg. 4, 180). Here in Jas. Christians are thought of as the first fruits of the new created order which supersedes the old Israel. They are “a temporary down-payment to be followed by the remaining members of the species” (M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James, Hermeneia, 1976, 106).

In Rev. 14:4 the hundred and forty-four thousand are similarly so described: “It is these who have not defiled themselves with women, for they are chaste; it is these who follow the Lamb wherever he goes; these have been redeemed from mankind as first fruits for God and the Lamb". (On the hundred and forty-four thousand → Number, art. chilias NT 4.)

3. Rom. 8:23 reverses the OT relationship of giver and receiver: "and not only the creation, but we ourselves, who have the first fruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly as we wait for adoption as sons, the redemption of our bodies." Here it is not God but believers who are the recipients of the first fruits. The gift of the → Spirit is seen as the first instalment and guarantee of the eschatological → redemption of the → body. (On the interpretation of this passage → Prayer, art. entynchanō; and on the nature of the resurrection body → Resurrection, art. The Resurrection in Contemporary Theology 2.)

4. In 1 Cor. 15:20 aparchē is used in connexion with the → resurrection: "But in fact Christ has been raised from the dead, the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep." The assertion follows the reflection that, "If in this life we who are in Christ have only hope, we are of all men most to be pitied" (v. 19). If Christ has not been raised both preaching and faith are → empty (v. 14). Christ's resurrection is thus a guarantee of the believer's resurrection. "This analogy may have come more readily to Paul's mind if he was writing between Passover (5:7 f.) and Pentecost (16:8): the presentation of the first fruits soon after Passover inaugurated the seven weeks which terminated at Pentecost (Lev. 23:15 ff.; cf. verse 4 above)" (F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Corinthians, New Century Bible, 1971, 145). The thought is further developed in v. 23 in relation to the eschatological order of resurrection life: "But each in his own order: Christ the first fruits, then at his coming those who belong to Christ" (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 2 (c)). H.-G. Link, C. Brown

θύω

θύω (thyō), to sacrifice, slaughter, kill, celebrate; θυσία (thysia), sacrifice, offering, act of offering; θυσιαστήριον (thysiastrion), altar; προσφορά (prophora), offering, the act of offering, the offering that is brought; εἰδολόθυτον (eidolothyton), a thing sacrificed to idols; ὁλοκαύτωμα (holokautoma), whole burnt offering.

CL 1. thyō (used since Homer) has in secular Gk. the basic meaning of to sacrifice, though originally in connexion with the smoke-offering it meant to smoke, and in particular, in the active form, to offer a smoking or a burnt sacrifice (Homer, Il. 9, 219; Xen., Cyr. 8, 7, 3). Because sacrificial animals or portions of animals – and human beings also – were burnt, thyō also assumed the meaning to slaughter for cultic ends (Hdt., 1, 216; Eur., Iph. Taur. 621). The noun thysia (since Pindar) signifies the ritual of sacrifice as well as the sacrificial animal or any other similar sacrificial gift (Hdt., 4, 60; Thuc., 8, 70).

2. prophora meant originally bringing, presenting. It was also used of income, revenue, and the offering of sacrificial gifts, then in particular an offering of food, especially in the form of a gift of cereals. From Sophocles onwards, in the connotation of making an offering in the form of a gift, the expression came to indicate total submission to the deity in cultic acts (Theophrastus, Characteres 30, 19). For further discussion see R. K. Yerkes, Sacrifice in Greek and Roman Religion and in Early Judaism, 1952.

F. Thiele

OT 1. Principal Sources. Many passages in the OT exhibit the wide-ranging significance which sacrifice acquired in Israel. The most important sources are the Cultic Decalogue (Exod. 34), the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:22–23:33), Deut. 12–26, the final part of the book of Ezekiel (chs. 40–48), and the so-called Priestly Code (especially Exod. 24–Num. 10). The OT does not present a single concept of sacrifice which embraces the whole, but rather a variety of inter-related ideas. Many scholars hold that most of the sacrificial rites of the OT did not originate in faith in Yahweh (cf. G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 252; R. Dussaud, Les Origines Cananéennes du Sacrifice Israélite, 1941²; H. H. Rowley, “The Meaning of Sacrifice in the Old Testament”, BJRL 33, 1950–51, 74–110; reprinted in From Moses to Qumran: Studies in the Old Testament, 1963, 67–107; R. de Vaux, Studies in Old Testament Sacrifice, 1964). It is widely held that they developed in part in the struggle with neighbouring heathen, particularly Canaanite, cults (cf. Lev. 20:2 ff.; Deut. 18), and that they were the product of a lengthy and complex development. In the OT the sacrificial cultus forms part of the Mosaic legislation.

2. Cultic Sites. The offering of sacrifice is localized at a cultic site which centres on the altar (Heb. mizbēah, place of sacrifice, which is related to the vb. zābah, to slaughter or sacrifice, and the noun zēbah, a sacrifice). The LXX is the first place where the corresponding Gk. noun thysiasērion, sacrificial table, altar, occurs. It is found in the LXX 419 times. Its use remains confined to Jewish and Christian literature. thysiasērion is always used as the “altar of the God of the Bible” (J. Behm, TDNT III 182), e.g. the altar of burnt offering (Lev. 4:7 etc.), the altar of incense (Exod. 30:1; 40:5), and the altar on which Abraham intended to offer Isaac (Gen. 22:9 f.). For the altars of foreign gods bōmos is used (for mizbeah, Exod. 34:13; Num. 3:10; 23:1 f., 4, 14, 29 f.; Deut. 7:5; 12:3; Jos. 22:10 f., 16, 19, 23, 26, 34; 2 Chr. 31:1; Isa. 17:8; 27:9; Jer. 11:13; for bāmāh, high place, Hos. 10:8; Amos 7:9; Isa. 15:2; 16:12; Jer. 7:31; 48[31]:35; 32[39]:35; cf. also 1 Macc. 1:46, 54, 59; 2:23 ff., 45; 5:68; 2 Macc. 2:19; 10:2; 13:8). This distinction was not, however, preserved by Philo (cf. Spec. Leg. 1, 285 ff.; 1, 290; Vit. Mos. 2, 196) and Josephus (Ant. 8, 88 and 230).

The patriarchs built their own altars and offered sacrifice without recourse to priesthood: → Noah (Gen. 8:20); → Abraham (Gen. 12:6 ff.; 13:18; 22:9); Isaac (Gen. 26:25); Jacob (Gen. 33:20; 35:1–7); → Moses (Exod. 17:15). Archaeologists have discovered Canaanite altars from the 14th and 13th centuries B.C. onwards. Moses was instructed to tell the people to make an altar of earth (Exod. 20:24 ff.). The altar built by → Elijah on Carmel consisted of twelve uncut stones representing the twelve tribes (1 Ki. 18:31 f.). Altars were also built by Joshua (Jos. 8:30 f.; cf. Deut. 27:5), Gideon (Jdg. 6:24 ff.) and David (2 Sam. 24:18–25). See also Jos. 22:10–34; 1 Sam. 20:6, 29. Solomon’s altar was probably a new one (1 Ki. 8:22, 54, 64; 9:25). This bronze altar for burnt offerings stood in the inner court. It was 20 cubits square and 10 cubits high (2 Chr. 4:1). Between this and the porch was the bronze laver (1 Ki. 7:23–26; cf. 16:17). Within the holy place in the tabernacle was a miniature altar of → incense, overlaid with gold (Exod. 30:1–10; → Tent). To this altar only Aaron and the high priests had access, for burning incense morning and evening and for making atonement once a year on the Day of Atonement. The horns of the altar were projections which were smeared with the blood of the sacrifice (Exod. 29:12; 30:10; Lev. 4:7). On the large altar the victims were tied to them (Ps.

118:27). Offenders might cling to them for safety (1 Ki. 2:28). In Ezekiel's vision of the temple no incense altar is mentioned, but the altar of burnt offering is described in detail (Ezek. 43:13–17), employing Babylonian concepts. When the temple was rebuilt after the exile it was provided with altars (cf. Josephus, Ap. 1, 21; and the Letter of Aristeas). Antiochus Epiphanes removed the golden altar in 169 B.C. (1 Macc. 1:21), and two years later surmounted the altar of burnt offering with the → abomination of desolation (1 Macc. 1:54). The Maccabees built a new altar and restored the altar of incense (1 Macc. 4:44–49). In the time of Herod the altar of burnt offering was a pile of unhewn stones approached by a ramp (for description see the Mishnah tractate Middoth 3).

3. Types of Sacrifice. Various forms of sacrifice are described in the OT, and they are named according to the occasion and form of the gift.

(a) The ḥattā'î (LXX peri hamartias, lit. “for sins”) is generally rendered “sin offering” (cf. the vb. ḥātā', to miss a goal or way, to sin, and the noun ḥēt', sin). However, “purgation offering” has been proposed as an alternative on the grounds that the name is derived from the piel form of the vb. ḥittē' which is synonymous with tihar, to purify (e.g. Ezek. 43:23–26) and kipper, to purge (Ezek. 43:20, 26) (cf. J. Milgrom. IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 766). In this sacrifice the → blood of the animal is not used on the person. The rites for the healed leper (Lev. 14) and the consecration of the priest involve this sacrifice and the daubing by blood, but the blood is taken from a different sacrifice. The priest purges the sanctuary by means of the ḥattā'î on the behalf of the person or group of persons who have polluted it. The reason for the pollution may be physical impurity (e.g. Lev. 12–15) or an unwitting offence against Yahweh (e.g. Lev. 4). Unrepented impurities cannot be so purged (Num. 15:27–31) but must be dealt with by the Day of Atonement ritual (→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai ὄν).

The underlying idea of purging is further illustrated by the fact that a person was contaminated by the blood of the sacrifice (Lev. 6:27). Earthenware objects used for the sin offering had to be broken and metal ones scoured (Lev. 6:28; 11:33, 35; 15:12; Num. 31:22 f.). Those who burned the sin offering after it had purged the sanctuary had to submit to ablutions (Lev. 16:16, 28; cf. also Num. 19:8 ff., 21). The sacrifice absorbed the impurity, and by that fact could also contaminate. For a similar idea outside the OT cf. the Hittite Code § 44 (ANET, 191). On occasion the priests could eat it (Lev. 6:29). “But no sin offering shall be eaten from which any blood is brought into the tent of meeting to make atonement in the holy place; it shall be burned with fire” (Lev. 6:30). It was thus burned outside the camp (Lev. 4:11 f., 21), and the one who burnt it must also purify himself before returning (Lev. 16:28).

Three stages have been noted in the purging of the sanctuary (cf. J. Milgrom, op. cit., 767): (i) When an individual commits an inadvertent sin or contracts impurity, the blood of the sin offering is daubed on the horns of the outer altar (Lev. 4:25; 9:9; 14:19). (ii) When the entire community commits an inadvertency, the blood is brought inside the shrine, where it is sprinkled before the veil and daubed on the horns of the inner altar (Lev. 4:5 ff., 16 ff.). (iii) For presumptuous sins the blood is brought inside the adytum where it is sprinkled before and upon the ark, followed by the ritual of the previous two stages in reverse order (cf. the Day of Atonement ritual in Lev. 16).

Repentance is a precondition of the sin offering (Lev. 4:22 f., 27 f.). The sacrifice covers the inadvertent violation of prohibitive commandments (Lev. 4:2, 13, 22, 27), but not the neglect of performative commandments. The type of animal offered is related to the social and economic position of the offender: a bull for the high priest and community, a he-goat for a chief, and a female of the flock for a common Israelite (cf. Lev. 4:2–21; 9:2 f., 15; 16:5, 11; with Num. 15:22–26). The very poor could offer birds or flour (Lev. 5:1–13). Where more than one kind of sacrifice is offered, the sin offering takes precedence, because the altar must first be purged before other gifts may be offered (cf. Lev. 5:8 with Num. 6:14 ff.). The man who deliberately delayed purification is warned that he will bear his iniquity (Lev. 17:16; Num. 19:13, 20).

(b) The 'āšām (LXX plēmmeleia) is generally translated as “guilt offering”. It is related to the vb. 'āsam, to offend, be guilty, incur liability to someone (cf. Lev. 5:19), and where it has no personal object, to feel guilty (e.g. Lev. 5:5, 17; 6:4[5:23]). J. Milgrom sees the underlying meaning as reparation (cf. Lev. 5:6), especially in view of the vbs. used in connexion with it: hēšīb, restore (Num. 5:7 f.; 18:9; 1 Sam. 6:3 f., 17) and šillēm, repay (Lev. 5:24[6:5]) (op. cit., 768). It thus implies indemnities. Moreover, the 'āšām is the only sacrifice upon which value is set in terms of money (Lev. 5:15, 18; 6:6[5:25]).

The guilt offering was to be offered, together with a fine to the value of one fifth, for unwitting trespass in any holy thing (Lev. 5:14; cf. also Lev. 27). The nature of the trespass is not defined in the OT, though in Hittite documents it can be related both to the animate and the inanimate (ANET, 208). Particular cases where the guilt offering has to be made include reparation by the Nazirite for desecrating his hair and vow (Num. 6:1–12), the desecration of Israel by foreign nations (Jer. 2:3), and the desecration of Israel by mixed marriages (Ezra 10:19). Lev. 5:17 ff. prescribes the guilt offering for unwitting sins in order to avoid divine retribution (cf. ANET, 34 ff., 391 ff.). The healed leper had to offer the 'āšām (Lev. 14:10–32; → Leprosy). It was also to be offered in cases of breach of faith (Lev. 6:1–7[5:20–26]), which also entailed restoration of the value of the property plus a one-fifth fine. This is further elaborated in Num. 5:6 ff. which stipulates that in cases where the owner dies without heirs the total reparation belongs to the sanctuary, and also that the guilty party must express his repentance in confession.

Isa. 53:10 f. declares of the servant of Yahweh: “Yet it was the will of the LORD to bruise him; he has made him sick; when thou makest his soul an offering for sin [MT 'im-tāšīm 'āšām napšō; LXX ean dōte peri hamartias], he shall see his offspring, he shall prolong his days; the will of the LORD shall prosper in his hand; he shall see the fruit of the travail of his soul and be satisfied; by his knowledge shall the righteous one, my servant, make many to be accounted righteous; and he shall bear their iniquities [MT “wōnōqām; LXX tas hamartias auton]” (RSV mg.). In this unique passage the servant of Yahweh takes over the rôle of the animal in the guilt offering by the offering of his own life. (On the question of the servant → Serve.) In the NT Jesus' self-giving as a lytron, ransom (Matt. 20:28), recalls this passage (→ Redemption; → Lord's Supper). Some scholars consider the text to be corrupt, and the RSV emends: “he has put him to grief; when he makes himself an offering for sin . . .” J. Begrich emended the text to read “he healed him who made his life a guilt offering” (Studien zu Deuterjesaja, 1938, 58; reprinted in ThB 20, 1963, 63; cf. R. N. Whybray, Isaiah 40–66, New Century Bible, 1975, 179, for this and other conjectured emendations). Thus Begrich eliminates the idea that Yahweh desires to make the life of the servant a guilt offering. However, it has to be asked whether all such emendations are not made in the light of a preconceived theological interest.

(c) The ’ôlâh is commonly translated “whole burnt offering”. It is related to the vb. ’âlâh, go up, hiph. cause to ascend, i.e. in the sacrificial fire. For this the LXX has holokautōma and holokautōsis, “holocaust”, and also holokarpōma and holokarpōsis, “whole food offering”, and karpōma and karpōsis, “food offering”. The Heb. kālîl is also used as a synonym (cf. Deut. 33:10; 1 Sam. 7:9; Ps. 51:21). All of the beast or fowl was laid on the altar, except the skin (Lev. 7:8) and those parts which could not be washed clean (Lev. 1:9 ff., 13), and it was entirely consumed by → fire. The beast had to be a male without blemish from the herd or flock (Lev. 1:3, 10; 22:18 f.). But the offering could also be a fowl (Lev. 1:14 ff.; 5:7; 12:8; 14:22; 15:14 f., 29 f.; Num. 6:10 f.). A → lamb was offered by individuals (Lev. 12:6; Num. 6:14) and by the nation with the sheaf-waving (’ōmer; Lev. 23:12) and also daily at the morning and evening sacrifices (Num. 28 and 29; cf. also Exod. 29:42; Lev. 9:17; 2 Ki. 16:15; Ezra 3:5; Neh. 10:34; Ezek. 46:13, 15). The whole burnt offerings were increased on important occasions such as certain feasts and the reconsecration of the → temple (2 Chr. 29:32; cf. Ezek. 45:23; 46:4).

The offerer imposed his hands on the head of the animal and then slaughtered it himself (Lev. 1:4 f.; 4:24, 33; 6:8; 7:2; 9:12; 14:13, 19, 31; Ezek. 40:39, 42; 44:11). He also flayed it (Lev. 1:6; 2 Chr. 29:34), though it was the priests that presented the blood and arranged the sacrifice on the altar and burned it (Lev. 1:5–10; cf. Ezek. 40:38). It was devoured by fire (Lev. 1:9, 13, 17; 6:2–6; 8:21; 9:24; Num. 28:13; 1 Ki. 18:38; 2 Chr. 7:1). To the devout Israelite it was a matter of great concern that his whole burnt offerings should be accepted (1 Sam. 15:22; Pss. 20:3; 40:6; 51:19; Isa. 56:7; Jer. 6:20). Performance of the cultic act without penitence and heartfelt longing for Yahweh was not enough.

The atoning character of the ’ôlâh is made explicit in Lev. 1:4, and is implied in certain rituals (Lev. 9:7; 14:20) and also in non-cultic passages (Job 1:5; 42:8). Counterparts to it outside Israelite religion have been found in Greece, Anatolia and Canaan, but not in Egypt or Mesopotamia. The OT speaks of human burnt offerings being made to other gods (2 Ki. 3:27; Jer. 19:5). Jephthah offered his daughter as such a sacrifice (Jdg. 11:31), though human sacrifice is condemned in the OT (Lev. 18:21; 20:1–5; Mic. 6:7; Ezek. 20:25 f.; Jer. 32:35; 2 Ki. 23:10; Deut. 12:31; 18:10; cf. de Vaux, op. cit., 63–90). Abraham was prepared to offer Isaac as an ’ôlâh, though God drew his attention to a ram instead (Gen. 22:2, 13). The ’ôlâh may well have been the earliest expiatory sacrifice. Outside the Pentateuch early references to its use on behalf of individuals are found in Job 1:5 and 42:8, and on behalf of the community in 2 Sam. 24:25.

(d) The noun minhâh (LXX thysia, and also twice thysiasma) means a gift or present (Gen. 32:14, 19, 21 f.; Jdg. 6:18 etc.), tribute (Jdg. 3:15–18; 2 Sam. 8:2, 6; Hos. 10:6 etc.), and an offering made to God of any kind whether of grain or animals (Gen. 4:3 ff.; Num. 16:15; 1 Sam. 2:17, 29; 26:19; Isa. 1:13; Ps. 96:8; Zeph. 3:10). Thus the sacrifices of Cain and Abel are both described by the same term; it is the context which indicates that Abel’s offering of the firstlings of his flock and their fat portions (Gen. 4:3) was acceptable to God rather than Cain’s offering of the fruit of the ground. But Cain’s decisive sin was to resent God with an impenitent heart (Gen.

4:6 f.), which in turn led to the murder of his brother and his attempted cover-up (Gen. 4:8 f.).

But minḥâh is also used in the special sense of the cereal offering in passages attributed to P (Exod. 30:9; 40:29; Lev. 7:37; 23:37; Num. 18:9; 29:39; Hos. 2:23, 29). It is found in various forms: 'abîb, the grain in the ear parched with fire, oil and incense (Lev. 2:14 f.); sōlet, fine flour usually mixed with oil and incense (Lev. 2:1; 6:7 f.; 14:10, 21; 23:13; but cf. 5:11 ff. for the very poor; Num. 7:13 ff.; 8:8; 15:4, 6, 9; 28:5 ff.; 29:3, 9, 14); sōlet, baked in an oven as cakes (Lev. 2:4; 7:9; Num. 6:15) or some form of a pan (Lev. 2:5, 7; 6:14; 7:9). These were always unleavened (maṣṣôt) and mixed with oil and salt (Lev. 2:11 ff.; → Leaven). They figured at → Pentecost (Lev. 23:16 f.; Num. 28:26). Barley meal without oil or incense was also used (Num. 5:15, 18, 25).

The minḥâh may have been a cheap 'olâh for the poor (cf. Men. 104b; Lev. Rab. 1:5; 8:4). In Mesopotamia cereal offering was an alternative to animal sacrifice for the poor (J. Milgrom, op. cit., 769). In Israel it regularly went with the 'olâh (e.g. Lev. 14:20; Num. 28 and 29) and had a similar range of functions including expiation (Men. 110a; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1, 271).

(e) The š'lamîm (LXX sôtêrion, eirēnikē) is a plur. formation. The sing. is found only in Amos 5:22. It is frequently translated as “peace offering”, on the grounds that it is etymologically linked with šālôm, peace, and that it effects → peace (Tosefta Zeb. 11:1). Some scholars see support for this view of the š'lamîm in the early sources which depict it as a shared meal eaten before Yahweh (e.g. Gen. 31:54; Deut. 27:7; 1 Sam. 2:13–16). But the evidence of the OT itself does not warrant the further suggestion that the peace offering effected a mystic union between the offerer and the deity (cf. Jdg. 6:18–21; 13:16; Ps. 50:12 f.). The sacrifice was eaten “before [lîpnê] Yahweh”, not “with” him.

Other conjectured derivations include seeing it as a → covenant or gift sacrifice in view of the Akkadian salimu (covenant) and šulmānu (gift). In view of the Heb. šālēm (whole, sound), it has been seen as a sacrifice in which the offerer expresses thanks for his well-being (cf. Tosefta Zeb. 11:1; Sifra, Nedaba 16:2; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1, 212). A further suggestion is to relate it to šillēm (repay), and see it as a sacrifice repaying God for his blessings (cf. Rashbam on Lev. 3:1; Prov. 7:14).

The š'lamîm is thought to be old, and was eaten close to the altar (1 Sam. 2:13; 9:24; cf. Ezek. 46:24; Num. 6:18 f. in the case of the consecration of the Nazirite). Birds could not be offered. In the wilderness period birds were considered game. Their blood was not dashed on the altar but buried (cf. Lev. 17:13 f.).

In passages attributed to P the š'lamîm are often linked with or replaced by the noun zebah, the generic term for sacrifice. In Ugaritic, Punic and rabbinic Heb. the root zbh can refer to all types of blood sacrifice. But in the OT it is used for those sacrifices in which the flesh is eaten (except possibly 2 Chr. 7:12), e.g. feasts at altars (1 Sam. 2:13), the yearly (1 Sam. 1:21) and family (1 Sam. 20:29) zebah.

The character of the š'lamîm as thankoffering, votive offering and freewill offering is brought out in Lev. 22:21: “And when any one offers a sacrifice of peace offerings to the LORD, to fulfil a vow or as a freewill offering, from the herd or from the flock, to be accepted it must be perfect; there shall be no blemish in it” (cf. Lev. 7:11–16; 19:5 ff.; Deut. 27:7; Philo, Spec. Leg. 1, 224; Plato, Laws 909 f.). The ritual is prescribed in Lev. 3. The offerer lays his hand on the animal's head and kills it at the door of the tent of meeting (v. 2; cf. v. 7 for a lamb and v. 13 for a goat). The priest throws the blood on the altar and round about (v. 2; cf. vv. 6–17). The entrails are removed (vv. 3 ff.) and the fat burnt as a pleasing odour to Yahweh (v. 5). It was mainly a private and family sacrifice, but was offered in public at → Pentecost (Lev. 23:19) and at the consecration of priests (Lev. 9:4).

The sacrifice was evidently of less sanctity than the burnt offerings, for female animals could be offered (Lev. 3:1 etc). It was additional to the mandatory offerings laid down by the law, and physically imperfect animals were accepted for freewill, but not votive offerings (Lev. 22:23). Certain parts went to the priest and the rest was eaten by the offerer and his friends (Lev. 7:15 f.). In general, the š^e lamîm were not associated with propitiation or expiation, and the OT largely avoids using the vb. kipper in association with it (→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai, OT). Possible exceptions are Ezek. 45:15, 17; 1 Sam. 3:14; and Lev. 17:11, where the context seems to refer to š^e lamîm. But the warning against eating flesh with → blood that makes atonement seems intended to ensure that the sacrifice is eaten as a proper peace offering (cf. Lev. 17:3 f.).

The š^e lamîm could be offered as a thanksgiving or thankoffering, tôdâh (Lev. 7:12 f., 15; 22:29; cf. also 2 Chr. 29:31; 33:16; Pss. 50:14, 23; 56:12; 107:22; 116:17; and the title of Ps. 100; Jer. 17:26; 33:11; Amos 4:5). It is linked with a bread offering and eaten the same day in Lev. 7:11–16. The offering in fulfilment of a vow (nedër, n'dābâh) might be brought as an 'ôlâh as well as a š^e lamîm (Num 15:3; Ezek. 46:2, 12), but apparently not the tôdâh (2 Chr. 29:31).

(f) Several other cultic rites are mentioned by the OT. For the qorbân, offering (Lev. 1:2 f., 10; 2:1, 5; 7:38; Num. 6:14 etc.) → Gift, art. korban. The neseq, drink offering (LXX spondê), which consisted of wine, is mentioned in Gen. 35:14 (attributed to E) and elsewhere in passages attributed to P (Lev. 23:37; Num. 4:7; 29:39). It was usually offered with the 'ôlâh (Exod. 29:40; Lev. 23:13, 18; Num. 15:5, 7, 10, 24; 28:7, 14, 31; 28:9–24; 29:6–37). It is mentioned in connexion with the morning offering (Exod. 29:41; Num. 28:8), and with other offerings (Num. 6:15, 17; 15:5, 7, 10; 1 Chr. 29:21; 2 Chr. 29:35; Ezek. 45:17; Jos. 1:9, 13; 2:14). Drink offerings were also offered to other deities (2 Ki. 16:13, 15; Isa. 57:6; Jer. 7:18; 19:13; 32:29; 44:17–25; Ezek. 20:28; Ps. 16:4). On the memorial 'azkârâh, a term associated with the meal offering (Lev. 2:2, 9, 16; 6:8; Num. 5:26) → Remember. It was used of the frankincense burned for the show-bread (Lev. 24:7). A meal offering could be used as a sin offering and a memorial before Yahweh by the very poor (Lev. 5:12).

The → bread of the presence or show-bread (lehem-panîm, lit. “bread of face”) was to be set on the table in the sanctuary perpetually before Yahweh (Exod. 25:30). Some critics have seen it as a survival of the idea that the deity was nourished by the food presented by the worshippers. It was unleavened recalling the exodus (→ Leaven). It was renewed each → sabbath, the old bread being eaten by the priests within the precincts of the sanctuary (Lev. 24:5–9). As such it is seen as a memorial before Yahweh and an expression of the covenant, being offered with fire and frankincense. 1 Sam. 21:1–6 tells how → David and his men ate this bread, which in the NT is appealed to by Jesus to justify the disciples' action in plucking grain on the sabbath (Matt. 12:1–8 par. Mk. 2:23–28, Lk. 6:1–5). See also 1 Ki. 7:48 = 2 Chr. 4:19; Exod. 35:13; 39:36; 40:23; Num. 4:7; 1 Chr. 9:32; 23:29; 2 Chr. 13:11; Neh.

10:34. Lev. 23:17 speaks of the wave-loaf, and Lev. 23:20 and 2 Ki. 4:42 of the bread of the first fruits.

The wave-offering ʿnūpāh (LXX epithema), wave offering, was waved at the high priest's ordination (Exod. 29:26). The → Levites were also offered as a wave offering (Num. 8:11, 13, 15, 21). The offering was so called because it was waved, signifying that the sacrifice was Yahweh's: "And you shall consecrate the breast of the wave offering, and the thigh of the priest's portion, which is waved, and which is offered from the ram of ordination, since it is for Aaron and for his sons" (Exod. 29:27; cf. also Lev. 7:34; 8:27; 10:14 f.; 14:14, 21, 24; 23:15, 17, 20; Num. 6:20; 18:18).

On the separate questions of cursing and tithing → Curse, → Tithe. On the festivals, including the Passover, → Feast.

4. Theories of Sacrifice. Various theories have been put forward as to the fundamental idea behind sacrifice in general.

(a) The view that sacrifice is intended to provide food for the god is argued by W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 141 f.; E. Westermarck, The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas, II, 1908, 611; R. H. Pfeiffer, Religion in the Old Testament, 1961, 35. Some support for taking this view in the OT has been found in certain idioms, such as "my table" (Ezek. 44:16), "the food of his God" (Lev. 21:22, cf. v. 17), "my food . . . my pleasing odour" (Num. 28:2) (cf. J. Milgrom, op. cit., 764). The furniture of the sacred → tent and later of the → temple (the table for the bread of the presence, the candelabrum, and the incense altar) have been seen as the means for providing Yahweh with the necessary means of partaking of the food offered. There are also passages which treat Yahweh as an honoured guest who must receive his share of the sacrifice before man (e.g. 1 Sam. 2:29). But the latter may also be construed as an expression of reverence. At most, as Milgrom points out, "these words and mores are only fossilized vestiges from a dim past, which show no signs of life in the Bible" (ibid.). There is never any thought in the biblical writers that Yahweh actually needs food from man. Although this may have been in the minds of some Israelites influenced by Canaanite religion, it was trenchantly denounced by the psalmist: "I do not reprove you for your sacrifices; your burnt offerings are continually before me. I will accept no bull from your house, nor he-goat from your folds. For every beast of the forest is mine, the cattle on a thousand hills. I know all the birds of the air, and all that moves in the field is mine. If I were hungry, I would not tell you; for the world and all that is in it is mine. Do I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Offer to God a sacrifice of thanksgiving, and pay your vows to the Most High; and call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver you, and you shall glorify me" (Ps. 50:8–15). What is striking about this Psalm is that it does not condemn sacrifice as such, but misconceptions of it. Commenting on v. 14, A. A. Anderson writes: "The point of this verse seems to be that sacrifice is not food for Yahweh, but that it can become a vehicle for expressing the right attitude to him, and a means of blessing for the worshipper" (The Book of Psalms, New Century Bible, I, 1972, 386).

(b) An alternative view is that sacrifice releases the life force of the animal through its death. This has been argued by E. O. James, "Sacrifice (Introductory and Primitive)", ERE XI 1 ff.; and Origins of Sacrifice: A Study in Comparative Religion, 1937²; R. Dussaud, Les Origines Cananéennes du Sacrifice Israélite, 1941²; A. Bertholet, *RGG*² IV 704. But whilst such views can be found in animism they are absent from the accounts of sacrifice in the OT. Appeal is sometimes made to the statement that life is in the blood (cf. Gen. 4:4; Lev. 17:11, 14; Deut. 12:23), and the inference is drawn that the death of the victim enables its life to be released. But this view cannot be sustained in the light of detailed examination of the passages concerned (→ Blood; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai OT 3 (d)).

(c) Sacrifice has also been understood as a means of effecting a union with the deity by sharing in the body of the sacrificed animal (cf. W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites: The Fundamental Institutions, [1889] 1927³, ed. S. A. Cook; F. B. Jevons, An Introduction to the History of Religions, 1927⁹, 144 ff., 285; C. F. Burney, Outlines of Old Testament Theology, 1930³, 55 f.). The nearest that the OT comes to this view is in the š'lamîm. For discussion of this see above, 2 (e). Detailed examination of this and the other sacrifices shows that, while there are elements of union and reconciliation, there is no thought of the sacrifice effecting a mystical identity between the offerer and Yahweh. This goes far beyond the idea which is present of expressing thanks or vowing one's commitment to Yahweh.

(d) A fundamental idea of sacrifice outside Israelite religion is that of inducing the aid of the deity (cf. E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture: Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Language, Art, and Custom, 1929⁵, II, 375 ff.; S. I. Curtiss, Primitive Semitic Religion Today, 1902, 218 ff.; O. Baumgarten, *RGG*¹ IV 956). The motive may be to secure fertility, blessing, deliverance from enemies, sin, or impurity. There would seem to be a profound awareness in man of need of power outside himself. In its crudest form sacrifice constitutes a bribe or a superstitious act, designed to secure success. But in its deepest form it represents an awareness of the need to be reconciled and to commit oneself without reserve to the God with whom man needs → reconciliation and who is worthy of total commitment. This finds expression, e.g. in Ps. 50 (quoted above under (a)). The variety of sacrifices in the OT expresses the varied aspects of this need and the divine provision made for them under the old → covenant. With the death of Christ the NT writers see the sacrifices of the OT superseded.

5. Sacrifice in the History of OT Religion. The OT presents sacrifice as dating back to primeval history. Cain and Abel both brought sacrifices, though Cain's cereal offering was unacceptable (Gen. 4:4 f.). Noah offered burnt offerings (Gen. 8:20 ff.) and the pleasing odour is stressed. Job likewise made burnt offerings (Job 1:5; 42:7 ff.). The patriarchs "called on the name of Yahweh" (e.g. Abraham in Gen. 12:8; 13:4; 21:3; and Isaac in Gen. 26:25). The association of the phrase with the building of altars shows that it was linked with sacrifice. In the case of Jacob the particular altar is named (Gen. 33:20; 35:7; cf. also 31:54; 46:1). Abraham was tested by the call to offer his son, Isaac, though God provided a ram instead (Gen. 22). Sacrifice formed an essential part in the → covenant between God and Abraham (Gen. 15:4 ff.; cf. Jer. 34:18 ff.).

The Mosaic covenant was inaugurated with sacrifice (Exod. 24:3–8). Burnt and peace offerings were first offered. The blood from them was then thrown, half against the altar and half against the people.

In the land of Canaan sacrifices were held at various places, e.g. Bochim (Jdg. 2:1–5) and Ophrah (Jdg. 6:24 ff.). Jephthah sacrificed his daughter in fulfilment of a vow to sacrifice whatever he first met, if he returned victorious (Jdg. 11:30–40). The Book of Judges offers no comment on the rightness of his action. It would seem to combine a devotion to Yahweh with a pagan view of sacrifice which permitted human offering. Elsewhere human sacrifice is denounced (cf. above 3 (c)). Jephthah's action appears to be the product of a → conscience which obliged him to keep a promise, regardless of the moral character of the act.

Shiloh emerged as the main centre for sacrifice (1 Sam. 1:3 ff.; cf. Jos. 18:1 ff.; Jdg. 18:31; 21:12 ff.; 1 Sam. 4:3 ff.; 14:3; 1 Ki. 2:27; 14:2 ff.; Ps. 78:60; Jer. 7:12 ff.; 26:6, 9; 41:5), where annual festive offerings were made. Eli's sons were condemned for their greed and treating the sacrifice with contempt (1 Sam. 2:12–17). Other legitimate centres were Bethshemesh (1 Sam. 6:14 f.), Mizpah (7:9), Ramah (7:17; 9:11–24), Gibeah (10:5) and Gilgal (10:8; 11:15; 13:9). Family and clan sacrifice is described in 1 Sam. 16:2–5.

Under Saul the chief centre was Nob (1 Sam. 21:1 ff.). The families of Saul and David made peace offerings and held family feasts at the new moon (1 Sam. 20:5, 24 f.).

Under → David the cultus came to be centralized at → Jerusalem which he made into his capital. Here he brought the ark and offered burnt and peace offerings (2 Sam. 6:16 ff.; 1 Chr. 16:2, 40). 1 Chr. 21:18–30 describes how David was commanded to build an altar on the threshing floor of Ornan. The horned altar had been located at Gibeon prior to its move to Jerusalem (1 Chr. 21:29; 22:1; 2 Chr. 1:6). David evidently reorganized the ritual (1 Chr. 23:28–31).

David was not allowed to build a permanent → temple (2 Sam. 7). This fell to his son, → Solomon (1 Ki. 7–9). Jerusalem now became the centre of the cultus (1 Ki. 8:5, 62–65; 2 Chr. 5:6; 7:4–8). Nevertheless, people continued to resort to the high places (cf. 1 Ki. 3:2; 13:2 ff.; 18:30 ff.; 19:10; 2 Ki. 14:4; 15:4, 35; cf. P. H. Vaughan, The Meaning of 'bāmâ' in the Old Testament: A Study of Etymological, Textual and Archaeological Evidence, Society for Old Testament Study Monograph Series 3, 1974). With the separation of the northern and southern kingdoms they constituted rival centres to Jerusalem. Jeroboam I of the northern kingdom established shrines at Dan and Bethel (1 Ki. 12:27 f.). Beersheba may also have been a rival centre (Amos 5:5). Although sacrifice continued to be offered at Jerusalem (2 Ki. 12:4–16; 16:13 ff.; 2 Chr. 13:10 ff.; 28:18; 24:14), sacrifice on the high places was also tolerated in Judah (2 Chr. 15:17; 20:33). From time to time godly kings sought to implement reform. Many of the high places were abolished by Hezekiah (2 Ki. 18:4; cf. 2 Chr. 29:21–35). But they returned under Manasseh (2 Ki. 21:3; 2 Chr. 33:3 f., 19). 1 Ki. 18 gives an account of the contest between → Elijah and the priests of Baal on Mount Carmel at the time of Ahab and Jezebel. Here both parties presented rival sacrifices. But whereas the priests of Baal failed to bring fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice, Elijah's prayers to Yahweh were answered by the fire of the Lord. The priests of Baal were then slaughtered. The compiler of the Books of Kings writes from the standpoint of the Deuteronomic Code. Josiah's reform which was based on the code led to the desecration of the high places from Geba to Beersheba (2 Ki. 23:5–9; cf. 2 Chron. 35:6–14). But they subsequently reappeared in the valley of Ben Hinnom and throughout Judah (Jer. 7:31; 17:3; cf. Ezek. 6:3, 6; 20:29), causing Israel to turn away from Yahweh and contributing to the downfall of Judah.

Following J. Wellhausen, many critics have seen two types of religion in Israel which were in tension: a moral religion taught by the → prophets and a ritualistic religion based on the cult and the law (cf. J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel, 1885; for discussion of this subject generally see H. H. Rowley, "The Law and the Prophets", in The Unity of the Bible, 1953, 30–61; A. C. Welch, Prophet and Priest in Old Israel, 1936; N. W. Porteous, "Prophet and Priest in Israel", ExpT 62, 1950–51, 4 ff.; and R. E. Clements, A Century of Old Testament Study, 1976, 7–30, 51–75).

A number of passages in the prophets denounce sacrificial ritual (Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21–27; Mic. 6:6 ff.; Isa. 1:11–31; Jer. 6:20; 7:21 f.). Righteous conduct and obedience are contrasted with empty ritual. Amos 5:25 and Jer. 7:22 are sometimes taken to imply that sacrifice was unknown in Israel prior to the settlement in Canaan. They do, however, suggest that sacrifice was not practised in the wilderness wanderings. The evidence from Ras Shamra and the OT itself indicates that sacrifice was practised by the Canaanites and that some sacrifices had the same names. But Rowley contends: "No one can deny that Israelite sacrifice came out of a wider background of ritual practice, but while it is probable that much of Israelite sacrificial ritual was modelled on Canaanite, we have no evidence that it was identical with it in form or meaning, and no evidence that for Israel sacrifice began after their entry into the land of Canaan" (op. cit., 31 f.). Rowley takes Amos 5:25 to mean "Was it only flesh-sacrifices and meal-offerings that ye brought me in the wilderness?" with the expected answer "We brought more than this; we brought true worship of heart and righteousness" (op. cit., 42). Clearly Jeremiah was not opposed to the temple as such (Jer. 7:11), but he denounced the attitudes of those who made ritual a substitute for obedience and righteousness. His attitude and that of the other prophets is comparable with that of Samuel in condemning Saul for sparing the Amalekites: "Has the LORD as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the LORD? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" (1 Sam. 15:22). The fact that the Israelites had to eat manna and quails in their wilderness wanderings (Exod. 16 ff.) indicates that they lacked animals for sacrifice in any case during this period.

A pronouncement like Hos. 6:6 (cf. Matt. 9:13; 12:7) is best understood as a statement of priorities expressed by means of hyperbole: "For I desire love and not sacrifice, the knowledge of God, rather than burnt offerings." On the other hand, the prescriptions of passages like Lev. 5:5 f. and Num. 5:6 f. make it clear that the offering of sacrifice must be accompanied by penitence and confession. Isaiah condemned not only vain offerings, new moons and sabbaths but also prayer (Isa. 1:15; 29:13), when it was made without the right inner attitude. Linked with the lack of right attitudes was the intrusion of alien elements into the worship of Yahweh, and these were also condemned by the prophets both in Judah (cf. Jer. 7:17 f.; Ezek. 8) and Israel (Amos 4:4 f.; Hos. 2:13 ff.; 4:11 ff.; 13:2).

The same emphasis on moral righteousness, as contrasted with mere ritual, is also found in the Psalms (e.g. 40:7 f.; 50:8–15; 51:18 f.) and the Wisdom literature (cf. Prov. 15:8; 21:3, 27).

In the post-exilic period, sacrifice was restored soon after the return (Ezra 3:2–7). Darius authorized not only the rebuilding of the temple but provision for the cultus (Ezra 6:9 f.). Henceforth, the second temple remained the centre for Israelite religion (Ezra 6:17; 7:17; 8:35; 10:19; Neh. 10:33–37; 13:5, 9). But for Samaritan practice → Samaria. A Jewish colony in Egypt had its own temple at Elephantine which dates from before 525 B.C., when Cambyses invaded Egypt. It was destroyed by opponents in 410 B.C. There was also a shrine at Lachish in the Hellenistic period, but without an altar for burnt offering. The Jerusalem temple was destroyed in A.D. 70, and with it the sacrificial rites died out. But already in NT times the growth of synagogue worship had tended to displace sacrificial ritual which could only be participated in at Jerusalem. The Qumran community had already cut itself off from the temple cult. Here obedience to the Torah and the community rule and the praise of God replaced material sacrifices. In the writings of Philo the cultic rites of the OT are given spiritual interpretations, although the practice of sacrifice is still endorsed by other late writings of the intertestamental period (cf. Jub. 50:11; Sib. 3:570–79; 1 Macc. 1:45; 2:68; 2 Macc. 1:19 ff.; 3:1 ff., 32 ff.; for a survey of views in later Judaism and Hellenism see J. Behm, TDNT III 186–89). In Yoma 8:8 f. repentance is said to effect atonement for lesser transgressions, although the sin offering, guilt offering and Day of Atonement are still necessary. (For rabbinic teaching see R. A. Stewart, Rabbinic Theology: An Introductory Study, 1961, 119–40.)

NT thyō and its cognates are found in various NT writings. The vb. thyō occurs chiefly in Lk. and Acts (4 times each; once each in Matt., Mk. and Jn.; twice in 1 Cor.). Out of the 28 instances of the noun thysia 15 are in Heb. (it occurs twice each in Matt., Lk. and Acts; 5 times in Paul; and once each in Mk. and Jas.). Of the 23 passages with thysia stērion 8 are in Rev., 6 in Matt., 4 in Paul, 2 each in Lk. and Heb., and 1 in Jas. The whole word-group retreats into the background in the Pauline corpus and the Johannine writings. Examination of the context of these passages reveals how far the NT writers have dissociated themselves from the OT cult. Even the allusions to the altar in the visions of Rev. which formally lean heavily on the imagery of the OT exhibit a new interpretation of the concept of sacrifice.

1. In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus is seen in confrontation with the Jerusalem temple cult. He does not reject it any more than the prophets. Rather he directs his polemic against the attempt to evade God's radical demand of love through ritual and hair-splitting observance of the law. In the Sermon on the Mount priority is given to reconciliation, but not to the exclusion of formal worship. "So if you are offering your gift at the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar and go; first be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift" (Matt. 5:23 f.). The saying presupposes the continued practice of Judaism (cf. Matt. 5:17 f.), and would thus fit into the earthly ministry of Jesus. D. Hill draws attention to the existence of the idea of reconciliation in contemporary Judaism (Yoma 8:9), but it was overshadowed by the desire to avoid desecrating the temple or defiling oneself (cf. CD 6:14–7:4) (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 122). For Jesus, doing one's utmost to seek reconciliation between men is the sine qua non of true worship.

Hos. 6:6 is cited twice in Matt. On the first occasion the → Pharisees had complained that Jesus was guilty of defilement by eating with tax collectors and sinners. In reply Jesus says: "Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick. Go and learn what this means, 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice.' For I came not to call the righteous, but sinners" (Matt. 9:12 f.; the par. in Mk. 2:13–17 and Lk. 5:27–32 omit the quotation). On the first part of the reply about "those who are well" → Heal, art. hygiēs NT 1 (b). The introductory words "Go and learn" are a rabbinic formula (SB I 499), and correspond to Jesus' teaching method of appealing to → Scripture (cf. Matt. 5:17 f.; and Jn. 5:39). Although the precise relevance of the quotation is sometimes questioned (cf. D. Hill, op. cit., 174 f.), it is in fact germane to the issue and also in line with the previous teaching in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:23 f.). For "sacrifice", as the highest form of Israelite worship, stands for the keeping of the Mosaic law, which itself demanded separation from anything that defiles as a prerequisite for worship. The greater includes the less. But Jesus makes the radical point that what defiles is not what the Pharisees think, i.e. formal association with sinners, but the heart which lacks → mercy (Heb. ḥesed). However, the radical demand is not something new, invented by Jesus. It is already present in the Scriptures which both Jesus and the Pharisees accept.

Hos. 6:6 is again appealed to in Matt.'s account of the disciples plucking the ears of grain on the → sabbath (Matt. 12:7 but not in the par. Mk. 2:23–28 and Lk. 6:1–5). Here too "sacrifice" stands for the observance of the religious prescriptions of the law, and the principle is the same. Humane considerations take precedence over formal observance of the letter of the law. Moreover, something greater than the → temple is here (Matt. 12:6). "And if you had known what this means, 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice,' you would not have condemned the guiltless. For the Son of man is lord of the sabbath" (Matt. 12:7 f.).

In the series of woes pronounced on the scribes and Pharisees Jesus condemned the practice not only of swearing by the temple but also of swearing by the gold of the temple (Matt. 23:16 f.) and the altar and the sacrifice: "And you say, 'If any one swears by the altar, it is nothing; but if any one swears by the gift that is on the altar, he is bound by his oath.' You blind men! For which is greater, the gift or the altar that makes the gift sacred? So he who swears by the altar, swears by it and by everything on it; and he who swears by the temple, swears by it and by him who dwells in it; and he who swears by heaven, swears by the throne of God and by him who sits upon it" (Matt. 23:18–22; → Swear). The scribal rulings operated on the principle that oaths by the most holy things were to be avoided, because they were as binding as an oath made in God's name. But oaths made by less holy things were less serious and thus less binding (cf. D. Hill, op. cit., 312; SB I 931 f.). Jesus simply swept such rulings aside as chicanery. Men should not make an oath at all (whether before God or man), unless they intend to keep it (cf. Matt. 5:33–37). Again this later teaching illustrates the principles enunciated in the Sermon on the Mount.

In all this Jesus is not rejecting sacrifice and the temple as such; he is putting them in perspective. B. Gerhardsson has pointed out that Matt. does not present the death of Jesus as a sacrifice ("Sacrificial Service and Atonement in the Gospel of Matthew", in R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope; New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 25–35). "For Matthew, Jesus' deed is not a sacrifice from which mankind is only to reap the fruits. Jesus invites Israel to participate in the deep spiritual temple service he himself carries out" (op. cit., 31). For the terms in which Matt. presents the death of Jesus, see his use of lytron, "ransom" (Matt. 20:28; → Redemption) and Matt. 26:28 (→ Lord's Supper).

All four Gospels record the cleansing of the temple by Jesus (Matt. 21:10–17 par. Mk. 11:11, 15 ff.; Lk. 19:45 f.; Jn. 2:13–17). (For details of temple trade see J.

Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 48 f.) In the Synoptics it occurs as a symbolic act after Jesus' entry into Jerusalem in the last week of his ministry. It represents his coming into his own and the purging judgment of God on God's own house. Jn. likewise sets the account before the Passover, but places it before his narrative of the public ministry of Jesus. It is possible to read the whole section of Jn. 2:13–22 as a detached pericope which John has placed, not in its chronological sequence, but as a kind of trailer epitomizing Jesus' relationship with the Jews. In the synoptic account Jesus cites Isa. 56:7 ("these will I bring to my holy mountain, and make them joyful in my house of prayer; their burnt offerings and their sacrifices will be accepted on my altar; for my house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples") and Jer. 7:11 ("Has this house, which is called by my name, become a den of robbers in your eyes? Behold, I myself have seen it, says the LORD") in a conflated saying ("He said to them, 'It is written, "My house shall be called a house of prayer"; but you have made it a den of robbers' ", Matt. 21:13; cf. Mk. 11:17; Lk. 19:46; and Jn. 2:16). The saying combines the eschatological proclamation of Isaiah with Jeremiah's denunciation of the temple as it was in his day. Jesus' action is also a fulfilment of Mal. 3:1 ff. and was thus a messianic sign. The purification of Jerusalem and the temple was part of Jewish expectation (cf. Ps. Sol. 17:30). In Jn. 2:17 "His disciples remembered that it was written, 'Zeal for thy house will consume me' " (cf. Ps. 69:9). The Ps. itself adds: "and the insults of those who insult thee have fallen on me." This may well be implied in Jesus' action; the attitude of men to the temple expresses their attitude to God. Jn.'s narrative then compares the Jerusalem temple with the temple of Jesus' body – both of which are the dwelling place of God. And in both cases the attitude of the Jews of Jesus' day showed how oblivious they were to the presence of God among them.

Lk. 2:24 refers to the offering made by Joseph and Mary on behalf of their infant son (cf. Lev. 12:2–8; Exod. 13:2, 12) which consisted of two → birds on account of their poverty. Lk. 13:1 refers to the blood of those Galileans which Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. Josephus does not mention this particular incident but describes Pilate's cruelty on another occasion (War 2, 175). In this connexion Jesus rebutted the inference that anyone who so suffered must have been particularly guilty of sin. "I tell you, No; but unless you repent you will all likewise perish" (Lk. 13:3). The later predictions of judgment on Jerusalem (Lk. 17 and 21) underline the warning.

The guilt of those who reject God's servants is expressed in the saying "that upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on earth, from the blood of innocent Abel to the blood of Zechariah the son of Barachiah, whom you murdered between the sanctuary and the altar" (Matt. 23:35 par. Lk. 11:51). Not only were these the first and last victims of murder in the OT (Gen. 4:8; 2 Chr. 24:21); they were also murdered in connexion with sacrifice. The words "the son of Barachiah" are generally explained as a copyist's error, in the light of Zech. 1:1, and that the allusion is to Zechariah the son of Jehoiada. Lk. omits the appellation. On this passage → also Rule, art. metron NT 1.

The holokautōma, whole burnt offering, is mentioned in Mark's account of the two great commandments. The scribe acknowledges that Jesus is right and adds "and to love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the strength, and to love one's neighbour as oneself, is much more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices” (Mk. 12:33; → Command; → Love). For the other instances of this term in Heb. 10:6, 8 see below 3.

Stephen’s speech in Acts 7 similarly adopts a negative attitude to sacrifice. The first allusion is to the sacrifice to the golden calf (Acts 7:41; cf. Exod. 32:4, 6), and the second cites Amos 5:25 on the absence of sacrifice in the wilderness wanderings (cf. above OT 5). Stephen draws the conclusion that Israel’s failure to worship God in a spiritual way resulted in God giving Israel over to paganism.

There is a distinct note of futility in the reference to a pagan altar in the account of Paul’s Areopagus address: “Men of Athens, I perceive that in every way you are very religious. For as I passed along, and observed the objects of your worship, I found also an altar [bōmon] with this inscription, ‘To an unknown god.’ What therefore you worship as unknown, this I proclaim to you” (Acts 17:22). (On the use of the word bōmos for pagan altars in the Bible see above OT 2. It occurs only here in the NT. On this passage → God, art. theos NT 4 (b); → Knowledge, agnoeō NT 2 (b)).

2. The apostle Paul evidently continued to make occasional offerings himself. Acts 21:26 tells how Paul released four men who were under a vow: “Then Paul took the men, and the next day he purified himself with them and went into the temple, to give notice when the days of purification would be fulfilled and the offering presented for every one of them.” The four men concerned had evidently undertaken a Nazirite vow (cf. Num. 6:1–21 and the Mishnah tractate Nazir; and Acts 18:18). By associating himself with the men in their vow Paul was consistent with his principle of being all things to all men in order to win them (1 Cor. 9:22; cf. H. L. Ellison, “Paul and the Law – ‘All Things to All Men’”, in W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, eds., Apostolic History and the Gospel: Biblical and Historical Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce, 1970, 195–202). Whereas Paul repudiated the extension of → circumcision to the Gentiles, he nevertheless kept the law among Jews. “To the Jews I became as a Jew, in order to win Jews; to those under the law I became as one under the law – though not being myself under the law – that I might win those under the law. To those outside the law I became as one outside the law – not being without law toward God but under the law of Christ – that I might win those outside the law” (1 Cor. 9:20 f.; cf. his rejection of circumcision in Gal. with his circumcision of Timothy, Acts 16:3). Similarly, Acts 24:17 f. reports how Paul made offerings (prosphoras) and was purified in the temple.

In his letters Paul took over the Jewish-Christian interpretation of the death of Jesus which saw its saving efficacy in terms of OT sacrificial language. In urging moral purity to the Corinthians, Paul writes: “Cleanse out the old leaven that you may be fresh dough, as you really are unleavened. For Christ, our paschal lamb, has been sacrificed. Let us, therefore, celebrate the festival, not with the old leaven, the leaven of malice and evil, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth” (1 Cor. 5:7 f.; → Leaven; → Feast, art. pascha). Rom. 3:25 sees Jesus’ death as a hilasterion, propitiation (→ Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). Rom. 15:16 sums up the grace of Paul’s calling “to be a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles in the priestly service of the gospel of God, so that the offering (prospora) of the Gentiles may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit.” Here the Gentile Christians are the offering and Paul the priest (cf. the minhâh of the Diaspora Jews in Isa. 66:20; SB III 153). In Phil. 4:18 Paul describes the gifts sent by the Philippian as “a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God.” And in Phil. 2:17 he sees his own impending martyrdom in similar terms: “Even if I am to be poured [spendomai] as a libation upon the sacrificial offering [epi tē thysia kai leitourgia] of your faith, I am glad and rejoice with you all” (cf. Phil. 1:19–26). It has been argued that the use of the vb. spendomai (“pour out”) is never used of the pouring out of blood sacrifice, and that Paul has in mind not his death but his apostolic labours (cf. R. P. Martin, Philippians, New Century Bible, 1976, 108). However, the use of the word thysia and the fact that Paul was in prison expecting the possibility of execution suggest that Paul was thinking of his death, not as a propitiatory sacrifice but as a freewill offering for the sake of the church.

In Rom. 12:1 Paul sees the Christian life as a sacrifice: “I appeal to you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship.” The word “therefore” implies that the act of total commitment is a response to all that has gone before. It is life, not ritual, which is now the true sacrifice of the people of God. For further discussion of this passage → Serve, art. latreuō; → Prayer, art. entynchanō.

Eph. 5:2 urges its readers to “walk in love, as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us, a fragrant offering and a sacrifice to God [prosphoran kai thysian tō theō eis osmēn euōdias].” M. Barth sees here a fusion of the unbloody and bloody sacrifices of the OT (the Heb. minhâh and ’ôlâh), and draws two conclusions: “(a) The author designates Jesus Christ’s death as an atoning sacrifice offered by the pouring out of blood. Sacrifice is not just a metaphor, but here – as much as in Rom. 3 and Hebrews – its essence and fulfilment are declared to be present on the cross. The author’s theology and soteriology are priestly. (b) The reference to the ‘love’ of the one who was priest and victim at the same time shows that the prophetic, i.e. ethical and metaphorical meaning of sacrifice was joined with the cultic and priestly understanding. Equally in Heb. 9:14; cf. 5:7–9; 10:5–10, the ‘Spirit’ in which Jesus Christ brought his sacrifice, i.e. the obedience of the priest, is pointed out. In summary, the reference to the Messiah’s death in Eph. 5:2 has a double function. The ‘cross’ (2:16) is a once and for all valid saving event that cannot be duplicated or imitated, and it is an example which is to be followed” (Ephesians, II, Anchor Bible, 1974, 558 f.).

In Corinth there was an acute problem for the church over whether Christians should eat meat that had been sacrificed to idols. The term eidōlothyton (Acts 15:29; 21:25; 1 Cor. 8:1, 4, 7, 10; 10:19; Rev. 2:14, 20) refers to meat which had been sacrificed according to the rites of the locality, and thus offered to a pagan deity, part of which had been burned on an altar, part eaten at a solemn meal in the temple and part sold in the market for domestic consumption (cf. A. Ehrhardt, “Social Problems in the Early Church. I: The Sunday Joint of the Christian Housewife”, in The Framework of the New Testament Stories, 1964, 276–90; C. K. Barrett, “Things Sacrificed to Idols”, NTS 11, 1964–65, 138–53). The eating of it was condemned by the Jerusalem council. The church of Pergamum was accused of allowing men to eat it and of practising immorality, as was the church of Thyatira. From the Jewish standpoint it was unclean and therefore forbidden. For the Christian it raised the question of whether eating such meat implied some kind of allegiance to or communion with a pagan deity. The strong at Corinth said that they could do it with good → conscience and impunity (cf. 1 Cor. 4:4, 10; 8:1 f.). But the scrupulous had a conscience about it. Paul replied that the Christian should be guided by love rather than any vaunted “knowledge”, and therefore Paul would not eat meat at all, if it caused others to stumble (1 Cor. 8:1–13). In the course of his argument he points out that it is God from whom all things exist, regardless of whether one regards idols as something or nothing (vv. 4 ff.). The Christian should be guided by concern for the conscience of others, rather than by what he feels from his own conscience (vv. 10 ff.). To participate knowingly in something offered to demons is to be a partner with demons, and as such is incompatible with partaking of the Lord’s table (1 Cor. 19:19 ff.). On the other hand, where the Christian is unaware of demonic associations, he may eat the meat (10:23–30). But he should do everything to the glory of God, giving offence to none (10:31 ff.).

Between the two passages in which he deals with meat offered to idols Paul deals with the question of freedom and the Christian worker’s right to upkeep. Alluding to Deut. 18:1, he asks: “Do you not know that those who are employed in the temple service get their food from the temple, and those who serve at the altar share in the sacrificial offerings?” (1 Cor. 9:13 with reference to the → Levites; cf. also 10:18; Heb. 13:10; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 105 f. 46–49, 105 f.; though the practice was also known in pagan religion).

3. The central theme of the Epistle to the Hebrews is the way in which, through Christ, believers enter into the reality of which the OT institutions represent only an anticipation. This is developed in terms of → angels (Heb. 1:5–2:18), → Moses (3:1 ff.), → rest (3:7–4:13), the high priesthood of Jesus which is after the order of → Melchizedek (4:14–7:21) and which thus supersedes the OT order of → priests, the new → covenant which supersedes the old (8:7–13; 10:15 ff.), the Day of Atonement ritual (9:1–10:39), and Mount Zion as compared with Mount Sinai (12:18–29). At the same time the epistle shows that God deals with men on the basis of → faith, just as he did under the old covenant (ch. 11).

The noun thysia occurs in the following passages. The function of the high priest is defined in terms of offering gifts and sacrifices for sin (5:1; cf. 8:3). But Jesus “has no need, like these high priests, to offer sacrifices daily, first for his own sins and then for those of the people; he did this once for all when he offered up himself” (7:27). The gifts and sacrifices of the old tabernacle “cannot perfect the conscience of the worshipper” (9:9). Their very repetition shows that they “can never take away sins. But when Christ had offered for all time a single sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God” (10:11 f.; cf. the use of prospora, offering, in vv. 14 and 18). The earthly tabernacle is but a copy of the heavenly one. “Thus it was necessary for the copies of the heavenly things to be purified by these rites, but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these” (9:23). Adopting the symbolism of the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev. 16), Christ is seen by his resurrection and ascension, following his death, as entering the inner sanctuary once and for all on behalf of his people. “Nor was it to offer himself repeatedly, as the high priest enters the Holy Place yearly with blood not his own; for then he would have had to suffer repeatedly since the foundation of the world. But as it is, he has appeared once for all at the end of the age to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself” (9:25 f.; cf. 10:1).

Heb. 10:5–10 sees the coming of Christ anticipated in Ps. 40:6 ff.: “Consequently, when Christ came into the world, he said, ‘Sacrifices and offerings thou hast not desired, but a body hast thou prepared for me; in burnt offerings and sin offerings thou hast taken no pleasure. Then I said, “Lo, I have come to do thy will, O God,”’ as it is written of me in the roll of the book.' When he said above, 'Thou hast neither desired nor taken pleasure in sacrifices and offerings and burnt offerings and sin offerings' (these are offered according to the law), then he added, 'Lo, I have come to do thy will.' He abolishes the first in order to establish the second. And by that will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all." The Ps. is cited in the LXX which reads "a body didst thou prepare for me" in place of the MT "ears hast thou digged for me." This is best regarded as an interpretative paraphrase of the Heb. which uses the part for the whole (cf. F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964, 232). The idea of "digging" refers to the fashioning of the human body, the imagery indicating obedience expressed in bodily action. Alternatively, the "digging" of the ear may refer to the custom of Exod. 21:6. The four types of sacrifice mentioned in vv. 5ff. are thysia (= zebah), prosphora (also vv. 8 and 10) (= minhâh), holōkautōma (= ōlâh), and peri hamartias (= ḥattâ'î). "The spiritual principles which underlay these various types of sacrifice are fulfilled and transcended in the perfect self-offering of Christ. Our author's contrast is not between sacrifice and obedience, but between the involuntary sacrifice of dumb animals and 'sacrifice into which obedience enters, the sacrifice of a rational and spiritual being, which is not passive in death, but in dying makes the will of God its own'" (F. F. Bruce, op. cit., 234, citing J. Denney, The Death of Christ, revised by R. V. G. Tasker, 1951, 131). Unlike the purificatory rites of the old covenant which required constant repetition, the offering of Christ effects the sanctification of believers once and for all (ephapax, v. 10). But "if we sin deliberately after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins" (10:26; cf. 3:12; 6:4–8; 10:29; 12:25 ff.). This denotes contempt of the most flagrant kind, comparable with the rebellion of the Israelites who failed to enter the promised land (cf. chs. 3 and 4; Ps. 95:7 f.; Num. 14:1–35).

Heb. 11:4 sees the essential difference between the sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:3–10) as lying in the fact that, "By faith Abel offered to God a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain, through which he received divine approval as righteous, God bearing witness by accepting his gifts; he died, but through his faith he is still speaking."

The sacrifices that remain for the Christian are those of praise and good living: "Through him then let us continually offer up a sacrifice of praise to God, that is, the fruit of lips that acknowledge his name. Do not neglect to do good and to share what you have, for such sacrifices are pleasing to God" (13:15 f.). The linking of praise with practical living shows that such sacrifice extends beyond liturgical worship. The argument is set in the context of a reminder that we have no lasting city on earth (v. 14), and the break with Judaism. The writer has earlier seen Christ's death in terms of the Day of Atonement tabernacle ritual. But now he argues that, "We have an altar [thysiasērion] from which those who serve the tent have no right to eat. For the bodies of those animals whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest as a sacrifice for sin are burned outside the camp. So Jesus also suffered outside the gate in order to sanctify the people through his own blood. Therefore let us go forth to him outside the camp, bearing abuse for him" (13:10–13). The allusion is to the Day of Atonement animals (Lev. 16:27). The word "altar" is used by metonymy for "sacrifice", since the author does not have in mind a material altar (F. F. Bruce, op. cit., 399 f.). The saying is perhaps comparable with speaking of Christ as a hilastērion (Rom. 3:25; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). The “we” in question must mean “we Christians” (cf. 8:1) in contrast to the Jews who clung to the material sacrifices of the temple ritual. Those who do so have no right to feed on Christ. The absence of a visible altar (v. 10) is comparable with the absence of a visible city (v. 13). The Judaizers had both a visible altar and a visible city, Jerusalem, but not the spiritual reality. They also had material sacrifices in contrast to the spiritual sacrifices of praise and deed (v. 16). What the author has in mind is therefore something much wider than the eucharist, which he does not mention either here or by any reference to the bread and wine brought by → Melchizedek (7:1). It is only in writings of a much later date that the Lord’s Table was spoken of as an altar (possibly Irenaeus, Haer. 4, 18, 6; Tertullian, De Oratione 19; De Exhortatione Castitatis 10; and regularly from Cyprian onwards; cf. B. F. Westcott, “On the history of the word thysiasērion”, in The Epistle to the Hebrews, 1892², 453–61). thysiasērion is also mentioned in Heb. 7:13 in making the point that no one from a tribe other than that of Levi had ever served at the altar. But Jesus was descended from Judah (v. 14), which in itself is an indication that he was of a different order of priesthood.

4. The theme of the sacrifice of the Christian is taken up in 1 Pet. 2:4 f. in its assertion of the priesthood of all believers: “Come to him, to that living stone, rejected by men but in God’s sight chosen and precious; and like living stones be yourselves built into a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices [anenenkai pneumatikas thysias] acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (→ House; → Temple; → Priest; → Rock). This priesthood, which also includes being a holy nation, is defined in terms of declaring “the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light” (1 Pet. 2:9; cf. also Exod. 19:5 f.). It is grounded in the death of Christ which is described in sacrificial language. Thus the recipients of the letter are called “the exiles of the dispersion” (1:1), “chosen and destined by God the Father and sanctified by the Spirit for obedience to Jesus Christ and for sprinkling with his blood” (1:2a). The allusion here is probably to the enactment of the Mosaic covenant (Exod. 23:3–8) by which Israel was constituted the covenant people of God. It is by the death of Christ that believers of all nations are constituted the new people of God and the new priesthood of God. This latter thought takes up the symbolism of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood (Exod. 29:19 ff.) who were likewise sprinkled with blood. 1 Pet. 1:18 f. sees the death of Christ as a ransom which is also understood in sacrificial terms and which in turn provides the basis for the Christian life: “You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot” (→ Redemption, arts. lyō and lytron; → Blood; → Reconciliation, art. hilaskomai). “Since in 2:22–5 the writer draws deeply on Isa. 53 he may well have Isa. 53:7 in mind here (cf. Isa. 52:3 with its reference to redemption without money, suggestive of 1 Pet. 1:18)” (E. Best, 1 Peter, New Century Bible, 1971, 90). The passover lamb and the atoning animal sacrifices in the OT were expected to be perfect (Exod. 12:5; 29:1; Lev. 22:17–25; Ezek. 43:22 f.; cf. Heb. 9:14). “The words serve to bring out the value of the sacrifice of Christ’s blameless life (cf. 2:22)” (E. Best, op. cit., 90 f.).

5. In addition to the reference to thysiasērion, altar, noted above (Matt. 5:23 f.;

23:18 ff.; 23:35 par. Lk. 11:51; 1 Cor. 9:13; 10:18; Heb. 7:13; 13:10), altars are mentioned in the NT in the following passages. Zechariah received tidings of the birth of his son, John (the Baptist), from “an angel of the Lord standing on the right side of the altar of incense” (Lk. 1:11). The place indicates the solemnity and divine origin of the revelation. The right side was the south side, and the angel would be between the altar and the golden candlestick. On the north side was the table with the bread of the presence (cf. Exod. 40:22–27; → Incense; → Angel). Rom. 11:3 alludes to → Elijah’s complaint in 2 Ki. 19:4: “Lord, they have killed thy prophets, they have demolished thy altars, and I alone am left, and they seek my life.” The saying forms part of Paul’s argument about the remnant and the people of God. God has not rejected his people, even though it may seem as if there are no godly men left. Just as God kept for himself seven thousand men who had not bowed the knee to Baal, so he keeps a remnant today. But it is by grace and not works (Rom. 11:4 ff.; cf. 1 Ki. 19:18). Jas. 2:21 asks: “Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he offered his son Isaac upon the altar?” (→ Abraham; → Righteousness, art. dikaïosynē NT 7).

The remaining passages referring to altars all occur in Rev. The souls of the martyred saints are depicted under the altar crying out for vengeance (Rev. 6:9 f.). The vision is rich in OT allusions. Blood was poured out at the base of the altar (Lev. 4:7). Ps. 116:15 declares that “Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints.” And the same Psalm speaks of commitment and thanksgiving in sacrifice (vv. 12–19). The cry recalls the death of Abel (Gen. 4:10; cf. Heb. 11:4). The sacrifices of the martyrs are in no sense atoning; but neither were all the sacrifices in the OT. The prayers of the saints have a sacrificial character: “And another angel came and stood at the altar with a golden censer; and he was given much incense to mingle with the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar before the throne” (Rev. 8:3). The mingling of → incense indicates symbolically the hallowing of the prayers from a source outside man, without which his prayers would not be acceptable to God. The action of the angel in taking fire from the altar and throwing it on earth (Rev. 8:5) is a sign that the prayers are answered in the judgments that will befall the earth (cf. Rev. 6:9 f.). The judgment pronounced by “the voice from the four horns of the golden altar before God” (Rev. 9:13) again indicates the divine judgment in answer to the cries of the saints. The miniature golden altar of incense stood within the Holy Place of the tabernacle (Exod. 30:1–10). Similarly in Rev. 14:18 and 16:7 judgment comes from the altar.

In Rev. 11:1 John is told to “measure the temple of God and the altar and those who worship there.” He is not, however, to measure the court outside the temple which is given over to the nations who will trample over the holy city for forty-two months (Rev. 11:2). The measuring symbolizes setting the holy places apart from that which is profane and will be subject to tribulation and judgment. But that which is set apart – the sanctuary which symbolizes the people of God – will come through the tribulation (cf. also Ezek. 40:5; 42:20; Zech. 2:1; → Rule, art. metron). Just as the sealed will come to no ultimate harm, so the sanctuary, which represents the true church which is sanctified by God himself, will be safe when the wrath of God falls on the holy city.

C. Brown

→ Covenant, → Feast, → Gift, → Incense, → Lord’s Supper, → Melchizedek, → Priest, → Reconciliation, → Redemption, → Salt, → Serve, → Sin

(a). Y. Aharoni, "Trial Excavation in the 'Solar Shrine' at Lachish", Israel Exploration Journal 18, 1968, 157–68; C. K. Barrett, "Things Sacrificed to Idols", NTS 11, 1964–65, 138–53; M. Barth, Was Christ's Death a Sacrifice? SJT Occasional Papers 9, 1961; and Ephesians, I–II, Anchor Bible, 1974; J. Behm, thyō, thysia, thysiastrion, TDNT III 180–90; S. Belkin, Philo and the Oral Law, 1940; E. Best, "Spiritual Sacrifice: General Priesthood in the New Testament", Interpretation 14, 1960, 280–90; and 1 Peter, New Century Bible, 1971; F. F. Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews, NLC, 1964; and "Altar, NT" IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 19 f.; H. Cazelles and R. Schnackenburg, "Sacrifice", EBT III 800–6; R. E. Clements, A Century of Old Testament Study, 1976; J. E. Coleran, "Origins of the Old Testament Sacrifice", CBQ 2, 1940, 130–44; O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, 1963²; G. Dellling, aparchē, TDNT I 484 ff.; G. R. Driver, "Three Technical Terms in the Pentateuch", JSS 1, 1956, 97–105; A. Ehrhardt, "Social Problems in the Early Church. I: The Sunday Joint of the Christian Housewife", in The Framework of the New Testament Stories, 1964, 276–90; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, 141–72; G. D. Fee, "II Corinthians vi.14–vii.1 and Food offered to Idols", NTS 23, 1976–77, 140–61; G. Fohrer, History of Israelite Religion, 1972; K. Galling, "Altar", IDB I 96–100; "Incense Altar", IDB II 699 f.; T. H. Gaster, "Sacrifices and Offerings, OT", IDB IV 147–59; B. Gerhardsson, "Sacrificial Service and Atonement in the Gospel of Matthew", in R. J. Banks, ed., Reconciliation and Hope: New Testament Essays on Atonement and Eschatology Presented to L. L. Morris, 1974, 25–35; G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament: Its Theory and Practice, 1925; J. Gray, "Cultic Affinities between Israel and Ras Shamra", ZAW 62, 1949–50, 207–220; A. Guglielmo, "Sacrifice in the Ugaritic Texts", CBQ 17, 1955, 196–216; M. Haran, "The Use of Incense in the Ancient Israelite Ritual", VT 10, 1960, 113–29; "The Complex of Ritual Acts Performed inside the Tabernacle", Scripta Hierosolymitana VIII, Studies in the Bible, ed. C. Rabin, 1961, 272–301; and "The Priestly Image of the Tabernacle", Hebrew Union College Annual 36, 1965, 191–226; and "Zebaḥ hayyamîm", VT 19, 1969, 11–22; M. Held, "Philological Notes on the Mari Covenant Rituals", BASOR 200, 1970, 32–40; D. R. Hillers, "Ugaritic šnpt 'Wave Offering'", BASOR 198, 1970, 42; and "Additional Note", BASOR 200, 1970, 18; H. Hubert and M. Mauss, Sacrifice: Its Nature and Function, (1898) ET 1964; E. O. James, "Sacrifice (Introductory and Primitive)", ERE XI 1 ff.; Origins of Sacrifice: A Study in Comparative Religion, 1937²; and "Aspects of Sacrifice in the Old Testament", ExpT 50, 1938–39, 151–55; F. B. Jevons, An Introduction to the History of Religion, 1927⁹; D. Jones, "The Cessation of Sacrifice after the Destruction of the Temple in 586 B.C.", JTS New Series 14, 1963, 12–31; Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel, 1961; D. Kellermann, 'āšām, TDOT I 429–37; H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Ancient Israel, 1966; G. van der Leeuw, Religion in its Essence and Manifestation, 1964²; B. A. Levine, "The Descriptive Tabernacle Texts of the Pentateuch", Journal of the American Oriental Society 85, 1965, 307–18; "Comments on Some Technical Terms of the Biblical Cult", Lešonenu 30, 1966, 3–11; and In the Presence of the Lord, 1974; B. A. Levine and W. Hallo, "Offerings to the Temple Gates at Ur", Hebrew Union College Annual 38, 1967, 17–58; S. Lyonnet and L. Sabourin, Sin, Redemption, and Sacrifice: A Biblical and Patristic Study, Analecta Biblica 48, 1970; D. J. McCarthy, "The Symbolism of Blood and Sacrifice", JBL 88, 1969, 166–76; and "Further Notes on the Symbolism of Blood and Sacrifice", JBL 92, 1973, 205–10; W. T. McCree, "The Covenantal Meal in the Old Testament", JBL 45, 1926, 120–28; J. Milgrom, Studies in Levitical Terminology, I, 1970, 1–43; "The Function of the ḥaṭṭā't Sacrifice", Tarbiz 40, 1970–71, 1–8; "Sin-Offering or Purification-Offering", VT 21, 237–39; "Two kinds of ḥaṭṭā't", VT 26, 1976, 333–37; "Israel's Sanctuary: The Priestly 'Picture of Dorian Gray'", RB 83, 1976, 390 ff.; "Day of Atonement", Encyclopaedia Judaica, V, 1384–87; "Kipper", ibid., X, 1039–44; "Leviticus, Book of", ibid., XI, 138–47; Cult and Conscience, 1976; "Sacrifices and Offerings, OT", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 763–71; "The Alleged Wave-Offering in Israel and in the Ancient Near East", Israel Exploration Journal 22, 1972, 33–8; and "A Prolegomenon to Leviticus 17:11", JBL 90, 1971, 149–56; T. C. Mitchell, "Altar", NBD, 27 f.; G. F. Moore, "Sacrifice", Encyclopaedia Biblica, IV 4183–4233; L. Morris, "'Asham", EQ 21, 1958, 196–210; W. O. E. Oesterley, Sacrifices in Ancient Israel: Their Origin, Purposes and Development, 1927; A. L. Oppenheim, Ancient Mesopotamia, 1964, 183–98, 206–27; W. P. Paterson, "Sacrifice", HDB IV 329–49; J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture, III–IV, 1940, 299–375; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 250–72; A. F. Rainey, "The Order of Sacrifices in the Old Testament Ritual Texts", Biblica 51, 1970, 485–98; and "Sacrifice and Offerings", ZPEB IV 194–211; H. W. Robinson, "Hebrew Sacrifice and Prophetic Symbolism", JTS 48, 1942, 129–39; H. H. Rowley, "The Law and the Prophets", in The Unity of the Bible, 1953, 30–61; "The Meaning of Sacrifice in the Old Testament", BJRL 33, 1950–51, 74–110 (reprinted in From Moses to Qumran: Studies in the Old Testament, 1963, 67–110); and “Ritual and the Hebrew Prophets”, JSS 1, 1956, 338–60 (reprinted ibid., 111–38, and also in S. H. Hooke, ed., Myth, Ritual and Kingship, 1958, 236–60); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion, 1977; P. Saydon, “Sin-Offering and Trespass-Offering”, CBQ 8, 1946, 393–98; W. Robertson Smith, The Religion of the Semites: The Fundamental Institutions, (1889) 1927³, ed., S. A. Cook; N. H. Snaith, “The Sin-Offering and the Guilt Offering”, VT 15, 1965, 73–80; and “Sacrifices in the Old Testament”, VT 7, 1957, 308–17; W. B. Stevenson, “Hebrew ‘Olah and Zebach Sacrifices”, in Festschrift Alfred Bertholet, 1950, 488–97; R. A. Stewart, Rabbinic Theology: An Introductory Study, 1961, 119–40; R. J. Thompson, Penitence and Sacrifice in Early Israel Outside the Levitical Law, 1963; R. J. Thompson and R. T. Beckwith, “Sacrifice and Offering”, NBD 1113–23; E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture: Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Language, Art, and Custom, 1929⁵; D. M. L. Urie, “Sacrifice among the West Semites”, Palestine Exploration Quarterly, 1949, 67–82; R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Its Life and Institutions, 1961, 415–510; and Studies in Old Testament Sacrifice, 1964; T. C. Vriezen, An Outline of Old Testament Theology, 1958; K. Weiss, prosphero, prosphora, TDNT IX 65–8; B. F. Westcott, “On the History of the word thysiasierion”, in The Epistle to the Hebrews, 1892², 453–61; R. B. Wright, Sacrifice in the Inter-testamental Literature, (Dissertation, Hartford Seminary) 1966; R. K. Yerkes, Sacrifice in Greek and Roman Religion and in Early Judaism, 1952.

(b). M. Albertz, “Die ‘Erstlinge’ der Botschaft des Neuen Testaments”, EvTh 12, 1952–53, 151 ff.; A. Bertholet, Der Sinn des kultischen Opfers, 1942; G. Bornkamm, “Lobpreis, Bekenntnis und Opfer”, in Aphoreta. Festschrift E. Haenchen, 1964, 46 ff.; J. Carmignac, “L’Utilité ou l’Inutilité des Sacrifices Sanguinants dans la Règle de la Communauté de Qumrân”, RB 63, 1956, 524–32; A. Charbel, “Virtus Sanguinis non Expiatoria in Sacrificio šlāmim”, Sacra Pagina 1, 1959, 366–76; P. Corssen, “Der Altar des unbekanntes Gottes”, ZNW 14, 1913, 309–23; S. Daniel, Recherches sur le Vocabulaire du Culte dans la Septante, 1966; R. Dussaud, Les Origines Cananéennes du Sacrifice Israélite, 1941²; O. Eissfeldt, Erstlinge und Zehnte im Alten Testament, 1917; K. Elliger, Leviticus, Handbuch zum Alten Testament 4, 1966; and “Zur Analyse des Sündopfergesetzes”, in A. Kuschke, ed., Verbannung und Heimkehr, 1961, 39–50; I. Fransen, “La Loi du Sacrifice”, Bible et Vie Chrétienne 30, 1959, 21–30; K. Galling, Der Altar in den Kulturen des Alten Orients, 1925; G. Gerleman, “Der Wurzel šlm”, ZAW 85, 1973, 1–14; H. J. Hermisson, Sprache und Ritus im altisraelitischen Kult, 1965; D. Hoffmann, Das Buch Leviticus, 1965; J. Hofstijzer, “Das sogenannte Feueropfer”, VT Supplements 16, 1967, 114–34; J. Jeremias, Der Opfertod Jesu Christi, Calwer Heft 62, 1965⁵; E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk, 1957²; D. Kellermann, “āšām in Ugarit”, ZAW 76, 1964, 319–22; K. Koch, Die israelitische Sühneanschauung und ihre historische Wandlungen, 1956; J. Landersdorfer, Studien zum biblischen Versöhnungstag, 1924; G. van der Leeuw, “Die do-ut-des Formel in der Opfertheorie”, ARW 20, 1920–21, 241 ff.; B. A. Levine, “Kippurim”, Eretz-Israel 9, 1969, 88–95; A. Loisy, Essai Historique sur le Sacrifice, 1920; N. M. Loss, “La Partecipazione Dei Laici al Rito Dell’ Olocausto”, Salesianum 23, 1961, 353–62; and “Olocausto e Sacrificio Pacifico”, ibid. 24, 1962, 525–33; E. Madar, Die Menschenopfer der alten Hebräer und der benachbarten Völker, 1919; A. Médebielle, L’Expiation dans l’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament, I, 1924; “De Sacrificii Israelitici Origine et Natura”, Verbum Domini 7, 1926, 214–19, 338–44; and “Expiation”, Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, III, 1938, 48–112; A. Metzinger, “Die Substitutionstheorie”, Biblica 21, 1940, 159–87; O. Michel, Der Brief an die Hebräer, KEK 13, 1966¹²; L. Moraldi, “Terminologia Cultuale Israelitica”, Rivista degli Studi Orientali 32, 1957, 321–37; and Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori nell’ambiente biblico e nell’ Antico Testamento, 1956; S. Mowinkel, Religion und Kultus, 1953; H. G. Müller-Schwefe, “Die Bedeutung des Opfers für unsere Zeit”, in Zeitwende/Die neue Furche, 1964, 163 ff.; R. Rendtorff, Studien zur Geschichte des Opfers im alten Israel, WMANT 24, 1967; R. Rendtorff, E. Kamlah, W. Anderson, “Opfer”, EKL II 1691 ff.; L. Sabourin, Rédemption Sacrificielle: Une Enquête Exégétique, Studia 11, 1961; A. Schimmel, R. Hentschke; H. D. Wendland, E. Kinder, H. Beintker, “Opfer”, *RGG*³ IV 1637 ff.; R. Schmid, Das Bundesopfer in Israel. Wesen, Ursprung und Bedeutung der alttestamentlichen Schelamim, 1964; O. Schmitz, Die Opferschauung des späteren Judentums und die Opferaussagen des Neuen Testaments, 1910; D. Schötz, Schuld- und Sündopfer im Alten Testament, 1930; C. Spica, L’Épître aux Hébreux, I–II, 1953³; A. Wendel, Das Opfer in der israelitischen Religion, 1927.

Sadducees, Herodians

Σαδδουκαῖοι

Σαδδουκαῖοι (Saddoukaioi), Sadducees.

The noun is always found in the plur. It designates a group, sect or party within Palestinian Judaism before and during the first century. It is usually assumed that the term goes back to the proper name Zadok (Heb. Šādôq; LXX Saddouk), the name of several priests, one as early as David's reign (2 Sam. 15:24 ff.; 17:15; 19:11) who with his family gained control of the high priesthood and temple under → Solomon (1 Ki. 2:35; 1 Chr. 29:22). "The Levitical priests, the sons of Zadok," minister in the sanctuary in Ezekiel's vision of the reconstructed temple (Ezek. 44:14). However, the identification of the Sadducees with the Zadokites is by no means certain, and there are conflicting traditions about their origin.

Information about the Sadducees with any claim to authenticity is found in only three bodies of ancient literature: (1) Josephus (Ant. 13, 117 ff., 293 ff.; 18, 11, 16 f.; 20, 199; War 2, 119, 162 ff.; Life 10); (2) the NT (Mk. 12:28 [par. Matt. 22:23; Lk. 20:27]; Matt. 3:7; 16:1, 6, 11, 12; 22:34; Acts 4:1; 5:17; 23:6, 7, 8); and (3) the Mishnah (Erubin 6:2; Makkoth 1:6; Parah 3:3, 7; Niddah 4:2; Yadaim 4:6, 7). There are numerous post-Mishnaic references to the Sadducees in the Talmud, but most are late, confused, unreliable, and sometimes makes "Sadducee" a synonym for "heretic" or → "Samaritan".

Josephus first mentions the Sadducees (Ant. 13, 293) in connexion with the reign of John Hyrcanus (135–105 B.C.) but assumes that they were a well-established group by that time. He says that they were rude in their conduct (War 2, 166; cf. Ant. 18, 16), few in number, included "men of high standing" (Ant. 18, 16), and held the "confidence of the wealthy alone" (Ant. 18, 293). When they assumed rule, the people tolerated them only when they reluctantly followed "the formulae of the Pharisees" (Ant. 18, 17).

Josephus usually refers to the Sadducees in the context of their continued controversy with the Pharisees. These groups differed because the Sadducees "own no observance of any sort apart from the laws" (Ant. 18, 16), by which Josephus means the Sadducees rejected the oral law ("regulations handed down by former generations and not recorded in the laws of Moses", Ant. 13, 297) which was authoritative for the Pharisees. The Sadducees also rejected belief in continued existence, bodily resurrection, or rewards and punishments after death (War 2, 165; Ant. 18, 16). Josephus twice notes Sadducean rejection of "Fate" (i.e., predestination); in order to dissociate God from evil they hold that "all things lie within our own power, so that we ourselves are responsible for our own well-being, while we suffer misfortune through our own thoughtlessness" (War 2, 164 f.; cf. Ant. 13, 173).

In the NT, Matt. 3:7–9 and 16:1–16 name the Sadducees along with the Pharisees as leaders of the Jewish people rebuked by both John the Baptist and Jesus. In Mk. 12:18–27 (par. Matt. 22:23–32, Lk. 20:27–39) the Sadducees, "who say that there is no resurrection", presented Jesus with a situation which to their notion made belief in the resurrection look ridiculous. Jesus constructed an argument based on the written law which silenced them (→ Resurrection, art. anastasis OT 4).

Acts places the Sadducees among the opponents of early Christians. In Acts 4:1 the Sadducees are associated with, but distinguished from, the priests; in 5:17, those with the high priests are specifically identified as “the party of the Sadducees”. Acts 4:2 tells that the opponents of the Christians were “annoyed because they were teaching the people and proclaiming in Jesus the resurrection from the dead.” Acts 23:6–9 describes an uproar in the Jewish Council when Paul, perceiving the presence of both Sadducees and Pharisees, identified himself with the latter. Acts adds, “The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, nor angels, nor spirits; but the Pharisees acknowledge them all.”

Mishnaic and rabbinic references to the Sadducees describe them almost entirely in terms of their differences with the → Pharisees on ritual, ceremonial, and judicial matters. These issues involved a wide range of questions relating to such matters as the date and observance of certain feasts, → sabbath-keeping, the way sacrifices were to be offered and → temple ritual performed, the conduct and penalties in criminal cases, and procedures relating to ceremonial defilement and cleanliness (see L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees, 1940, II, 637 ff.; and J. W. Bowker, Jesus and the Pharisees, 1973, 53 ff.).

From these sources one might generalize as follows. The Sadducees came into existence during the intertestamental period, probably assuming their definitive stance after the Hasmonean priest-rulers gained firm control. They were closely associated with the priestly aristocracy (although not necessarily identical with it) and hence deeply involved in political matters. Like the priests, the Sadducees seem to have given at least some support to foreign influences (e.g., Hellenism) and powers (e.g., the Romans) present in Jewish Palestine in order to maintain their own position.

Their religious and theological views resulted from conservative, literal handling of the OT law. They were bitter opponents of the Pharisees for whom oral tradition was an attempt to interpret, up-date, and apply the written law in the face of changing circumstances. The Sadducees had their own traditions and hermeneutical methods which accepted the written law (i.e., the Pentateuch) alone as authoritative. Hence they refused the mass of post-biblical developments associated with Pharisaism, including belief in the imminence of divine activity and life after death.

The Sadducees were essentially secularists. This doubtless resulted from their exclusion of God (“Fate”) from human history and their limitation of man’s existence and blessing to this life. The consequences of their this-worldly orientation were many. For example, they went to great lengths to protect their power and prestige; many of their ceremonial positions, Lauterbach observes, benefited the priests financially.

These motives stirred the Sadducees to opposition against Jesus and the Jewish church. Jesus’ preaching and activities posed a threat to the political status quo and the dominance of the priestly party within it (cf. Jn. 11:47 ff.). Jesus’ emphasis upon the spiritual realm, his attacks upon the external religion of Jewry, and the popular acceptance accorded Jesus and his followers could have endangered the already precarious position of the Sadducees. Furthermore, Christianity was in agreement with much in the position of the Sadducees’ enemies, the Pharisees. However, the Sadducees found one emphasis of Christian doctrine more objectionable than any Pharisaic teaching. While the latter taught the resurrection as a theory and future possibility, the Christians taught it as a present reality, accomplished in Jesus (cf. Acts 4:2).

The Sadducees were closely associated with the external institutions and concerns of the Jerusalem-centred Judaism of the first and preceding centuries. With the destruction of the Second Jewish Commonwealth by the Romans, c. A.D. 70, Sadducean influence was lost.

J. Julius Scott, Jr.

Ἡρωδιανοί

Ἡρωδιανοί (Hērōdianoî), Herodians.

Although, as their name implies, the Herodians appear to have been supporters of the house of Herod, little is known about them. They are twice reported in the Gospels to have joined forces with the Pharisees in efforts to destroy Jesus. The first instance is the direct outcome of the sabbath healing of the man with the withered hand in a Galilean synagogue (Mk. 3:6). The second incident takes place in Jerusalem when the question is raised about paying tribute to Caesar (Matt. 22:16; Mk. 12:13). Josephus mentions hoi ta Hērōdou phronountes in Judea (Ant. 14, 450) and Hērōdeioi in Galilee (War 1, 139). Both Gk. expressions mean “partisans of Herod”, but are unlikely to refer to the Hērōdianoî of the Gospels. In some circles they may have been known as Boethusians, a family providing many high priests in the 1st cent. A.D. But Mark does not use that term, and probably a rather amorphous group of pro-Herod aristocrats is intended by “Herodians” in the gospels.

H. H. Rowley (JTS 41, 1940, 14–27) reviews various interpretations of Hērōdianoî. He concludes that the Herodians were not members of Herod’s domestic staff, for the Pharisees would hardly associate with such a class, let alone propose an alliance, implying equal status. Neither were the Herodians court officers, for to bring along those with official positions to question Jesus would be to menace him rather than lay a subtle snare against him. Nor are court officers accustomed to enquire of any beneath them as to the legality of the taxes they themselves levy. Herodians as a term, therefore, is likely to refer not to an organized party but to men of a particular political outlook, that of support for the house of Herod, and thus, as the best way to achieve that end, of support for the occupying Roman power. A. Schalit (König Herodes, 1969, 479–81) suggests that Herodians were men whose friendship Herod the Great bought in an effort to improve public relations. The Jews had an intense dislike of Herod and all his works.

It seems more probable that the Herodians arose during the principality of Antipas, who apparently adopted the name of Herod after the deposition of Archelaus. Herod the Great had not thought Jews fit for autonomy, or had not dared to entrust them with it. His cities had all been pagan, and the towns he had built on Jewish soil had been administered by his own officials. Antipas rebuilt Sephoris, demolished by Varus in 4 B.C., and founded a new city on the West shore of the Sea of Galilee, naming it Tiberias after his imperial patron. As a cautious experiment, Antipas brought in Jewish officials to govern both cities, each with a regular Græek constitution. Thus Antipas proved that he could depend on the loyalty of the Jewish upper classes, who filled all the offices in councils and magistracies. Antipas’ quarrel with Pilate, whatever its origin, no doubt caused his stock to rise among the populace, for there was widespread dissatisfaction with Pilate’s rule. Many leading Jews had also been affronted at the low rank of the Roman governors sent to their province after the death of Herod the Great. The rule of the procurators had originated in the desire of the Jews not to suffer another Herod the Great. But when they found that procuratorial rule was even less bearable, there was an upsurge of general support for the house of Herod in the person of Antipas. That support was in part given expression by the appearance in his reign of the Herodians, who as a group probably included not only the official aristocracy which Antipas had created, but other Jews of influence and standing. While the Herodians were pro-Roman, as the test question to Jesus about the tribute-money shows, they aimed at the indirect rule of Rome, mediated through its loyal agents, the Herodian dynasty (Origen, Comm. on Matt. 22:16). Furthermore, the Herodian kings might be a useful buffer against the arrogance and intolerance of the average equestrian governor. Antipas' experiment was justified by the results. The governing classes of Sepphoris and Tiberias remained outstandingly loyal to the Herodian house and to the Roman government during the Great Rebellion (A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judea, 1938, 179).

The Pharisees were no friends of the Herods, but for them to ally with the Herodians in the tribute-money incident is understandable. Both parties were seeking to get rid of Jesus as a potential trouble-maker, as they saw it, whose activities would sooner or later cause the Romans to intervene and thereby threaten the Jewish establishment. But why did the Pharisees turn to the Herodians in the other incident of the healing of the man with the withered hand in the synagogue on the sabbath? The issue, on the surface at least, is one involving the Torah. But the Herodians were apparently more concerned with political than with religious issues. Indeed, they seem not to have been present at the service, since it is said only of the Pharisees that they went out of the synagogue to take counsel with the Herodians (Mk. 3:6). At other times the Pharisees were prepared to swallow their dislike of the Sadducees and work with them in order to try to discredit Jesus (Matt. 16:1). Geography prevented a similar alliance on this occasion. The aristocratic priestly party of the Sadducees was based only on Jerusalem. By contrast, Pharisees were to be found all over the country. The controversial healing of the withered hand took place in Galilee. The Pharisees had to turn for support to the Herodians as the only other influential body in the area. The Herodians might not be interested in the religious question involved in Jesus' apparent breach of the sabbath, but they were concerned with preventing trouble which might lead to disturbances and so threaten the political and social order. The Herodians had a vested interest in maintaining the status quo. The Pharisees opposed Jesus on religious grounds for what they regarded as disrespect for the law, the Herodians on political grounds, for his messianic claims conflicted with their hopes for the restoration of Herodian rule in Judea.

Although he had an interest in the Herods, Luke never mentions the Herodians in his parallel accounts of the two incidents (Lk. 6:6–11; 20:20–26), presumably because Herodians would have had little significance for his readers. The absence of references to Herodians outside the gospels suggests their presence was short-lived.

In Mk. 8:15 some MSS read, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of the Herodians" (the better attested reading is Herod), while the parallel passage in Matt. 16:6 speaks of Pharisees and Sadducees. But the equation that all Herodians were Sadducees is unlikely, though probably some were. (The two parties are mentioned as separate groups in Matt. 12:13, 18.) Politically, the Sadducees seem to have remained loyal to the memory of the Hasmoneans, a fact which Herod the Great recognized by never choosing a high priest from the Hasmonean house

(Josephus, Ant. 15, 22, 39–41, 320–322). Geographically, the Sadducees were centred solely on Jerusalem, whereas at Mk. 3:6 Herodians are also to be found in Galilee. In Jerusalem, however, where Herodians and Sadducees were likely to meet, the two parties would naturally tend to support one another on many issues. Both were the aristocrats of the day. Both depended for their positions on an understanding with the house of Herod. The marriage of Herod Antipas with Herodias about A.D. 29 may well have brought the two groups together. N. Hillyer

On the Sadducees:

(a) S. W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, II, 1953, 35 ff.; J. W. Bowker, Jesus and the Pharisees, 1973, 53 ff.; G. H. Box, “Who were the Sadducees?”, The Expositor, Eighth Series 15, 1918, 19–38; and “Scribes and Sadducees in the New Testament”, ibid., 401–11, and 16, 1918, 55–69; W. W. Buehler, The Pre-Herodian Civil War and Social Debate, 1974, 95 ff.; E. E. Ellis, “Jesus, the Sadducees, and Qumran”, NTS 10, 1963–64, 274 ff.; L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees, II, 1940, 637 ff.; D. A. Hagner, “Sadducees”, ZPEB V, 211–16; P. Z. Lauterbach, “The Sadducees and Pharisees”, in Rabbinic Essays, 1951, 23 ff.; J. W. Lightley, Jewish Sects and Parties in the Time of Jesus, 1925, 11–78; T. W. Manson, “Sadducees and Pharisees – The Origin and Significance of the Names”, BJRL 22, 1938, 144–59; R. Meyer, Saddoukaïos, TDNT VII 35–54; Schürer, II, 2, 29 ff.; M. H. Segal, “Pharisees and Sadducees”, The Expositor, Eighth Series 13, 1917, 81 ff.; M. Simon, The Jewish Sects at the Time of Jesus, 1967, 22 ff.; A. C. Sundberg, “Sadducees”, IDB IV 160–63.

(b) G. Hölscher, Der Sadduzäismus, 1906; R. Leszynsky, Die Sadduzäer, 1912; SB IV 334–52; M. Wagner, Die Parteien im jüdischen Volke zur Zeit Jesu, 1893; J. Wellhausen, Die Phariseer und die Sadducäer, 1874.

On the Herodians:

(a) B. W. Bacon, “Pharisees and Herodians in Mark”, JBL 39, 1920, 102–12; W. J. Bennett, Jr, “The Herodians in Mark’s Gospel”, NovT 17, 1974, 9–14; L. Finkelstein, The Pharisees, I–II, 1938; M. Grant, The Jews in the Roman World, 1975; H. W. Hoehner, Herod Antipas, 1972; A. H. M. Jones, The Herods of Judaea, 1938; H. H. Rowley, “The Herodians in the Gospels”, JTS 41, 1940, 14–27; E. M. Smallwood, The Jews under Roman Rule, 1976.

(b) E. Bickerman, “Les Hérodiens”, RB, 47, 1938, 184–97; P. Joüon, “Les ‘Hérodiens’ de l’évangile”, RSR, 28, 1938, 585–8.

Salt

ἅλας ἅλας (halas); ἅλις (hals), salt; ἅλυκος (halykos), salty; ἅλιζω (halizō), to salt, season with salt; ἄναλος (analogos), saltless, insipid; συναλιζω (synalizō), to assemble with, eat (salt) with.

CL halas, or, more commonly, hals, salt (from Homer); poetically, the sea; proverbially, to have eaten a bushel of salt together, i.e., be old friends; to eat the proverbial salt in company, i.e., be bound by ties of hospitality (Aristot.). halizō, to supply with salt, to salt food (Aristot.); to collect, assemble, as military forces, fragments, etc. (Hdt.). halykos, salty (Aristoph.); analogos (Aristot.) or analmos (Xen.), without salt, unsalted. synalizō, frequently in Hdt. and Xen., to bring together, collect; or if derived from hals, to eat (salt) with, eat at the same table. The passive means to come together, assemble.

The domestic and medicinal value of salt both as condiment and preservative was as universal in the ancient world as it is today. Pliny declared that “salt has something of the nature of fire”, and he quotes a current saying, “To the whole body nothing is better than sun and salt” (Nat. Hist. 31, 98, 102). Salt on sacrifices no doubt originated from the primitive conception of sacrifice as the meal of a god (Homer), but the association of salt with the deity (Plato) also balanced the notion of putrefaction and corruption being linked with demons. Lasting alliances were made by eating bread and salt, or salt alone (Aristot.). Cato, Virgil, and Pliny all refer to the ability of salt to improve the productivity of the soil.

OT The Heb. verb mālah, to salt, is translated in the LXX by halizō, and the corresponding noun melaḥ by hals, hala, or halas. halykos occurs only in reference to the Dead Sea (Num. 34:3). It is used three times in Gen. 14 in an effort to interpret rather than translate the obscure Heb. term siddim, valley of Siddim, later submerged beneath the Salt Sea after the divine judgment upon Sodom and Gomorrah.

Apart from various outcrops, the main source of salt in Palestine was from the so-called Hill of Salt (Jebel Usdum) which stretched for some seven miles along the SW corner of the Dead Sea. Salt was also obtained by evaporation from water in salt pits in the same area (Zeph. 2:19; 1 Macc. 11:35) and from the incrustation of marshes along the shore (Ezek. 47:11). Incrustation salt was much less bitter, since as the saline water rose through the marsh soil much of the magnesium chloride causing the bitterness was absorbed. Salt was a necessity of life in Palestine (Ezr. 7:22; Sir. 39:26), as elsewhere in the ancient world, for a people whose diet was vegetables. The consequent commercial value of salt is illustrated by many references to taxation (1 Macc. 10:29), and to the Torah's being likened to salt "which the world cannot do without" (Sopherim 15:8). Salt was used to preserve fish and meat (Bar. 6:28), as a condiment (Job 6:6), and for toothache (Shabbath 6:5). The practice of rubbing a newborn baby with salt (Ezek. 16:4), still done among Arabs, may have been to preserve life, or to drive away evil spirits (T. Canaan, Dämonenglaube im Land der Bibel, 1929, 42), or to signify separation from its unclean state immediately after birth (J. Gray, I & II Kings, 1964, 427 f.).

The impressive scene of desolation around the Salt (Dead) Sea formed a natural boundary (Num. 34:3), and a perpetual reminder of the ability of large quantities of salt to destroy vegetation (Deut. 29:23) and leave an area uninhabitable (Jer. 17:6). Sowing an enemy city with salt after its capture (Jdg. 9:45) may not have implied using massive quantities to render the ground useless for cultivation. Token amounts could be sprinkled as a sign of cursing the city with infertility and barrenness (F. C. Fensham, BA 25, 1962, 48–50). No doubt the impure water at Jericho was a side-effect of the curse pronounced upon any who rebuilt the city (Jos. 6:26; 1 Ki. 16:34). The miracle of healing carried out by Elisha (2 Ki. 2:19–22) at the beginning of his ministry made use of the symbolism of salt staying corruption and death. "Sin must be cleansed at the fountain-head in the heart, not half a mile down the stream, in the deeds. Put the salt in the spring, and the outflow will be sweet" (A. Maclaren, The Book of Kings, 1906, 345). Small amounts of salt sprinkled on fodder were beneficial as an antiseptic for animals (Isa. 30:24), and a light application on soil to improve its quality for crop-bearing was well known. To eat someone's salt, i.e., his bread, was to be on friendly terms with him, to enjoy his hospitality. To eat the salt of the palace (Ezr. 4:14) was in practice to be on the royal pay-roll (cf. salary, from Lat. salarium, the allowance made to Roman soldiers for the purchase of the ever-necessary sal, salt). But the uppermost thought behind the expression is that of loyalty in the relationship of employee to employer. Similarly, the salt of the covenant (Lev. 2:13) refers to the solemn irrevocable character of the relationship between God and his people. Hence the custom of salting all sacrifices (Exod. 30:35; Ezek. 43:24). DCG (art. "Salt"), curiously declares that salt with sacrifices typified the prevention of putrefaction. H. C. Wilson (ExpT 35, 1923–4, 136 f.) points out that sacrifices were consumed not preserved, and salt was certainly not necessary to preserve cereals (Lev. 2:13). The symbolism was of the permanency of the covenant with God. The sacred incense (Exod. 30:35) and, according to the Mishnah, even the wood for the sacrificial fire (Menahoth 20b) were likewise sprinkled with salt. In Lev. 21:8, 17 such salted sacrifices are even termed the food of God (see above, CL). This is not to imply a pagan notion of divine need. Rather the allusion is to indispensability: as salt is essential to man, so sacrifice (i.e., the covenant signified by sacrifice) is essential to the divine-human relationship (Jn. 6:51). In rabbinic Judaism the cultic significance is weakened: "This is an eternal covenant with the Lord concluded with salt. Scripture (= God) made a covenant with Aaron by means of something (salt) which is not only in itself wholesome but which keeps other things (e.g., the covenant) wholesome" (Mid. Siph. Num. 118 on 18:19). Rabbinic instructions to the disciples of scribes included the exhortation to be modest and of a humble spirit, industrious and (lit.) salted (Derek 'Ereš Zuta). Here salt seems to mean wise, bright, sagacious (W. Nauck, StTh 6, 1952, 165–78). The same phrase occurs in the Mishnah: If a son is industrious and intellectually bright, the study of the Torah by the son takes precedence over its study by his father (Kiddushin 29b). Less seriously, witty speech is likened to salt (Kethuboth 66b).

NT Salt is mentioned in six passages. In Matt. 5:13 commentators usually take salt to be a preservative, but the context (tēs gēs, of the earth) more probably suggests the stimulating property of salt as a fertilizer: "for if the salt has lost its true nature, en tini halisthēsetai, with what shall it [gē] be salted?" This is a more edifying idea than the delay of putrefaction. Jesus came not to keep the world from putrefying but to save it (Jn. 3:17) and to provide life in abundance (Jn. 10:10). In quoting the same saying, Luke (14:34) and Mark (9:50) also indicate by their use of artyō, to season, that bringing out the quality, in food or soil, is meant. There is only one instance of salt being used to prevent putrefaction, a reference to the priests' wives salting down the priestly portion of sacrificial meat for later use by their families (Bar. 6:28). hymeis este to halas tēs gēs in Matt. 5:13, therefore, is best translated "You are salt for the soil" (tēs gēs, objective genitive), and balanced in the parallelism with 5:14, "You are light for the world" (tou kosmou). See E. P. Deatrick, BA 25, 1962, 41 ff. Though one cannot see salt which has been added to food, it can be tasted. Salt is noticed by the tongue, and light by the eye, and in either case the user is gratified. A city on a hill cannot be hidden, even at night because of its lights. Salt in food, or its absence, cannot be kept from the knowledge of the eater. "What can you salt with flavourless salt, or what can you illumine with a hidden lamp? Let your stimulating power be so evident that men will recognize the source of your good works" (W. R. Hutton, ExpT 58, 1946–7, 166–8). K. Bornhäuser (Die Bergpredigt, in Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie, 2.7, 1927, 45) draws attention to the emphatic hymeis, you, at the beginning of Matt. 5:13 and 14. The Sermon on the Mount has to be understood as being of a piece with Christ's opposition to the scribes and Pharisees. It is not they who are the salt and light, but his disciples. So Jesus calls his disciples the real teachers, the true wise men, as against the Jewish wise men (→ Scribes). Savourless salt and a covered lamp are alike useless; so the Christian disciple who fails to be stimulating and bright in the work that God wants done is good for nothing. (Cf. a similar combination of light and wisdom in Eph. 5:8, 15 f.)

The stability of sodium chloride as a chemical compound has raised a problem about salt being said to be liable to lose its quality of saltiness. Jesus is referring to one of the impure salts of Palestine in everyday use which can and does lose its savour through physical disintegration or through being mixed with wind-blown gypsum dust (Pliny, 3, 31, 34). This suggests that “if [ean] the salt has lost its savour” should be translated (as it may) as whenever, since what follows is not a condition contrary to fact but a real possibility.

Local colour on how Palestine salt can lose its savour is suggestive. (a) W. M. Thomson (The Land and the Book, 1882, 362) tells of a merchant of Sidon who imported twenty years’ supply of incrustation salt and stored it in mountain cabins to evade the salt tax, only for the salt, in too close contact with the damp earthen floor, to disintegrate and leach away. (b) Blocks of salt were used by the village baker in his oven to maintain a moist atmosphere, so that the soft bread could later be torn into sops for dipping into stews. The intense heat over a period of time would cause the salt to deteriorate. The bread then turned out hard and to the eastern diner unpalatable, and the savourless salt had to be dug out and replaced. (c) At Gebul, near Aleppo, are sparkling veins of salt alongside a hill. The salt on the surface, exposed to rain, sun and air tastes like sand. But salt extracted from below the surface, in contact with the rock, is perfect. Spent natural salt cannot regain its quality, but the faltering disciple can be restored – by getting back to the Rock which is Christ. Present-day shepherds use the term “salt of the earth” as an idiom for rock-salt. (d) In modern Israel savourless salt is spread on the soil on the flat roofs of houses, thus making it hard and serving to prevent leaks. Since the flat roof is used as a meeting-place for adults and as a play-ground for children, the useless salt can still be said to be trodden under foot.

The difficulty of understanding Mk. 9:49 was evident from the earliest days. There are three major textual forms. The best attested reading is “for everyone will be salted with fire”. Other MSS have “for every sacrifice will be salted with salt” (Lev. 2:13), or a combination of both readings. Even at the beginning of this century, H. A. W. Meyer could list fourteen different interpretations of the verse (B. Weiss, Die Evangelien des Markus und Lukas, 1901, 153–5). If nothing else, it highlights the problems surrounding this logion, and the verse following, and their connexion, if any, with the preceding sayings. Literary critics have usually concluded that an editor brought together the whole passage Mk. 9:42–50 on little more than catchwords: skandalizō, cause to stumble; gehenna, hell; pyr, fire; halas, hals, salt.

The secondary textual form may be right in interpreting “salted with fire” as a reference to the Christian disciple being seasoned with salt like the OT sacrifices. This will take place through trials (1 Pet. 1:7, 4:12; cf. 1 Cor. 3:13) and everything contrary to God will be purged away (F. Hauck, TDNT I 228 f.; W. Nauck, StTh 6, 1952, 165–78). The self-sacrifice metaphor in the whole context is appropriate to a situation of suffering and testing in which the principle of sacrifice is severely tried. Understood in this way, Jesus’ word is a challenging pronouncement on suffering which sheds light on the experience of the church in Nero’s Rome (W. L. Lane, The Gospel according to Mark, NLC, 1974, 349). But F. C. Burkitt saw nothing about sacrifice in the entire passage. Cutting off the hand, etc., is not a sacrifice but a precaution. The only salting of a living person in Hebrew literature is Ezek. 16:4 (the newborn infant). The custom might have been in Jesus' mind, for the context is about "entering into life" and "little ones" (Mk. 9:42 f.). halisthēsetai, will be salted, may refer to the first bath of a Jewish infant (JTS 17, 1915, 16–18). T. J. Baarda (NTS 5, 1958–9, 318–21) suggests from the possible equivalence of the Gk. halizō and the Aram. tabbel that through a mishearing of the spoken word, derivative forms from the Aram. roots tbl and t̄bl were confused. An original mitt̄_hel (baptized) may have been mistaken for mitta_hbal or m^etabbal (seasoned, salted), so that the translator targumized the Aram. with halisthēsetai (will be salted) where he should have written baptisthēsetai (will be baptized). A curious coincidence supports the possibility. Matt. 3:11 and Lk. 3:16 are the only NT passages in which baptism by fire is mentioned. In the same two passages the phrase pyr asbeston (unquenchable fire) appears, and this otherwise occurs only in Mk. 9:43, with the verbal form in 9:48, to pyr ou sbennytai, the fire is not quenched (Isa. 66:24). Fire is used as a metaphor of purification in rabbinic writings (Sanhedrin 39a; Siphre Num. 158 on 31:23), and similarly salt (Berakoth 5a).

The organic union of Mk. 9:49 and 9:50 has been questioned. The latter saying occurs in a different context in Matt. 5:13 and Lk. 14:34, and there seems no logical coherence in referring in Mk. 9:50a to something which is already a possession of the disciples of Jesus. The context of Mk. 9:50 shows that the evangelist took the saying to be part of Jesus' teaching to his disciples (9:35, he sat down, as teacher, and called the Twelve around him). Matthew and Luke both employ mōrainomai, usually in Gk. of a human characteristic (to become foolish), rather than a quality of things (to become savourless). But the Aram. sry or sr' has a similar double meaning, as does the Heb. tpl. mōrainomai maintains the rabbinic background of the saying, according to which savourless/foolish and salt/wisdom were associated. W. Nauck, therefore, understands "Have salt in yourselves" in the same sense as in the rabbinic instruction to disciples of scribes to be wise (→ στ). In Mk. 9:50 eschatological wisdom is meant, the wisdom of disciples lived out in their religious attitude, faith, and conduct, keeping in mind the last events to come (Matt. 10:16; Eph. 5:15 f.). These eschatological events provide the organic link between verses 49 and 50 in Mk. 9 (StTh 6, 1952, 165–78). Salt as Christian wisdom was taken up as a metaphor by the early church (Ephrem Syrus, Gelasian Sacramentary).

The last phrase of Mk. 9:50, eirēneuete en allēlois, be at peace with one another, resembles the continuation of the rabbinic instruction to scribes: "They should suffer insult and should be liked by all men." The last sentence of Mk. 9:50 is an example of two Gk. imperatives in conditional parataxis, linked by the consecutive kai: "Have salt in yourselves, then you will be able to maintain peace with one another" (Funk § 442 (2)).

If the disciple is thought of as a sacrifice (Rom. 12:1), "have salt in yourselves" is apt. Without it, their sacrifice, however great, would be of no use. "Be at peace with one another" follows on easily from "have salt in yourselves", for the disciples had just been arguing about who would be greatest (Mk. 9:34). But there should be no quarrel among the sacrifices as to whether the flesh, whole burnt-offering, cereal, or incense is the more important. All, if offered with salt, were acceptable. Salt was salt, whether offered in one class or another. Furthermore, salt made those who ate at the common table friends. There should be no quarrelling among friends. Such a covenant was inviolable, and so the treachery of Judas is portrayed, it is said, by the up-setting of the salt in the picture of the Last Supper by Leonardo da Vinci (W. R. Hutton, ExpT 58, 1946–7, 168).

Because of the reading salem, for sal, in the Lat. text of Codex Bezae (d), J. R. Harris suspects a Latinism in the Gk. text, in which by word-play salem is mystically interpreted as peace, Heb. šālôm (cf. Heb. 7:2). See ExpT 35, 1923–4, 403–5; 48, 1936–7, 185 f.

A reference to ancient practices throws light upon the unity and meaning of the whole passage Mk. 9:42–50. Amputation of the hand was known in biblical times (Deut. 25:22). Ancient peoples in general cut off hands or feet, as the guilty members, in cases of theft, robbery, or forgery. Similarly, the eye was taken for adultery (Job 31:1; Gen. 19:11; Matt. 5:29 f.). Recent puritanical movements in Africa have revived the practice as government policy: Saudi Arabia, Libya, and Sudan all do so in 1977. Punishment by amputation was considered humane in an age when the death penalty was common for theft, robbery, sedition, and even adultery. The stump had to be cauterized, otherwise gangrene set in. In the ancient world worms bred in mortified flesh (cf. Mk. 9:48). Salt was a primitive treatment for wounds, including superficial injuries left after the most careful amputation. Fear of secular punishment partly, if inefficiently, deters from crime against secular society and its ruler. The deterrent in the sphere of sin is Isa. 66:24, quoted in Mk. 9:48. The threat also has its healthful side. Avoid the supernatural fire of the next world by applying a symbolic fire in this. Avoid the figurative worms of hell by preserving yourself from worms in this. The salt that draws off blood (it was used to prepare meat, Berakoth 3a) will also preserve meat. Salt is a medicament for damaged tissue. Apply the symbolic amputation to this life, and you not only avoid the circumstances whereby actual amputation might result, but you avoid the fire to come. The church leaders are the preserving salt of the community. By their skilful performance of “amputations” and by healing the wounds afterwards (bearing one another’s burdens), they will preserve one another, so that they are the beati within the meaning of the closing verses of Isaiah (J. D. M. Derrett, Theology, 76, 1973, 364–8).

The passage Lk. 14:25–34 is a discourse on the need for persistent wholeheartedness in following Jesus. That takes precedence even over the family, though to abandon family life was quite outside the rabbinic ideal. The man who lays down the cross has no further testimony. The man who leaves his house roofless is a laughing-stock. The man who sues for peace at the start is beaten without a struggle. Salt that has lost its flavour is like all these – no use at all: neither as a fertilizer for the land (eis gēn), nor even for the dunghill (eis koprian). Assuming word-play originally spoken in Aramaic, F. Perles (ZNW 19, 1928, 96) suggests that the translation should be: “It is fit neither for seasoning (lʿabbālāʾ) nor for dunging (lʿabbālāʾ)”, tēbēl is five times rendered in the LXX by gē, earth, and might have been the original of gē in “You are the salt of the earth” (Matt. 5:13), the occurrence of the same consonants in a following line misleading the translator into rendering lʿabbālāʾ by eis gēn (M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels, 1967³, 166 f.).

In Col. 4:6 Paul declares that the Christian’s speech should always be gracious, seasoned with salt (halati ērtymenos). Salt gives flavour to discourse and recommends it to the palate (cf. Job 6:6), and this may be the primary idea of the metaphor here, as the use of artyō, to season, suggests. Salt also preserves from corruption and renders wholesome. Eph. 4:29 carries similar ideas: “Let no corrupt speech proceed from your mouth . . . that it may impart grace” (J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul’s Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1897, 230). W. Nauck interprets Col. 4:6 by the metaphorical sense of salt as wisdom: “Your talk should always be with grace; it should be wise, and you should learn how to answer every man (StTh 6, 1952, 165–78). Several church fathers take salt in this sense of wisdom (Origen, Hom. in Gen. 5:12).

halykos occurs only at Jas. 3:12. In nature it is impossible for both salt water (halykon hydōr) and fresh (glyky, lit. sweet) to come from the same spring. It ought to be just as unnatural for the tongue of the Christian to pour out curses as well as blessings.

The only occurrence of synalizō in the NT (Acts 1:4) poses several difficulties. The context seems to need not the present singular but a perfect plural. The translation is taken by Chrysostom and by the Vulgate’s convescens to mean eating together. Many minuscules and patristic citations, however, read synaulizomenos, from synaulizomai, to spend the night with, stay with, and this meaning is followed by RSV (Arndt, 791). Behind the variant text may be the desire to avoid the difficulty of accepting that the risen Christ ate food, since his resurrection body had no need of physical sustenance. That he did take food is affirmed in Lk. 24:41–43 (cf. Acts 10:41), to convince the disciples of the reality of his presence. N. Hillyer

- (a). T. J. Baarda, “Mark IX. 49”, NTS 5, 1958–9, 318–21; N. D. Coleman, “Note on Mark IX. 49, 50: A new meaning for halas”, JTS 24, 1923, 387–96; and “‘Salt’ and ‘Salted’ in Mark ix. 49, 50”, ExpT 48, 1936–7, 360–2; E. P. Deatrick, “Salt, Soil, Savior”, BA 25, 1962, 41–8; J. D. M. Derrett, “Salted with Fire. Studies in Texts: Mark 9:42–50”, Theology 76, 1973, 364–8; J. R. Harris, “An Unrecognized Latinism in St Mark”, ExpT 35, 1923–4, 403–5; F. Hauck, halas, in TDNT I 228 f.; A. M. Honeyman, “The Salting of Shechem”, VT 3, 1953, 192–5; W. R. Hutton, “The Salt Sections”, ExpT 58, 1946–7, 166–8; W. Nauck, “Salt as a Metaphor in Instructions for Discipleship”, ExpT 35, 1923–4, 136 f.; W. S. Wood, “The Salt of the Earth”, JTS 25, 1924, 167–72.
- (b). J. ten Hove, “Het zout der aarde”, Theologisch Tijdschrift 46, 1912, 252–4; J. B. Souček, “Salz der Erde und Licht der Welt. Zur Exegese von Matth. 5, 13–16”, ThZ 19, 1963, 169–79.

Samaritan, Samaria

Σαμαρίτης

Σαμαρίτης (Samaritēs), Samaritan; Σαμάρεια (Samareia), Samaria.

OT 1. Linguistic Usage. The Gk. word Samareia (v.l. Samaria) stands for the Heb.

šōm rōn and designates originally the capital city of the northern kingdom founded by Omri in 876 B.C. It later came to designate the area of the northern kingdom as an administrative unit of several successive empires. After the city was refounded by Herod in 27 B.C. the new name of Sebastē was widely accepted; hence the Arabian Sebastīye. In the NT Samareia always denotes the territory of Samaria, which can readily be seen in those passages which list Samaria together with other territories (Lk. 17:11; Jn. 4:4; Acts 1:8; 8:1; 9:31; 15:3). Josephus and 1 Macc. also use the terms hē Samareitis and (solely in Ant. 17, 319) to Samareitikon for the territory of Samaria. The words Samareitēs, Samaritēs (fem. Samareitis, Samaritis) for the first time used in 2 Ki. 17:29 LXX (and in the LXX only here) denote the inhabitants of Samaria, both the city and the territory. In the NT they apply only to the latter. In Josephus Samareitēs alternates with Samareus and also Sikimitēs, Shechemite (e.g. Ant. 12, 10), because the Samaritans “had then Shechem for their metropolis” (Ant. 11, 340). Other synonyms are hoi Sidōnioi en Sikimois, the Sidonians in Shechem (according to Ant. 11, 344; cf. 12, 258, 262, it was a self-designation of the Shechemites) and Chouthaioi, Cutheans or Kuthites (Ant. 10, 184; 11, 88, 303; cf. 2 Ki. 17:24, 30).

The context shows Samar(e)itēs to be a geographical, and thus indirectly an ethnological term, but at the same time to be a religious group designation (cf. Ioudaios, Jew). The ethnological identity of the Samaritans is a point of dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans. The anti-Samaritan polemic of Judaism assumes a total deportation of the population of the northern kingdom; hence the equation of the Samaritans with the Cutheans. But the religious community centred on Shechem, or Mount Gerizim, until today sees itself as a confessional denomination within Israel, standing ethnologically in unbroken continuity particularly with the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. It draws a distinction between the admittedly mixed populace of the territory of Samaria and the worshippers of the Yahweh-cult of Shechem, and accepted the designation “Samaritan” only with hesitation as a term originally used only by outsiders.

Nevertheless, it is best not to follow Kippenberg and Macdonald in drawing a strict terminological distinction between Samaritans in the geographical and Samaritans in the religious sense (cf. G. H. Kippenberg, Garizim und Synagoge. Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur samaritanischen Religion der aramäischen Periode, 1971, 34; and J. Macdonald, The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964, 14).

For we must respect the lack of precision in the terminology of the sources as part of the evidence. The two strands cannot be disentangled historically. In any case, the territory of Samaria in the post-exilic period had no cultic centre acceptable to Israelites other than Mount Gerizim, near to ancient Shechem. Only after Alexander the Great's general, Perdikkas, had settled the city with Macedonians could the city of Samaria perhaps be said to stand apart from the religious faith of the rest of the population. However, Josephus (Ant. 12, 258–262) indicates possibilities of solidarity between the two groups. Similarly, there are numerous common factors in later history. John Hyrcanus destroyed both Shechem and Samaria. Neither side took part in the rebellion of 4 B.C. Jewish attacks were unitedly repulsed by armed Samaritans and soldiers from Sebaste in A.D. 52.

The term “Sidonians in Shechem” (cf. Ant. 11, 344; 12, 258, 262) is to be recognized as a self-designation of the Samaritans (so E. Bickerman, “Un Document relatif à la Persécution d'Antiochus IV Epiphane”, RHR 58, 1937, 188–223; Ger. translation in Zur Josephus-Forschung, ed., A. Schalit, 1973, 241–77; and A. Schalit, “Die Denkschrift der Samaritaner an König Antiochos Epiphanes zu Beginn der grossen Verfolgung der jüdischen Religion im Jahre 167 v. Chr. (Josephus, AJ, XII, §§ 258–264)”, ASTI 8, 1970–71, 131–83; against M. Delcor, “Vom Sichem der hellenistischen Epoche zum Sychar des Neuen Testaments”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 78, 1962, 34–48; and H. G. Kippenberg, op. cit., 79).

However, it does not shed light on the ethnological identity of the Samaritans, but only on their political tactics which Josephus aptly describes (Ant. 11, 291, 341).

It is uncertain when the self-designation šôm^erîm (pronounced by the Samaritans šām^e rîm), lit. those who keep or preserve, came into use. Origen knows it (cf. Homily on Ezek. 9, 1; John 20, 25). But Philo too, who never explicitly refers to the Samaritans, appears to play on the term (cf. Leg. All. 3, 25 f.).

2. The History of the Samaritans to the Arab Occupation. The origins of the Samaritan community lie in obscurity and are covered over by the mutual polemic of the Jews and Samaritans. The tension between the northern and southern tribes, and between the northern and southern kingdoms in both politics and religion doubtless forms part of the antecedents of the schism. But the tracing of it to the Assyrian colonization by Jewish polemics based on 2 Ki. 17:24 ff. (which has also influenced the Christian picture of the Samaritans) is to be rejected. Likewise we cannot accept the Samaritan attempt to date the break as early as the time of Eli, who, according to the Samaritan Chronicles, is supposed to have founded the sanctuary at Shiloh as a rival centre to Mount Gerizim. Even the conflict between the Persian administration in Samaria, headed by the house of Sanballat, and the leaders of the restoration in Jerusalem (Nehemiah and Ezra) should be seen as only one contribution to the growing alienation between Judea and Samaria (cf. Ezr. 4; Neh. 4; 13:28). It is a matter of dispute whether the texts of the Heb. OT already mount a polemic against the Samaritans. Among these are the writings of the Chronicler; Isa. 56–66; Hag. 2:10–14; Zech. 11:14; Ps. 78. Recent writers tend to be more sceptical on this point than the earlier ones (cf. R. J. Coggins, Samaritans and Jews: The Origins of the Samaritans Reconsidered, 1975). In any case the conflict soon influenced the history of the text of the OT, in particular that of the Pentateuch which alone was canonical for the Samaritans (cf. the substitution of Mount Ebal for Mount Gerizim at Deut. 27:4 MT).

The most important single event in the history of the rise of the Samaritan community was probably the construction of the temple to Yahweh on Mount Gerizim towards the end of the 4th cent. B.C. According to Josephus, Ant. 11, 302–47, the initiative came from the priests who had been excluded from Jerusalem, because their marriages had been rejected as mixed marriages (cf. Ant. 11, 306 ff., 312). They were settled by Sanballat in Shechem (11, 312, 340). Permission to build the temple is supposed to have been granted by Alexander the Great in gratitude for military support by Sanballat (Ant. 11, 321–24, cf. 346; 13, 256; cf. F. M. Cross, Jr., “Aspects of Samaritan and Jewish History in Late Persian and Hellenistic Times”, HTR 59, 1966, 201–11). In the mouth of Josephus this is a credible and historically plausible tradition, because the erection of a temple was in any case an act of state (cf. Ezr. 1:1–8).

This was not the only temple to Yahweh that was erected outside Jerusalem in the post-exilic period. We know of a temple at Elephantine in Upper Egypt in the 5th cent. B.C., and in the 2nd cent. B.C. temples were founded at Leontopolis in Lower Egypt (cf. Josephus, War 1, 33; 7, 420–736; Ant. 12, 387 f.; 13, 62–73) and ‘Arâq el-‘Emîr in Transjordan. However, the Gerizim temple alone became a real challenge to the Jerusalem temple, because it represented a considerable political faction, and because sooner or later the claims of Deut. about the sole, legitimate cultic centre came to be related to it. The idea cannot be excluded that the participants in the founding of the sanctuary saw it as an act of restoration (cf. Jos. 24:2, the MT against the LXX), since Shechem and Gerizim have ancient Israelite traditions on their side (cf. Deut. 27:4, the Samaritan Pentateuch against the MT).

The next conflict which opened up deep wounds and which was perhaps decisive for the ultimate schism arose through the opportunist policy of Shechem under Antiochus IV (175–c. 164 B.C.), Epiphanes. In a petition preserved by Josephus, Ant. 12, 258–261 (on its authenticity see E. Bickermann, op. cit.) the Samaritans requested in 167/166 B.C. that their temple on Mount Gerizim (which, they pretended, had up to that very day been “anonymous”, i.e. not connected with the name of any particular deity) should be dedicated to Zeus Hellenios (i.e. the Zeus worshipped on Aigina; cf. Schalit, op. cit.). They evidently did not intend thereby to implement any change of cultic practice. Rather, they were making use of the interpretatio Graeca, according to which other oriental deities could also be identified with Greek gods and worshipped under their names. Thus the Samaritans escaped persecution, whilst in Judea the Maccabees resisted the policy of cultural and religious Hellenization at the price of their lives. It was only natural that the success of the Maccabean revolt led as a consequence not only to the expansion of Judea at the expense of Samaria (cf. 1 Macc. 10:38; 11:24, 57), but also to the destruction of the temple on Mount Gerizim by John Hyrcanus in 129/128 B.C. (Josephus, Ant. 13, 255 f.; War 1, 63; Megillat Ta’anit 9).

It was Pompey that ended the Judean dominance over Samaria in 63 B.C. This explains the good relations of the Samaritans to the Romans which lasted until A.D. 67 and to the house of Herod which was closely tied to Rome (cf. Josephus, War 1, 213, 302 f., 355; Ant. 14, 411, 468; 18, 167). These were interrupted only by the blood bath precipitated by Pontius Pilate which, however, cost him his office (cf. Josephus, Ant. 18, 85–89), and a trial for breach of the peace in A.D. 52, when the Samaritans who were supported by the procurator Cumanus came into violent conflict with the Jews. Following the trial in Rome the leading Samaritans were executed and Cumanus banished (Josephus, War 2, 232–46; Ant. 20, 118–24). The execution may have provoked the mood which led to the tardy and vain participation in the Jewish rising of A.D. 67 (cf. Josephus, War 3, 307–15).

The basically pro-Roman attitude of the Samaritans was the logical consequence of their support of the Seleucids into whose inheritance the Romans entered in the region of Syria. Their support of Herod combined loyalty to the dominant world power with hostility to the Hasmoneans and Jewish patriotism. This traditional hostility found expression in isolated outbursts like the desecration of the Jerusalem temple under Coponius (c. A.D. 6–9; cf. Josephus, Ant. 18, 29 f.) and the murder of a Galilean pilgrim in A.D. 52 (according to Josephus, War 2, 232; cf. Ant. 20, 118).

It seems like an irony of history that the Samaritans, who were in general ready to co-operate with the world power of the day and to make compromises with the surrounding pagan world, did not regain their rights to practise the Israelite religion after the Bar Kochba revolt of A.D. 132–35. It was otherwise with the Jews. The Samaritans, however, were bloodily persecuted, especially on account of the practice of circumcision (cf. Origen, Contra Cels. 2, 13). The 4th cent. A.D. brought with it a time of revival for the Samaritans which lasted several decades. Their leader, Baba Rabba, reformed the life of the synagogue, and the oldest portions of the extant non-biblical literature of the Samaritans (the Memar Markah, parts of the liturgy) date from this period. Growing pressure from the Christian Byzantine emperors (cf. the Code of Justinian 1, 5, 17) led to futile risings with considerable loss of life. As a consequence the Samaritans in the 7th cent. A.D. welcomed and gave support to the Arab conquerors.

3. Geographical, Social and Cultural Aspects. For a true appreciation of the relationship between the Samaritans, the Jews and the Christians an explanation of the geographical situation is of fundamental importance. The Samaritans lived in many places outside Samaria, even in Palestine. Archaeological finds indicate Samaritan synagogues in Bet Še'an (Scythopolis), Šabarin on Mount Carmel, Gaza, Jabneh, Kfar Bilu and Beth-Dagan in the coastal area, 'Amwâs (Emmaus/Nicopolis) and Shaalbin in the Shephelah, and possibly Mount Nebo and Namara in Transjordan. There is literary and archaeological evidence of a strong Samaritan concentration in and around Caesarea by the sea. Outside Palestine special mention may be made of Alexandria and the rest of Egypt (from the 4th cent. B.C.; cf. Josephus, Ant. 11, 345; 12, 7–10; 13, 74–79), and also of Damascus, Thessalonica, Athens and Rome.

The proximity of Samaria to Hellenistic cities and the presence of Samaritans in such cities ties up with reports of the pro-Greek attitude of the early Samaritans, forming a clear overall picture. Also pointing in this direction is the evidence of at least one Samaritan companion piece to the LXX (the Samareitikon; Symmachus?). So too does the Samaritan origin of a number of educated figures like Justin Martyr (2nd cent. A.D.), Siricius (the rhetorician in Athens in the 4th cent. A.D.) and Marinus (the Neo-Platonist of the 5th cent. A.D.). All these hailed from Neapolis which continued to be the religious centre of the Samaritans (cf. the synagogue inscription of Thessalonica). The philosophical grounding of Markah (4th cent. A.D.) merits considerable esteem. These data help to explain the cross-connexions with Hellenistic Judaism and Hellenistic Jewish Christianity (cf. Acts 8:4–25), both of which likewise grew up amid an urban civilization.

Of course, the liberal, cosmopolitan attitude of the Samaritans could not in the long term survive the painful encounters with the power of imperial Rome. The brief Samaritan renaissance of the 4th and 5th cents. A.D. that was terminated by force led, therefore, to a concentration on the Israelite inheritance canonized in the Torah. It decided the character of Samaritan theology and piety as an exclusively Mosaic religion. This was intensified rather than weakened by the encounter with Islam. It may be said that the Samaritans in the first centuries A.D. caught up with a development which had been extinguished in Judaism through the conflict with the Seleucids. In this connexion belongs the rise of a specific Samaritan eschatology (with the expectation of the "day of vengeance and recompense"), including the hope of resurrection which the Samaritans did not originally share.

NT 1. Samaria and the Samaritans in the NT. (a) Matt. 10:5 f. Within the framework of the commissioning of the disciples (Matt. 10:1–16, par. Mk. 3:13–19; 6:8–11; Lk. 6:12–16; 9:2–5, cf. 10:1–12) vv. 5 f. contain the saying peculiar to Matt.: "Go nowhere among the Gentiles, and enter no town of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." J. Jeremias sees the saying as an ancient tristich based on an Aram. tradition forbidding the disciples to work among either Samaritans or Gentiles. He reconstructs it as follows: "Go not to the Gentiles/and enter not into the land of Samaria/but go (only) to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (TDNT V 92; cf. J. Jeremias, Jesus' Promise to the Nations, SBT 24, 1958, 19 f.).

The parallelism with "the Gentiles" (ethnē) and the juxtaposition with "the house of Israel" show unmistakably that the Samaritans are here not recognized as Israelites. The saying is very closely related to Matt. 15:24, where Jesus says to the Canaanite woman: "I was sent only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Here too in a Matthaean addition the same picture taken from Jer. 50:6 (LXX 27:6) is applied to Israel and a Canaanite woman is excluded from the mission of Jesus which is directed only to Israel. Against this background Matt. 10:5 f. is not to be understood as a purely geographical limitation of the mission of the disciples to Galilee (as against the commentaries of Gaechter, Holtzmann, Loisy, Montefiore, McNeile ad loc., and Jeremias, op. cit.). Rather, the reference to "the house of Israel" indicates that all members of the people of Israel are included wherever they live (cf. P. Nepper-Christensen, Das Matthäusevangelium, ein judenchristliches Evangelium?, 1958, 182). In the light of this, it is questionable whether polin Samaritōn here really means the province of Samaria, because in that case the way to the Jewish part of "the house of Israel" would actually be barred by the double command of v. 5. Rather, a distinction must be drawn between the journey through the province and entry into a Samaritan town or village (cf. Jn. 4:5). This is the view of A. Schlatter, Der Evangelist Matthäus, 1963⁶, 328 f. (cf. Lk. 9:52 f.; Jn. 4:8, 40).

Historically Matt. 10:5 f. stands in connexion with the conception of a mission solely to Israel, as is also evidenced in Matt. 10:23. But it is doubtful whether the negations of Matt. 10:5 are directed against a Samaritan or Gentile mission that was beginning or had already begun (cf. E. Käsemann, "The Beginnings of Christian Theology", in New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, 87 ff.; and R. Scroggs, "The Earliest Hellenistic Christianity", in J. Neusner, ed., Religions in Antiquity, 1968, 176–206, see especially 177), in view of the fact that the charge was clearly directed to the Twelve in Matt. 10:5 f. In any case, their rôle was related to the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. Matt. 19:28). Gal. 2:7 ff. could be, as far as Peter was concerned, a testimony to the same.

According to H. Schürmann ("Mt. 10, 5b–6 und die Vorgeschichte des synoptischen Aussendungsberichtes", in Neutestamentliche Aufsätze für J. Schmid, 1963, 270–82), these words were part of Q where they served as an introduction to Lk. 10:8 ff. and were interpreted, historicized and "neutralized" by the insertion of Lk. 9:51–56. Lk. then omitted the logion contained in Matt. 10:5 f., whereas Matt. omitted the pericope in Lk. 9:51–56.

An antipode of Matt. 10:5 f. from early Christian times (and an indirect testimony to Samaritans' view of their own identity) is the observation of Justin Martyr: "For all the other human races [genē] are called Gentiles [ethnē] by the Spirit of prophecy; but the Jewish and Samaritan races are called the tribe [phylon] of Israel, and the house of Jacob" (Apol. I, 53). For further discussion of the concepts involved in Matt. 10:5 f. → Israel; → Lamb, Sheep; → People.

(b) The Lucan Writings. (i) Lk. 9:51–56. The narrative fits perfectly into our picture of the mutual attitudes of the Jews and Samaritans of the 1st cent. A.D. (cf. Josephus, War 2, 232–46; Ant. 20, 118–36). The reaction of James and John, the sons of Zebedee (v. 54) takes up the → Elijah tradition of 2 Ki. 10:10–14 (cf. vv. 54 f.

v.l.) and recalls the judgment on the people of Sodom (Gen. 19; cf. Lk. 10:12), as well as the sin of the brothers Simeon and Levi (Gen. 34), which in Test. Lev. 6 is defended as a punishment for the notorious hostility to strangers of the Shechemites. The astonishing feeling of power of the two disciples is perhaps to be understood as an anticipation of Lk. 10:17–20. Jesus' rebuke (v. 55), even without the later addition of the words, "and he said, 'You do not know what manner of spirit you are of; for the Son of man came not to destroy men's lives but to save them'" (vv. 54 f. v.l.; cf. Metzger, 148 f.), serves as a repudiation of false notions of the character of his messianic way (Lk. 10:51, 53; cf. Matt. 16:22 f. par. Mk. 8:32 f.) and the apostolic commission (cf. Lk. 10:3, 5 f., 10 f.). It is debated whether v. 56 refers to another Samaritan village or indicates a detour of the whole Samaritan area (cf. Lk. 18:35; 19:1, 11, 28).

In the Clementine Recognitions 1, 57 in a great (legendary) debate with the religious parties of Israel the pericope is taken as the occasion to picture the sons of Zebedee eloquently confuting their Samaritan opponents.

(ii) Lk. 10:30–37. The parable of the Good Samaritan is a Lucan amplification of the pericope on the two great commandments (Matt. 22:24–40 par. Mk. 12:28–34, Lk. 10:25–28), giving an illustration in the form of a narrative and expounding Lev. 19:28 (→ Command, art. entolē NT 1; → Love, art. agapaō NT 2; → Brother, art. plēsion, NT; → Large, art. megas NT 4). The introductory question of v. 29 ("But he, desiring to justify himself, said to Jesus, 'And who is my neighbour?'") stands in tension with the point of the parable drawn out in vv. 36 f. ("Which of these three, do you think, proved neighbour to the man who fell among the robbers?" He said, 'The one who showed mercy on him.' And Jesus said to him, 'Go and do likewise'"). This has given rise to various tradition-historical and redaction-critical hypotheses, without however attaining conclusive results. (For the history of the interpretation of the parable see W. Monselewski, Der barmherzige Samariter. Eine auslegungsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu Lukas 10, 25–37, Beiträge zur Geschichte der biblischen Exegese 5, 1967; cf. also J. D. M. Derrett, "The Parable of the Good Samaritan", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 208–27.)

The fact that the positive figure in the present narrative is a Samaritan serves to detach the love command from all previous relationships with a person in need. In the juxtaposition with the priest and Levite (cf. Jn. 1:19) it contains an element of criticism of official Judaism (cf. Jn. 4:1–45). Attention is not drawn to any particular qualities of the Samaritan. The omission of the designation of "Samaritan" (v. 37) is, despite widespread opinion, probably without significance. For the name "Samaritan" as such was not important to the Samaritans, and it was not the subject of a taboo for the Jews. The story anticipates the saying of Rabbi Simeon ben Gamiel (c. A.D. 140), that the Samaritans keep the commandments which they observe more strictly than the "Israelites", i.e. the Jews (cf. Kid. 76a par.).

(iii) Lk. 17:11–19. The description of the grateful Samaritan as allogenēs could in itself be intended in an unpolemical way: "Was no one found to return and give praise to God except this foreigner?" (v. 18). For the Samaritans could occasionally describe themselves as being an independent nation (genos) alongside the Jews (cf. Josephus, Ant. 12, 261; Justin Martyr, Dial. 120, 6). This did not necessarily downgrade them as non-Israelites (cf. Justin Martyr, Apol. I, 53). But Jewish polemics gave point to talk about an independent Samaritan genos (cf. Josephus, Ant. 18, 167) by stressing the alleged non-Israelite origin of the Samaritans (cf. Josephus, Ant. 13, 255, to Chouthaiōn genos, “the nation of the Cutheans”). It is not by accident that the term allogenēs is a key word in the mixed marriage texts in 1 Esd. 8 f. LXX, and a designation for the Shechemites of Gen. 34 in Jud. 9:2, where the deed of Simeon (and Levi) is represented as divinely willed (as against Gen. 49:5 ff.; cf. Jub. 30:5).

Another possible background for calling the Samaritans a foreign people is the use of Deut. 32:21 in anti-Samaritan polemics (cf. Sir. 50:25 f.).

The intention of Lk. 17:11–19 is comparable not only with Lk. 10:30–37 but also with Matt. 8:5–13 par. Lk. 7:1–10, where it is a heathen who puts the whole of Israel in the shade with his faith. In these texts the later way of mission (cf. Acts 8; 10 f.) is anticipated in paradigmatic cases in the pre-Easter history of Jesus (cf. Jn. 4:1–42).

Apart from the fact that as a Samaritan he would not have gone to the Jerusalem priests, the behaviour of the Samaritan in Lk. 17:15 f. might have had as its background a particular openness of the Samaritans to the charismatic (cf. Acts 8:4–13; Jn. 8:48(?); Clementine Recognitions 1, 57).

(iv) Acts 1:8; 8:1; 9:31. Acts 1:8 contains the promise and commission: “But you shall receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you; and you shall be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria and to the end of the earth” (→ Spirit). The fact that “Samaria” in Acts 1:8 is attached to “Judea” without repetition of the preposition and article makes the phrase “in all Judea and Samaria [en pasē tē Ioudaia kai Samareia]” appear to be a single compound concept and not the designation of two consecutive stages in the history of the mission. This corresponds to the common administration of Judea and Samaria by a Roman procurator from A.D. 6.

Acts 9:31 concludes the account of Paul’s conversion and first preaching with the statement: “So the church throughout all Judea and Galilee and Samaria [kath’ holēs tēs Ioudaias kai Galilaias kai Samareias] had peace and was built up; and walking in the fear of the Lord and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit it was multiplied.” The mention of Galilee between Judea and Samaria does not conflict with the above interpretation. For in Acts 1:8 and 8:1 Galilee was probably included in the notion of Judea, corresponding to the religious orientation of Galilee around Jerusalem. (For a more broadly based idea of “Judea” cf. e.g. Matt. 19:1; Josephus, Ant. 9, 280; Strabo, Geography 16, 21.) From a geographical standpoint the statement in Acts 1:8 has therefore three parts: Jerusalem, the land of Israel and finally the whole world are to be the scene of the testimony of the disciples. With the idea of “witnesses” the → proclamation of the word by the disciples is interpreted as a resumption of the trial of Jesus before the forum of the world. This in itself anticipates the many forensic scenes in Acts.

(v) Acts 8:4–25. In order to understand the account of Philip’s missionary success in Samaria it is essential to grasp the geographical aspect. According to J. Jeremias, the expression “city of Samaria [polin tēs Samareias]” (v. 5) is an Aramaism meaning “the province of Samaria”, reflecting the indefinite term m’dīnā (TDNT VII 92; cf. polis Iouda, “city of Judah” in Lk. 1:39). But v. 8 (“So there was much joy in that city”) appears to have a particular city in mind. The question arises as to which city could be intended. The narrator could be avoiding mentioning the name of the former capital Sebaste because that name paid tribute to the religious veneration of Augustus (= Sebastos). He could have meant the nea polis of the Samaritans which was already standing before Vespasian (later named Flavia Neapolis, modern Nablus; cf. Josephus, War 4, 449; Pliny, Nat. Hist. 5, 69). Alternatively, he might have been thinking of Sychar which is mentioned in Jn. 4:5 as “a city of Samaria” (polin tēs Samareias legoumenēn Sychar).

Historically relevant here is the decision between a Hellenistic linguistic and cultural environment (Sebaste) and the Aramaic-speaking context of the Samaritan community. In favour of the latter is the fact that Simon Magus (→ Magic, art. mageia NT 1 (a)), who before the appearance of Philip dominated the religious scene in this area, was revered by the populace as megalē dynamis: “This man is that power of God which is called Great” (Acts 8:10). This expression is more readily explicable if it is seen as rendering the Aram. ḥaylāh (in the masc.) rather than as a Gk. title (for further discussion of the possibilities see F. F. Bruce, The Acts of the Apostles, 1952², 185). Therefore, Acts 8:4–25 probably does not deal with the mission in Sebaste – and thus with the beginnings of the Gentile mission – but with the mission in a (possibly the) centre of the Samaritan community.

The report of this Simon in Acts 8:9 ff. must be compared with the traditions of a later gnostic group which claimed to derive from him (cf. Justin Martyr, Apol. I, 26:1–3 etc.; Iren., Haer. 1, 23; Hippol., Haer. 6, 19 f.; Epiph., Haer. 21, 1–4 etc.). Lack of non-polemical sources makes historical investigation on this point considerably difficult. Acts 8:9 indicates that Simon appeared as a miracle worker, and in this he was apparently later superseded by Philip (cf. Acts 8:6 f., 13). The mention of → “magic” in vv. 9 and 11 is not indicative of the manner of the phenomena, but is rather an expression of a negative theological judgment. The lofty, but not more precisely defined, claim that Simon evidently made for himself (v. 9; cf. Lk. 1:15, 32; 7:16; Heb. 4:4; 11:24) was, according to v. 10, superseded by the even more enthusiastic acclamation of the populace, which praised him as “that power of God which is called Great.” This might be the expression of an angelology of a kind associated with Michael (→ Angel) or → Melchizedek (cf. Hippol., Haer. 7, 36; 10, 24 etc.; see K. Beyschlag, Simon Magus und die christliche Gnosis, WUNT 16, 1974, 109). The early origins of such an angelology have now been illuminated by 11QMelchizedek. But comparison with Lk. 22:69 (par. Matt. 26:64; Mk. 14:62) makes it probable that theou (“of God”) is here a Lucan addition in the exegetical genitive. “The great power” is a designation of divinity which was very widespread in the Syrian and Palestinian area (cf. Beyschlag, loc. cit.). If Simon was honoured as the “first” or “chief” divinity, i.e. as the incarnation of Zeus, it must be remembered that in Samaria Zeus was at times syncretistically identified with Yahweh (probably on the grounds of the title ʿElyôn; cf. Pseudo-Eupolemos in Eusebius, Praep. ev. 9, 17, 2–9). Simon’s consort Helena was equated with Athena, the daughter of Zeus (cf. Irenaeus, Haer. 1, 23, 4), and designated as his prōtē ennoia (“first thought”). There is an obvious comparison with other female cult figures in Jewish (at Elephantine) and Samaritan (cf. Epiphanius, Haer. 78, 23, 6) syncretism. What is new, though not altogether without analogy, is the thought of incarnation, or rather of manifestation, which attaches to the miracle worker here as at Lystra (Acts 14:11 f.). The historical figure of Simon does not bear any specific gnostic traits, and the later assimilation to gnosticism of the Simon-movement is to be traced back to dependence on Christian gnosticism (K. Beyschlag, op. cit., against G. Lüdemann, Untersuchungen zur simonianischen Gnosis, 1975). Perhaps Acts 8:18–24 already reflects the way in which the Simon-movement sought to adopt and modify the Christian tradition.

The fact that the newly formed Samaritan communities did not at once manifest the usual charismatic gifts of the primitive communities is unique in the NT. (Acts 19:1–7 is no real parallel!) The account cannot have as its intention the tying of the gift of the Spirit to the apostolic office (cf. Acts 9:17; 19:7). But it is conceivable that this may be the expression of the healing of the breach between Judea and Samaria and of the primacy of honour held by the Jerusalem church (cf. Jn. 4:22 ff.). O. Cullmann has suggested that Jn. 4:38 is a reflection of the relatively tardy participation of Jerusalem in the Samaria mission (cf. O. Cullmann, “Samaria and the Origins of the Christian Mission”, in The Early Church, 1956, 183–92).

This hesitation on the part of the Jerusalem community was repeated in the case of the Gentile missionary drive, led by the same Hellenistic Jewish Christians (cf. Acts 11:19 f.). Whilst representatives of the Jerusalem church (cf. Acts 15:1, 23; cf. 11:27?) questioned the Gentile mission with its disregard for the law (Acts 15:2), and opposition in Jerusalem itself became vocal (15:3), the churches in Phoenicia and Samaria were overjoyed at the conversion of the Gentiles (15:3). Therefore, from a historical point of view (and thus also from the theological) one cannot overlook the fact that already in NT times cultural differences resulting from political and economic factors produced or at least fostered dissensions in the theology of Christian mission.

(c) John. (i) Jn. 4:1–42. Various aspects of this passage need to be taken into consideration:

(1) Geographical factors. Sychar (v. 5) may be identified with modern ‘Askar’ (cf. H. M. Schenke, “Jakobsbrunnen–Josephsgrab–Sychar”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 84, 1968, 159–84; against G. E. Wright, Shechem: The Biography of a Biblical City, 1965, 243 f.) that is situated on the South Eastern slope of Mt. Ebal somewhat to the side of the road from Jerusalem to Galilee. This would explain the scene in vv. 6b and 8. The remarkable pinpointing of Sychar in v. 5b is best explained if Sychar stood not topographically, but historically, in continuity with ancient Shechem and its traditions (see below), perhaps as its successor between 128 B.C. and the emergence of Neapolis.

The geographical comment in v. 5b (“near the field that Jacob gave to his son Joseph”) goes back to Gen. 48:22, and leans on the formulation of Jos. 24:32 LXX, where Gen. 48:22 is assimilated to Gen. 33:19 (cf. Acts 7:15 f.). Gen. 48:22 LXX identifies this particular heritage of Joseph with Shechem, on the grounds of the ambiguity of the Heb. šəqem which means both “shoulder” (i.e. here a “mountain slope”, cf. RSV with RSV mg.) and Shechem (cf. E. A. Speiser, Genesis, Anchor Bible, 1964, 358). The ET of the LXX reads: “Now to thee exclusively above thy brothers, I give Shechem, which I took out of the hand of the Amorites with my sword and with my bow.” Philo interpreted this as an act of detachment: Jacob did not want to keep what he had not received from God, but had conquered in his own strength (Leg. All. 3, 26). As against this (or apart from this tradition which relates Gen. 48:22 to Shechem) the Samaritans have considered and revered a certain parcel of ground at the foot of Mt. Gerizim as the original plot of Gen. 33:18 (cf. Memar Markah [= MM] IV, 9, p. 102, 13–16). In the 4th cent. A.D. they built there a synagogue (cf. Chronicle V [Salsalat] 89 and 126; cf. perhaps also Epiphanius, Haer. 80, 1, 6). The early church identification of Joseph's grave on this spot (cf. Jos. 24:32; MM V, 4, p. 128, 24) by Old Shechem (= Balāta; cf. Itin. Burdig., Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, XXXIX, 20, 3–7) seems to correspond to the ancient Samaritan tradition concerning the site (against Schenke, op. cit.).

The spring, or well, of Jacob (vv. 6, 11 f.) is not mentioned in the OT. The sole tradition about a well associated with the name of Jacob is found in Gen. 29:2–10, where the place is given as Haran. In the Haggadah it was enlarged into a wandering legend by association with Exod. 2:15–22 (→ Moses in Midian) and the miracle of the water in the wilderness (Exod. 17:1–7; Num. 20:1–11; 21:16 ff.). At the same time it was compressed into the picture of a single miraculous spring which “accompanied” the patriarchs and Moses on their wanderings (cf. 1 Cor. 10:4; Pirqê de R. Eliezer p. 268, Friedländer; see A. Jaubert, “La Symbolique du Puits de Jacob, Jean 4, 12”, in L'Homme devant dieu, Mélanges offerts au P. Henri de Lubac, 1963, I, 63–73). The Samaritan concentration of the most diverse patriarchal traditions on Shechem and its environment (cf. Jn. 4:20) led logically to the local tradition of the well of Jacob. The fact that Jn. 4:6 is strongly reminiscent of Exod. 2:15 f. in the narrative in Josephus, Ant. 2, 257, shows that already in NT times the motives of this tradition were rather fixed while the names of places and people changed.

The information about the well in Jn. 4 (note the oscillation between “well” and “spring”, the situation outside the village, and the depth of the well) corresponds to the well fed by a spring, and identified as Jacob's well, in a church 400 meters South-East of ancient Shechem.

(2) The problem of the relationship of the Jews to the Samaritans (vv. 7 ff.). The woman's amazement and the explanatory comment of the evangelist refer particularly to Jesus' request for water, which indicates a kind of meal fellowship. It is distinguished from the Pharisaic conception, according to which the vessels of the Samaritans were considered unclean and could not be used by the Jews (cf. D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 373–82).

(3) The symbolism of the living water (vv. 10–15) has been related by tradition history primarily to → wisdom (cf. Prov. 13:14; 18:4; Sir. 24:25–34; Philo, Som. 1, 6; Eth. Enoch 48:1; 19:1; and often) and secondarily to the → law (cf. Sir. 15:3; 24:23; CD 3:16; 6:4; 19:34; S.Dt. § 48[84a]). Jn. is acquainted with the symbolical correspondence of → water and → Spirit (cf. Jn. 3:5; 7:39). But Jn. 4:10, 13 f. (cf. also 7:37 f.) do not seem to have been designed originally to express the once-and-for-all reception of the Spirit, but rather the continued working of the words of Jesus (cf. 6:63).

In the Samaritan literature of the 4th cent. A.D. the picture of living water plays a significant rôle as part of the strong wisdom traditions of the Samaritans (cf. J. C. H. Lebram, “Nachbiblische Weisheitstraditionen”, VT 15, 1965, 167–237). The emphasis on the person of Moses in these texts (in contrast with the stress on the impersonal law in Judaism) is reminiscent of Johannine christology, and prompts the question of historical connexions between the Johannine and the Samaritan tradition (see below). In Jn. 4:10–15 the striking hallomenou (“welling up”, v. 14) refers back to the Moses tradition of Num. 21:16 ff.; cf. ‘lî, “spring up” in v. 17 (cf. T. F. Glasson, Moses in the Fourth Gospel, 1963, 55 f.). The same allusion occurs in MM VI, 3, p. 136, 18.

(4) The allusion to the life of the Samaritan woman in the course of the conversation (Jn. 4:16–19, especially vv. 17 f.) has often been interpreted allegorically, since D. F. Strauss, of the five gods of the Assyrian colonists in Samaria (five instead of seven is the number given in Josephus, Ant. 9, 287, against 2 Ki. 17:20 f.). Today this is generally and rightly rejected. The interpretation remains for us as ambiguous as that of Jn. 1:48, and has the same function in the context of the narrative, focusing on a special charismatic gift of Jesus and eliciting a corresponding confession (cf. Jn. 1:49; 4:19). The woman's belief that in Jesus she was being confronted by a prophet is to be understood from her standpoint only in the light of v. 18. One should not read into it any eschatological expectations, e.g. those derived from Deut. 18:15, 18.

(5) The allegiance to Mount Gerizim as the sole legitimate place of worship is the fourth and ultimately distinctive point of the Samaritan creed. The way in which the Samaritan woman introduces the theme (v. 20) is an excellent expression of the Samaritan standpoint: the age-old Israelite practice ("our fathers worshipped on this mountain") is set in opposition to the Jewish claims in favour of → Jerusalem ("and you say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship"). According to Samaritan tradition, a long chain of important biblical figures from Adam right up to Joseph knew and recognized Gerizim as a holy place (cf. MM II, 10, p. 47, 7–12; IV, 10, p. 105, 7 f.). Pseudo-Eupolemos (an anonymous Samaritan) provides testimony already in the early 2nd cent. A.D. of the transference of the Abraham tradition of Gen. 14 to Mount Gerizim (cf. Eusebius, Praep. ev. 9, 17). The fact that the cultic centre in Jn. 4:20 is introduced as a place of worship corresponds to Samaritan linguistic usage (cf. MM II, 10, p. 47, 25 f.; II, 12, p. 52, 5; III, 2, p. 59, 2 f.; III, 6, p. 73, 5). Josephus gives account of disputes between Jews and Samaritans in Egypt over the legitimacy of Gerizim and Zion (Ant. 12, 10; 13, 74–79). All in all, Jn. 4:20 is formulated so authentically in the style of Samaritan traditions, that the narrator must be credited with a knowledge of them.

(6) Jesus' position on the problem of the right cultic centre (vv. 21–24) exhibits different lines of thought. The essentially futuristic pronouncements of vv. 21 and 23 f. relativize the question of the place in favour of stressing the dimension of Spirit and truth in which God will be worshipped (→ Prayer, art. proskyneō NT 4). V. 22, on the other hand, speaks in the present, and makes Jesus adopt clearly the Jewish standpoint and condemn the Samaritan one. V. 22 (or only 22c, "for salvation is from the Jews") has often been judged to be an editorial addition, though for differing reasons. But it fits completely into the context of the chapter (cf. vv. 9 and 42) and that of the entire Gospel (cf. Jn. 1:11; 4:43 f.; 12:37 ff.). Jesus is a Jew, and Judea is his actual domain; it is this that gives his conflict with the Jews its particular acerbity. Rather, vv. 21 and 23 f. could be understood as the Johannine addition to a previous narrative, if the juxtaposition of the two answers of Jesus were seen as intolerable. For it is an evident concern of the evangelist to present the Spirit as the decisive power of the new age inaugurated by Jesus (cf. Jn. 1:32 f.; 3:3–8; 6:63; 20:22; and the paraclete sayings, → Advocate).

The reproach in v. 22a ("You worship what you do not know") recalls Acts 17:23, and fits in well with the tendency in Judaism to place the Samaritans on the same level as the Gentiles on cultic questions. This was particularly pronounced in the 1st cent. A.D. (J. Jeremias, TDNT VII 90 f.). In any case, the petition preserved by Josephus which the Samaritans presented to Antiochus Epiphanes presents a concrete instance of the reproach of Jn. 4:22a. There the Samaritans represented their sanctuary on Mount Gerizim as a nameless one (Josephus, Ant. 12, 259, 261), to allow it to be consecrated to Zeus. The whole affair was probably a move in a political game of chess, made possible by the strict disciplina arcana, which protected the name of Yahweh from profanation (→ God, art. theos or 2), and which could cause people to think that the God of Israel had no name (cf. A. Schalit, op. cit., 150 f.). The form of Judaism influenced by the Maccabees and the Hasidim understood these manoeuvres of Samaritan politics as a declension from Yahweh to Greek religion. Hence, the parallelism between Jn. 4:22a and Acts 17:23 is no accident.

Over and above this, the accusation of a defective knowledge of God stands in the broader context of a Jewish polemic which characterized the Samaritans as “a foolish people” and the like, taking up the thought of Deut. 32:21 (cf. Sir. 50:25 f.; Test. Lev. 7). In contrast, Ps. 76:2 (LXX 75:2) speaks of the knowledge of God as a privilege of Judah (LXX Judea). (The fact that, in the Fourth Gospel, Jesus denies even his Jewish opponents a knowledge of God, stands on a different plane, in so far as it is grounded in the special situation of the rejection of Jesus; cf. Jn. 5:37, 42; 7:28; 8:54 f.)

The premise in Jn. 4:22c (“for salvation is from the Jews”) sounds like the repetition of a generally accepted principle. In the context of the Jewish-Samaritan controversy this could be a sentence of the Torah (cf. Josephus, Ant. 13, 76, 78 f.). This could be identified as the oracle on Judah (Gen. 49:8–12), a text which in Judaism was related to Zion and the Davidic dynasty (cf. Ps. 78:67–72), but which was felt to be a problem by the Samaritans and was reinterpreted by them (cf. Chronicle II, 151 f.). Within the framework of Jn. 4 this allusion to Jacob’s blessing in Gen. 49 is particularly eloquent, because the scene is set by the well of Jacob (vv. 5 f.) and the woman has previously compared Jesus with Jacob (v. 12). Against the background of Gen. 49:8–12 the question in v. 25 about the messiah follows on from Jesus’ answer in v. 22. This is an added reason for seeing in vv. 21 and 23 f. an extension of a pre-Johannine narrative.

It is a striking fact that the question of the place of worship is also relativized in the Samaritan liturgical texts (cf. Markah, Hymn 12, 4–6, p. 27, 1–4; Amram Darah, Hymn 1, 4 f., 11, p. 28, 1–3, 11 f.; 2, 22, p. 29, 25; Durran 4, p. 40, 1–15; Durran 5, p. 40, 16–26; Durran 8, p. 41, 19–42 all in A. E. Cowley, The Samaritan Liturgy, 1909; cf. also MM IV, 7, p. 97, 28–31). In place of the topological question, anthropological categories stand in the foreground, especially uprightness and truth (cf. Markah, Hymn 2, 18 f., p. 18, 17 f.; 3, 17, p. 19, 13 f.; 5, 12, p. 21, 5, 8 f.; 10, 5, p. 25, 7 f.). The theological and historical relationship of these texts to Jn. 4:21, 23 f. is still in need of clarification. For the time being one may proceed on the basis of the widespread consensus of more recent exegesis that “Spirit and truth” means a reality proceeding from God. But does this not include the idea that the Spirit of God indwells man and becomes – admittedly in a way dependent on God – an inner reality? Opposition to the idealist understanding of the Holy Spirit should not obscure this fact.

O. Michel compares Jn. 4:23 f. with Acts 7:48; 17:25 (Das Zeugnis des Neuen Testaments von der Gemeinde, 1941, 16 f., n. 12; cf. Philo’s use of topos, place, in the discussion of H. Köster, TDNT VIII 201 f.). Jn. 4:21, 23 f. and the comparable Samaritan texts probably stand in the broader stream of the theology of omnipresence which goes hand in hand with a sublimation of cultic observance.

(7) The woman's testimony to belief in the coming messiah (v. 25) relates to the Jewish expectation of salvation, endorsed by Jesus in v. 22. The idea of a messiah is lacking in Samaritan texts right up to the 16th cent. A.D.; to Samaritan ears it was probably too closely tied to the ideal of the Davidic king. The openness of the woman is probably to be understood as the consequence of the impression made on her by Jesus' prophetic knowledge (v. 19). This line is continued in her receptivity (v. 29) to his messianic claims (v. 26).

The present wording of vv. 25 f. hardly provides a basis for the frequently expressed opinion that Jesus is here shown as the fulfilment of Samaritan messianic expectation. The Samaritans did indeed expect that their Taheb (the coming one, the one who will return and overturn, the restorer, who was an eschatological figure) would reveal truth (cf. MM II, 9, p. 44, 31 f.; IV, 11, p. 108, 6 f.; IV, 12, p. 111, 13 f.). But in its context (and in contrast to Jn. 4:25) this is not to be understood in terms of proclamation, but as the realization of the divinely willed state of affairs (cf. 2 Esd. 6:27 f.), and in particular the restoration of worship on Mount Gerizim (cf. also MM IV, 12, p. 110, 33). Furthermore, the dating of the Taheb expectation is disputed (even the relevant texts in the Memar Markah are uncertain from the standpoint of textual criticism). And indeed the beginnings of Samaritan eschatology lie largely in obscurity. Therefore, Jn. 4:25c is to be understood, unless further light is forthcoming, entirely from the context of the Fourth Gospel as the expression of a christology that gives strong prominence to the element of proclamation and teaching as the mission of Jesus (cf. Jn. 1:18; 6:68; 18:37 and often). The fact that the Gk. word christos in Jn. 4:25 is not introduced as the translation of messias (as it is in Jn. 1:41) but as a second name suggests the conjecture that messias in v. 25 may have replaced some other term, but any further attempt to make this conjecture more specific must remain doubly hypothetical.

(8) Also the final confession of the Samaritans who were impressed by Jesus ("It is no longer because of your words that we believe, for we have heard for ourselves, and we know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world", v. 42) cannot be demonstrated as the expression of contemporary Samaritan theology. Judged by the texts from the oldest strata of the Samaritan liturgy (cf. Markah Hymns 2, 17 p. 18, 16; 6, 17 p. 22, 7; 7, 5 p. 22, 19), the title "Saviour of the world" would be an extension to Jesus of a divine title (cf. Acts 8:10?). The way in which vv. 39-42 refer back to v. 29 shows, however, that in the sense of the narrator "Saviour of the world" is a synonym for the title of messiah or Christ (cf. alēthōs, indeed or truly, v. 42). This is anticipated in the text of the Heb. prophetic canon (which the Samaritans did not recognize), where men appear as saviours commissioned by God (cf. Jdg. 3:9, 15; 2 Ki. 13:5; Isa. 19:20; Zech. 9:9; → Redemption, art. sōtēr OT). But it is in Jn. that the office of saviour is applied to the whole world for the first time (cf. even Jn. 4:14). This extension is probably connected with the Johannine pre-existence christology which binds the messiah closely with the concept of God and at the same time allots him a cosmological function (cf. Jn. 1:1 ff.). The above mentioned Markah texts stand perhaps in a wisdom tradition (cf. Wis. 16:7) which for their part have been adopted and transformed by John in his christology.

(ii) Jn. 8:48 f. In Jn. 8:48, in the context of a violent controversy, "the Jews" put to Jesus the question: "Are we not right in saying that you are a Samaritan and have a demon?" Jesus' reply gives an explicit answer only to the second part of the question: "I have not a demon; but I honour my Father, and you dishonour me" (v. 49). Both the question and answer have been variously understood. Two main lines of thought may be noted. (1) For the majority of exegetes the two halves of the question in v. 48 are materially related or even mean the same thing, and the answer in v. 49 refers to the whole question as a pars pro toto. For Samaria was considered to be a demon-possessed land, in which people like Dositheus, Simon Magus (cf. Acts 8:9 ff.) and Menander appeared with blasphemous claims and found support. Alternatively, the Samaritans as heretics were regarded eo ipso as demon-possessed (cf. Gal. 3:1). In this connexion attention has been drawn to Sot. 22a, where Samaritan and magician are related categories. (2) On the other hand, some scholars stress the difference between the two halves of the question in v. 48 and Jesus' silence on the accusation of being a Samaritan in v. 49 (cf. the commentaries of Lagrange and Odeberg, ad loc.; J. Bowman, "Samaritan Studies", BJRL 40, 1958, 298–327; E. D. Freed, "Did John Write his Gospel Partly to Win Samaritan Converts?", NovT 12, 1970, 241–56; O. Cullmann, "Von Jesus zum Stephanuskreis und zum Johannesevangelium", in E. E. Ellis and E. Grässer, eds., Jesus und Paulus, Festschrift für W. G. Kümmel, 1975, 44–56). This is taken to be a conscious reference to a certain proximity of Jesus to the Samaritans (in his teaching or in his less hostile attitude), or perhaps to the corresponding interest of the Fourth Evangelist. But such conjectures are opposed by the clear rejection of Samaritan claims in Jn. 4:22. Neither do the sharp accusations against the Jews in Jn. 8 make Jesus into a Samaritan. Rather, they are sharper than any Samaritan polemic against the Jews that we know (cf. A. Merx, Das Evangelium des Johannes nach der syrischen im Sinaikloster gefundenen Palimpsesthandschrift, 1911, 216). The first interpretation (1) which is supported by the majority of expositors is exegetically more plausible. In any case, the reference to Simon Magus does not fit chronologically into the life of Jesus. Jn. 8:48 is, like other elements in the controversy between Jesus and "the Jews" in Jn., also of historical value as testimony to the relationship between Jews and Christians at the time of the composition of the Fourth Gospel (cf. A. Merx, op. cit., 218). In this connexion, it is worth asking whether Samaritēs is an inadequate, unduly restrictive rendering of the rabbinic term mîn (heretic), for which there was no exact Gk. equivalent in the NT age.

2. Samaritan Influences in the NT? (a) The Gospel of John. After A. Merx (op. cit.) and especially H. Odeberg (The Fourth Gospel interpreted in its Relation to Contemporaneous Religious Currents in Palestine and the Hellenistic-Oriental World, 1929) had brought their knowledge of Samaritan literature to the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, J. Bowman gave impetus to further consideration (cf. his "Samaritan Studies", BJRL 40, 1958, 298–327, especially 298–308; and his Samaritanische Probleme. Studien zum Verhältnis von Samaritanertum, Judentum und Urchristentum, 1967). He raised the question whether the Gospel according to John could not have been directed in many respects to the needs of the Samaritan mission; e.g. by taking up positively Deut. 18:15, 18 and the thought of pre-existence into the Johannine christology; by thinking in terms of the unity of the people of God in Jn. 10:16; by stressing the idea of faith which was also important for the Samaritans. G. W. Buchanan ("The Samaritan Origin of the Gospel of John", in J. Neusner, ed., Religions in Antiquity: Essays in Memory of E. R. Goodenough, 1968, 149–75) and E. D. Freed (op. cit.) took up and extended the hypothesis. H. G. Kippenberg expressed his approval (op. cit., 162, n. 95), and O. Cullmann combined it with his earlier thesis of the origin of the Fourth Gospel in the circle of Hellenistic Jewish Christianity (The Johannine Circle: Its Place in Judaism, among the Disciples of Jesus and in Early Christianity. A Study in the Origin of the Gospel of John, 1976). Alongside this, Samaritan texts have been adduced in the interpretation of Johannine thought by W. A. Meeks (The Prophet-King: Moses Traditions and the Johannine Christology, 1967) and K. Haacker (Die Stiftung des Heils. Untersuchungen zur Struktur der johanneischen Theologie, 1972). At first J. Macdonald followed Bowman ("The Samaritan Doctrine of Moses", SJT 13, 1960, 149–62), but later proceeded to reverse his opinion, and explained the common factors between John and the Samaritans as the borrowing by the latter from John or from early church christology (The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964). K. Haacker (op. cit., 127 f.) and R. Bergmeier ("Zur Frühdatierung samaritanischer Theologumena", Journal for the Study of Judaism 5, 1974, 121–53) have stressed that the arguments so far adduced are insufficient, in the light of the chronology of the Samaritan sources and the multiplicity of strata in the Johannine tradition, to provide the basis for a new theory of the origin and objectives of the Fourth Gospel.

Clarification is only possible if, in connexion with developments in research into the Samaritan religion, all significant linguistic and material parallels to Jn. of the really ancient literature and tradition of the Samaritans are brought together and inserted into the framework of the rest of the material from the history of religion. Only the concurrence of specifically Samaritan traditions with Johannine statements permits conclusions to be drawn about historical relationships in the one direction or the other. The stepping up of relevant research could make an important contribution to the understanding of the Fourth Gospel, and help to solve the riddle of how the Fourth Gospel has "alongside its Hellenistic traits such a strikingly Palestinian-Jewish character" (J. Schniewind, "Über das Johannesevangelium", in H.-J. Kraus, Julius Schniewind. Charisma der Theologie, 1965, 194).

(b) Stephen's Speech (Acts 7:2–53). Stephen's speech in Acts 7:2–53 contains several readings peculiar to the Samaritan Pentateuch and themes recalling specifically Samaritan traditions: Exod. 3:6 in v. 32; Deut. 2:5 in v. 5; the chronology of Gen. 11:32 in v. 4; the transfer of the tombs of the patriarchs from Hebron to Shechem (a combination of Gen. 23; 49:29–33; 50:13 with Gen. 33:19; [Jos. 24:32]) in vv. 15 f. (cf. the local tradition according to Jerome, Epp. 57, 10 and 108, 13).

However, a number of points remain uncertain (as against A. Spiro, "Stephen's Samaritan Background", in J. Munck, The Acts of the Apostles, revised by W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Anchor Bible, 1967, 285–300; and C. H. H. Scobie, "The Origin and Development of Samaritan Christianity", NTS 19, 1972–73, 390–414).

(i) It is not clear whether the quotations from Gen. 12:7; 15:13 f. and Exod. 3:12 in vv. 5 ff. are intended to support the cultic claims of Shechem, because the revelation in Gen. 12 is located at Shechem. For the phrase en tō topō toutō ("in this place") in v. 7 differs from the Samaritan Pentateuch version of Exod. 3:12, and furthermore in context refers to the temple at Jerusalem (cf. 6:14). (ii) Nor is it clear whether v. 37 reflects the Samaritan text of Exod. 20, where Deut. 18:18 is interpolated. For on the one hand, it is not Deut. 18:18 but Deut. 18:15 that is quoted. And on the other hand, the Pentateuchal quotations in Acts 7 do not stand in the logical sequence of their occurrence in the biblical text. (iii) It is not clear whether the polemic against the building of Solomon's temple in vv. 47–50 reflects the Samaritan position. For on the one hand, the Samaritans possessed a temple themselves for two hundred years on Mount Gerizim. On the other hand, the Samaritan polemic was not directed against a particular form of building (oikos, house, instead of skēnē, → tent, tabernacle, or skēnōma, tent, dwelling place), but exclusively in what in their eyes was the illegitimate site of Jerusalem. (iv) Finally it is not clear whether the link with Deut. 18:15, 18 points as such to a Samaritan background (against this cf. H. M. Teeple, The Mosaic Eschatological Prophet, 1956).

Spiro's assertion is quite erroneous that the "downgrading" of → Moses (and the law) by setting angels as intermediaries between God and Moses (vv. 30, 35, 38) is typically Samaritan. On the one hand, it is improbable in the light of v. 53 that the mention of angels here (as in Gal. 3:19) has a pejorative intention. And on the other hand, Spiro's opinion, that the Samaritans had taken centuries to accommodate themselves to Moses and the law in their detour via the patriarchs, rests upon an uncritical understanding of 2 Ki. 17 and Josephus, Ant. 11, 346, and is altogether untenable.

Over against the Samaritan readings and peculiar traditions stands the use of OT texts outside the Pentateuch, which the Samaritans did not regard as Holy Scripture: Amos 5:27 in vv. 42 f. and Isa. 66:1 f. in vv. 49 f. M. H. Scharlemann, Scobie and Spiro see further echoes of Jer. 7:18 and 19:13 in v. 42 and of Ps. 132:5 in vv. 45 f. (M. H. Scharlemann, Stephen: A Singular Saint, Analecta Biblica 34, 1968, 43; Scobie, op. cit., 395; Spiro, op. cit., 287). These quotations or allusions stand in an anti-Jewish context, or to be more precise, in the context of a sermon to the Jews summoning them to repentance. This in itself does not give them a Samaritan character (as against Scobie et al.; cf. above on Jn. 8:48). Rather, it may be explained without further problems from the situation narrated in Acts 7.

Spiro, following a tradition in Abul Fath (ed. Vilmar, 1865, 159), takes Stephen to be a Samaritan Christian who preached the gospel in Jerusalem and for homiletical reasons also quoted from the Jewish prophetic books. The latter is in principle feasible in view of Gen. R. 4:4a, where a Samaritan cites Jer. 23:24. But the price of the theory is to claim that Stephen did not belong to the circle of Hellenists of Acts 6:1. Rather, he is said to belong to that of the Hebrews whom Spiro reckons to be Christian Samaritans, because in his opinion the term Hebraios in the 1st cent. A.D. was ostensibly used only for Samaritans (but cf. Phil. 3:5).

More plausible is the conjecture of Scharlemann, that Stephen was probably a Jew, but (perhaps even before his conversion) came under Samaritan influence (cf. op. cit., 186). Scobie departs unnecessarily from the NT testimony, when he sees the speech as a product of the Samaritan mission which began only after Stephen's death (cf. NTS 19, 1972–73, 398).

The question is whether the Samaritanisms of Acts 7 are explicable only through direct, particular contacts with the Samaritans. The contemporary discussion is in danger of falling back behind the insights of P. Kahle (Opera Minora, 1956, 3–37, especially 8–12), which have been confirmed by the Qumran discoveries, and of underestimating the fact, that the text of the Samaritan Pentateuch and other Samaritan traditions were spread beyond the narrow confines of the Samaritan community (cf. Philo, Migr. Abr. 176 f. with Acts 7:4; Exod. 3:6 LXX v.l. with Acts 7:32). Readings of the Samaritan Pentateuch are therefore no certain indication of the Samaritan provenance of a source.

Acts 7:2–53 is, therefore, until further evidence is discovered to be evaluated as testimony for the cross-connexions between Hellenistic Judaism and Hellenistic-Jewish Christianity (cf. Acts 6:1) on the one hand and Samaritanism on the other. The speech is not a literary fruit of the Samaritan mission, but it gives insight into its theological and cultural antecedents.

K. Haacker

An alphabetical list of most of the literature of and on the Samaritans which had been published up to his time was produced by L. A. Mayer and edited by D. Broadribb under the title Bibliography of the Samaritans (Supplement to Abr-Nahrain I), 1964. This list has been supplemented by S. Noja, "Contribution à la bibliographie des Samaritains" in AIÖN 33, Naples, 1973, 98–113, and by R. Weis, "Supplements to the Samaritan Bibliography" in AIÖN 35, 1975, 265–273. For selected bibliographies see: J. A. Montgomery, The Samaritans. The Earliest Jewish Sect. Their History, Theology and Literature, (1907) 1968, 322–346; J. Macdonald, The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964, 457–463 (especially for the editions of sources), and R. Weis, Leqeṭ bibliografi 'al ha-Šomerim (A Selected Bibliography on the Samaritans) 1974³. For details of the Samaritan Chronicles and other writings see J. Macdonald, op. cit., 457, 460 ff.

(a). E. Baguley, A Critical Edition, with Translation, of the Hebrew Text of the Malef, and a Comparison of its Teachings with those in the Samaritan Liturgy, 1962; Z. Ben-Hayyim, The Literature and Oral Tradition of Hebrew and Aramaic among the Samaritans: The Grammar, Masoretical and Exegetical Writings of the Samaritans, I–III, 1957–67; J. Bowman, "Early Samaritan Eschatology", Journal of Jewish Studies 6, 1955, 63–72; "The Exegesis of the Pentateuch among the Samaritans and among the Rabbis", OTS 8, 1950, 22–62; "The Importance of Samaritan Researches", Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society 1, 1959, 43–54; "The Samaritans and the Book of Deuteronomy", Transactions of Glasgow University Oriental Society 17, 1959, 9–18; "Pilgrimage to Mt. Gerizim", Eretz Israel 7, 1964, 17–28; and "Samaritan Law and Liturgy", BJRL 40, 1958, 315–27; "The Fourth Gospel and the Samaritans", BJRL 40, 1958, 298–308; "Faith in Samaritan Thought", BJRL 40, 1958, 308–15; G. W. Buchanan, "The Samaritan Origin of the Gospel of John", in J. Neusner, ed., Religions in Antiquity: Essays in Memory of E. R. Goodenough, 1968, 149–75; R. J. Coggins, Samaritans and Jews: The Origins of the Samaritans Reconsidered, 1975; A. E. Cowley, "The Samaritan Doctrine of the Messiah", The Expositor, Fifth Series 1, 1895, 161–74; "Samaritan Literature and Religion", JQR 8, 1896, 562–75; The Samaritan Liturgy, I–II, 1909; and "The Samaritan Liturgy and the Reading of the Law", JQR 7, 1894, 121–40; F. M. Cross, Jr., "Aspects of Samaritan and Jewish History in Late Persian and Hellenistic Times", HTR 59, 1966, 201–11; and "Papyri of the Fourth Century B.C. from Dāliyah", in D. N. Freedman and J. Greenfield, eds., New Directions in Biblical Archaeology, 1969, 45–69; O. Cullmann, "Samaria and the Origins of the Christian Mission", in The Early Church, 1956, 183–92; and The Johannine Circle: Its Place in Judaism, among the Disciples of Jesus and in Early Christianity. A Study in the Origin of the Gospel of John, 1976; D. Daube, "Samaritan Women", in The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, Jordan Lectures 1952, 1956, 373–82; J. D. M. Derrett, "The Parable of the Good Samaritan", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 208–27; J. W. Drane, "Simon the Samaritan and the Lucan Concept of Salvation History", EQ 47, 1975, 131–37; R. A. Falconer, "Is 2nd Peter a Genuine Epistle to the Churches of Samaria?", Expositor, Sixth Series, 5, 1902, 459–72; M. S. Enslin, "Luke and the Samaritans", HTR 36, 1943, 277–98; E. D. Freed, "Did John Write his Gospel Partly to Win Samaritan Converts?", NovT 12, 1970, 241–56; M. Gaster, "The Samaritan Legends of the Birth of Moses", The Quest 21, 1930, 358–71; Samaritan Oral Law and Ancient Traditions, I, Eschatology, 1932 (only this volume was published); The Samaritans: Their History, Doctrines and Literature, Schweich Lectures for 1923, 1925; and Studies in Texts in Folklore, Magic, Medieval Romance, Hebrew Apocrypha and Samaritan Archaeology, I–III, 1925–28; T. H. Gaster, "A Samaritan Poem about Moses", in A. Berger, L. Marwick and I. S. Meyer, The Joshua Bloch Memorial Volume (Studies in Booklore and History), 1960, 115–39; B. Gerhardsson, The Good Samaritan – the Good Shepherd, 1958; C. Heller, The Samaritan Pentateuch: An Adaptation of the Masoretic Text, 1923; J. Jeremias, Samareia, Samarië, TDNT VII, 88–94; Jesus' Promise to the Nations, Franz Delitzsch Lectures, SBT 24, 1958; and Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions during the New Testament Period, 1969, 352–58; R. W. Klein, “Samaria Papyri”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 772; J. Macdonald, Memar Marqah, I–II, BZAW 84, 1963; “The Tetragrammaton in Samaritan Liturgical Compositions”, Transactions of Glasgow Oriental Society 17, 1959, 37–47; A Critical Edition of the Text of the Samaritan Yom ha-Kippur Liturgy, with Translation thereof and Comparison with the corresponding Jewish Liturgies, (Dissertation, Leeds) 1958; “Islamic Doctrines in Samaritan Theology”, Muslim World 50, 1960, 279–90; “The Samaritan Doctrine of Moses”, SJT 13, 1960, 149–62; “The Day of Judgement in Near Eastern Religions”, Indo-Iranica 14, 1961, 33–53; and The Theology of the Samaritans, 1964; W. A. Meeks, The Prophet-King: Moses Traditions and the Johannine Christology, Supplements to NovT 14, 1967; S. L. Miller, The Samaritan Molad Mosheh, 1949; J. A. Montgomery, The Samaritans: The Earliest Jewish Sect, 1907; G. F. Nicholls, A Grammar of the Samaritan Language, 1858; J. D. Purvis, The Samaritan Pentateuch and the Origin of the Samaritan Sect, 1968; “The Fourth Gospel and the Samaritans”, NovT 17, 1975, 161–98; “Samaritan Pentateuch”, IDB Supplementary Volume 1976, 772–75; “Samaritans”, ibid., 776 f.; H. H. Rowley, “Sanballat and the Samaritan Temple”, BJRL 38, 1956, 166–96; C. H. H. Scobie, “The Origin and Development of Samaritan Christianity”, NTS 19, 1972–73, 390–414; A. Spiro, “Stephen’s Samaritan Background”, in J. Munck, The Acts of the Apostles, revised by W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, Anchor Bible, 1967, 285–300; J. E. H. Thomson, The Samaritans: Their Testimony to the Religion of Israel, 1919; R. J. F. Trotter, Did the Samaritans of the Fourth Century Know the Epistle to the Hebrews?, Leeds University Oriental Society Monograph Series 1, 1961; and A Critical Study of the Ideological Background of Fourteenth-Century Samaritanism, with Special Reference to the Works of Abisha b. Phinehas, Abdallah b. Solomon and Ben Manir, (Dissertation, Leeds) 1962; G. E. Wright, “The Samaritans at Shechem”, in Shechem: The Biography of a Biblical City, 1965, 170–84.

(b). R. Bergmeier, “Zur Frühdatierung samaritanischer Theologumena”, Journal for the Study of Judaism 5, 1974, 121–53; K. Beyschlag, Simon Magus und die christliche Gnosis, WUNT 16, 1974; B. H. Binder, “Das Gleichnis vom barmherzigen Samariter”, TZ 15, Basel, 176 ff.; K. Bornhäuser, “Die Samariter des Neuen Testaments”, ZSTh 9, 1932, 552–66; J. Bowman, Samaritanische Probleme. Studien zum Verhältnis von Samaritanertum, Judentum und Urchristentum, 1967; O. Cullmann, “Von Jesus zum Stephanuskreis und zum Johannesevangelium”, in E. E. Ellis and E. Grässer, eds., Jesus und Paulus, Festschrift für W. G. Kümmel, 1975, 44–56; J. Daniélou, “Le bon Samaritain”, Mélanges bibliques rédigés en l’Honneur de André Robert, 1957, 457–65; M. Delcor, “Vom Sichern der hellenistischen Epoche zum Sychar des Neuen Testaments”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 78, 1962, 34–48; F. Diening, Das Hebräische bei den Samaritanern. Ein Beitrag zur vormasoretischen Grammatik des Hebräischen, Bonner Orientalischer Studien 24, 1938; A. F. von Gall, Der hebräische Pentateuch der Samaritaner, 1918; K. Haacker, Die Stiftung des Heils. Untersuchungen zur Struktur der johanneischen Theologie, 1972; M. Gaster, “Die 613 Gebote und Verbote der Samaritaner”, Festschrift zum Bestehen des jüdisch-theologischen Seminars Breslau, 1929; M. Heidenheim, Bibliotheca Samaritana, I, Die samaritanische Pentateuch-Version, 1884; II, Die samaritanische Liturgie, 1885; III, Der Kommentar Marqahs des Samaritaners, 1896; A. Hilgenfeld, “Der Taheb der Samaritaner, nach einer neu aufgefundenen Urkunde”, Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie 36, 1894, 233–44; J. Jeremias, Die Passahfeier der Samaritaner und ihre Bedeutung für das Verständnis der alttestamentlichen Passahüberlieferung, BZAW 59, 1932; P. Kahle, “Die zwölf Marka-Hymnen aus dem ‘Defter’ der samaritanischen Liturgie”, in Opera Minora, 1965, 186–212; H. G. Kippenberg, Garizim und Synagoge. Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zur samaritanischen Religion der aramäischen Periode, 1971; G. Lüdemann, Untersuchungen zur simonianischen Gnosis, 1975; Der Messias oder Ta’eb der Samaritaner, BZAW 17, 1909; A. Merx, Das Evangelium des Johannes nach der syrischen im Sinaikloster gefundenen Palimpsesthandschrift, 1911; W. Monselewski, Der barmherzige Samariter. Eine auslegungsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu Lukas 10, 25–37, Beiträge zur Geschichte der biblischen Exegese 5, 1967; D. Rettig, Memar Marqa. Ein Samaritanischer Midrasch zum Pentateuch, 1934; B. Reicke, “Der barmherzige Samariter”, in O. Böcher and K. Haacker, eds., Verborum Veritas. Festschrift für Gustav Stählin, 1970, 103–9; J. Rosenberg, Lehrbuch der samaritanischen Sprache und Literatur, 1901; SB I 538–60; A. Schalit, “Die Denkschrift der Samaritaner an König Antiochos Epiphanes zu Beginn der grossen Verfolgung der jüdischen Religion im Jahre 167 v. Chr. (Josephus, AJ, XII, §§ 58–264)”, ASTI 8, 1970–71, 131–83; H. M. Schenke, “Jakobsbrunnen – Josephgrab – Sychar”, Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 84, 1968, 159–84.

Satan, Beelzebul, Devil, Exorcism

διάβολος διάβολος (diabolos), adj., slanderous; noun, slanderer, the devil; διαβάλλω (diaballō), accuse, bring charges with hostile intent; Βεεζεβούλ (Beezeboul), Βεελξεβούλ (Beelzeboul), Βεελξεβούβ (Beelzeboub), Beelzebul, Beelzebub; Βελιάρ (Beliar), Beliar; Βελιάλ (Belial), Belial; Σαταν (Satan), indeclinable, and Σατανᾶς (Satanas), the Adversary, Satan.

diaballo (formed from dia, through, and ballō, to throw) means to throw over or across, divide, set at variance, accuse, bring charges, slander, inform, reject, misrepresent, deceive. In the NT it is only used in Lk. 16:1 of the Unjust Steward who was (justly!) accused of and denounced for embezzlement (→ House, art. oikonomia NT 1 (a)). From the vb. is derived the noun diabolos, slanderer, accuser, devil. It is hardly found outside the NT and LXX.

OT 1. In the LXX diabolos occurs 21 times (13 times in Job 1 and 2). Except for Esther 7:4 and 8:1 (which have šar and šōrēr, adversary) it is always a translation of Heb. šāṭān, which is also transcribed three times simply by satan (1 Ki. 11:14, 23a, 25b). The Aram. form is sāṭānā'. Satan in the OT means an adversary or wicked opponent. In 1 Sam. 29:4 šāṭān (LXX epiboulos) is used of a potential saboteur in the ranks; in 1 Ki. 11:23, 25 it denotes the leader of a faction and later Syrian king Rezon (but see also Ps. 109[108]:6, where the LXX gives diabolos). šāṭān is also used of the angel who stood in Balaam's way (Num. 22:22, 32). It is in the prologue to Job that Satan first appears as a heavenly being, who accuses the righteous to God's face (the Public Prosecutor in heaven!). He similarly appears in Zech. 3:1 f. The word is first used as a personal name in 1 Chr. 21:1, where Satan entices → David to undertake the census of the people. The earlier account emphasizes Yahweh's wrath (2 Sam. 24:1). In the OT Satan is not the devil in the later sense of the word; he is not an evil principle opposing God. The LXX perhaps shows a slight shift in this direction, when it avoids using diabolos in the translation of the Numbers and Samuel references; it makes the word less ambivalent and puts the main emphasis in Job. Other instances of diabolos in the LXX are Wis. 2:24; and 1 Macc. 1:36.

The AV translates the Heb. hēlēl (LXX heōsphoros) in Isa. 14:12 by "Lucifer", lit. it means the shining one, i.e. Day Star. The reference is not to Satan but to the king of Babylon (→ Light, art. phōs NT 4).

2. In late Judaism the devil is particularly identified with the "evil inclination" and with the "angel of death". He now has a clearly evil character. As in the OT, he is the accuser of men before God. The fall of the → angels plays a large rôle (being linked with Gen. 6:1 ff.; → Demon, art. daimonion OT 2) without having any fundamental significance (Eth. Enoch 86:1–88:3; Jub. 5:1–12; CD 2:18–21). The impure spirits who deceived → Noah's grandsons are children of "the Watchers" (Jub. 19:28). The greater number of these spirits were destroyed, but a tenth remained, and with these Mastema is able to carry out his purpose among men (Jub. 10:8). For the rest, the demons stand alongside Satan in their own right, while he functions as the sole accuser before God. There is no account of his fall from heaven: otherwise he could not be the accuser. He tries above all to disrupt the relationship between God and Israel, but he also endeavours to separate the rest of mankind from God. His activity is briefly and tellingly described in Baba Bathra 16a: “It has been taught in Baraita: Satan comes down and deceives, goes up and accuses, seizes power and souls.” It is only later traditions that state that Satan had been an angel of high rank. The rabbis allowed that man had free will, to enable him to keep the law and to ward off the evil inclination or Satan-Sammael.

3. In the writings of Qumran Belial appears as the name of the evil spirit. God created two spirits, the spirit of light and the spirit or angel of darkness (Belial), who both exercise their power in the present (1QS 1:18; 2:5, 19; 3:20–23). Belial is the angel of malevolence (1QM 13:12), who lives in the hearts of his followers, the “sons of darkness” (1QS 1:10) and rules in the preacher of apostasy (CD 12:2). The enemies of the righteous are filled with “guiles of Belial” (1QH 2:16 f.; 6:21; 7:4). Belial’s followers are called his “congregation” (1QH 2:22). Unchastity, riches and defilement of the temple are the “three nets of Belial” (CD 4:15). His power is like a flood, threatening the world and the righteous (1QH 3:29, 32; 5:39). But God protects his righteous ones (1QM 14:9). Belial and his followers are solemnly cursed (1QS 2:4–9; 1QM 13:4 f.). The “spirits of his company” are “angels of destruction” (1QM 13:12). In the last days, after the Qumran community has cut itself off from the rest of the people, Belial is let loose against Israel (CD 4:13). At the end of days in the final war, the “sons of darkness” constitute Belial’s army (1QM 1:1, 13). But it will be destroyed (1QM 11:8 f.), because God himself is fighting against him (1QM 15:3; 18:1, 3), and his violent wrath is raised against him (1QM 4:1 f.). The → curse of Joshua (Jos. 6:6) signifies that an accursed man, one of the company of Belial, will again rebuild Jericho (4Qtest 23). In these writings, therefore, Belial no longer appears as accuser, and accordingly has no access to heaven or to God. Nor is it stated that Belial was the one who deceived → Adam and so brought sin into the world. This same figure appears as Beliar in the Test. XII, and, according to Eth. Enoch 54:6, Azazel and his hordes became subjects of Satan.

4. Beelzeboul is an indeclinable noun (other versions read Beezeboul and Beelzeboub). The origin and meaning of this name are not entirely clear. In 2 Ki. 1:2 f. and 6:16 ba'al z'hub, Lord of the Flies, appears to be god of Ekron. Beelzeboul could be derived from ba'al z'bûl, lord of the heights, i.e. of heaven, and so lord of heaven or God of heaven. Most probably Bee(l)zeboul comes from ba'al zibbûl (from post-OT Heb. zebel manure, dung; zibbûl meaning an idolatrous sacrifice) – lord of the idol–sacrifice – which is at once equalled to dung. There is the further possibility of deriving the name from a Hittite deer-god Zapparwa, which, via Zebaba, became ba'al z'hub for the Philistines at Ekron. Derivation from the Aramaic would lead to be'el d' bābā, lord of enmity, enemy; or to be'el dibabā, lord of the flies (cf. Galilean-Aram. dibabā, a fly).

NT 1. In the NT diabolos occurs 37 times, Satanas 36 times, Bee(l)zeboul 7 times.

In addition there are the following names: the → enemy, echthros; the → evil one, ho ponēros; the prince of this world, ho archōn tou kosmou toutou (→Beginning); the adversary, antidikos, which is a literal translation of the OT śātān (1 Pet. 5:8). Mk. uses satanas exclusively. Lk. prefers this word in his special material, but no basic difference in meaning from diabolos can be established. The latter is never used as a form of address (cf. Matt. 4:10 with 4:1, 5, 8, 11).

2. In Matt. 25:41 angels of the devil (tu diabolou) are mentioned (cf. also 2 Cor.

12:7; → Fruit, art. skolops). Similarly, in the account of the temptation (Matt. 4:1–11, par. Mk. 1:12 f., Lk. 4:1–13), the devil, as in the Qumran writings, arrogates to himself the position of a lord of the world, hoping by this transference of title to deter Jesus from his way (→ Tempt). Appropriately he is called the “prince of this world” (archōn tou kosmou toutou, Jn. 12:31; 14:30; 16:11). The place of the devil is not → hell; the eternal fire is prepared for the devil and all his angels (Matt. 25:41). As in the OT, he has access to God, in order to accuse mankind (Lk. 22:21; Jn. 12:31; 16:11). Hence, Jesus prays for the faith of his disciples and teaches them to pray for deliverance from the evil one (Matt. 6:13).

According to Lk. 10:18, Jesus saw the downfall of Satan (the accuser in heaven). This follows the joyful return of the seventy who tell Jesus: “Lord, even the demons are subject to us in your name!” (Lk. 10:17). Rev. 12:5, 7–12 links this fall of Satan with the appearance of Jesus himself. In Rev. 12:9 diabolos and Satanas stand side by side as words of equal weight and significance, while in v. 8 this figure is described as a drakōn, → dragon, or ophis, serpent, and in v. 10 as → accuser, katēgōr. This breaks up the dualistic view of the world held in Qumran: Jesus has defeated and disarmed the devil, and can thus rob him of his plunder – i.e. Jesus is able to heal those who are possessed (Matt. 12:27–29). (On the bearing of this on the question of the millennium → Number, art. chilias NT 4.)

But even though Satan has been thrown out of heaven, this does not prevent him being able to act. The unbelieving Jews are of their father, the devil (Jn. 8:44). Peter finds himself being addressed and identified as “Satan”, because he tried to turn Jesus back from his way of suffering obedience (Matt. 16:23 par. Mk. 8:53). It can also be said that Satan entered Judas, when he was prepared to betray Jesus (Lk. 22:3; Jn. 13:27; cf. Jn. 6:70; 13:2 [diabolos]). The hour of darkness is his hour (Lk. 22:53; note the dualistic terminology). Satan can – but does not necessarily! – stand behind illness (Lk. 13:16; cf. 2 Cor. 12:7; and Acts 10:38 [diabolos]). He snatches the saving word from men’s hearts lest they believe and be saved, in the parable of the sower (ho ponēros, “the evil one”, Matt. 13:19; ho satanas, “Satan”, Mk. 4:15; ho diabolos, “the devil”, Lk. 8:12). But it is not only in relation to individuals, but also in relation to the → church that anyone can be called diabolos who tries to impede God’s word of salvation. For instance, in the parable of the wheat and the tares (Matt. 13:24–30), the presence of “evil” in the community is explained through the activity of the → “enemy”. There are no intermediaries here as sometimes in rabbinic theology. In recording this → parable Matt. is making an implicit contrast with the Qumran solution to the problem. There the law-breakers are excluded from the community of the people of God by the community’s own disciplinary measures before the final judgment, leaving only the pure saved community. The parable teaches the impossibility of an absolutely pure church; the church on earth is inevitably a mixed body. Separation is the special task of the eschatological judge alone (→ Present; art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT; → Judgment).

On “evil” in the Lord’s Prayer and other instances of ponēros → Evil; → Prayer, art. proseuchomai NT 2.

3. (a) In the Pauline writings diabolos is found only in Eph. 4:27 and 6:11 (and 6 times in the Pastorals: 1 Tim. 3:6 f., 11; 2 Tim. 2:26; 3:3; Tit. 2:3). Otherwise Satanas is the regular word (which, in turn, appears in the Pastorals only in 1 Tim. 1:20, taking up the usage of 1 Cor. 5:5 and 1 Tim. 5:15 for Christians who fall back into discipleship of Satan [→ Disciple, art. opisō]). But this name is not very common either; there are only 10 references (Rom. 16:20; 1 Cor. 5:5; 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; 11:14; 12:7; 1 Thess. 2:18; 2 Thess. 2:9; 1 Tim. 1:20; 5:15). In 2 Cor. 6:15 Paul makes use of the name Beliar, found in the writings of Qumran. Indeed, the whole section 2 Cor. 6:14 ff. is reminiscent of the thought of Qumran, with its opposing pairs of ideas, such as righteousness and lawlessness, light and darkness, Christ and Beliar, believing and unbelieving, temple of God and temples of idols. Paul also attributes many misfortunes and difficulties to the work of Satan. The “thorn in the flesh” is a “messenger of Satan” sent to bruise him (2 Cor. 12:7; → Fruit, art. skolops). Satan wants to outwit Paul (2 Cor. 2:11). To prevent him from making a journey (1 Thess. 2:18) he can change himself into an → angel of → light, and with this disguise disseminate impure thoughts through those he sends out (2 Cor. 11:14). He tempts Christian communities (1 Cor. 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:1; 1 Thess. 3:5). He is wily and deceitful (Eph. 6:11; here and in the following references diabolos is used); he sets traps (1 Tim. 3:7; 2 Tim. 2:26) and is encountered in calamity and sin as the ruler of the air (Eph. 2:2, → Demon, art. aēr).

(b) In 1 Cor. 5:5 the notorious sinner is to be excluded from the congregation and given over to Satan for death (→ Destroy, art. olethros). This ban (→ curse) is intended to make it possible for the pneuma, the → spirit (the → soul?) of this man to be saved. Accordingly, Hymenaeus and Alexander are handed over to Satan to be punished, and to be dissuaded from their blasphemies (1 Tim. 1:20); they are not to be killed (cf. Acts 5:5 ff.). Behind these disciplinary instructions stands the Jewish conception of Satan as master of death and destruction, and as executor of the divine wrath, from whose control membership of the congregation secured freedom, and into whose control the culprit is now thrown back.

4. The devil's area of activity is primarily the non-Christian world (Acts 26:18; cf. 2 Cor. 6:16), and hence → magic is bound up with him (Acts 13:10). An apocalyptic story, presumably originating from the Assumption of Moses and telling of an attack of the devil on the archangel Michael, is presupposed in Jude 9 (→ Angel, art. Michaël; → Revile, art. blasphēmēō NT 6). Acts 5:3, Rev. 2:9 f. and 20:7 also speak of Satan's fight against the Christian community.

5. At the time of the end Satan sends → Antichrist (2 Thess. 2:3–12; the beast of Rev. 13:17; → Animal, art. thērion). Matt. 25:41; Rev. 20:10 (cf. 1 Jn. 3:8; Heb. 2:14), and possibly also Rom. 16:20, speak of the destruction of the devil at the end. Angry and violent, he realizes that till then he only has a little time, and rages wildly against God's people (Rev. 12:12, 16 f.). On the binding of Satan and the question of the millennium → Number, art. chilias NT 4.

6. All that can help against temptation is the armour of God (Eph. 6:11, 16; → War), a determined turning to God (Jas. 4:7) and a sober and alert faith. This alone will cause the devil to lose his power, although he paces about like a roaring lion, irritated and dangerous (1 Pet. 5:8). The ultimate reason for his defeat, however, is the “blood of the Lamb” (Rev. 12:11), that is, the victory of Jesus through his death on the → cross.

7. The NT contains no speculations at all about the origin or nature of the devil. He is also not equated with the evil inclination or with the angel of death. Indeed, → death and the devil are distinguished (Rev. 20:10, 14); for Satan has power over death (Heb. 2:14).

8. In the Johannine writings there are occasional references (Rev. 12:9; possibly also Jn. 8:44; 1 Jn. 3:8) to the rôle of the devil in the primeval history of Genesis 3. Jewish exegesis interpreted the serpent as the devil. Thus, the devil is a sinner right from the beginning (1 Jn. 3:8), and has been a murderer from the beginning (Jn. 8:44b). He does not have a share in the truth; he lies, he speaks on his own account (Jn. 8:44c). This is the Bible's historical, non-metaphysical, speech. But it is noteworthy here that dependence on the power of the devil can show itself both in actions and decisions: the effects of this are expressed in John by means of the predicative statements of descent and relationship. One who sins belongs to the devil, like Cain (1 Jn. 3:8, 12); or he is a devil himself, like Judas, the betrayer (Jn. 6:70). Hence the children of God can stand over against the children of the devil (1 Jn. 3:10; cf. Qumran above OT 3). Jesus' enemies are called children of the devil, i.e. those who share his nature and behaviour (Jn. 8:44). When "young men" succeed in defeating the evil one (1 Jn. 2:13 f.), that is a gift of Christ (cf. Jn. 17:15). Jn. 8:44 does not speak of a father of the devil; rather, tou diabolou is in apposition to patros, i.e. of your father, namely, the devil.

H. Bietenhard

9. Bee(l)zeboul in the NT is the name of a chief demon. Jesus' enemies accused him of being possessed by him: "And the scribes who came from Jerusalem said, 'He is possessed by Beelzebul, and by the prince of demons he casts out the demons'" (Mk. 3:22; cf. par. Matt. 12:24 and the doublet in Matt. 9:34 "the prince of the demons", Lk. 11:15; cf. also Matt. 10:25; 12:27; Lk. 11:18 f. for further use of the name). In reply Jesus "called them to him, and said to them in parables, 'How can Satan cast out Satan? If a kingdom is divided against itself, that kingdom cannot stand. And if a house is divided against itself, that house will not be able to stand. And if Satan has risen up against himself and is divided, he cannot stand, but is coming to an end. But no one can enter a strong man's house and plunder his goods, unless he first binds the strong man; then indeed he may plunder his house. Truly, I say to you, all sins will be forgiven the sons of men, and whatever blasphemies they utter; but whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit never has forgiveness, but is guilty of eternal sin' – for they had said, 'He has an unclean spirit'" (Mk. 3:23–30; cf. par. Matt. 12:25–37; Lk. 11:17–23; 12:10, 43 ff.; and also Jn. 8:48–59 on the suggestion that Jesus was a → Samaritan and had a devil). Similar charges persisted in Jewish sources, ascribing Jesus' works to → magic: "Yeshu of Nazareth was hanged on the day of preparation for the Passover because he practised sorcery and led the people astray" (Sanhedrin 43a; cf. Sanhedrin 107b; Sotah 47a; T. J. Hagigah 2.2; and the references in the Christian fathers, Justin, Dial. 69; Origen, Contra Cels. 1, 6, 28, 68, 71; 2, 9, 14, 16, 44, 48, 49, 51; 3, 1; 5, 51; 8, 9, 39; Tertullian, Adv. Marc. 3, 6; W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark, NLC, 1974, 142; H. van der Loos, The Miracles of Jesus, Supplements to NovT 9, 1965, 158–67).

W. L. Lane comments: "By tacitly substituting 'Satan' for 'Beelzebul' Jesus brings the controversy within the perspective of his mission as a direct confrontation with Satan. His argument is cumulative in its force: If what you say is true there exists the impossible circumstance that Satan is destroying his own realm. For it is self-evident that a kingdom divided against itself will fall, while a household divided against itself cannot be established. If your accusation is factual, then Satan has become divided in his allegiance. This should mean that he has become powerless. Yet this is clearly not so. Satan remains strong, and this fact exposes the fallacy of your charge” (op. cit., 142 f.). The evidence why Satan remains strong may be twofold. On the one hand, there is his activity among those who are already afflicted by the demons. (It is the mission of Jesus and his disciples to preach and to cast out demons, cf. v. 15.) On the other hand, there is his activity among those who are opposing Jesus and attributing the work of the Holy Spirit (v. 29) to Beelzebul. With v. 27 Jesus turns to the charge that he is demon-possessed. “Satan is the strong man whose strength is evidenced in the enslavement of men through sin, possession, disease and death; the demons are his servants in this destructive work. . . . Jesus’ ability to cast out demons means that one stronger than Satan has come to restrain his activity and to release the enslaved. The heart of Jesus’ mission is to confront Satan and to crush him on all fields, and in the fulfilment of his task he is conscious of being the agent of irresistible power. Jesus’ statement raises the pressing question of the source of his power. The pronouncement on blasphemy indicates that Jesus’ works are accomplished through the power of the Holy Spirit. It is as the Bearer of the Spirit that he stands as the Champion of God in the battle with Satan. In the face of the claim that he is possessed by an unclean spirit Jesus affirms that he possesses the Spirit of God” (W. L. Lane, op. cit., 143). On the question of the unforgivable sin → Revile, art. blasphēmēō NT 5. For further literature → the bibliography below and → Sin.

C. Brown

ἐξορκιστής

ἐξορκιστής (exhorkistēs), exorcist; ἐξορκίζω (exhorkizō), exorcize.

This whole word-group is rare both in the NT and elsewhere. exhorkistēs occurs only at Acts 19:13 and exhorkizō as a v.l. at Acts 19:13 f. (see below NT 7 (d)). The vb. horkizō means to adjure, implore (cf. Matt. 26:63). Hence, exhorkizō means to ^{expel} ~~expel~~ ^{vertrieb} a spirit by a solemn adjuration. In the NT the usual vb. is ekballō, to cast out (→ Demon, art. ekballō). But the phenomenon of exorcism is much more widespread than the infrequent use of the cognate noun and vb. suggest. Exorcism is now used as a general term for driving out an evil spirit, described in the NT as a daimōn or daimonion, demon, or a pneuma akatharton, unclean spirit, or pneuma ponēron, evil spirit (→ Demon; → Spirit). In this article exorcism is used in the general sense of any form of such expulsion. Although the AV speaks of casting out devils, the Gk. always refers to demons. diabolos, devil, is always sing., and is used only of Satan in the Bible. Satan is only once said to have entered into a person, i.e. Judas (Lk. 22:3; Jn. 13:27).

CL exhorkizō (cf. exhorkoō, administer an oath) is found in Demosthenes 54, 26; the Revenue Laws of Ptolemy Philadelphus 56.12 in the 3rd cent. B.C.; Polybius 3, 61, 10 etc. (cf. Liddell-Scott, 598). In the sense of exorcize an evil spirit, it is found in Defixionum Tabellae, Rheinisches Museum, Frankfurt, 55, 248. The noun exhorkistēs is found in Luc., Epirg. 23; Ptolemaeus, Tetrabiblos 182).

OT 1. exhorkizō is found in the LXX only at Gen. 24:3 and 1 Ki. 22:16 for the Heb.

šāba', swear; and at Jdg. 17:2 v.l. for 'ālāh, swear, i.e. curse. In none of these instances is there any question of exorcism.

2. The only example of exorcism in the OT is that of Saul, when he was afflicted by "an evil spirit from the LORD" (1 Sam. 16:14 ff.). We may interpret the phrase as implying that the spirit was permitted by Yahweh to afflict Saul for a special purpose (as in, e.g., 1 Ki. 22:19 ff.; Job 1:12; cf. also 2 Cor. 12:7). The spirit was temporarily exorcized by the playing of → David.

NT 1. Possession. During the ministry of Jesus and afterwards there were afflicted people whose symptoms were diagnosed as different from ordinary illnesses, by their contemporaries, by Jesus and his disciples and by the evangelists. They diagnosed possession or other influence by one or more evil spirits. If we wish to regard some at least as mentally deranged (e.g. schizophrenics), we have the difficulty of their immediate cure by word of command in a way unmatched by modern psychotherapists.

Present-day descriptions of illness are mainly descriptions of symptoms. Possession is the description of a cause. It is recognized today that the origin and form of many illnesses and disabilities are far from clear. There may be two cases that are apparently similar, and yet one may be purely physical and the other psychological in origin. Dumbness, blindness, choking, heart symptoms, accident proneness, even pseudo-pregnancy (e.g. Joanna Southcott the prophetess), may be the result of some traumatic experience, now forgotten. Shellshock is a classic, though extreme, example. Genuine possession goes a step further back, so that the psyche is affected, not simply by some happening, but by the influence of a spirit. Nothing is said of how a spirit gains control, but repossession comes when the personality is merely cleaned up without being renewed and occupied by God's Spirit (Matt. 12:44; Lk. 11:25). This puts some responsibility upon the person.

An indication of possession is the confession of the spirits when face to face with Jesus. They confess him to be "the Holy One of God" (Mk. 1:24), "Son of God" (Mk. 3:11), "Son of the Most High God" (Mk. 5:7). Yet Jesus exorcized them, and would not accept their testimony as legitimate preaching of the gospel (Mk. 1:34; 3:11, 12), any more than Paul accepted the testimony of the spirit of divination (Greek Pythōn, originally the dragon who guarded the oracle at Delphi) (Acts 16:16–18; → Magic, art. mageia NT 2 (e)).

2. The Nature of the Possessing Spirits. Although the Gospels admit that departed spirits may return (Lk. 24:37 ff.; Mk. 9:4; Matt. 14:26), there is no suggestion that these are the spirits who possess (contra the belief of mediums and some modern exorcists). They belong to Satan's kingdom (Matt. 12:26, 27), and consequently face ultimate destruction (Mk. 1:24) in torment (Matt. 8:29) in the abyss (Lk. 8:31) (→ Hell, art. abyssos).

There are grades of possessing spirits. A spirit may take with him "seven other spirits more evil than himself" (Matt. 12:45; Lk. 11:26). Jesus spoke of one kind that needed intensive prayer before it could be cast out (Mk. 9:29). The argument about casting out by Beelzebul turns on the superiority of one spirit (i.e. the Holy Spirit) over another (Matt. 12:23 ff. par.; → diabolos NT 9).

3. The Manner of Exorcism. Jesus commands directly with absolute authority

(Lk. 4:36). His power is “the finger of God” (Lk. 11:20; → Hand, art. cheir NT 2) or “the Spirit of God” (Matt. 12:28). The word of command is “come out” (Mk. 1:25), with the addition once of “never enter again” (Mk. 9:26), or simply “Go” (Matt. 8:32), although this last has the further meaning of “go into the swine”. The disciples were given authority to cast out in the name of Jesus (Matt. 7:22; Lk. 10:17; Acts 16:18; 19:13).

4. Specific Cases. (a) There are general references without details: daimonia (Matt. 10:8; Mk. 1:39; 3:15; 6:13[16:17]; Lk. 9:1; 13:32); pneumata akatharta or ponēra (Matt. 8:16; 10:1; Mk. 6:7; Lk. 4:36; 6:18; 7:21; 10:20; Acts 5:16; 8:7).

(b) Mary Magdalene is named with other women as “healed of evil spirits and infirmities” (Lk. 8:2). Seven demons are said to have come out of Mary, and traditionally these are linked to her life as a prostitute. But the identification of Mary with the prostitute of 7:36 ff. is very far from certain.

(c) An unusual factor in the exorcism of the Syro-phoenician’s daughter (Matt. 15:21 ff.; Mk. 7:24 ff.) is that she was freed at a distance without any audible command. The only other distant exorcism, though of a different kind, is when handkerchiefs were taken from Paul and applied to the sufferers (Acts 19:12).

(d) Illnesses and disabilities (→ Weakness) include epilepsy (Matt. 17:14 ff.; Mk. 9:14 ff.; Lk. 9:37 ff). Matthew uses the word selēniazomai (17:15; only elsewhere at Matt. 4:24), which by derivation (selēnē, moon) means lunatic (Lat. luna, moon) but was commonly used to describe an epileptic. On this occasion Mark includes deafness and dumbness (9:17, 25). A dumb demoniac is also described in Matt. 9:32 ff.; Lk. 11:14 and is exorcized, whereas a normal deaf and dumb case is cured by a different miracle of healing (Mk. 7:31 f.; → Deaf, Dumb).

(e) A possessed girl followed Paul and Silas, declaring that they were bringers of God’s salvation. Nonetheless, Paul cast out the spirit (Acts 16:16 ff.).

5. The Fate of the Spirits. There is likely to be a final show of violence (Mk. 1:26; 9:26), or defiance if the spirit refuses to come out (Acts 19:15). Once exorcized, the spirit is like a traveller in a barren land, while still looking for the relief of repossessing his victim (Matt. 12:43 ff.; Lk. 11:24 ff.).

The only other clue is not easy to understand. The legion of demons regarded permission to enter the swine as preferable to normal exorcism, and Jesus allowed this (Matt. 8:28 ff.; Mk. 5:1 ff.; Lk. 8:26 ff.). Did the demons intentionally drown their new hosts, and, if so, what did they expect to gain thereby (cf. Matt. 17:15)? There may have been a danger in releasing a host of demons into the crowd, and modern exorcists usually remove children and pets from the vicinity before an exorcism. A non-supernatural explanation is that the ravings of the possessed frightened the pigs.

6. The Remainder of NT. Apart from the Gospels and Acts, there is no other case of exorcism in the NT. It is likely that the gift of distinguishing between spirits (1 Cor. 12:10) has reference to exorcists. Deceiving spirits inspired false prophets (1 Jn. 4:1, 2), were to be tested and exposed by what they said of Jesus Christ, but apparently were not exorcized (cf. 1 Cor. 12:3). Unlike modern mediumship, which accepts the need to test spirits, the biblical test is to establish whether the “speaker” through the prophet is the Holy Spirit or a deceiver, never to determine whether the speaker is one’s departed husband or wife.

7. Non-Christian Exorcisms. (a) Some would include the unattached exorcist who “does not follow with us” (Mk. 9:38; Lk. 9:49), but “following” in the synoptists normally means belonging to the group who travelled with Jesus. This man was a believer who chose not to leave home.

(b) Jesus spoke of successful exorcists who at the → judgment would be told, “I never knew you” (Matt. 7:22, 23).

(c) Jesus admits that Jewish exorcists cast out demons (Matt. 12:27; Lk. 11:19).

(d) The sons of Sceva appear to have had some success until they used the name of Jesus as a magical formula (Acts 19:13 ff.; → Magic). This is the only passage to use exhorkistiēs and exhorkizō (in a v.l.) in the NT: “Then some of the itinerant Jewish exorcists undertook to pronounce the name of the Lord Jesus over those who had evil spirits, saying, ‘I adjure you by the Jesus whom Paul preaches.’ Seven sons of a Jewish high priest named Sceva were doing this. But the evil spirit answered them, ‘Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are you?’ And the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, mastered all of them, and overpowered them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded” (Acts 19:13–16). It is a tribute to the effectiveness of Christian exorcism that the name of Jesus occurs in early magical formulae, e.g. “I adjure you by the God of the Hebrews, Jesus, Iaba, Iae, Abraoth” (Great Paris Magical Papyrus, IV, 3019 f. This material probably dates from c. A.D. 200).

(e) Exorcists and magicians, from Egypt and Babylon to the present day, have had varying success. Jewish believers in God could well have been used directly by God. Others have regularly followed the magical practice of calling on greater spirits, or even on angelic beings, to drive out the lesser. Some have used material means, as when Josephus saw an exorcist drawing out a demon through a victim’s nostrils by applying herbs of a kind described by Solomon, who had secret knowledge of spells (Ant. 8, 45 ff.). All such exorcisms, whether effective or not, are complicated and second-rate compared with the instant authority of Jesus and his disciples in their wholesale assault on the kingdom of Satan wherever they met it.

J. Stafford Wright

→ Animal (for Beast), → Antichrist, → Demon, → Dragon, → Ecstasy, → Evil, → Heal, → Hell, → Judgment, → Magic, → Name, → Prayer, → Tempt

On the devil, Satan, Beelzebul, Beliar:

(a) W. E. M. Aitken, “Beelzebul”, JBL 31, 1912, 34–53; W. F. Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, 1957; D. G. Barnhouse, The Invisible War, 1965; K. Barth, CD III, 3, see index; G. B. Caird, Principalities and Powers: A Study in Pauline Theology, 1956; P. Carus, History of the Devil, 1900; E. Dinkler, “Peter’s Confession and the ‘Satan’ Saying: The Problem of Jesus’ Messiahship”, in J. M. Robinson, ed., The Future of our Religious Past: Essays in Honour of Rudolf Bultmann, 1971, 169–202; S. Eitrem, Some Notes on the Demonology of the New Testament, 1966²; W. Foerster, Beezeboul, TDNT I 605 f.; and Beliar, TDNT I 607; T. H. Gaster, “Beelzebul”, IDB I 374; “Belial”, IDB I 377; and “Satan”, IDB IV 224–28; L. Gaston, “Beelzebub”, ThZ 18, 1962, 247 ff.; D. E. Hiebert, “Satan”, ZPEB V 282–86; R. H. Hiers, “Satan, Demons and the Kingdom of God”, SJT 27, 1974, 35–47; C. G. Jung, Psychological Types, 1923; and Psychology and Religion, 1938; J. Kallas, The Satanward View, 1966; R. S. Kluger, Satan in the Old Testament, 1967; E. Langton, Satan, A Portrait: A Study of the Character of Satan through all the Ages, 1945; and Essentials of Demonology: A Study of the Jewish and Christian Doctrine, its Origin and Development, 1949; R. Leivestad, Christ the Conqueror: Ideas of Conflict and Victory in the New Testament, 1954; C. S. Lewis, The Screwtape Letters, 1942; E. Lewis, The Creator and the Adversary, 1948; T. Ling, The Significance of Satan: New Testament Demonology and its Contemporary Relevance, SPCK Biblical Monographs 3, 1961; S. V. McCasland, By the Finger of God, 1951; D. Pentecost, Your Adversary the Devil, 1969; M. Prager, “Satan”, EBT III 808–12; G. von Rad and W. Foerster, diaballō, diabolos, TDNT II 71–81; F. J. Rae,

“The Two Circles of Faith”, ExpT 66, 1954–55, 212–15; J. M. Ross, “The Decline of the Devil”, ExpT 66, 1954–55, 58–61; K. Schäferdieck, satanas, TDNT VII 151–65; F. A. Tatford, The Prince of Darkness, 1967.

(b). J. B. Bauer, “Libera nos a Malo”, Verbum Domini 34, 1956, 12–15; M. E. Boismard, “Satan selon l’Ancien et le Nouveau Testament”, Lumière et Vie 15, 1966, 61–76; H. Braun, Qumran und das Neue Testament, I–II, 1965–66; A. Brock-Utne, “Der Feind. Die alttestamentliche Satangestalt im Lichte der sozialen Verhältnisse des nahen Orients”, Klio 38, 1935, 219–27; H. Bietenhard, Die himmlische Welt im Urchristentum und im Spätjudentum, WUNT 2, 1951; N. A. Dahl, “Der erstgeborene Satans und der Vater des Teufels (Polyc. 7, 1 und John 8, 44)”, in Apophoreta, Festschrift Ernst Haenchen, 1964, 70 ff.; C. Duquoc, “Satan – Symbol oder Person?”, in Christus vor uns, 1966, 49–57; E. Fascher, Jesus und der Satan, Hallische Monographien 11, 1949; H. W. Huppenbauer, “Belial in den Qumrantexten”, ThZ 15, 1959, 81–89; and Der Mensch zwischen zwei Welten, ATHANT 34, 1959; P. Jacobs, “Teufel, Teufelsglaube”, EKL III 1336 ff.; K. Lüthi, Gott und das Böse, 1961; K. Marti, “Der Ursprung des Satans”, ThStKr 65, 1892, 207 ff.; G. Mensching, F. Horst, A. Adam, W. Philipp, “Teufel”, *RGG*³ VI 704 ff.; B. Noack, Satanas und Sōteria, 1949; P. von der Osten-Sacken, Gott und Belial, 1969; M. Prager, “Vater der Lüge. Aufriss einer biblischen Diabolologie”, Gloria Dei 7, 1952, 105–18; H. Riniker, “Die theologische Frage nach dem Zürcher Hexenprozess”, Kirchenblatt für die reformierte Schweiz 125, No. 10, 1969; D. de Rougement, Der Anteil des Teufels, 1949; SB I 118 f., 136 f.; IV, 1, 501–35; R. Scharf, “Die Gestalt des Satans im Alten Testament”, in C. G. Jung, Symbolik des Geistes, 1948, 153–319; K. L. Schmidt, “Luzifer als gefallene Engelsmacht”, ThZ 7, 1951, 161–79; I. Turmel, Histoire du Diable, 1931; F. Zeman, “De daemoniis in scriptis prophetarum Veteris Testamenti in luce daemologiae Orientis antiqui”, Verbum Domini 27, 1949, 270–77, 321–35; and ibid. 1950, 18–28, 89–97; S. Légasse, “L’homme fort de Luc 11:21–22”, NovT 5, 1962, 5–9.

On exorcism:

(a). C. Bonner, “Traces of Thaumaturgical Technique”, HTR 30, 1927, 171–81; and “The Techniques of Exorcism”, HTR 36, 1943, 39–49; C. H. Cave, “The Obedience of Unclean Spirits”, NTS 11, 1964–65, 93–97; R. H. Hiers, “Satan, Demons and the Kingdom of God”, SJT 27, 1974, 35–47; J. M. Hull, Hellenistic Magic and the Synoptic Tradition, SBT 28, 1974; and “Exorcism in the NT”, IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 312 ff.; H. C. Kee, “The Terminology of Mark’s Exorcism Stories”, NTS 14, 1967–68, 232–46; W. L. Knox, “Jewish Liturgical Exorcism”, HTR 31, 1938, 191–203; K. E. Koch, Christian Counselling and Occultism, 1972; and Occult Bondage and Deliverance, 1970; I. M. Lewis, Ecstatic Religion, 1971; J. L. Nevius, Demon Possession, (1894) 1968; T. K. Oesterreich, Possession and Exorcism, 1974; R. Petitpierre, ed., Exorcism, 1972 (Bishop of Exeter’s Commission Report of 1965 with appendices); J. Richards, But Deliver us from Evil, 1974 (with extensive bibliography); W. Sargent, The Mind Possessed, 1974; C. Strachan, Casting out the Devils, 1972.

(b). O. Bauernfeind, Die Worte der Dämonen im Markusevangelium, 1927; A. Dupont-Sommer, “Exorcismes et Guérisons dans les Récits de Qumrân”, VT Supplement 7, 1960, 251 ff.; R. Wünsch, Antike Fluchtafeln, 1912².

Scribe

γραμματεύς γραμματεὺς (grammateus), scribe, clerk, secretary, biblical scholar, teacher of the law of Moses; νομικός (nomikos), expert in Jewish law, lawyer; νομοδιδάσκαλος (nomodidaskalos), teacher of the law of Moses.

CL grammateus, derived from gramma, letter of the alphabet, is the title of officials at Athens and elsewhere, from secretary and registrar to clerk (Thuc.). grammateus saphēs, lit. accurate writer, means a scholar (Aristot.). grammateus can be used contemptuously: olethros grammaeus, a pestilent scribe (Dem.); and metaph. of memory: the recorder (Plato).

OT grammateus translates two Heb nouns. šōṭēr (from šāṭar, to write) is used of an officer or overseer (Exod. 5:6), the seventy elders (Num. 11:16), administrative officers in the army (Deut. 20:5), and magistrates (1 Chr. 23:4). More frequently, grammateus renders sōpēr (from sāpār, to scratch letters on stone, hence to write). sōpēr was used for the royal private secretary (2 Sam. 8:17), the military scribe who kept the muster rolls (Jer. 37:15), and in the later books, one skilled in the law of Moses (Ezr. 7:6; Neh. 8:1).

In ancient Israel the writing art was preserved as a craft by certain families. Literary and artistic evidence, right up to the Middle Ages, give an unchanging picture of the scribe, either standing to make brief notes, or sitting on stool, bench, or floor, with a scroll or codex on his knees. A glimpse of an ancient scribe's appearance is in Ezek. 9:2. Among the Kenites were families of sōp̄rīm (LXX, grammateis) dwelling at Jabez (1 Chr. 2:55). Such scribal schools trained suitable priests and Levites, who in turn instructed the people in the law on the great feast days and made legal judgments (Deut. 33:10). The most noted of these earlier scribes was the priest Ezra, a sōpēr skilled in the law of Moses, who had set his heart to seek the law of the Lord and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments (Ezr. 7:6, 10). In the latter respect he is the prototype of the scribes of later times who were professional interpreters of the law.

During the monarchy Levitical scribes were needed in the fiscal organization of temple operations (R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel, 1961, 353–5). A Levitical scribe recorded the priestly assignments (1 Chr. 24:6), and scribes were involved in the business of temple repairs (2 Ki. 12:10; 2 Chr. 34:13). In this way developed the status of the grammateis tou hierou, temple scribes, first mentioned in the edict of Antiochus III (Josephus, Ant. 12, 142; cf. 11, 128). Since the furnishing of written copies of Torah and other parts of Scripture was a (scribal) Levitical responsibility (Deut. 17:18; Jer. 8:8), the reforms of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. 17) are probably associated with scribes. At least one “writing prophet” employed an amanuensis (Jer. 36:4, 18, 32). It was probably a scribe who drew up the deed of sale in Jer. 32:10–12, since the document was entrusted to Baruch before witnesses.

Government scribes served in diverse ways, from giving the king counsel (1 Chr. 27:32) to mustering the army (2 Ki. 25:19). If David's cabinet is listed in order (2 Sam. 8:16–18; cf. 1 Chr. 18:15–17), the king's scribe ranked below the military commander, recorder, and high priest, but above the palace priests. By Josiah's reign Shaphan the scribe precedes the recorder as well as the governor of the city (2 Ki. 22:3–13; 2 Chr. 34:8–21). The high status of Shaphan's family is evident from the careers of his son Ahikam and grandsons Gedaliah (master of the palace, and later governor of Judea under the Babylonians) and Micaiah (who served as chief minister of state under Jehoiakim, Jer. 36:11). Such royal scribes apparently had offices at the palace (Jer. 36:12), which illustrates their importance in the Judean government. There was an Akkadian counterpart to the royal scribe, with equally high standing (Nah. 3:17) and military functions (Jer. 52:25). The multilingual pluralistic character of the Persian period likewise demanded administrative specialists (Est. 3:12; 8:9), and provincial commanders had scribes as their deputies (Ezr. 4:8 f.) (A. Rainey, ZPEB V, 298–302).

The profession of scribe received considerable impetus by the return of the Jews from exile, when the need arose to copy, study, and expound the Scriptures to make them the basis of national life. Thus the finest age of the sōp̄rīm was in the two centuries between the only bearers of the title in that period whose names we know, Ezra (c. 398 B.C.) and Ben Sira (c. 180). The book of Ezra marks a development in the scribe's status. The earlier administrative sense of sōpēr in 7:12–26 is set side by side with 7:6, 11, verses which refer to Ezra as a scribe whose learning enables him to interpret the law for the common people. Moreover, his priestly lineage symbolized the close connexion between the priesthood and this official interpretation of the law which existed probably until the second century B.C.

Ben Sira's portrait of the grammateus reveals how the position of the teacher is becoming less closely associated with the temple, though he retains a positive attitude towards the cult and stresses the inalienable privileges of the priesthood (Sir. 7:29; 35:6; 45:6–26). Proud of being in the profession, Ben Sira lauds the perfect scribe in Sir. 38:24–39:11 (part of this hymn appears in an earlier form in 11QPsDav; Discoveries in the Judaean Desert 4, 1965, 77 ff.). Ben Sira declares that the scribe, schooled in Torah and religious wisdom, understands the implications of both the written law and oral tradition (39:6). Thus he enters upon the heritage of the prophets (who include the law-giver Moses, 46:1). He invites the untaught to his school (51:23), though he carefully preserves the scribe's claim to exclusiveness by seeking to bar peasants and craftsmen from the study of wisdom (38:25 ff.). The scribe's learning makes him a public figure (39:4), able to administer justice among the people, and regarded by them as specially pious on account of his knowledge of the revealed will of God. Ben Sira claims to teach in his own name (50:27), a new departure, for stressing the personality of the teacher probably indicated that Hellenic individualism was gaining significance among the Jewish people. On the other hand, perhaps in reaction against Hellenism, the scribe soft-pedalled the notion of his being a wisdom teacher in favour of the reputation of being one learned in the Scriptures (39:1, 7 f.). But later rabbinic literature dropped the term sōpēr, except in reference to earlier scholars, and called contemporary rabbis h'kāmīm, wise men. The two terms are combined at Qumran, where according to a wisdom collection of psalms, David was both a sōpēr, filled with an understanding and enlightened spirit, and a h'kām, who "composed all his 4,050 psalms and hymns by prophetic inspiration" (11QPs^a 154).

During the Maccabean revolt a company of scribes (synagōgē grammateōn), by now a numerous and independent group, sought a conference with the Seleucid-appointed high priest Alcimus and the Seleucid general Bacchides (1 Macc. 7:12 ff.). Although their confidence was short-lived (7:16), the incident illustrates the continuing association between scribes and the priesthood. By NT times scribal rules and practices had acquired binding authority among the orthodox, and were imposed upon proselytes in addition to the plain sense of the written Torah (Siph. Lev. 19:34). One tradition boldly claimed greater authority for scribal teachings than for the written law (Sanhedrin 11:3). Occasionally, when scribes had formulated rules without regard for a supposed biblical basis, later rabbis were distressed (Kelim 13:7). See SB I 79–82, 691–5; II 647–61.

grammateus appears only once in Philo (Flacc. 1, 4), where it means a political adviser. Josephus uses the term 29 times and in a wide sense. He pokes fun at garbled history in an Egyptian work which calls Joseph and Moses scribes (Ap. 1, 290), but at least the reference indicates that outsiders considered scribes to be men of authority and influence. Elsewhere in Josephus grammateus can mean anything from David's secretary of state (Ant. 7, 110) or a leading council official (War 5, 532) to clerks recording David's ill-fated census (Ant. 7, 319). Several times Josephus adds scribes to OT narratives which do not mention them (e.g., 1 Sam. 14:33; 2 Sam. 14:2). Josephus 8 times uses the term hierogrammateus, interpreter of holy books, sacred scribe (War 6, 291; Ant. 2, 205; Ap. 1, 289), but this word does not appear in the LXX or NT.

NT grammateus occurs some 60 times in the Synoptic Gospels, 4 times in Acts, once in Paul. The Fourth Gospel makes no mention of scribes. grammateus appears at Jn. 8:3, but this is in the non-Johannine pericope, 7:53–8:11. Once grammateus is used of a civic official, the town clerk at Ephesus (Acts 19:35). Otherwise grammateus in the NT always has its Jewish meaning of one learned in Torah, rabbi, ordained theologian. Two other terms, equivalent to grammateus, are found in the NT: nomikos, lawyer, and nomodidaskalos, teacher (didaskalos) of the law (nomos). Tit. 3:13 mentions a certain Zenas the nomikos, though it is not clear whether he was an expert in Jewish or Roman law. Since Mark was writing for Romans, he never uses the word nomikos, to avoid misleading his readers, for in the Roman world nomikos was one versed in civil law. Elsewhere in the NT, nomikos always means a Jewish expert in the law of Moses (Matt. 22:35; Lk. 10:25; 11:45 f., 52; 14:3). Lawyers and Pharisees are associated together in Lk. 7:30; 11:53 (D), 14:3. nomodidaskalos, teacher of the law (of Moses), occurs only in Christian writings. In the NT the term is found at Lk. 5:17; Acts 5:34; 1 Tim. 1:7.

Judging by the frequency of their appearance in the Synoptic Gospels, scribes were clearly influential. Far from being simply clerks or copyists, they were teachers (Matt. 7:29; Mk. 1:22), lawyers, doctors of the law, and some were members of the Sanhedrin (Matt. 16:21; cf. 26:3). Scribes of the people (Matt. 2:4) and scribes of the Pharisees (Mk. 2:16) are phrases suggesting varied shades of meaning for the term grammateus. The scribes devoted themselves to several fields: (1) the study and interpretation of the law, which was both civil and religious; and to determining its application to the details of daily life; decisions of the great scribes became the oral law or tradition; (2) the study of the Scriptures generally in regard to historical and doctrinal matters; "Elijah must first come" (Matt. 17:10) is attributed to scribal doctrine; (3) teaching; each noted scribe, attracting around him a group of disciples (Matt. 7:29; Mk. 1:22), had a developed system of teaching of his own (Matt. 17:11; Mk. 8:11); (4) proselytizing (Matt. 23:15).

The Synoptic Gospels show scribes active on their own account, either as individuals (4 times) or as groups (16), and also in association with the priestly Sadducean party (Matt. 2:4; 21:15) or the Pharisees (Matt. 23). The grouping of scribes and Pharisees is mentioned 19 times, occasionally perhaps as something of a formula for Jesus' opponents; scribes and chief priests are coupled 11 times, scribes and elders once, scribes, chief priests, and elders 10 times. The order of names in the Gospels is not consistent, although precedence is usually given to scribes over Pharisees, for the former were the scholars of the party. More precisely they are defined as nomikoi, lawyers, and nomodidaskaloi, teachers of the law (as Gamaliel, Acts 5:34). The scholars of the Pharisees were the leaders of what became rabbinic Judaism, when they were known first as sages, then as rabbis. Rabbis formed a closed order. Only fully qualified scholars, who by ordination had received the official spirit of Moses mediated by succession (SB II 654 f.; cf. Matt. 23:2), were legitimate members of the guild of scribes.

The high reputation of the rabbis among the people (Matt. 23:6 f.; Mk. 12:38 f.) rested on their knowledge of the law and oral traditions, but also of secret theosophic, cosmogonic, and eschatological doctrines concealed by an esoteric discipline. Jesus roundly condemned the scribal approach to the will of God (Matt. 23). Sociologically, the rabbis were the successors of the prophets, i.e., men who knew the divine will, and proclaimed it in instruction, judgment, and preaching. It was they who decided what was required, in all details of conduct, in order to give practical effect to the law – as interpreted by themselves. This was a necessary task, since biblical Hebrew was no longer widely understood. The scribes were not men of wealth or property; yet this was a responsibility which gave them powerful influence, not only in the council of elders which advised the king, but over public opinion as well (M. Grant, The Jews in the Roman World, 1973).

Prominent rabbis, as leaders of the Pharisaic communities, formed one of the three parties in the Sanhedrin, and as such they took part in the prosecution and condemnation of Jesus (Matt. 26:57). Matthew is more specific about the Pharisees being the ones who hounded Jesus, whereas Mark for “Pharisees” has “scribes of the Pharisees” (Matt. 9:11; Mk. 2:16), “disciples of the Pharisees” (Matt. 9:14; Mk. 2:18), or only “scribes” (Matt. 9:34; 12:24 = Mk. 3:22; Matt. 22:41 = Mk. 12:35). Scribes are associated with the rulers and elders in the persecution of Peter and John (Acts 4:5) and the martyrdom of Stephen (Acts 6:12).

At the end of the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew notes the astonishment of the crowd at the authoritative manner in which Jesus taught, and “not as the scribes” (Matt. 7:29). The scribes argued from Scripture and tradition, and by quoting older authorities to support their teaching. Jesus had spoken with freshness, directness, and in his own name: “I say to you” (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 154). D. Daube suggests that the crowd’s surprise was due to the novelty of hearing in Galilee of all places an ordained rabbi using his full rabbinic authority to promulgate new decisions (The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 205–16). But it seems very unlikely that Jesus was ordained (Jn. 7:15; Matt. 21:23). In contrast to rabbinic exposition, with its dependence on the tradition of the elders, here was the disturbing activity of a prophet directly authorized and commissioned by God (W. L. Lane, The Gospel according to Mark, 1974, 72).

Some scribes are said to have accepted Christ’s teaching (Matt. 8:19), but most were prejudiced against him. They challenged Jesus about his disobedience to traditional practices under the law, and found fault with much that he and his disciples said and did (Matt. 21:15), e.g., eating with those who ignored the traditions (Mk. 2:16) or without first ritually washing the hands (Matt. 15:2; Mk. 7:5). They were affronted by Jesus’ apparent blasphemy in claiming to forgive sins (Matt. 9:3; Mk. 2:7; Lk. 5:21). Ignoring the miracles of healing, they demanded some other authenticating sign from heaven, i.e., by a Semitic idiom, from God (Matt. 12:38). For his part, Jesus attacked the scribes for their misuse of Corban (Matt. 15:1–20; Mk. 7:1–23), their spiritual blindness in failing to recognize him (Matt. 12:38–42; Lk. 11:16, 29–32) and ascribing his actions to Satanic inspiration (Matt. 12:24–32; Mk. 3:22–30; Lk. 11:15–22), and because of their worldly desire for prominence (Matt. 25:3–7; Mk. 12:38–40; Lk. 20:46 f.). As a by-product of the effort of study, scribes came to be noted for their abilities in business and administration. This led to their being appointed as trustees for widows and orphans (2 Esd. 2:20 f.), and the temptation to live comfortably on “expenses”, thus earning a rebuke from Jesus for thus swallowing up the victims’ estates (Mk. 12:40; Lk. 20:47) (J. D. M. Derrett, Jesus’s Audience, 1973, 57).

Jesus conceded that the scribes sat “on Moses’ chair” (Matt. 23:2), i.e., that it was their business to teach God’s will as revealed in the law of Moses. But he warned the people and the disciples against the scribes’ example. They did not practise what they preached. Jesus then pronounced seven woes upon the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. 23:13–36) for obscuring the real issues of belief and conduct by casuistry and hypocrisy, so making it virtually impossible for men to fulfil the law of God (D. Hill, The Gospel of Matthew, 1972, 311–15).

Scribes of the Pharisees took Paul’s part concerning the doctrine of the resurrection (Acts 23:9). Paul, himself an ordained scribe (deduced from his part in capital punishment, Acts 26:10), saw in the Jewish theologians’ rejection of the preaching of the cross a fulfilment of Isa. 19:12; 33:18 (pou grammateus? what has become of the scribe?), which according to his exposition prophesied the futility of human wisdom, as illustrated by scribal dialectics, and the paradox of divine election (1 Cor. 1:10). In the early church the Christian grammateus continues as a scholar and instructor in God’s law (Matt. 13:52; 23:34; cf. 5:19; 16:19; 18:18; 23:8–12), so that Mosaic law is not abolished but reapplied for the needs of the Christian church. Matthew’s Gospel, especially in its proofs from Scripture, reveals a Christian scribe at work.

N. Hillyer

→ Law, → Pharisee, → Rabbi, → Scripture, → Word

- (a). A. W. Argyle, “The meaning of exousia in Mark 1:22, 27”, ExpT 80, 1968–9, 343; J. Bowman, “Scribes, Pharisees and Haberim”, in The Gospel of Mark, 1965, 337–41; J. H. Dampier, “The Scrolls and the Scribes of the New Testament”, Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society, 1.3, 1958, 8–19; D. Daube, “exousia in Mk. 1:22 and 27”, JTS 39, 1938, 45–59; “Rabbinic Authority”, in The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 205–33; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, I–II, 1974; J. Jeremias, grammateus, in TDNT I, 740–2; Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, ch. 10; A. Rainey, “Scribe”, in ZPEB 5, 298–302; S. Safrai and M. Stern (ed.), The Jewish People in the First Century (Compendia Rerum Iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum I), 1974–76.
- (b). J. Hoh, “Der christliche grammateus”, BZ 17, 1929, 256–69; S. Légasse, “Scribes et disciples de Jésus”, RB 68, 1961, 497–502; E. Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, 1901–11, II. 1, 306–79.

Scripture, Writing

The following study focuses attention on writing and the written aspect of Scripture. For the revelatory aspect of Scripture → Revelation; → Word.

γραφή

γράφω (graphō), write; γράμμα (gramma), letter, document; γραφή (graphē), writing, in the NT always of Scripture; ἐγγράφω (engraphō), write in, record; ἐπιγραφή (epigraphē), inscription, superscription; προγράφω (prographō), write before(hand), set forth publicly.

CL 1. The root graph- has the primary meaning of to scratch on, engrave, with reference to an ornament, reports, letters, lists, and instructions. From it are derived the Eng. “graphic”, “graph” etc. The material can be various: stone, wood, metal, wax, or leather. graphō is found in its original sense in Homer, Il. 17, 599. In Hdt., 4, 36 the word is used meaning to draw, of lines on maps; and scholars of the 3rd cent. B.C. used it of drawing of mathematical figures. In Homer graphō is already used in the sense of scratching signs on a tablet as a kind of letter (Il. 6, 169). From the time of Hdt. it is used generally in the normal sense of to write, and from the time of Pindar in the derived sense of to prescribe, to order. From the practice of handing in a written accusation, graphō came in judicial language to mean to accuse (Plato, Euthyphro 2b).

2. The passive forms gegraptai and gegrammenon mean that which is laid down in writing, the valid norm, especially in the legal sphere (Demosthenes, 58, 24; Plato, Leg. 6, 754c). The compound vb. engraphō means particularly to enter officially, in documents or official lists. hypographō means to sign, then, to sketch out; according to Plato, a teacher draws the lines for the children to write their letters (Prt. 326d).

3. The noun graphē originally carried the abstract verbal sense of the act of writing, drawing or painting; then the concrete sense of writing, inscription, letter (generally from 4th cent. B.C. onwards), indictment; in papyri of the 3rd cent. a list; in Plato the written law (Leg. 11, 934c).

gramma means: (a) the product of the action, especially where contrast with the spoken word is stressed; occasionally (b) the action itself; but then also (c) ability to write. It can mean the individual letters of the alphabet (Hdt., 5, 58 f.), but also papers, letters, documents. The plur. grammata is used in the sense of elementary knowledge, then literature, learning. The concept of “holy writings” or “holy scriptures” becomes important in the Hellenistic period: temple records, magic books and hermetic literature; also imperial letters and decrees which are regarded as quasi-divine. The authority of the written word leads, even in the classical period, to the composition of explanatory commentaries, especially on the writings of Homer.

OT The vb. graphō occurs about 300 times in the LXX, almost without exception for the Heb. kāṭab, to write. Traces of the original meaning are still to be seen in its use to describe the signet engraving on the cultic crown of the high priest (Exod. 39:30), and the heathen custom of scratching marks on the skin (Lev. 19:28; cf. Ezek. 9:4). But the basic meaning is to write. graphē (about 40 times) always stands for forms of kāṭab in the sense of (holy) writing, written decree, types of script (of different languages), letter. Only once (2 Chr. 24:27) is it used for midrāš, commentary. gramma (26 times) generally corresponds to the Heb. sēper, less often for formations from ktb or dābār, → word. It has the meaning of writing, document, letter, book.

1. The 22 letters of the Old Canaanite script (all consonants), which were used in the land when Israel entered it, were carved (Exod. 32:16; cf. the Mesha stone, 840 B.C.; the Siloam inscription, c. 700 B.C.) or painted (Deut. 27:3, 8; Jos. 8:32) on stones, scratched or written with ink on potsherds (the ostraca of Lachish, Samaria, Arad), carved or painted on wood (Deut. 6:9; Isa. 8:1; Ezek. 37:16), and later written chiefly on leather or papyrus. They were also taught in the schools (cf. Isa. 28:9 ff.). Between the 4th and 2nd cents., with the spread of the Aramaic language, the Aramaic alphabet, the so-called square character, gradually gained predominance in Israel. By the time of the second temple it seems to have found general acceptance (only in this alphabet is Yōd the smallest letter, Matt. 5:18; → Redemption, art. lyō NT 6 (a)). But even in texts written in square character Hebrew, the Old Canaanite script was used for writing the (unutterable) divine name (in Bible quotations in the Habakkuk commentary from Qumran: 1QpHab 6:14; 10:7, 14; 11:10; → God, art. theos OT 2; → Lord, art. kyrios OT 2). It is also retained on coins of the Maccabean period, and of the periods of revolt in A.D. 66 and A.D. 132, as a symbol of the fulfilment of messianic hopes, a return of the days of old (→ Possessions, art. Coins in the Bible and Theological Issues).

The purpose of writing can be very diverse. The OT mentions rods for drawing lots (Num. 17:1 ff.), letters (2 Sam. 11:14 f.; 2 Ki. 10:1, 6; Sennacherib's letter of contempt, 2 Chr. 32:17), lists (description of the land, Jos. 18:8 f.), deeds of purchase (Jer. 32:10 ff.), bills of divorce (Deut. 24:1, 3), sentences and decrees (Ps. 149:9; 1 Sam. 10:25; Est. 8:8; 9:23), divine commandments (Deut. 17:18; 27:3; 31:9). The words of Jeremiah were written down by his disciple Baruch, at his master's dictation (Jer. 36:4).

2. (a) Theological observations. The most important act of writing in the Bible concerns the laws of God. The central part of this → law, the Decalogue, was written, according to the biblical narrative, by God himself, on stone tablets which he had prepared (the so-called Elohist narrative: Exod. 24:12; 31:18; 32:16; also in Deut. 4:13; 5:22; 9:10). There is however another narrative (the so-called Yahwistic), which finds a place alongside and interwoven with this one: here it is → Moses who writes at God's behest (Exod. 34:1a, 4, 27 f.). Deut. describes how it was done (Deut. 10:1 ff.; Exod. 34:1b seems to have been inserted from the same source). Then it is stated that Moses (Exod. 34:4) wrote all the ordinances of the divine covenant in a → book (the Book of the Covenant, Exod. 20:22 – 23:33). This differentiation of the laws according to their importance may again be observed in the description of the other regulations about the holy tent and the service of the priests (Exod. 25–31), which Moses received from God by word of mouth only. For further discussion → Command, → Law. On the passages attributed to Moses → Moses, art. Mōysēs OT 3.

Apart from this central complex relating to the giving of the commandments, other passages also state that God himself writes things. He keeps a book in which he writes those who commend themselves to him, and from which he can also blot them out again (Exod. 32:32). He writes his law in men's hearts (Jer. 31:33; cf. Deut. 6:6; → Covenant, art. diathēkē OT 5).

The writing of God's law is so important that Israel is commanded not only to pass it on by word of mouth, but individually and literally to write it upon the doorposts of their houses and upon pieces of parchment which were tied on their foreheads and arms (Deut. 6:8 f.; cf. Prov. 3:3). The written word thus serves as a reminder and a witness (Exod. 17:14; Hab. 2:2; Deut. 6:8). The power inherent in the written word can even have physical effects (water of bitterness, used for cursing, Num. 5:23 f.). When the written word is disobeyed, it can at a future date be used as a witness against evil doers (Isa. 30:8; similarly, Deut. 31:19); but where it has been fulfilled, it can become a pledge (Deut. 27:3).

(b) Tradition and interpretation. The written word has great authority which is invoked by later generations (2 Ki. 14:6; 2 Chr. 23:18; Ezr. 3:2; Neh. 10:34; 2 Macc. 10:26). Even non-canonical books are referred to in the Bible (2 Sam. 1:18; frequently in Ki. and Chr.). In other citations and allusions within the Bible we can see the beginnings of the interpretation of Scripture. Thus Deut. is in part a revision of the previous books in a new style (similarly Chr. is a revision of Ki.). God speaks not directly to Israel, but through Moses. In the case of the prohibition of images, we find a kind of proof from scripture (Exod. 20:4 in Deut. 4:9–24, especially v. 15). The prophets too speak God's word to Israel by referring to his traditional promises and commands, interpreting these afresh for the changed situation of the present.

(c) Josiah's reform in 621 B.C. (2 Ki. 23:24 f.) was made on the basis of the rediscovery of part of the book of Deut., which had apparently been found in the temple by Hilkiah, the priest. After the destruction of the temple, and the exile, Ezra in the middle of the 5th cent. put the "law of the God of heaven" (Ezr. 7:21), which is probably to be identified with the Pentateuch, into operation among the Jews (Ezr. 3:2; 7:6–26; 10:3; cf. Neh. 8:1–13:28). He bore the title of sōpēr, → scribe, as a secretary of state at the Persian court. Later this title came to be understood in the Judaistic sense of one learned in the scriptures, since he was reckoned as the founder of the system of scribes. In the period which followed, the scriptures were collected, set in order and finally edited; nevertheless disagreements about the canonicity of certain books (Ezek., Cant., Prov., Eccl., Est.) continued into the 1st cent. A.D. About A.D. 80 at Jamnia the number of books was fixed at 24, divided into three groups: tôrâh, the Torah, instruction, or law; n'bhî'im, the Prophets; and k'tûbîm, Writings or Hagiographa (abbreviated t'naḵ the Jewish name for the Heb. Bible). Josephus (Ap. 1, 8) and the Talmud (Baba Bathra 14b) are in substantial agreement over this. For the canon → Rule, art. kanōn NT 4. The fact that the three groups were already well defined before Jamnia is evidenced by Lk. 24:44.

The Scriptures were now formally constituted into a canon. The reading of them (→ Book, art. anaginōskō) was, along with prayer, the chief part of the service of worship from the time of Ezra onwards. Indeed, it seems that the reading out of the law gave the motivation for the first meetings for worship, where the word of God was heard (Neh. 8). In addition to kaṭûb, what is written, the word miqrâ', what is read, thus becomes a common name for the Bible. For the reading of the Pentateuch there was a cycle of seven and then of three years. Finally the Babylonian cycle, which lasted one year, came to be used generally. Even in the pre-Christian period, this reading was followed by a passage from the prophetic books (Megillah 4:4 and the accompanying Gemara; cf. Lk. 4:17, Acts 13:15). This hapṭarâh was supposed to relate to the passage from the law, or to the meaning of the day. Early on an exposition came to be added, a kind of sermon, which had among all the groups of Jews an important function in their service.

(d) With the supersession of Heb. by Aramaic as the everyday language, the necessity arose of translating the passages which were read out. Similarly, in the Greek-speaking Diaspora they had to be translated into Gk. Next to the reader stood the m'tûrg'mān, the interpreter, who gave a free, explanatory translation. Thus there arose targums in many languages, where there were Jewish communities in the area. The relatedness of content between such targums can be seen, e.g., in the similarity of method found in the Gk. translation of Aquila and the somewhat later, very important Aramaic targum of Onkelos, which bears his name.

The most significant of all these translations is the LXX, which was commenced in the 3rd cent. B.C. in Alexandria, with the translation of the Pentateuch, and probably completed in the 2nd cent. It is partly a literal rendering and partly free translation, in the style of a targum. In it the Heb. text was translated into the concepts of Gk. culture. As a result what was intended in a concrete and immediate sense was sometimes transformed into a promise for the future. The LXX became the Bible of the Christians (for details of the LXX see S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study, 1968). All groups of Jews had the same Bible and the same historical situation as their basis; but they drew different conclusions from it, depending on their characteristic doctrines and experience. Consequently, there arose side by side many legitimate possibilities within the whole range of Israel for realizing their history and interpreting the Bible. Other translations included those of Symmachus and Theodotion (2nd cent. A.D.) (cf. H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, 1900). The adoption of the LXX by the church caused the Jews to abandon it.

3. Judaism after the closing of the OT canon. (a) In Philo and Josephus, the most important writers of the Jewish-Hellenistic symbiosis, we again find the whole range of meaning covered by the words. graphē is used in its original sense (Philo, Vit. Mos. 1, 287), then inscription (Josephus, Ant. 15, 417), and painting (Philo, Vit. Mos. 1, 158), and finally in a legal sense (Philo, Vit. Mos. 2, 203). engraphō is likewise used by both writers in connexion with official documents, etc. (Philo, Conf. Ling. 109; Op. Mund. 143; Josephus, Ant. 17, 226; War 1, 625). "Holy Scripture" (sing. and plur.) is used of the Bible particularly often by Philo (e.g. Congr. 34, 90). gramma is used in parallel to this (Vit. Mos. 2, 290, 292). In his great commentaries Philo attempts to bring the Jewish Bible into harmony with Gk. philosophy. For beginners he admittedly retains a literal exposition, but this forms only a foundation for the allegorical interpretation which reveals the true meaning of scripture. A precedent for this spiritualizing method may be seen in the Gk. interpretation of the myths, and in the expositions of the Essenes, but it also has points of contact with the contemporary Midrash in the land of Israel. The writings of Philo had less influence on later Judaism than on the Christian Fathers. In Josephus' historical work The Antiquities of the Jews the old traditional text is paraphrased to cover the biblical period.

(b) In the Essene community, which has left a relatively large library, writing and the written word were of especial importance. A wide range of different subjects were recorded in the writing room at Qumran, which has been discovered by excavations. Much may be learned about their expectation of an imminent end from the symbolic inscriptions on their military equipment (1QM 3:2 ff., 13 ff.; 6:2 f.; 9:14 f.).

As of old the patriarchs were "enrolled" as participators in the eternal covenant (CD 3:3 f.; similarly Jub. 30:19 ff.), so the saved members of the community are enrolled, according to their obedience before God, in a "book of remembrance" (CD 20:19). Members were enrolled in a literal sense according to families (CD 14:4 ff.) and according to status, which was reviewed annually (1QS 5:23 f.). Hence, they can be described simply as "the enrolled" (1QS 6:10 f., 26).

At Qumran a canon of Holy Scripture is presupposed, which serves as the foundation of the new covenant (1QS 7:1; CD 5:2 f.; 7:15 ff.). The study of this was continued even by night, when the scholars relieved one another in shifts (on this cf. 1QS 6:7 f.). The range of books regarded as holy scripture was wider than those of the canon adopted somewhat later by the → Pharisees. The Essene tradition differs in part from that of the Pharisees, and, probably because of common roots in the exilic Zadokite tradition, shows similarities to the Samaritan tradition and the LXX. In addition to the biblical books, the Book of Enoch is cited as graphê in the Test. XII (cf. Test. Lev. 14:1; Test. Naph. 4:1; Test. Zeb. 3:4 v.l., where words of Moses from Deut. 35:10 are attributed to Enoch). Other books regarded by the community as Holy Scripture are a “Book of the Divisions of Time into their Jubilees and Weeks” (CD 16:3 f.; probably a reference to the Book of Jubilees), a “Book of Meditation” for priests and judges (CD 10:6), and a “Book of Destiny” (1QM 15:5).

Through living with the Bible, the members of the Essene communities came to see the events of their day as foreshadowed and predicted in Scripture, and proof-texts are therefore used with the formula: “as it is written” (1QS 5:15, 17; 8:14; CD 1:13; 5:1 f.; 7:18 ff.). This is even more obvious in their biblical commentaries. Here a text will be cited from the Bible, which they regard as inspired, and there follows the formula pišrô, “its interpretation is”, and then the exposition itself. The latter is based not on literal or historical considerations, but on an application to the present, which is veiled in mystery and revealed only to students who have the Holy Spirit (1QH 14:12 f.; 16:1 ff.). This is referred to as pesher exegesis. Paraphrases in the style of a targum or midrash are also found, however, like the Genesis Apocryphon or the Florilegium, in which Bible texts of various origins are woven together by link-words to form a thematic unity.

The community’s own psalms, Hodayot, are likewise full of echoes of the Bible. The exegetical methods of the Essenes developed out of their daily liturgical reading of scripture, which was explained piece by piece by an expert (cf. Philo, Omn. Prob. Lib. 81 f.).

(c) In the literature of Pharisaic Judaism kātāb and its derivatives are frequently used of the writing of testaments, bills of → divorce, and other documents, but particularly for the writing of biblical scrolls and phylacteries (strips of parchment with the Bible texts, cf. Deut. 8:4–9; 11:13–21; Exod. 13:1–10, 11–16, which were placed in the small boxes worn for prayers), which required great care. To introduce citations, the Aram. expression kētīb is frequently used, even in Heb. texts; the Aram. diktīb corresponds to the Gk. gegraptai gar, “for it is written”. Frequently šenne’mar, “as it is said”, is used, in further citations interchangeably with diktīb. kētīb also means the traditional text of a word as written, in contrast to the word as it was read (qrē), which made possible a new interpretation of the text. kātūb, the noun derived from the pass. part., means a particular passage in the Bible, or the Scriptures as a whole, and is used with various vbs., particularly those of utterance. Scripture can now even be personified: it comes, speaks, teaches, proclaims. The plur. kētūbīm, scriptures, is used like kātūb for the whole Bible, but it is also often used of the third division of the Heb. Bible, in contrast to the first two (the Torah and the Prophets). kētāb means the written word, writing in a concrete sense, but it can also refer to a piece of writing, book. The expression Holy Scriptures, kitē bē-haqqōdeš, is used par. to the simple kētūbīm; it is roughly equivalent to hiera grammata and graphai hagiāi in the NT (2 Tim. 3:15; Rom. 1:2).

It is a matter of importance that God writes people’s → names in his → book at the New Year for life or death (Rosh ha-Shanah 16b), which is the origin of the traditional Jewish New Year wish.

Scholars among the → Pharisees took a great interest in the writing on the table of the commandments. Thus in Pesahim 54a it is said that these instructions were created before the world, i.e. without any human assistance. The details are described in Gen. R. 1 (2b), where it is said that God made the script, the writing-instrument and the tables on the eve of the → Sabbath. Rabbi Hisda (Shabbath 104a) interpreted the words “the writing was graven” (Exod. 32:16) to mean that the table could be read on both sides, the writing being engraved right through. The Sāmek and final Mēm were miraculously held in, and so did not fall out. The word hārūt, graven, could also, if differently vocalized, be read as herūt, freedom: the Decalogue is and effects freedom. In accordance with this, Rabbi Joshua ben Levi concludes: “For thou findest no free man excepting him who occupies himself in the study of the Law” (Aboth 6:2).

The written Torah, tôrâh šebbiḳtab, is distinguished by the Pharisees from the oral Torah, tôrâh šebbʿalpē (Shabbath 31a). The law applies here (Giṭṭin 60b): “The words of Scripture thou mayest not speak from memory, and the oral teaching thou mayest not commit to writing.” When the Bible had been revealed by translation to the peoples of the world, the Pharisaic leaders guarded the oral tradition as the genuinely Jewish one. It was this giving of equal importance to the oral and the written traditions, and regarding them together as making up the one Torah, that constituted the principal difference, according to Josephus (Ant. 13, 297 f.), between the doctrine of the → Pharisees and that of the → Sadducees. Nevertheless, the oral tradition was written down early in the Christian era. The Mishnah of Rabbi Judah, the Prince, goes back in its turn to written collections of Mishnah.

In the schools of the Pharisees importance was attached to making the children learn writing while still young, then the text of the Bible, and finally its interpretation: the ṣ̄šaṭ, or literal meaning of a text, and the dʿraš, interpretation, which arose out of the desire to find biblical authority for existing customs and ordinances, and for which in the 1st and 2nd cents. rules were developed. In the extended midrash literature the meaning for the present day is unfolded to cover the entire Scriptures. The meaning of a passage was sought in a democratic, didactic discussion, and fixed as far as it related to making a norm for living, by the majority in each case.

The apparent carelessness in quoting Scripture which may be observed throughout the literature of early Judaism is due to two factors. On the one hand, there was a great range of variations in the textual tradition. On the other, there was liberty to change the form of a text to accord with the theological basis and aims of the individual community, a liberty for which every community claimed an equal right to the Holy Spirit. The variety of interpretation within Judaism as a whole led to a spirit of competition, the expression of which ranged from friendly discussion to hostile polemics. The interpretative element in its quotation from the Scriptures may also be seen in the NT.

NT 1. (a) In the NT the vb. graphō in its various forms occurs about 180 times, of which scarcely half refer to the Bible. In about 70 cases we have an introductory formula, which is then followed by a Bible citation giving proof. Among the various verbal forms, particles and adverbs, one or two characteristic features may be singled out. The formula kathōs gegraptai, “as it is written”, which is taken over from the LXX (found in the Synoptic Gospels, Rom. and 1 and 2 Cor.), is used for setting down a norm. Luke has a preference for gegrammenon, and especially for panta ta gegrammena, “all that is written” (Lk. 18:31; 21:22; Acts 13:29, each time in connexion with “accomplish” or “fulfil”, → Fullness, art. plēroō; cf. Jn. 15:25). John prefers the perf. participle gegrammenon estin, “[it] is written”, by which he emphasizes the permanence of the written word. Sometimes the name of the writer or of the book concerned is mentioned in connexion with graphō (e.g. Jn. 1:45; Lk. 2:44).

Parallel to the use of graphō in the NT is often that of legō, to say, which can be used, as in Pharisaic Judaism, to express the directness with which the Scripture addresses us. Matthew in particular, in using his typical formula hina plērōthē, “that it might be fulfilled”, constantly adds to rhēthen, what was said (hypo or dia, by or through) (Matt. 1:22; 2:15, 17, 23; 4:14; 8:17; 12:17; 13:35; 21:4; 22:31; 24:15; 27:9). John too links plēroō, to fulfil, with logos, → word, or graphē, writing. In Hebrews citations of scripture are generally introduced by verbs of saying, or are placed in the context without introduction. Revelation has much imagery which echoes OT allusions.

In another 17 cases, there follows no direct quotation, but merely a general allusion to the Scriptures (nearly always as a whole). More than half of these are in the Synoptic Gospels (cf. also Acts 13:29), and present (with the exception of Lk. 21:22) the suffering, death and resurrection of the Son of man, and John as his forerunner (Mk. 9:13) as events prophesied in the Bible. John sees the Scriptures as pointing directly to Jesus (Jn. 1:45; 5:46). Passages of this category in Paul (Rom. 4:22 ff.; 15:4; 1 Cor. 9:10; 10:11; also 5:6) emphasize, in a way exactly corresponding to the exegetical methods of Qumran, the relevance of the ancient Scriptures for the community of the present.

Only here and there is graphō used in a secular sense. Jesus drew in the sand (Jn. 8:6, 8). Paul wrote sentences in his own hand, especially at the end of letters, in order to authenticate their contents (Gal. 6:11; 2 Thess. 3:17; Phlm. 19; also 1 Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18). Zechariah wrote his son's name on a tablet (Lk. 1:63). In the parable of the unjust steward the debtors' bills are written differently (Lk. 16:6 f.). Also mentioned are a letter of commendation, a letter to the governor, and the intention to write something to the emperor (Acts 18:27; 23:25; 25:26). The compound vb. epigraphō is used of the inscription of an altar in Athens (Acts 17:23), and noun epigraphē of the inscription on an imperial coin (Matt. 22:20; Mk. 12:16; Lk. 20:24), and of that on the cross (Mk. 15:26; Lk. 23:38).

(b) With the use and interpretation of the canonical Scriptures for edification and teaching purposes, by means of express citations, allusions, or general references and circumlocutions, an independent tradition came into being which acquired, entirely through being in a written form, a new authority of its own. According to Col. 4:16 and 1 Thess. 5:27, Christian writings were also read in services. Hence, the act of writing came sometimes to be emphasized; and certain writers made reference to their own writing, in order to assure the church of their love (2 Cor. 2:4), to guarantee the truth of the message (Lk. 1:3 f.; Phil. 3:11; 1 Jn. 2:21; 5:13; Rev. 19:9), to remind (Rom. 15:15; 2 Pet. 3:1), to exhort (1 Cor. 4:14; 5:9, 11; 1 Pet. 5:12), to testify (Jn. 21:24; 1 Pet. 5:12), and to stimulate faith (Jn. 20:30 f.). graphō is used frequently, and is of great importance, in the Book of Revelation. As elsewhere in apocalyptic, the written word here acquires a directly sacramental character. He who would not fail to attain what is promised must, therefore, read (aloud) and hear this writing without adding or taking away anything (Rev. 1:3; 22:18 f.). As far as the letters to the seven churches are concerned, they are dictated to the visionary by the Son of man himself (Rev. 1:10 ff.; chs. 2 and 3). The apocalypse sealed with the seven → seals is written within and without (Rev. 5:1). The → Lamb's book of life contains the → names of those who will be saved (Rev. 13:8; 20:15; 21:27). The messiah riding on a white horse has a mysterious name, and also the title of King and Lord written upon him (Rev. 19:12, 16). The great harlot likewise has a mysterious name written on her (Rev. 17:5). The two protagonists – the Lamb and the beast – mark their followers on hand and forehead, where the Jews carried their phylacteries, which contained the confession of God's uniqueness (Rev. 13:16; 14:1; 22:4; cf. Deut. 6:4, 8). Those who endure do not accept the mark of the beast; they receive rather a stone on which is written a new name (Rev. 2:17; 20:4). Just as the gates of the city have the names of the twelve tribes as an inscription, so on the pillars of the → temple (i.e. the faithful) is written the name of God, of the Son of man, and of the holy city (Rev. 3:12; 21:12). While all apocalyptic attaches importance to its own, new writings (Qumran, Mk. 13 par., Rev.), the citation of Scriptures hallowed by age remains important also, so that further additions are interspersed with and determined by guiding texts. Since historical experience is here lacking, and for this very reason, some kind of link, such as visions and auditory experiences always found in the development of the tradition, is needed.

In connexion with engraphō we encounter the concept, universal in Judaism, of the heavenly book, in which the names of the faithful are inscribed (Lk. 10:20; → Book, art. biblos); and then also the picture of an inscription written by God on men's hearts as an assurance of his love. Similarly, Paul sees the church as a letter of Christ, not written with ink (2 Cor. 3:2; → Book, art. epistolē). The prophecy about the commandments written on men's hearts and minds (Jer. 31:33) was important to all the Jews (in the NT, especially cited at Heb. 8:10 and 10:16, v.l. grapsō, epigrapsō; cf. Rom. 2:15, graptos). Paul says that he “openly wrote out”, or “made known officially” (another interpretation of prographō is to paint before someone's eyes) Jesus as the crucified (Gal. 3:1). (Elsewhere, prographō means write above [Eph. 3:3], mark out or write about [Jude 4], write about before [Rom. 15:4].) This sufferer is reckoned as the hypogrammos, example, who should be followed (1 Pet. 2:21; → Image, art. hypogrammos).

R. Mayer

(c) The noun graphē is used 51 times in the NT, nearly always absolutely in either the sing. or plur. In the NT it is used exclusively of Holy Scripture. As such it may refer to an individual Scripture passage (Mk. 12:10; 15:28 v.l.; Lk. 4:21; Jn. 13:18; 19:24, 36 f.; Acts 1:16; 8:35; Rom. 11:2; 2 Tim. 3:16; Jas. 2:8, 23. The plur. hai graphai, the Scriptures, designates collectively all the parts of Scripture (Matt. 21:42; 22:29; 26:54; Mk. 12:24; 14:49; Lk. 24:27, 32, 45; Jn. 5:39; Acts 17:2, 11; 18:24, 28; Rom. 15:4; 2 Pet. 3:16). Matt. 26:56 refers to hai graphai tōn prophētōn, “the writings of the prophets”. The sing. is also used as a designation of Scripture as a whole (Jn. 20:9; Acts 8:32; 2 Pet. 1:20).

Sometimes Scripture is quoted in a way which is tantamount to quoting God himself. Thus: eipen hē graphē, “Scripture said” (Jn. 7:38; cf. Isa. 44:3; 55:1; 58:11; Jn. 7:42; cf. Mic. 5:2); legei, “says” (Rom. 4:3; cf. Gen. 15:6; Rom. 9:17; cf. Exod. 9:16; Rom. 10:11; cf. Isa. 28:16; Gal. 4:30; cf. Gen. 21:10 ff.; 1 Tim. 5:18; cf. Deut.

25:4; Jas. 4:5, where a writing outside the canonical Scriptures is cited, cf. M. Dibelius and H. Greeven, James, Hermeneia, 1976, 220–24). For similar formulae in early Christian literature see Arndt, 165. Other passages speak of “it stands in Scripture [periechei en graphē]” (1 Pet. 2:6; cf. Isa. 28:16); “that the Scripture might be fulfilled [plērōthē]” (Jn. 17:12; cf. Ps. 41:9); “to fulfil [teleiōthē] the Scripture” (Jn. 19:28; cf. Ps. 22:15); “they believed [episteusan] the Scripture” (Jn. 2:22; cf. perhaps Ps. 16:10 which is interpreted of the resurrection in Acts 2:31; 13:35; and possibly Isa. 53:12). Jn. 10:35 states that “the Scripture cannot be set aside [ou dynatai lythenai hē graphē]” (on this verse → Redemption, art. lyō NT 6 (d)). Scripture is personified in Gal. 3:8: “And the Scripture, foreseeing [proidousa] that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, preached the gospel beforehand to Abraham, saying, ‘In thee shall all the nations be blessed’ ” (cf. Gen. 12:3; 18:18, where in fact God is speaking). Similarly Gal. 4:22 declares: “But the Scripture consigned [synekleisen] all things to sin, that what was promised to faith in Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe.” This evidently refers back to the argument of Gal. 3:10 ff. (cf. Deut. 27:26).

Jas. 2:8 uses the phrase kata tēn graphēn, “according to Scripture” (cf. Lev. 19:18); and 1 Cor. 15:3 f. uses the plur. kata tas graphas, “according to the Scriptures” (cf. Isa. 53:5–12; Ps. 16:8 f.). On the subject of the NT’s use of the OT see especially C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures, 1952; E. E. Ellis, Paul’s Use of the Old Testament, 1957; and R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1975. For further discussion of passages which identify the words of Scripture with the Word of God → Revelation, art. Revelation in Contemporary Theology 1 (e); → Word.

Occasionally Scripture is qualified: graphai hagiai, “Holy Scriptures” (Rom. 1:2); dia . . . graphōn prophētikōn, “through the prophetic writings” (Rom. 16:26 RSV). 2 Tim. 3:14 ff. urges Timothy, the convert from Judaism (Acts 16:1 ff.), to continue in the study of the Jewish Scriptures as a basis for his Christian life and work: “But as for you, continue in what you have learned and have firmly believed, knowing from whom you learned it and how from childhood you have been acquainted with the sacred writings [hiera grammata] which are able to instruct you for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. All scripture is inspired by God [theopneustos] and profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness, that the man of God may be complete, equipped for every good work.” The adj. theopneustos (v. 16) means lit. “God-breathed”. It does not imply any particular mode of inspiration, such as some form of divine dictation. Nor does it imply the suspension of the normal cognitive faculties of the human authors. On the other hand, it does imply something quite different from poetic inspiration. It is wrong to omit the divine element from the term implied by theo-, as the NEB does in rendering the phrase “every inspired scripture”. The expression clearly does not imply that some Scriptures are inspired, whilst others are not. The sacred scriptures are all expressive of the mind of God; but they are so with a view to their practical outworking in life. On the doctrine of inspiration in Judaism see Josephus, Ap. 1, 31 ff., and Philo’s doctrine of the prophet possessed by God (prophētēs theophorētos) in Spec. Leg. 1, 65; 4:49 (cf. also Rer. Div. Her. 263 ff. referring to Plato, Ion 534b) (cf. M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 120). Dibelius and Conzelmann cite Epictetus’ comment on the usefulness of the Eleusinian mysteries: "Only thus do the Mysteries become helpful, only thus do we arrive at the impression that all these things were established by men of old time for the purpose of education and for the amendment of our life" (Dissertationes 3, 21, 15).

2 Pet. 3:15 f. evidently counts the apostolic writings of Paul on a par with the OT scriptures: "And count the forbearance of the Lord as salvation. So also our beloved brother Paul wrote to you according to the wisdom given him, speaking of this as he does in all his letters. There are some things in them hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction, as they do the other scriptures."

C. Brown

2. 'Scripture' in the NT is generally identical with the Greek version of the Jewish Bible. Sometimes, however, known Pseudepigrapha (Jude 14 f. cites Eth. Enoch 1:9; Jude 9 perhaps Ass. Mos.) and unknown passages are quoted (Jn. 7:38 and Jas. 4:5 use the word graphē; see above). Similarly, kathōs gegraptai, "as it is written" (1 Cor. 2:9) and egraphē, "it was written" (1 Cor. 9:10) refer to the LXX (cf. also "therefore it is said", Eph. 5:14; "therefore also the Wisdom of God said", Lk. 11:49).

(a) Along with such broad and general Jewish literature, specifically Christian writings came to be given an equal authority. To the old prophetic writings has been added in the age of salvation the new revelation (Rom. 16:26; similarly at Qumran, 1QpHab 2:7 ff.; 7:1 ff.). In 1 Tim. 5:18, Deut. 25:4 is cited first as "scripture", and there follows, connected only by kai ("and") a saying which is known as a saying of Jesus (Lk. 10:7). Even if the second quotation were not meant to be included under the heading of scripture, something new is nevertheless expressed in this connexion by its place immediately after the citation. Here we may see the beginnings of a development, in the course of which the words of Jesus ("I did not come to call the righteous, but sinners" [Matt. 9:13; Mk. 2:17; Lk. 5:32] cited in 2 Clem. 2:4 as graphē), and then also the letters of Paul (2 Pet. 3:16; see 1 above), became authoritative in their own right alongside the old holy writings.

(b) In the Holy Scriptures God promised the good news beforehand through his prophets (Rom. 1:2); now in the day of salvation they are being or have been fulfilled (e.g. Matt. 26:54, 56; Lk. 4:21; Jn. 13:18; 19:24, 36), and that finally (Jn. 19:28). The Scripture cannot be annulled (Jn. 10:35; cf. Matt. 5:17; → Redemption, art. lyō 6 (a), (d)). As in Pharisaic Judaism, the Scripture is frequently personified, so that, as it were, it speaks (Jn. 7:42; Rom. 9:17; Gal. 4:30; Jas. 2:23; 4:5) and can be inquired of (Acts 17:11) in God's stead. It foresees and prophesies (Gal. 3:8; 2 Pet. 1:20), judges and gives encouragement (Gal. 3:22; Rom. 15:4), and can be the subject of faith (Jn. 2:22). The Scripture even becomes a means by which men can be made perfect (2 Tim. 3:16 f.). It is an object of investigation, is read and interpreted (Matt. 21:42 par. Mk. 12:10, Lk. 20:17; Lk. 24:27, 32; Jn. 5:39). It can give rise to and form the basis of dialogue (cf. Acts 17:2). It can be used to prove and confute (Acts 18:28), but it can also be twisted (2 Pet. 3:16). Some know and understand it, and others do not (Acts 18:24; Matt. 22:29 par. Mk. 12:24; Lk. 24:25; Jn. 20:9), an accusation which was, of course, reciprocal.

(c) gramma is used on 8 occasions (in the plur.) in a concrete sense, with a marked leaning towards the secular and legal. It can mean letters of the alphabet (Gal. 6:11; Lk. 23:38 v.l.), written information (Acts 28:21), a debtor's bill (Lk.

16:6); also learning (Jn. 7:15; Acts 26:24), which for Jews implies knowledge of the Scriptures; and finally the writings of → Moses (Jn. 5:47), and generally, the Holy Scriptures (2 Tim. 3:15). The other 7 examples show that Paul uses the term chiefly in a transferred sense, parallel to nomos, → Law, and contrasted with pneuma, → spirit. Probably in order to assimilate its form to that of pneuma, spirit, the sing. gramma is used in these passages (except for 2 Cor. 3:7). The tendency to make a contrast between gramma and pneuma – something already established in cl. Gk. and in Jeremiah (31:31–33) – was turned by Paul into a system (Rom. 2:27, 29; 7:6; 2 Cor. 3:3, 6 and 17 should for this reason be regarded as constituting an inner unity). The following scheme exhibits the juxtaposition of ideas set out in these passages which contrast the Jewish use of Scripture with the reality of life in Christ and the Spirit.

gramma	pneuma
letter	spirit
written on stone	written on the heart with ink on stone tablets	with the Spirit on tablets of flesh
→ Law	→ Freedom
circumcision (literal)	circumcision of the heart
→ old	→ new
→ death	→ life

The detailed and consistent application of the contrast clearly shows that we have here a polemical scheme (see below for further comment).

3. (a) Attitudes to Scripture. The first Christians were Jews among Jews. For them, therefore, as for all other Jews, the Bible was “Holy Scripture”, the foundation, rule and goal for faith and life. In it they encountered the living Word of God, experienced by means of interpretation as a personal message, and at first handed down in this form by word of mouth, and preserved intact by amazing powers of memory. At various times and for various reasons, the oral tradition was collected and committed to writing. No matter to what extent it had acquired definite form, tradition became, as soon as it was written down, an abiding, objective sign and testimony, outliving individual men, which could be experienced afresh by every generation (→ Teach). This process of constant appropriation of Scripture did not take place without sharp tensions. On the one hand, there is that between Scripture and actual life. On the other hand, there is that between the various interpretations made by particular groups. Scripture was seen by each group in the light of its own historical experience, while at the same time their experience of history was moulded by the word of the Bible. Since all Jewish communities believed the interpretation of Scripture to be the work of the Holy Spirit, its results were regarded as revealed truth, having the same dignity as the original; and thus there arose, in addition to the Heb. Bible, on the one hand the Mishnah, and on the other the NT, which with its christology was analogous and at the same time superior to the “Old Testament”. On the rise of apocryphal writings → Hide, art. kryptiō NT 6, and on the canon of Scripture → Rule, art. kanōn.

(b) Methods of Interpretation. These can be discovered by a study of the Bible quotations (cf. C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures, 1952; R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Age, 1975). The variations are hardly coincidental, although oral citation was common. Use is made in interpretation of textual variants, and also of texts altered, shortened or lengthened in the style of a midrash, or quotations from different contexts linked together under one heading, or merged into one another, and even of texts changed round to mean the opposite to bring out a contrasting meaning (cf. Ps. 68:18 with Eph. 4:8 ff.; → Heaven, art. anabainō NT 5). Indications of the method of interpretation are also to be found in the form of the text which was used, although the textual tradition was at that time still fluid. Thus NT citations sometimes show similarities to forms of the text which were later used by Theodotion, Aquila and Lucian as the basis of their translations. Aram. targums are similar to texts used by Paul and Matthew (the latter is occasionally comparable with the Heb. text; nearest to the text of the LXX are apparently the citations in Luke–Acts and Heb.).

4. Theology of Scripture. The many and various Bible quotations in the New Testament are not incidental ornament but its very foundation. The NT is built upon authoritative texts from the Hebrew Bible. There is often a flowing transition from the allusion into citation; and citations without introduction are found alongside others which have an introductory formula. These formulae (such as Scripture says, or Moses, David, Isaiah said, wrote, prophesied, warned, called) are by and large those generally used in Judaism. Specifically Christian interpretation is shown above all in those statements which point to the fulfilment of the Scripture, i.e. as a realization of what was promised (→ Fullness, art. pleroō). This emphasis on the biblical text was important for the Jews as a starting point in missionary endeavour, and was then taken over by Christians too in their mission to the heathen.

(a) Proof from Scripture gained, however, special force and development in the conflict with Judaism. It is the principal tool of apologetics (cf. B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961). Jewish opposition to Christian preaching led Matthew in particular to add direct quotations of Scripture to the traditional material. The passion narrative especially was linked up with old Jewish tradition, since it was here that the greatest conflict arose. Within the church, but much more in the debate with those outside, the great problem was the manner of Jesus' suffering and death; by means of evidence from Scripture discouragement and doubt could be dispelled, and at the same time hostile attacks could be repelled. What had happened here was for the Christians neither a chance event nor a catastrophe, but – as evidenced particularly by the Psalms – God's purpose from of old. The high number of citations demonstrates that questions about the origin and authority of Jesus were further focal points in the controversy within the Jewish community. In the case of Matthew, indications of the fulfilment of scripture are woven just like a leitmotiv into the whole book.

(b) This characteristic use of evidence from Scripture, with its testimony to the fulfilment of promise, emphasizes however not only the continuity, but also the break between the old era and the new. To the Essenes the history of the "Teacher of Righteousness" meant a similar cutting across of old traditions, whereas for the Pharisees who followed Hillel even the catastrophe of the destruction of the temple scarcely ruffled the continuity of their interpretation of Scripture. The coming of Jesus gave the Scriptures a new importance for Christians, since it revealed a meaning hitherto unrealized. Matthew, Paul and John, and the other NT writers too, saw the events of Jesus' life mapped out beforehand in the OT. However conscious Jesus himself was of being the subject of such biblical prophecy, it was not merely from oral tradition that the believing community composed its life of Jesus, but also "according to the Scriptures", which were understood as having been written for his and for their own sakes.

(c) The deeper the sense of a break between the old and the new, the greater were the possibilities of evidence from Scripture being used as a polemical weapon. This made the division from the rest of the Jewish community still more acute. When for instance Paul refers in 2 Cor. 3 to Exod. there is admittedly a formal community of ideas. But the content of what he says separates him from his opponents, as is shown by the pairs of contrasted words associated with gramma and pneuma (see above 2 (c)). What belongs together is torn apart. The position of the opponent is deliberately made negative and thus demolished. In polemic similar to that of Qumran (with its contrast between light and darkness) those who believe otherwise are denied any positive value, on the basis of their own scriptures. It can even be made to look as if the common ground from which both originated, now emptied of its value, is the property of the opponents alone.

The NT presents a state of continual tension. On the one hand, it emphasizes strongly the authority of the Hebrew Bible (or the LXX). On the other, it allows this authority almost to disappear before the claims of the new gospel. From these tensions, however, which were conditioned by the historical situation and indeed necessitated by it, a synthesis was able to develop. Understanding of the unity that exists within the tension, is expressed particularly in typology. Here, as in the thought of the Essenes and the Pharisees, there is seen in the fulfilment of a promise, the promise of a still greater fulfilment. The historical value of types like → Adam, → Abraham, → Moses, → Elijah, the → temple, the → sacrifices, does not have to dissolve because these have been overshadowed by Christ. This leads to a new goal to which God leads his people along the ancient course of history. R. Mayer
→ Book, → Explain, → Fullness, → Proclamation, → Promise, → Revelation, → Rule, → Teach, → Truth, → Word

For the various aspects of Scripture see the fuller bibliographies given in the articles referred to in these cross-references.

(a). D. L. Baker, Two Testaments, One Bible: A Study of Some Modern Solutions to the Theological Problem of the Relationship between the Old and New Testaments, 1976 (with extensive bibliography); J. Barr, Old and New in Interpretation, 1966; The Bible in the Modern World, 1973; and "Scripture, Authority of", IDB Supplementary Volume, 1976, 794–97; E. C. Blackman, Biblical Interpretation, 1957; L. Berkhof, Principles of Biblical Interpretation, 1950; J. W. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature: An Introduction to Jewish Interpretations of Scripture, 1969; J. Bright, The Authority of the Old Testament, 1967; C. Brown, ed., History, Criticism and Faith: Four Exploratory Studies, 1977; F. F. Bruce, The Books and the Parchments, 1950; The English Bible: A History of Translations, 1961; Biblical Exegesis in the Qumran Texts, 1960; This is That: The New Testament Development of Some Old Testament Themes, 1968; F. F. Bruce and E. G. Rupp, eds., Holy Book and Holy Tradition, 1968; F. F. Bruce, ed., Promise and Fulfilment: Essays Presented to Professor S. H. Hooke, 1963; J. T. Burtchaell, Catholic Theories of Inspiration since 1810, 1969; The Cambridge History of the Bible, I, ed. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans, From the Beginnings to Jerome, 1970; II, ed. G. W. H. Lampe, The West from the Fathers to the Reformation, 1969; III, ed. S. L. Greenslade, The West from the Reformation to the Present Day, 1963; O. Cullmann, "Scripture and Tradition", in D. J. Callahan, H. O. Ober-mann and D. J. O'Hanlon, eds., Christianity Divided: Protestant and Catholic Theological Issues, 1962, 7–33 (also in SJT 6, 1953, 113 ff.); H. Cunliffe-Jones, The Authority of the Biblical Revelation, 1945; C. H. Dodd, The Authority of the Bible, 1935; The Bible and the Greeks, 1954; and According to the Scriptures, 1952; J. W. Doeve, Jewish Hermeneutics in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, 1954; G. Ebeling, Word and Faith, 1963; E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the Old Testament, 1957; and "The Authority of the Bible: Critical Judgments in Biblical Perspective", EQ 39, 1967, 196–204; C. F. Evans, Is 'Holy Scripture' Christian? and Other Questions, 1971; F. W. Farrar, History of Interpretation, Bampton Lectures, 1886; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Use of Explicit Old Testament Quotations in Qumran Literature and in the New Testament", NTS 7, 1960–61, 297–333 (reprinted in Essays on the Semitic Background of the New Testament, 1971, 3–58); R. T. France, Jesus and the Old Testament: His Application of Old Testament Passages to Himself and his Mission, 1971; H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics, 1974; L. Gausson, Theopneustia: The Plenary Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, 1888; B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 22, 1961; and Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, Coniectanea Neotestamentica 20, 1964; G. W. Grogan, "Scripture", ZPEB V 302–13; R. H. Gundry, The Use of the Old Testament in St. Matthew's Gospel with Special Reference to the Messianic Hope, Supplements to NovT 18, 1967; A. T. Hanson, Jesus Christ in the Old Testament, 1965; J. R. Harris, Testimonies, I–II, 1916–20; A. G. Hebert, The Throne of David, 1941, 240–66; C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation and Authority, I–IV, 1976–; C. F. H. Henry, ed., Revelation and the Bible, 1958; J. P. Hyatt, ed., The Bible in Modern Scholarship: Papers Read at the 100th Meeting of the Society for Biblical Literature, 1966; S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study, 1968; P. H. Kelsey, The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology, 1975; E. G. Kraeling, The Old Testament since the Reformation, 1955; W. G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems, 1972; B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic, 1961; H. Lindsell, The Battle for the Bible, 1976; R. N. Longenecker, Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 1974; I. H. Marshall, ed., New Testament Interpretation, 1977; J. Michl, "Scripture", EBT III 816–25; K. H. Miskotte, When the Gods are Silent, 1967; R. Morgan, The Nature of New Testament Theology, SBT Second Series, 1973; S. Neill, The Interpretation of the New Testament, 1861–1961, 1964; D. E. Nineham, The Use and Abuse of the Bible, 1976; D. E. Nineham, ed., The Church's Use of the Bible Past and Present, 1963; W. O. E. Oesterley and G. H. Box, A Short Survey of the Literature of Rabbinical and Mediaeval Judaism, 1920; J. Orr, Revelation and Inspiration, 1909; J. I. Packer, Fundamentalism and the Word of God, 1958; D. Patte, Early Jewish Hermeneutics in Palestine, 1975; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, II, 1965; B. Ramm, Protestant Biblical Interpretation, 1950; J. K. S. Reid, The Authority of Scripture: A Study of the Reformation and Post-Reformation Understanding of the Bible, 1957; A. Richardson, The Bible in the Age of Science, 1961; and "Scripture, Authority of", IDB IV 248–51; P. Ricoeur, "Biblical Hermeneutics", Semeia 4, 1975, 29–145; H. Schlier, The Relevance of the New Testament, 1967; L. A. Schökel, The Inspired Word: Scripture in the Light of Language and Literature, 1967; G. Schrenk, graphō etc., TDNT I 742–73; J. D. Smart, The Interpretation of Scripture, 1961; and The Strange Silence of the Bible in the Church, 1973; K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew and its Use of the Old Testament, Acta Seminarii Neotestamentici Upsaliensis 20, 1969²; H. B. Swete, An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, 1900; G. Vermes, Scripture and Tradition in Judaism, 1961; W. Vischer, The Witness of the Old Testament to Christ, I, 1949; B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, 1948; J. C. Wenger, God's Word Written: Essays on the Nature of Biblical Revelation and Authority, 1966; J. W. Wenham, Christ and the Bible, 1972; C. Westermann, ed., Essays on Old Testament Interpretation, 1963; W. Wink, The Bible in Human Transformation: Toward a New Paradigm for Biblical Study, 1973.

(b) W. Bacher, Die exegetische Terminologie der jüdischen Traditionsliteratur, (1899) 1965; G. Bauer, "Schriftbeweis", EKL III 846 ff.; O. Betz, Offenbarung und Schriftforschung in der Qumransekte, WUNT 6, 1960; I. Christiansen, Die Technik der allegorischen Auslegungswissenschaft bei Philon von Alexandrien, 1969; L. Goppelt, Typos. Die typologische Deutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen, 1939; F. Hesse, "Schriftauslegung", *RGG*³ V 1513 ff.; H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart, 1956; H.-J. Kraus and C. Maurer, "Bibelwissenschaft", EKL I 489 ff.; H.-J. Kraus and H. W. Surkau, "Bibelkritik", EKL I 454 ff.; R. Mayer, "Geschichtserfahrung und Schriftauslegung", in O. Loretz and W. Strolz, Die hermeneutische Frage in der Theologie, 1968, 290 ff.; O. Michel, Paulus und seine Bibel, 1929; M. Rese, "Die Rolle des Alten Testaments im Neuen Testament", Verkündigung und Forschung 2, 1967, 287 ff.; O. Schmitz, "Das Alte Testament im Neuen Testament", in Wort und Geist. Festgabe Karl Heim, 1934, 49 ff.; R. Smend, Die Mitte des Alten Testaments, 1970; E. Stauffer, "Jesus und seine Bibel", in Abraham unser Vater. Festschrift Otto Michel, 1963, 440 ff.; H. J. Stoebe, E. Nestle, W. Wiesner, "Bibelkanon", EKL I 448 ff.

Seal

σφραγίς

σφραγίς (sphragis), seal, signet; σφραγίζω (sphragizō) and κατασφραγίζω (katasphragizō), to seal.

CL 1. sphragis is attested since the 6th cent. (Theognis) – the first attestation is probably already a metaphor – and the vb. since c. 500 B.C. The noun means both the tool that seals (e.g. a signet ring), the stone set in it (the gem) and the engraving on it (an image or name) as well as its imprint.

2. Seals were widely used very early (3rd millennium onwards), especially in Mesopotamia, where Hdt. observed that every man possessed not only a staff but also a seal (1, 195), and later in the whole Mediterranean area (on the different forms of seals – e.g. rolls, buttons, scaraboid – cf. BHHW III 1786 ff., 1812 f.). The real importance of the seal is a legal one: the owner puts his mark on his possessions, his beasts (cf. Virgil, Georgics 3, 157 ff.; BGU I, 87, 12 f.; P. Teb. 419), his slaves (cf. Pliny, Nat. Hist. 25, 13, 173; BGU I, 15, etc.) and thereby guards his property against theft. To that extent one can call it a protecting sign or a guarantee. When used with documents (wills, deeds of sale, etc.) the seal served as a signature to authorize what was written there (cf. TDNT VII 941). Things sealed were at the disposal of the possessor of the seal. This applied not only to private persons, but also particularly to the authorities of a city and to kings. The seal symbolized their authority.

3. Seals were also significant in religious life. For instance, a beast could be attested as ritually pure and thus suitable for a sacrificial victim (cf. Hdt. 2, 38; BGU, I, 250, 15 ff.; 356, 7). Men show themselves to be the possession of their deity by the imprint of their seal (Hdt., 2, 113; cf. 3 Macc. 2:29 f.; also J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology, 1962, 200 f.). More tangibly one can seal houses, etc., to guarantee that they were preserved, or documents, to keep their contents a secret. Hence, one can also say that the mouth or words are sealed (cf. Diog. Laert., 1, 58; Theognis, 1, 178; Timotheus, Persians 148): what one has experienced must remain secret and in safe keeping. This applied particularly to keeping the secrets of the mysteries (Ysebaert, op. cit., 221–226).

OT In the LXX the noun is a translation of hōtām, hōtām, and of the vb. hātām.

Twice the LXX translates hōtām with daktylios, signet-ring, but daktylios usually represents the Heb. ṭabba'at, ring (e.g. on the ark of the covenant, altars, the priests' clothing, etc.). However, it is also used of signet-rings. On the other hand, sphragis can also mean a signet-ring (e.g. Exod. 35:22; 1 Ki. 20[21]:8). Both the noun and the vb. are used (1) literally and (2) figuratively. In this way they approximate to non-biblical usage.

1. A seal engraved by a maker of signets (Sir. 38:27) can leave its impress in clay (Job 38:14). It has a legal use: by means of a seal a document (e.g. a marriage contract, Tob. 7:14; or a deed of sale, Jer. 39[32]:10 f., 44) is made valid. All who affix their seals to a document are bound to abide by its contents (Neh. 10:1). To give one's seal to another implies the transference of authority and power (Gen. 41:42; 1 Ki. 20[21]:8; Est. 3:10; 8:8, 10). Hence, one of the means by which the dying Antiochus Epiphanes appointed his friend Philip as regent over his kingdom was to hand over his seal to him (1 Macc. 6:15).

The LXX can also speak of a seal used as a fastening (for a purse, 2 Ki. 22:4; Tob. 9:5; a treasury, Deut. 32:34; the temple, Ad. Dan. 14:14, 16 f.; a pit, Dan. 6:18; a fountain, Cant. 4:12). Thence the act of sealing comes to be equivalent to keeping something secret: that which is sealed is hidden from men (a book, Dan. 12:4; Isa. 29:11; cf. 1 Esd. 3:8). The seal is thus absolutely necessary in both private and public life. The seal of the state (Jerusalem, 2 Esd. 10:23) is carefully guarded (Tob. 1:22). Signet-rings are precious (Isa. 3:20; Sir. 35[32]:5 f.) and are regarded as valuable spoil (Num. 31:50).

2. The figurative use of the concept is found especially with the sense of concluding or shutting up. One can, e.g., ask for a seal to be set on one's lips that one may not sin in speaking (Sir. 22:27; cf. Ps. 141[140]:3). God seals the stars (Job 9:7) by shutting them up so that they can no longer shine, and he seals men and thus prevents them from working, so that they may recognize their dependence on him (Job 37:7 LXX). Several times sins are said to be sealed (in a bag, Job 14:17; Dan. [Theod.] 9:24; cf. Hos. 13:12). A revelation that is sealed remains hidden (Dan. 12:9) and one can therefore learn as little of its contents as of those of a sealed book. In Job 24:16 skulking malefactors are said to have "sealed" themselves from daylight. The end of life is sealed in that it is as unalterable as a sealed document (Wis. 2:5).

The application of sealing to a religious context plays some part in the LXX. These precise words are not used, but their meaning is. Isa. 44:5 presupposes the custom of having a seal with the words "for Yahweh", i.e. Yahweh's property, tattooed on the hand. Probably the author of Lev. 19:28 was opposing this very practice, because he regarded it as pagan. Ezek. 9:4 ff. is also relevant at this point: God gets one of his servants to mark a sign upon the foreheads of his children to protect them in the judgment. The seal is thus God's protective mark for his property (cf. Pss. Sol. 15:6 ff.: "For the mark of God is upon the righteous that they may be saved. Famine and death remain far from the righteous, for sword and pestilence [shall be] far from the righteous, for they shall flee away from the pious as men pursued in war").

3. The affixing of seals is also frequently mentioned in Rab. Judaism. Letters are sealed (Oholoth 17:5); their seals are smaller than those of sacks (Shabbath 8:5). In the temple there was a room where four kinds of seals for victims were kept (Shekalim 5:3, 4). A seal can be made of metal or coral (Kelim 13:6), and is used like a key to lock things up (Tohoroth 7:7). The Mishnah also uses the word in a metaphorical sense, e.g. Sanhedrin 4:5, "Man stamps many coins with one seal and they are all like one another; but the King of Kings, the Holy One, blessed is he, has stamped every man with the seal of the first man, yet not one is like his fellow" (Sanhedrin 4:5; → Image).

Sealing often occurs in the sense of signing, especially in the tractate Gittin (1:1, 3, et passim), where two witnesses are said to "seal" a bill of → divorce. → Circumcision can be called the seal of the holy → covenant (T. J. Ber. 9:3) or the seal of → Abraham (Exod. R. 19:5), since he was the first to receive this sign (Gen. 17:11). The noun and the vb. occur only infrequently in the Qumran texts. CD 5:2 refers to the sealed book of the law, and 1QH 8:11 to the seal of the secret of the holy shoot, i.e. its secret is inscrutable.

NT The noun sphragis and the vbs. occur 32 times in the NT (22 times in Rev. alone). The other occurrences are divided between the Pauline writings (6), Jn. (2), Matt. (1) and 2 Tim. (1).

1. The Literal Use of these Words. (a) Twice sphragizō is used of actual physical sealing: the stone before Jesus' grave (Matt. 27:66; cf. Dan. 6:18) and the pit into which the devil is thrown (Rev. 20:3) are both sealed. In both cases this is done to prevent the one enclosed within from leading men astray (Matt. 27:63 f.; Rev. 20:3).

(b) In Rom. 15:28 Paul says that he is "sealing" the collections from Macedonia and Achaia for the Jerusalem church. Here he is either wanting to say that he has "sealed" the collections as one seals a purse (cf. Tob. 9:5; Job 14:17) so that the contents may be kept safe, or that he has finished the collections (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4).

2. The Figurative Use. (a) Jn. uses sphragizō, to seal, in the sense of confirm, authenticate. He who receives God's witness thus affirms that God is true (Jn. 3:33). Jn. 6:27 says that God has put his seal upon the Son of man. By doing so he attests that the eternal food that the Son of man gives is the true food and not perishable; by his seal he authenticates the Son of man's work. Perhaps Jn. is here thinking of → baptism as a sealing (cf. (b)). Others think that this seal is the miracle of the feeding of the five thousand (6:1 ff.), or the testimony of Holy Scripture (5:39).

When Paul in 1 Cor. 9:2 calls the Corinthian community the seal of his apostleship, he means that the existence of this community in the world confirms the legitimacy of his apostolic authority and that they are at the same time his letters of recommendation (cf. 2 Cor. 3:1–3; → Book, art. epistolē).

(b) Three times Paul connects "sealing" with the Holy → Spirit. This sealing, as he sees it, is symbolized by → baptism (aor.) which he associates with the gift of the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:11; 12:13; cf. Acts 2:38; 10:47). While Eph. 1:13 relates "being sealed" with or in the Holy Spirit (cf. Eph. 4:30) to the whole baptismal event, 2 Cor. 1:21 f. looks on baptism as an anointing in Christ and associates it with the receiving of the pledge of the Spirit (→ Gift, art. arrabōn). As Christ was anointed with the Spirit at his baptism (cf. Lk. 3:22; 4:18; Acts 10:37 f.; → Anoint, art. chriō), so also are believers at theirs. The Spirit is a pledge until the day of redemption (Eph. 1:14; 2 Cor. 1:22; cf. 5:5). In sealing believers with his Spirit, God makes them his own possession (cf. above OT). On the relation of → faith to baptism → the various articles under Baptism.

It is not certain whether Paul used the word "seal" in Rom. 4:11 in connexion with → Abraham's → circumcision, because he thought of baptism as a "seal" (cf. Col. 2:11 f. which mentions a circumcision which is not performed by hand, which comes through Christ). This idea first became explicit at a later stage (e.g. 2 Clem. 7:6; 8:6; Hermas, Sim. 8, 6, 3). Rom. 4:11 is most readily intelligible, if it means that by the seal of circumcision God confirms that Abraham was justified even before God made his covenant with him (Gen. 17:10 ff.), a covenant whose sign is circumcision.

So circumcision would here represent God's confirmatory sign (cf. 2 (a)).

(c) That difficult passage, 2 Tim. 2:19, speaks of a firm foundation which is fixed (cf. Isa. 28:16) and bears a seal: "But God's firm foundation stands, bearing this seal: 'The Lord knows those who are his,' and, 'Let every one who names the name of the Lord depart from iniquity.'" The word "seal" here means the impress of the seal, the inscription on it (cf. Exod. 28:36). The question is what is meant by the foundation upon which this mark is stamped: is it Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 3:10 ff.), the church (cf. 1 Tim. 3:15), the apostolic witness (cf. Eph. 2:20), or the truth in contrast to that which is taught by the false teachers (vv. 15, 18)? Through his seal God guarantees the firmness of the foundation, for he knows his own and does not tolerate unrighteousness. The two inscriptions probably depend on Num. 16:5 LXX, but M. Dibelius and H. Conzelmann, think that this is a quotation from early Christian poetry influenced by the Gk. OT (The Pastoral Epistles, Hermeneia, 1972, 112).

3. The use of these Words in Revelation. (a) The sealing of words and its absence. In Rev. 22:10 the seer is forbidden to seal the words of the prophecy; he is not to keep them secret since the time of their fulfilment is near (cf. the opposite in Dan. 12:4).

On the other hand, Rev. 10:4 reads: "Seal up that which the seven thunders have spoken; do not write it down." This reflects the idea that that which is sealed up is hidden (cf. Isa. 29:11). The message of the thunders which ushers in the beginning of the final judgment was only for the seer's ears and should not be communicated by him to anyone else (→ Revelation; → Hide).

(b) The book with the seven seals. Rev. 5:1 tells us how Jn. saw in the right hand of him who sat on the heavenly throne a scroll written on both sides which had seven seals. No one but the → Lamb could open it (5:2–10). The contents of the scroll (and also, according to E. Lohmeyer, Die Offenbarung des Johannes, HNT 16, 1970³, ad loc., the events which Rev. goes on to describe) are so voluminous that they cover both sides of it (cf. Ezek. 2:9 f.). But it is still secret, even for the seer (cf. Dan. 12:4, 9). The number seven recalls the Roman custom of sealing wills with 7 seals, but it is more likely to be derived from the use of this number in Rev. itself (→ Number, art. hepta).

It is difficult to guess what the scroll looked like, since a part of the final cataclysm is revealed with the opening of each individual seal (Rev. 6:1, 3, 5, 7, 9, 12; 8:1), despite the fact that the contents of ancient documents were disclosed only after the opening of all the seals. But the writer is not interested in this idea itself, but in emphasizing that only the Lamb is worthy of setting the final events in motion.

(c) The sealing of believers. Finally Rev. 7:10 ff. refers to the "seal of the living God" which is imprinted on the foreheads of believers before the four angels of judgment are allowed to set to work. These are to protect them from the judgment that is coming upon the world (Rev. 9:4; cf. Ezek. 9:4; Pss. Sol. 15:6 ff.; cf. OT above). The seal is here a sign of ownership and hence also of the one that protects; God keeps his own from the judgment. The fact that 12,000 of each tribe, i.e. 12 x 12,000, receive the seal means that the whole of God's people are spared from the judgment (→ Number, art. chilias). The imprinting of the seal which bears God's → name (cf. Rev. 14:1; 22:4) will distinguish believers from those who bear the "mark of the beast" on their hands and foreheads (13:16 f.; 14:9, 11, etc.; → Animal, art. therion). God's sign protects one from judgment; the mark of the beast brings it upon one

(9:4; 14:9 ff.). It is easy to discern here a word of consolation to a community which is living through the trials of persecution; it tells them of God's protection.

R. Schippers

(a). D. Diringer, "Seals". in D. W. Thomas, ed., Documents from Old Testament Times, 1969, 219–26; G. Fitzler, sphragis etc., TDNT VII 939–53; F. B. Huey, Jr., "Seals", ZPEB V 319–24; J. Michl, "Seal", EBT III 827 ff.; G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit: A Study of Baptism and Confirmation in the New Testament and the Fathers, 1967²; W. M. F. Petrie, Scarabs and Cylinders, 1917; A. Reifenberg, Ancient Hebrew Seals, 1950; and "Hebrew Seals and Stamps", Israel Exploration Journal 4, 1954, 139–42; G. M. A. Richter, The Engraved Gems of the Greeks and the Etruscans and the Romans, I, 1968; O. Tufnell, "Seals and Scarabs", IDB IV 254–59; W. H. Ward, The Seal Cylinders of Western Asia, 1910; D. J. Wiseman, Cylinder Seals of Western Asia, 1958; Y. Yadin, ed., Hazor I: An Account of the First Season of Excavations, 1955, 1958; and Hazor II: An Account of the Second Season of Excavations, 1956, 1960; J. Ysebaert, Greek Baptismal Terminology: Its Origins and Early Development, Graecitas Christianorum Primaeva 1, 1962.

(b). N. Avigad, hōtām, Encyclopaedia Biblica, III, 1958, 68–86; J. Diehl, Sphragis. Eine semasiologische Nachlese, (Dissertation, Giessen) 1938; E. Dinkler, "Die Taufterminologie in 2 Kor. i, 21 f.", in Neotestamentica et Patristica. Eine Freundesgabe Herrn Professor Dr. Oscar Cullmann, Supplements to NovT 6, 1962, 173–91 (reprinted in Signum Crucis, 1967, 99 f.); F. Dölger, Sphragis, 1911; K. Galling, "Beschriftete Bildsiegel des ersten Jahrtausends v. Chr. vornehmlich aus Syrien und Palästina", Zeitschrift des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins 64, 1941, 121–202; and "Siegel", *RGG*³ VI 27 f.; W. Heitmüller, sphragis, in Neutestamentliche Studien G. Heinrichs dargebracht, 1914, 40–59; W. Michaelis, "Zeichen, Siegel, Kreuz. Ein Ausschnitt aus der Bedeutungsgeschichte biblischer Begriffe", ThZ 12, 1956, 505–25; S. Moscati, "I Sigilli nell' Antico Testamento", Biblica 30, 1949, 314–38; L. Wenger, "signum", Pauly-Wissowa Series 2, II 2361–2448; and Die Quellen des römischen Rechts, 1953, 45–9.

Secret, Mystery

μυστήριον

μυστήριον (mystērion), mystery, secret; μύεω (myeō), initiate, instruct.

CL 1. mystērion, found from the time of the Tragic Poets onwards, comes from myō, to shut (the mouth), and means that which must not or cannot be said. The plur. is almost exclusively a technical term for festivals such as those which took place in Eleusis from the 17th cent. B.C. and were widespread during the Hellenistic period and especially in Christian times as the mysteries associated with Isis, Attis, Mithras etc. The mystery celebration gave a ceremonial and dramatic representation of the deity suffering and overcoming death, and the initiated attained salvation (sōtēria; → Redemption, art. sōzō) and deification by sharing in the deity's fortunes through sacramental acts such as baptism, cultic feasts, and ceremonies of death and resurrection (→ Baptism, art. baptizō NT 7; cf. G. Wagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries, 1967). The cultic acts and symbols were kept strictly secret.

2. myeō meant originally to initiate (into the mysteries), and then (as in NT Gk.) took on the meaning of to instruct, to teach.

3. As early as Plato, ideas and terms from the mystery cults were being transferred to philosophy: He describes the path of knowledge for immutable being as the path of true initiation (cf. Theaet. 156a; Gorgias 497c). In later mystic philosophy, especially in Neoplatonism, mystērion is that which by its very nature cannot be put into words. Mystic speech is the very negation of speech (TDNT IV 809).

In gnosticism (→ Knowledge) the mystēria become secret revelations granted only to the “perfect” (teleioi) with a view to the redemption of their souls.

OT 1. (a) In the LXX mystērion occurs only in later writings, i.e. those belonging to the Hellenistic period; the same is true of apokalypsis, → revelation, in its theological sense of the revelation of a mystery. The OT is very slow to abandon the idea that God’s words and deeds in history (Heb. dābār; → word) are manifest in the sense that they take place before the eyes of the whole world. Numerous passages demonstrate this. God does not speak in secret (Isa. 45:19; 48:16). Amos 3:7 f. goes so far as to contradict the later concept of “mystery” or “secret” (Heb. sōd): “Surely the Lord GOD does nothing, without revealing his secret to his servants the prophets.”

(b) When it occurs later in the LXX, mystery terminology frequently refers to heathen cults (Wis. 12:5; 14:23; 3 Macc. 2:30 and passim). On the other hand, in passages such as Wis. 2:22; 6:22; 8:4 the way to divine → wisdom is described approvingly in terms of the mysteries. But even here (Wis. 6:22) the authentic OT note is still sounded in that the way of wisdom is faithfully and uncompromisingly set forth.

In writings other than Wis. and Dan., mystērion occurs with profane meanings such as the secret plans of a political leader (Tob. 12:7; Jud. 2:2), military secrets (2 Macc. 13:21), or secrets shared among friends (Sir. 22:22; 27:16 f., 21).

2. mystērion always renders the Heb. sōd, confidential speech, secret, except in Dan. where it occurs most frequently and corresponds to the Aram. rāz. Dan. uses the word in a very definite theological sense, that of “eschatological secret”, the vision of what God has decreed shall take place in the future (Dan. 2:28). When given in the form of a → dream, it can be interpreted only by a Spirit-inspired seer (4:6, 18), for the revelation of mysteries belongs to God alone (2:28 f.).

In this way Dan. serves as a transition to the special use of the term in late Jewish apocalyptic, where the mystēria are used in the one sense of eschatological events: the judgment and punishment of sinners (Eth. Enoch 38:3), the reward of the righteous (Eth. Enoch 103: 2 ff.) and the cosmic upheaval at the dénouement of world history (Eth. Enoch 83:7). Future events, in so far as they belong to the divine decrees, are present realities in the heavenly sphere, and are revealed in vision to the apocalyptic seer (Heb. Enoch 71:3 f.). He knows even now about “the approach of the ages” (Syr. Bar. 81:4), and what must, of divine necessity, come to pass in the last days (TDNT IV 816). But what he beholds remains a secret in that he may pass it on only in symbolic, oracular language (Eth. Enoch 68:1: “signs of all secrets”) and for the exclusive benefit of a given circle of initiates (2 Esd. 12:36 ff.).

3. (a) In rabbinic literature there are also references to “secrets” in connexion with the interpretation of the written and oral tradition. The secrets of the Torah seek to reveal the inner workings of the Lawgiver’s mind, and, being also “the secrets of creation”, to throw light on his purposes for the world (Heb. Enoch 11:1). Such secrets are part of an esoteric scheme of doctrine reminiscent of gnosticism. The esoteric interpretation of Gen. 1:1 ff. and of Ezek. 1:1 f. is a work of daring (cf. Hagigah 2, 1; J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus, 1969, 237; H. Bietenhard, 502 Die himmlische Welt im Urchristentum und im Spätjudentum, WUNT 2, 1951, 86 ff.).

(b) In the true apocalyptic tradition the Qumran texts speak of the secrets which God has prepared for men (frequently in stereotyped association with pele', wonder, miracle; wondrous, miraculous), no distinction in meaning being drawn between sôd and râz (cf. 1QH4 27f.). The "wondrous secrets" are God's decrees, according to which, in strictly dualistic and predestinarian fashion, he has set apart one section of mankind, the sons of righteousness, for the way of light (1QS 3:20), and the other section, the sons of evil, for the way of darkness (1QS 3:21). Individuals (the Teacher of Righteousness?) are set to be "a banner and a discerning interpreter of wonderful mysteries, to try [those who practise] truth" (1QH 2:13 f.). The secrets give information about God's purposes for the world from its very beginning right through to its end: about his creation (1QH 1:9 ff; 1QS 3:15), his deeds in history (1QH 4:29), and about cultic arrangements, interpreted along the lines of Qumran observance (CD 3:14 ff.). All this is arrived at through a kind of spiritual exegesis of the written tradition, with correction and reinterpretation of existing prophecies (1QpHab 7:7 f.). In addition there are revelations regarding the time of visitation (1QS 3:21 f.) and the final conflict of the sons of light with the sons of darkness (1QM 14:14 ff.).

NT In the NT mystêrion is comparatively rare, occurring only some 27 times. It is significant that it is found most frequently (20 times) in Paul (5 times in 1 Cor; 6 times in Eph.; 4 times in Col.; twice in Rom. and 1 Tim. and once in 2 Thess.), since it is here that the mystery cults and gnosticism are directly dealt with. The word occurs once each in Matt., Mk. and Lk. and, as one would expect, is found also in Rev. (4 times). Its complete absence from the Gospel of Jn. is striking. Perhaps the reason lies in John's christology.

1. Mk. 4:11 (par. Matt. 13:11, Lk. 8:10) with its picture of harvest, i.e. the appearing of the kingdom of God, touches on a matter close to the heart of apocalyptic. Mk., however, sees God's kingdom as having already arrived in Christ. The meaning of the parables (note the plur. in v. 11), i.e. that of Christ's teaching as a whole, has to do with his way to the → cross. Only this will usher God's → kingdom into the world. One of the ideas basic to Mk.'s Gospel (W. Wrede calls it the messianic secret) is that neither the people nor the disciples realized that this way to the cross was according to the will of God (cf. 3:35), even though the Twelve received clear teaching on the matter (4:11; 8:17; cf. on the other hand Matt. 13:51; → Parable, art. parabolê). The first man to confess the truth was the heathen soldier at the foot of the cross: "Truly, this man was the Son of God!" (15:39). Only the evil spirits knew from the beginning that the turning point of the ages had come (1:24). On the question of the messianic secret see the note appended to this article.

Matt. and Lk. abandon this strict adherence to the idea that Christ's way to the cross remained a mystery, and speak of the secrets which it is given to the disciples to know (Matt. 13:11; Lk. 8:10). The plur. here indicates that the decrees of God concerning Christ and his church, latent in the Scriptures of the OT but now explainable to the disciples, are at last being fulfilled (cf. the frequent references to the fulfilment of OT prophecies: Matt. 2:17, 23; 3:3 and passim; Lk. 24:26 and passim). According to Lk., Christ's way of suffering, and that of his church, are a matter of divine → necessity (Lk. 24:26; art. dei) and will issue in the glory of heaven (cf. Lk. 23:43; Acts 7:55).

2. The mystery with which Paul firmly confronts his opponents in 1 Cor. is that of the → cross of Christ, revealing as it does God's redemptive decree for the world. Paul is concerned to set before men Jesus Christ only, and him crucified (1 Cor. 2:2; cf. 1:23). This is the essence of "the mystery of God" (2:1; a well-attested v.l.). Although the apostle uses "mystery" terminology (teleioi, "perfect", 2:6; en mystērō, "in a mystery", 2:7; psychikos "physical"/pneumatikos, "spiritual", 2:14, 15), he interprets this "mystery" in an entirely apocalyptic manner. Before the beginning of → time God in his wisdom predestinated the cross of Christ to our glory, i.e. with a view to our glorification at the end of time (2:7; → Determine, art. horizō; cf. Rom. 16:25). That which has already been prepared in heaven and promised in OT prophecy, has now taken place in time and history (1 Cor. 1:19 quotes Isa. 29:14; 2:9 quotes Isa. 64:3). The rulers of this age have not known the secret of the divine decree (2:6); but he who, enlightened by the → Spirit (2:12), now acknowledges it in humble submission. He is left speechless before its unfathomable depth (1:23; 2:3). His grasp of it is sufficient to bind him irresistibly to its service for life (9:16) and to rule out all boasting of self (1:31; 3:21).

Only thus, in weakness and humility, are the → apostles, as servants of the crucified Christ, stewards of the mysteries of God (4:1; → House, art. oikos). They submit to the plan (oikonomia) of God (Eph. 3:8). Their sole ground of boasting is that, in spite of all their weakness and insufficiency, he can still use them as instruments of his grace (1 Cor. 1:26 f.; 2 Cor. 1:12).

3. Practically wherever it occurs in the NT mystērion is found with vbs. denoting → revelation or → proclamation, i.e. mystērion is that which is revealed (cf. TDNT IV 819). It is a present-day secret, not some isolated fact from the past which merely needs to be noted, but something dynamic and compelling.

This is vividly expressed in Col. By his office the apostle "fulfils" (Col. 1:26) "the mystery of Christ" (4:3), i.e. by bearing in his own body that which is still lacking in the afflictions of Christ (1:24), he gives practical expression to the "mystery" and carries it on towards its final consummation. The riches of the mystery (1:27) are summed up as Christos en hymin, "Christ in you", i.e. the world-wide church with Christ as its → head, having reconciled the whole universe and the whole of mankind through his death (1:18, 20). This was concealed from earlier generations (1:26), but now men specially set apart are entrusted with the task of proclaiming it to all (1:28), that as perfect men (teleioi) all may share in the power of the first-born from the dead (1:18) and be incorporated into his resurrection body (1:28).

In Eph. too the mystery of Christ is essentially the fact that through Christ the Gentiles have been given access to the Father of all creation (Eph. 3:15; cf. 2:18). They are members of the world-wide church of Jew and Gentile, described figuratively in Eph. 2:20 f. as a building whose head or corner-stone is the pivot of all creation (→ Rock). This was God's will before time began (3:9; cf. 1:9) and was all part of his great purpose (3:6). It was kept secret from men in the past, but now, since the time is fulfilled (1:10), God has made known his will to those who proclaim the gospel (3:8), that through them his purpose may come to fulfilment (1:9 f.). The gospel is spreading throughout the whole world but is meeting with much opposition on the way, so at the close of the first section of the epistle Paul has every reason for urging his readers to exercise patience (3:13) and for recording his own intercession on their behalf (3:14 ff.).

The only other christological passage is 1 Tim. 3:9, 16, where the mystērion tēs pisteōs ("mystery of the faith") and the tēs eusebeias mystērion ("mystery of [our] religion") both refer to the confession of Christ and his redeeming work, i.e. mystērion here is a paraphrase for a formulated confession of faith (on this hymn 3:16; → Revelation, art. epiphaneia 5 (c)).

4. The same divine economy which directs the course of history towards its predestined goal also concerns itself with the destiny of → Israel. The apostle uses a strong negative (mē genoito, "by no means!") in Rom. 11:1 to counter the suggestion that God has cast off his people, even though their hardness of heart might lend colour to the idea. Against all the dictates of reason and experience (Rom. 11:9 f., 25a), he unfolds the secret of the final acceptance of the chosen people. Israel has been stricken with blindness only for a limited period, in order that the gospel may have free course among the Gentiles and that their → fullness (art. plērōō) may come in (11:25). Believing Gentiles, knowing that they are now God's elect people, are to respond not with pride or arrogance but with reverent, adoring fear (11:20). They are also to be humbled by the fact that the Jews who at present are hard of heart will one day be saved. Truly the mystery of free → grace is unfathomable and unsurpassable (11:33 ff.)!

5. (a) In 1 Cor. 14 Paul warns against too high an estimation of speaking with tongues (→ Word, art. glōssa). In his judgment it is subordinate to preaching, for to outsiders it is not intelligible of itself and does not serve to build up the church (14:2, 16). The mysteries uttered in ecstatic, unintelligible sounds need to be interpreted (14:13), and in any case no such ecstatic experience of divine mysteries can bear comparison with love (13:2).

1 Cor. 15:51 is written in the light of the imminence of Christ's parousia (→ Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT). Paul tells the Corinthians the apocalyptic mystery the imminent day of → resurrection will dawn, when all those still living will be changed.

(b) In Eph. 5:32 mystērion refers to the allegorical sense of a verse of Scripture, Gen. 2:24 being interpreted as referring to the relationship between Christ and his church. The apostle's phrase egō de legō eis ("I take it to mean" RSV) is intended to exclude any other possible interpretations.

(c) 2 Thess. 2:7 bears an apocalyptic stamp, the context dealing with the events which are to precede the parousia. Before Christ returns, there will come a period of apostasy, in which the anthrōpos tēs anomias ("man of lawlessness"; → Antichrist) will gain the upper hand (2:3 f.). At present there is a power which hinders (katechōn) his appearing, but already the mystery of anomia ("lawlessness") is abroad and the day of Antichrist is dawning (2:7).

(d) In Rev. the mystēria similarly refer to apocalyptic events which, occurring in a time of distress, will precede the return of the Lord. The mysteries are presented in the form of OT symbols and metaphors which require interpretation. But God reveals them to his church through the mouth of the → prophets (10:7) and through the seer (17:7; cf. 1:19). The victory is his (18:2; 19:6), and this knowledge serves to comfort his church as it passes through severe affliction and persecution.

Rev. 1:20 introduces the seven letters by a reference to the "mystery" of the seven churches and their angels. As the mystery is unfolded they are enlightened as to their true standing in the eyes of God, who sees through all pretence of virtue and goodness, and they are exhorted to repent.

G. Finkenrath

The Messianic Secret

Jesus' injunctions to secrecy have been the subject of intense debate among students of the Gospels throughout the twentieth century. The controversy was initiated by William Wrede in his book Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (1901; ET The Messianic Secret, 1971). Wrede argued that the picture of Jesus presented by the Gospel of Mark portrays him as one who is deeply concerned to veil his mission, and the disciples are made to appear as recipients of revelations by him which they do not understand. However, the resurrection ends Jesus' self-concealment, and the disciples are given the commission to proclaim Jesus as messiah to the world. What was novel about Wrede's thesis was the contention that this picture of Jesus was not based on the Jesus of history; it was the product of the theological reflection of the early church. For Jesus did not think of himself as the messiah in this way; it was only after the resurrection that the church thought of this. The church, therefore, had to explain why Jesus did not speak openly about his messiahship. Wrede's reply was that the church put out the story that Jesus had indeed told the disciples of his messiahship, but that he had done it secretly and at the same time had forbidden them to tell people about it. The picture of Jesus presented by Mark is, therefore, not strictly a piece of historical reporting; it is a theological interpretation, the product of the reflection of the early church on its own Easter faith.

Albert Schweitzer concluded his survey of The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1910) with a discussion of Wrede. He saw Wrede's position as one of "thorough-going scepticism" which he contrasted with his own "thorough-going eschatology" (on Schweitzer → Present, art. The Parousia and Eschatology in the NT 1 (a)). Subsequent discussions of this subject include the introduction to The Messianic Secret by J. C. G. Greig, op. cit., vii–xxi; E. Sjöberg, Der verborgene Menschensohn in den Evangelien, 1955; P. W. Meyer, "The Problem of the Messianic Selfconsciousness of Jesus", NovT 4, 1960, 122–38; N. Perrin, "The Wredestrassen becomes the Hauptstrasse", JR 46, 1966, 296–300; G. Minette de Tillesse, Le Secret Méssianique dans l'Évangile de Marc, 1968; B. G. Powley, "The Purpose of the Messianic Secret: A Brief Survey", ExpT 80, 1968–69, 308 ff.; D. Aune, "The Problem of the Messianic Secret", NovT 11, 1969, 1–31; R. N. Longenecker, "The Messianic Secret in the Light of Recent Discoveries", EQ 41, 1969, 207–15; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Messianic Secret in Mark", TB 21, 1970, 92–117 (summarized in "The Messianic Secret in Mark", TSF Bulletin 69, 1974, 7–14). The following note is much indebted to Dunn's researches.

A focal point in Mk.'s Gospel and also in Wrede's thesis is Peter's confession of Christ, followed by the → transfiguration and the injunction: "And as they were coming down the mountain, he charged them to tell no one what they had seen, until the Son of man should have risen from the dead" (Mk. 9:9; cf. 8:30; and Wrede, op. cit., 13 ff., 252 ff.). This, Wrede claims, is not historical but the theological invention of the early church. It is further supported by the silence enjoined by Jesus on the messianic confessions of the demons (Mk. 1:23 ff., 34; 3:11 f.; cf. 5:6 f.; 9:20) and the healings (Mk. 1:43 ff.; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26), Jesus' intention to remain hidden (Mk.

7:24; 9:30 f.), and the command of the crowd to blind Bartimaeus to remain silent (Mk. 10:47 f.). Moreover, Jesus' teaching was directed to his followers for their private illumination and not the crowds (Mk. 4:34; 7:17–23; 8:31; 9:28 f., 31; 10:32 ff.; 13:3 ff.). It also accords with Jesus' method of teaching in → parables, as he explained to the disciples: "To you has been given the secret of the kingdom of God, but for those outside everything is in parables; so that they may indeed see but not perceive, and may indeed hear but not understand, lest they should turn again and be forgiven" (Mk. 4:11 f.). Dunn notes three main strands in Wrede's argument: (a) the motif in Mk. concerning the messianic secret; (b) the argument that certain elements in this motif are unhistorical, e.g. the exorcisms, which leads to the conclusion that the whole motif is the construction of Christian theology; and (c) as the raison d'être the complementary argument that belief in Jesus as the messiah was the product of the church's Easter faith, and thus that the messianic secret is an attempt to read back Jesus' messiahship into the life of Jesus.

(a) In reply to the first of these three strands Dunn contends that Wrede has narrowed too much the scope of the secrecy motif. In none of Mk.'s accounts of the miracles did any spectator conclude that Jesus was the messiah (cf. the healing of the paralytic in ch. 2 and the man with the withered arm in ch. 3). The people of Nazareth saw only the carpenter (Mk. 6:1–6). Herod thought that Jesus was John the Baptist, Elijah or a prophet (Mk. 6:14 f.; cf. 8:28). The Pharisees attributed his works not to the → Spirit but to Beelzebul (Mk. 3:22; → Satan). Moreover, the only person healed by Jesus who hailed him in messianic terms was not silenced by Jesus (Mk. 10:46 ff.). Dunn suggests that Jesus' injunctions to silence were motivated by a variety of reasons, including concern for the individual being healed (Mk. 1:44; 5:40; 7:33; 8:22, 26; 9:25), a desire to discourage misleading ideas, and perhaps a strong sense that his destiny was completely in the hands of God.

Whilst the → kingdom is bound up with the status and ministry of Jesus, the purpose of the parables is wider than the messianic secret (cf. Mk. 4:11, 34). To those outside everything is taught in parables. The parable in Mk. 7:17 concerns not messiahship but inward cleanliness. Moreover, if Mk. 4:11 (which implies the illumination of the disciples) is interpreted in the light of the messianic secret, it stands in conflict with the incomprehension of the disciples of the messianic secret in Mk. 9:32. The disciples show their incomprehension about other matters, such as Jesus' teaching on marriage and divorce (Mk. 10:10). Dunn comments: "Bearing in mind this diversity in the situations which demonstrate the disciples' obtuseness, it is more plausible to recognize in the motif a historical reminiscence of the very natural and unexceptional slowness of unlettered men whose rigid and closed system of thought made it difficult for them to adjust to new teaching. It was not simply the difficulty of coping with new information, but the impossibility of trying to assimilate that new information into a system of thought and reference which had no place for such information. . . . This then is my first criticism of Wrede's thesis: that it fails to do justice to the full scope of the secrecy motif in Mark. The secrecy motif is more complicated than Wrede allowed. And since those passages which give his thesis credibility are only part of a larger whole, it suggests that there is more to Mark's picture of Jesus at this point than the hypothesis of the Messianic secret allows – a 'more' which puts a question mark against that hypothesis" (TB 21, 96, 98).

(b) Counterbalancing the secret motif in Mk., there is what might be called the publicity motif. After the first exorcism “his reputation spread everywhere through all the surrounding Galilean countryside” (Mk. 1:28). Following the healing of the leper people came from all around (Mk. 1:45). Other instances may be found in Mk. 3:20; 5:19 f.; 6:2 f., 14 ff., 31; 7:24; 8:28. Although the crowd rebuked Bartimaeus, Jesus did not do so when he called him the son of David (Mk. 10:46 ff.; cf. 12:35 ff.). Although secrecy and privacy are attached to some healings (Mk. 5:37 ff.; 7:31–37; 8:22–26), Jesus healed in full view the paralytic, the man with the withered arm and Bartimaeus (Mk. 2:12; 3:3 ff.; 10:52). Despite the injunction to silence, Mk. records how the news of Jesus’ actions was broadcast far and wide (Mk. 1:25–28, 43 ff.; 7:36 f.). Summing up this aspect of Mk., Dunn comments: “If the Messianic secret motif was added to explain why Jesus was not recognized as Messiah, and part of that motif is the command to demons and men not to tell of their cures, I am at a loss to understand what Mark was trying to achieve by adding or at least retaining the publicity sequel. For the whole point of these passages is that the secret commanded was not kept. The commands to silence failed, and the so-called attempt to keep His Messiahship secret also failed. If the Messianic secret was a Markan theory, then these publicity passages are the reductio ad absurdum of that theory. This publicity motif may not simply be dismissed as though it left the theory of the Messianic secret unaffected. On the contrary, it shows that at most we can speak of a Messianic misunderstanding, but hardly of a Messianic secret” (TB 21, 1970, 100).

In addition to the publicity which surrounded Jesus’ exorcisms and healings, Mk. draws attention to the dimensions of revelation which are intrinsic to Jesus’ ministry: his claim to be able to forgive sins (Mk. 2:10), to have a mission to call sinners (Mk. 2:17), to be Lord of the → sabbath (Mk. 2:28), to be the one who binds the strong man (Mk. 3:27); that loyalty to him will be the criterion in the judgment (Mk. 8:38); his teaching about the true nature of messiahship (Mk. 8:31 ff.; 9:31 f.; 10:32 ff., 45; 14:22–25); the way in which Jesus brings God’s mystery to men (Mk. 4:34; 7:17–23; 8:15–21, 27–33; 9:30 ff.; 10:32 ff.; cf. 5:37; 9:2; 13:3 f.). In Mk. 12:12 the priests and lawyers recognize that Jesus’ teaching about the stone which the builders rejected was directed against them (→ Rock). The centurion confesses that Jesus was a (or even the) Son of God (Mk. 15:39).

(c) Wrede maintained that Jesus did not think of himself as the messiah, and that the idea was the product of the theological reflection of the early church. But there are incidents in Mk. which cannot be explained away and which show not only that Jesus thought of himself in these terms but that others also thought of him in this way.

Commenting on the feeding of the five thousand (Mk. 6:30–44; cf. 8:1–21), J. C. O’Neill draws attention to its possible significance to contemporaries: “We may suppose that some extraordinary event will lie behind such a miraculous narrative . . . it remains true that if Jesus did preside at a communal meal in the desert places of Galilee and Judaea, this would have a peculiar significance to his contemporaries. They would perhaps remember that Moses by praying to God was able to feed the people with manna and quail in the desert; they would perhaps be reminded of the promise that the desert would again be fruitful; and they would think of the shepherd King as they were given food in the barren places (cf. Pss. of Sol. xvii. 45). The Qumran desert community placed great emphasis on communal meals, and looked forward to the time when the Messiah of Aaron would preside and the Messiah of Israel, whom God had begotten among them, would come (IQSa ii. 11–22)” (“The Silence of Jesus”, NTS 15, 1968–69, 163 f.). Dunn relates the hurried departure of Jesus following the feeding to Jn. 6:14 f., and interprets it as an attempt by Jesus to forestall the messianic enthusiasm of the crowd who want to make Jesus king by acclamation (op. cit., 102). He also sees Jesus’ resorting to prayer (Mk. 6:46; cf. 1:35, 38; 14:35 f.) as an expression of Jesus’ awareness of his messiahship and the need to fulfil it in accordance with the Father’s will and not that of the people.

Peter’s confession of Christ (Mk. 8:27–30) has obvious messianic implications. Clearly, advocates of Wrede’s thesis need to explain it away as unhistorical, for the event implies conscious acceptance of messiahship both by Jesus himself and by Peter as the spokesman for the disciples. But there are strong indications within the account which favour its historicity (cf. Dunn, op. cit., 103–6). It is located in the region of Caesarea Philippi. None of the traditional resurrection appearances took place so far north, which suggests that it is unlikely to be a post-resurrection story which somehow got transferred to the earthly ministry of Jesus. The use of the title Christ is messianic (→ Jesus Christ, art. Christos). Its use by a disciple is unique. At the same time the disciple is addressed as → Satan, an event which would be highly improbable, if it had not actually happened. The insertion of the words kai idōn tous mathētas autou (“and seeing his disciples”, v. 33) may well suggest an authentic reminiscence. In v. 31 Mk. records how Jesus “began to teach [ērxato didaskein]”, which is not a normal Marcan Semitism but an indication of the particular point in his ministry when, for the first time, a repeated teaching is given (cf. W. Grundmann, Das Evangelium nach Markus, Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament 3, 1959², 167).

A third incident which has the stamp of authenticity and which has clear messianic implication is Jesus’ triumphal entry into Jerusalem on the first Palm Sunday (Mk. 11:1–11; cf. Zech. 9:9). This was clearly pre-Easter, and the cries of Hosanna reinforce the messianic connotation (→ Amen, art. hōsanna).

All four Gospels record how Jesus at his trial was found guilty of claiming to be King of the Jews (Matt. 27:37; Mk. 15:26; Lk. 23:38; Jn. 19:19). The title is repeated in Mk. 15:2, 9, 12, 26, 32. Alongside of this are Jesus’ sayings about the → temple (Mk. 14:58; 15:29; Matt. 26:61; 27:40; Jn. 2:19; Acts 6:14). The building of the temple belonged to the messianic age (Eth. Enoch 90:29; 2 Esd. 9:38–10:27; cf. Ezek. 40–48; Jub. 1:17, 27 f.; 2 Sam. 7:12 ff.). The messianic implication of Jesus’ sayings about the temple was seized upon by the high priest at Jesus’ trial, when he asked; “Are you the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?” (Mk. 15:61). Mk. records the reply: “And Jesus said, ‘I am; and you will see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven’ ” (v. 62).

If these events are historical, and there are good grounds for thinking that they are, their messianic associations are not the product of post-resurrection theology but are intrinsic to the events themselves. The account of the feeding of the five thousand shows that in Galilee at least there was a popular, political, messianic conception. Jesus did not respond to it – not because he was not conscious of his messiahship – but because he wished to avoid the wrong kind of messiahship. Similarly, he reacted to Peter’s advice at Caesarea Philippi, not because he was not the messiah but because Peter had false notions of messiahship. The entry into Jerusalem was an enacted parable concerning the nature of Jesus’ messiahship. This explains why the political overtones are absent. The prophecy of Zech. 9:9 is not directly referred to. The king comes to his capital, not as the leader of an uprising but as one who seeks peace. Similarly, there are messianic overtones at the trial of Jesus, but at the same time Jesus avoids political connotations. He replied to the question of the high priest: sy eipas hoti egō eimi (lit. "You say that I am"). Dunn is inclined to favour this longer version, and paraphrases it: "You could put it that way" (op. cit., 111).

Jesus firmly believed himself to be the messiah, but sought to avoid misconceptions, and this is the reason why so often he enjoined silence. "The claims He made to Messiahship and Messianic authority were of a parabolic sort whose significance was there, plain for all to see whose eyes were not blinded and whose ears were not clogged by misconceptions (8:17–21)" (J. D. G. Dunn, op. cit., 112). Dunn sees this reinforced by three further aspects of Mk. (i) The teaching on authority in Mk. (especially Mk. 2:1–3:6) is not explicitly messianic, but has messianic overtones. (ii) All Jesus' teaching had a parabolic quality, so that all who had ears to hear could hear (cf. Mk. 4:9). (iii) Jesus' choice of the term → Son of man was capable of concealing as well as revealing. On the one hand, it could be simply a circumlocution for "I". But on the other hand, it had also strong links with the Danielic Son of man (Dn. 7). "No term was more fitted both to conceal, yet at the same time to reveal to those who had ears to hear, the Son of Man's real identity" (M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts, 1967³, 329).

R. N. Longenecker has noted parallels between the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels, the Qumran Teacher of Righteousness and Simeon ben Kosebah (Bar Kokhba). In each case there was an external exclamation, a reticence on the part of the individual concerned to speak of himself in terms used by others, and at the same time a consciousness of the ultimate validity of the titles employed (EQ 41, 1969, 207–15). In none of these cases is there a "messianic secret" theology. Rather, the reticence is to be attributed to the Jewish view that no man can be defined as a messiah before he has accomplished the task of the anointed. If this is so, then Jesus was indeed the messiah during his earthly life. But only with the cross, resurrection and exaltation could he enter into the fullness of his messianic office and be properly understood as messiah by men. And it is for this reason that the messianic titles and messianic claims became widespread and explicit in the post-Easter period. C. Brown → Baptism, → Gospel, → Jesus Christ, → Lord's Supper, → Parable, → Son

(a). D. Aune, "The Problem of the Messianic Secret", NovT 11, 1969, 1–31; G. H. Boobyer, "The Secrecy Motif in St Mark's Gospel", NTS 6, 1959–60, 225–35; G. Bornkamm, mysterion, myeō, TDNT IV 802–28; J. W. Bowker, "Mystery and Parables in Mark: Mark iv. 1–20", JTS New Series 25, 1974, 300–17; W. J. P. Boyd, "The Mystery of God and Revelation", SJT 13, 1960, 178–82; R. E. Brown, "The Semitic Background of the New Testament Mystery", Biblica 39, 1958, 426–58; and ibid. 40, 70–87; T. A. Burkill, "The Injunctions to Silence in St. Mark's Gospel", ThZ 12, 1956, 585–604; and "Concerning St. Mark's Conception of Secrecy", Hibbert Journal 55, 1956–57, 150–58; A. W. Carr, "The Rulers of this Age – I Corinthians ii 6–8", NTS 23, 1976, 20–35; J. D. G. Dunn, "The Messianic Secret in Mark", TB 21, 92–117 (summarized in "The Messianic Secret in Mark", TSF Bulletin 69, 1974, 7–14); J. Coppens, "Mystery in the Theology of Saint Paul and its Parallels at Qumran", in J. Murphy-O'Connor, ed., Paul and Qumran: Studies in New Testament Exegesis, 1968, 132–58; F. Gavin, The Jewish Antecedents of the Christian Sacraments, 1969; R. M. Grant, Hellenistic Religions: The Age of Syncretism, 1953; L. E. Keck, "Mark 3 7–12 and Mark's Christology", JBL 84, 1965, 341 ff.; J. W. Leitch, "The Injunctions to Silence in Mark's Gospel", ExpT 66, 1954–55, 178–82;

.. N. Longenecker, "The Messianic Secret in the Light of Recent Discoveries", EQ 41, 1969, 207–15; W. Manson, "Realized Eschatology and the Messianic Secret", in D. E. Nineham, ed., Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot, 1955, 209–22; B. M. Metzger, Index to the Periodical Literature on Christ and the Gospels, New Testament Tools and Studies 6, 1966, 139 f. (for journal articles prior to 1966 on the messianic secret); P. W. Meyer, "The Problem of the Messianic Selfconsciousness of Jesus", NovT 4, 1960, 122–38; "Messianic Secret and Messianic Didache in Mark's Gospel", Oikonomia, 1966, 57 ff.; N. Perrin, "The Wredestrasse becomes the Hauptstrasse", R 46, 1966, 296–300; B. G. Powley, "The Purpose of the Messianic Secret: A Brief Survey", ExpT 80, 968–69, 308 ff.; K. Prümm, "Mystery", EBT II 598–611; H. Rahner, Greek Myths and Christian Mystery, 1963; M. Smith, The Secret Gospel, 1974 (on this see F. F. Bruce, The Secret Gospel of Mark, 974; ExpT 86, 1974–75, 130 ff.; and Q. Quesnell, "The Mar Saba Clementine: A Question of Evidence", CBQ 37, 1975, 48–67); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, (1910) 1954³, 328–95; V. Taylor, "The Messianic Secret in Mark: A Rejoinder to the Rev. Dr. T. A. Burkill", Hibbert Journal 55, 1956–57, 241–48; G. Vagner, Pauline Baptism and the Pagan Mysteries: The Problem of the Doctrine of Pauline Baptism in Romans VI. 1–11, in the Light of its Religio-Historical "Parallels", 1967 (see pp. 299–316 for literature relevant to Christian origins and the mystery religions).

3). L.-M. Dewailly, "Mystère et Silence dans Rom. xvi. 25", NTS 14, 1967–68, 111–18; E. Fuchs, Das Sakrament im Lichte der neueren Exegese, Schriftenreihe der Kirchlich-Theologischen Societät in Würtemberg 1, no date; R. Follet, "Mystères", Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément VI, 1958, 1–225; G. Gnülka, "Mysterium", LTK VII 727 ff.; G. Haufe, "Die Mysterien", in J. Leipoldt and W. Brundmann, eds., Umwelt des Urchristentums, I, 1965, 101 ff.; N. Johanssen, to mysterion tēs basileias ou theou, Svensk teologisk Kvartalskrift 16, 1940, 3–38; E. Jünger, "Das Sakrament – Was ist das?", NT 26, 1966, 320 ff.; K. Koch, "Die Apokalyptik und ihre Zukunftserwartungen", Kontexte, III, 1966, 51 ff.; H. Krämer, "Zur Wortbedeutung 'Mytheria'", WuD Neue Folge 6, 1959, 121 ff.; J. Leipoldt, "Mysterien", *RGG*³ IV 1255 ff.; W. Luz, "Das Geheimnistmotiv und die markanische Christologie", ZNW 56, 1965, 9–30; M. P. Nilsson, Die Religion der Griechen, 1927; R. Reitzenstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, 1927²; B. Rigaux, "Révélation des Mystères et Perfection à Qumrân et dans le Nouveau Testament", NTS 4, 1958, 237–62; J. Schneider, "'Mysterion' im Neuen Testament", ThStKr 104, 1932, 255 ff.; G. Strecker, "Zur Messiasgeheimnis im Marcus", StudEv, III, 961, 87 ff.; E. Schweizer, "Zur Frage des Messiasgeheimnis bei Markus", ZNW 56, 1965, 1 ff.; E. Jöberg, Der verborgene Menschensohn in den Evangelien, 1955; G. Minette de Tillesse, Le Secret Messianique dans l'Évangile de Marc, 1968; N. Turchi, Fontes Historiae Mysteriorum Aevi Hellenistici, Collezione Graphe 3, 1923; E. Vogt, "'Mysteria' in Textibus Qumran", Biblica 37, 1956, 47 ff.

see, Vision, Eye

ὄραω

ὄραω (horaō), see; ὄρατός (horatos), visible; ἀόρατος (ahoratos), invisible; ὄραμα (horama), sight, vision; ὄρασις (optasia), vision; ἐποπτεύω (epopteuō), observe; καθοράω (kathoraō), look at; προοράω (prohoraō), foresee; βλέπω (blepō), see; θεάομαι (theaomai), behold; θεωρέω (theoreō), watch; ὀφθαλμός (ophthalmos), eye.

1. (a) The vb. horaō, see, is only found in this form in the pres. and perf. act. The fut. act. opsomai and the aor. pass. ophthēn are derived from the stem op-, and the aor. act. eidon from the stem id-. The vb. is common from Homer onwards and in the act. means to see, look, perceive, observe (Homer, Od. 4, 540). But it is found more often (with the prep. eis) meaning to look towards something or (with the acc.) to see something. Aesch. also uses it in the mid.

(b) Already by Homer's time it had the meaning of to conceive or experience, and even be present at or participate. In a fig. sense it means to understand, recognize, consider, attend to (Thuc., 5, 27).

(c) From the pass. used with an intrans. sense it came to mean to appear, become visible (cf. the aor. pass. ōphthēn). In Soph. it means roughly “you will surely see i.e. be shown. The pass. use is absent in Homer.

(d) The verbal adj. horatos (Hippocrates onwards) and the later negative form ahoratos (by the time of Polyb. and Isoc.) mean visible and invisible respectively (the invisible world, the invisible God, etc.).

(e) Three important nouns are formed from horaō. (i) horasis (Aristot. onward) synonymous with opsis, designates on the one hand the capacity to see, the organ of sight, also the whole face (Plut., Mor. 88D), and on the other hand that which is seen, the view, spectacle. It is also used with reference to the supernatural. (ii) horar (Xen. and Aristot. onwards) means that which is seen, view, sight, vision, and so the effect on the viewer; that which is seen can assure and empower. (iii) optas derived from the stem op-, is close to horama in meaning.

(f) Compound vbs. include: (i) prohoraō (Hdt. onwards) has the sense of foresee the future, see something which one has seen before, or (mid.) which one sees in front of oneself; (ii) kathoraō and epopteuō (Homer onwards) both mean to look at, regard, observe (for demonstrative and imperative forms derived from the roots ka- and id- see NT 1 (h)).

2. The noun ophthalmos, eye, is derived from the root op-, and has been used abundantly from Homer onwards. It is not simply synonymous with omma, which also means eye, but has a more specialized use (in Homer, Aesch., Pindar, etc., fa- in Pindar, Plato, etc., in the poetic sense of the eye of heaven, the sun and the moon as also expressing the ideas of light, well-being and that which brings comfort).

(a) In general the ophthalmos, eye, is the highest means of contact with the world around. It is the organ of perception. Gk. sagas (cf. Lucian) continually mention many-eyed beings, e.g. Argus with his 100 eyes.

(b) Figuratively it means that which is dearest and most loved (cf. the apple of the eye).

(c) At the same time the eye is generally associated with man's relation to God, his fellow men and the world around. In Gk. the “eye of the soul” gains insight into the cosmos (see further below). Moral concepts are associated with the eye (so Soph., to look covetously, to cast jealous glances). In Aesch. and Soph. it is used in the sense of being awake or guarding oneself. Sometimes the eyes were associated with tasks and qualities.

3. blepō, see (Pindar onwards), possesses some tenses not attested for horaō. As a rule it is near to horaō in meaning, but gradually it replaced it. Where it can be distinguished from horaō, it relates to that which strikes the eye, that which faces the viewer, the front. Originally it applied only to the function of the eyes, seeing, looking, watching (with the acc. of the thing seen). Thence it came to mean to look at, view, look into, and also give heed to, pay attention to something. Figuratively it can mean observe, notice.

4. theaomai (Homer onwards) is derived from thea, seeing (cf. theatēs, view and → theatron, cf. Eng. “theatre”; found in Thuc. and Plato), and means view, behold, watch. theōreō (Aesch. onwards), also watch, look at something, is used absolutely or with the acc. (Aesch. Prometheus Bound 304) and has the fig. meaning of reflect on, notice, understand, comprehend, and in the pass. means become visible or be looked at.

5. (a) The vbs. of seeing or beholding in Gk. have religious and philosophical significance, for Gk. religion, like that of antiquity in general, was a religion of seeing. In contrast to Judaism, the rôle of hearing is subordinate to that of seeing. "The Greeks were 'a people of the eye'" (W. Michaelis, TDNT V 319). Seeing was an integral part of their religion.

(b) Insight into the cosmic order and the rationale of this world was understood religiously. That applied both to the world on the grand scale, in the sense of the macrocosm, and to the world on a small scale, in the sense of the microcosm. The eye of the soul" is particularly significant here.

(c) The actions of men were governed by this insight into the cosmos. In Plato god is more an object than a subject and being seen is predicated of him. Plato arrives at the concept of the vision of the ideas (cf., e.g., Meno; Rep.; → Form, art. idos CL). The word idea, appearance, image, derived from idein (Pindar onwards), takes on a philosophical sense and means the knowledge of supernatural things achieved by the spirit: pattern, idea, essence (so in Plato, Aristot., Plut.).

(d) In general deity is regarded as invisible (cf. Hellenistic Gnosticism). Yet from Homer onwards we find the notion that the gods are visible. This happens in human form (anthropomorphism). The gods often go around in bodily form. They "appear" in human disguise, and have human qualities and propensities. But in general their invisibility is still emphasized. The "vision of god" serves as the way to be like the immortals, to become assimilated to the gods.

ⲓⲥ horaō with its 2nd aor. eidon occurs some 1450 times in the LXX. The most important Heb. equivalents are rā'âh and hâzâh, which have a rather wider meaning than horaō. horaō can even mean to select (Deut. 12:13), yet horaō corresponds to them fairly closely (cf. learn, find, as in Gen. 18:21; 22:8).

1. (a) Generally horaō means see with one's own eye, become aware (Gen. 27:1).

(b) Figuratively it comes to be used of intellectual or spiritual perception: notice, become conscious (Ps. 34[33]:8[9]); or of what man experiences or suffers (seeing death, Ps. 89[88]:48[49]). It also means to regard (misfortune, Ps. 106[105]:44), attend to, know or have experienced (Deut. 11:2), or be concerned about something (Gen. 37:14; Isa. 5:12). Seeing in the Gk. and Heb. OT can refer also to perception by means of other senses, e.g. hearing (Jer. 33:24) or understanding (1 Sam. 12:17; 1 Ki. 20[21]:7). In the pass. it is used for letting oneself be seen, having something shown to one or experiencing it. Here the idea is of true perception in contrast to figments of the imagination (phantasma). God let himself be seen, disclosed, showed or revealed in visions (horama). Through this action the one who sees as well as the nearer is encouraged or commissioned (Gen. 15:1; 46:2; where God speaks through visions).

(c) Furthermore, seeing can refer to prophetic perception. Prophetic seeing, which sometimes assumes the character of a vision, is frequently attested in the OT. Hence the → prophet can also be designated a seer (Heb. hōzeh; LXX horōn; 1 Chr. 21:9; 2 Chr. 9:29). The seer's visions generally have a twofold reference. On the one hand, they refer to the thing seen, the vision (horama) or the appearance of the vision (Exod. 3:3; Dan. 7:1). On the other hand, they show the effect on the seer. He is encouraged, chosen, shocked, pardoned (Gen. 15:1; Dan. 7:13). This prophetic vision involves primarily a → revelation of God and his word, and only then a visual impact: God lets it be known what he wants or what he is going to do and “shows” someone whom he has chosen for this purpose.

(d) It is simply assumed in the OT that God sees and watches man. He sees justice (Lam. 3:34 ff.), the death of his prophet (2 Chr. 24:22), the distress of his (Exod. 3:7). He looks for faithfulness (Ps. 101[100]:6) and for trust (Jer. 5:3). He also has his eyes on the sinful kingdom (Amos 9:8). Man cannot hide (139[138]:3, 7, 16). God sees into his innermost being (1 Sam. 16:7).

2. (a) Even though the OT speaks of God’s becoming visible in visions, yet it must be clear that there is no sign in it of inquisitive speculation into God’s form. The statements on the theophanies of the OT are not unanimous in this respect. God appears to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Moses (Num. 12:8) face to → face and in human form. “As a matter of fact Jahweh was always thought of as having human form, like that of a man” (G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, I, 1962, 219-220, 145). Several passages extend this bodily imagery (Gen. 3:8; Exod. 33:23; Amos 9:11 ff.; Isa. 6:1 ff.). These anthropomorphic modes of manifestation show how man is used to recognize and understand God’s nature, and how he conceived of it. “In place of a cosmic-mythical occurrence in the Babylonian epiphanies there is in the OT a historical one. Yahweh appears in order to help his people and to destroy their foes” (C. Westermann, The Praise of God in the Psalms, 1966, 96). Fire, clouds, etc., are mentioned as important elements in these manifestations.

(b) In the theophany God’s kābôd, weight, splendour, → glory (which is translated in the Gk. by doxa, authority, glory) was revealed and seen by men (Ezek. 1:1; Exod. 33:18; Num. 14:22). Heaven opens (Ezek. 1:1), the transcendent breakthrough and is visible. Supernatural brightness (Hab. 3:4; Pss. 18:12[13]; 50:2), likeness of sunrise (Hos. 6:3), storm and tempest (Job 38:1; Nah. 1:3) are mentioned as concomitant phenomena for God’s presence.

(c) prosôpon, → face, means in the context of the theophanies the very person of God and not just that side of him that is turned towards men. It reveals something of God’s nature (Gen. 32:30 f.). The parts of God’s form that are mentioned (the ear and hand) illustrate his faithfulness and care. It is significant that qualities those attributed to the Gk. gods (like sexuality) are not ascribed to God in the OT. Rather the OT seeks to disclose God’s nature, but not to provide any concrete visual images of him.

(d) On the other hand, God’s holiness and majesty prevent man from seeing God’s face. Man’s consciousness of guilt leads to a consciousness of distance (Isa. 6:5). God’s glory would slay man (cf. Exod. 33:20; and Gideon’s lament, “I have seen the angel of the LORD face to face”, Jdg. 6:22).

(e) The OT epiphanies express God’s partnership. Biblical man sees himself as God’s creature and at the same time knows himself to be called as a partner. The God is one who meets us and consorts with us and is known as such. “The content of the knowledge which Scripture imparts to us is therefore moulded by God’s dealings with men” (H. M. Kuitert, Gott in Menschengestalt, 1967, 237). G. von Rad argues from this that in the biblical view God is not anthropomorphic, but merely anthropomorphic (cf. op. cit., 145).

(f) Eschatological vision. In the OT’s message the future constantly reappears in the prophetic vision discussed above under 1 (c). In view are the coming redemption of the conquest of enemies and the establishment of God’s kingdom (1 Chr. 29:11;

:28 f.; Isa. 11:6 f.; 57:19). The goal is to see God face to face (Ps. 42:2[3]), rhaps in the future life. However, this last point is not unambiguously attested in OT (cf. Ps. 17:15; → Resurrection OT). The promise of Matt. 5:8 and the confident assertion of 1 Jn. 3:2 have no direct OT parallels.

3. In late Judaism seeing gave way to hearing. In Philo this group of words took a spiritualized meaning (cf. TDNT V 334–38). Seeing is frequently separated from the grasping of sense-perceptions (Leg. All. 3, 100–103). Besides the general meaning of to know, horaō and its derivatives can mean to obtain knowledge, and so occasionally to see God. Philo held that the world (creation) should lead to a knowledge of God (Spec. Leg. 1 20, 32–35; cf. Rom. 1:20, kathoraō; → Revelation, t. Revelation in Contemporary Theology 2 (a)).

1. Survey of the Terms. This group of words occurs frequently in the NT: horaō and the fut. opsomai occur c. 110 times, the aor. eidon 336 times, blepō 132 times. Generally they are used in the same sense as in secular Gk. and the OT. Their uses that fall into these categories (see above CL and OT) will be only summarily discussed here.

(a) horaō, opsomai and eidon generally mean see, perceive (Matt. 28:27; Mk. 16:7; Jn. 16:16 f.). These vbs. can be used figuratively for perceiving, recalling, ascertaining, realizing (e.g. Matt. 13:14) and for a vision of the spirit or intellect (Lk. 2:30, seeing salvation; cf. 1 Cor. 2:9; seeing visions or appearances, Acts 2:17; 26:16).

(b) blepō in general simply refers to the capacity to see, of sense-perception (Matt. 23:22; Lk. 7:21). Otherwise it can mean to watch, look at, look into (Matt. 5:28; ev. 5:3 f.). It also represents intellectual functions like attending, paying attention to (Mk. 13:33; 1 Cor. 1:26), heeding something (2 Cor. 10:7), or being careful. Figuratively it can mean to perceive or observe (Rom. 7:23, Heb. 2:9). The NT does not use blepō to say that God is seen (TDNT V 343 f.).

(c) The verbal adjs. horatos and ahoratos mean visible and invisible respectively. They are used to emphasize God's invisibility (Col. 1:15 f.; Rom. 1:20; 1 Tim. 1:17).

(d) The nouns horasis, horama and optasia are used in the same sense as in the NT.

horasis means appearance (Rev. 4:3) or vision (Acts 2:17; Rev. 9:17) and horama the thing seen, the vision (Matt. 17:9; Acts 18:9) and also the vision seen in a dream (Acts 16:9). Continuing in line with the OT, the NT represents its effects on the visionary as pardoning, encouraging, commissioning (Acts 10:3; 9:10, 12; cf. Terms, Vis. 3, 10, 6).

optasia, the appearance of the vision, that which God lets man see, is found in Lk. 24:22; 24:23 of the appearances of → angels, and in 2 Cor. 12:1 probably of ecstatic experiences (cf. W. Michaelis, TDNT V 353, 357, 373).

(e) Compounds include the following. (i) prohoraō can mean to foresee, referring to the future (Acts 2:31; Gal. 3:8), but it can also mean to see something previously (Acts 21:29). (ii) kathoraō means to perceive, and in Rom. 1:20 it refers to the invisible, which is perceived in the external and visible (“His [God's] invisible nature is perceived with the eye of reason in the things that have been made”, Arndt, 392; but → God, art. theos NT 4 (b); → Revelation, art. Revelation in Contemporary Theology 2 (a)). (iii) epopteuō, to look at, is used in 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:2 with reference to the Christian's manner of life which the Gentiles notice.

(f) theaomai means in its various contexts to visit (Rom. 15:24), to look at (Mt. 22:11), and to notice something (Lk. 23:55).

theōreō, look at, behold, but also experience (Matt. 27:55; Lk. 14:29), is found of intellectual seeing (Jn. 4:19; Acts 4:13). In the pass. it means become ble.

The pres. part. of optanomai, a hapax legomenon in the NT, refers in Acts 1: the appearances of the risen Christ.

(g) ophthalmos, eye (cf. CL 2), is used some 100 times in the NT, whereas the is mentioned only 36 times. Besides the usage mentioned in CL, which is continue the NT, it is also now used more often with moral concepts, especially in the Syrtic Gospels (38 times; Acts 6 times): to look enviously (Matt. 20:15; Mk. 7:22) or genuinely or evilly (Matt. 6:22 f.). It can be the occasion of taking offence or inci to sin (Matt. 5:29; 2 Pet. 2:14; Jn. 2:16;).

It is also the organ of understanding and knowing. Eph. 1:18 speaks of the ey the heart. Very rarely, however, does the NT refer to God's eyes (1 Pet. 3:12; F 4:13; cf. 1 Clem. 22:6).

(h) The use, especially in the Synoptic Gospels, of idou or kai idou, "see!", "see!" (adapted from the OT and not found in secular Gk.), is also noteworthy. It is used to attract attention at the beginning of a conversation (Mk. 3:32; 10:28), generally draw attention to something. Matt. and Mk. also use it with a predicate to advertise something surprising or new (Matt. 12:2; Mk. 2:24). The formulation occurs in the context of the proclamation of salvation (Lk. 2:34; Jn. 1:29, "See, th is the Lamb of God"). At other times it draws attention to the fulfilment of the promise (Matt. 12:41; Mk. 14:41 f.; Jn. 4:35), and gives assurance of the fulfilment of that which has been announced (Mk. 10:33; Jn. 16:32). The varied usage shc that idou and kai idou are not only demonstrative or stylistic additions. They serv kerygmatic purpose, addressing the hearer, before whose eyes (kat' ophthalmous) message is proclaimed (cf. P. Fiedler, Die Formel "und siehe" im Neuen Testam 1969).

2. The Johannine Concept of Seeing. In Jn. the vbs. of seeing take on a spe significance. He loves to use horaō for that which the pre-existent Son saw when was with his Father (Jn. 3:11, 32; 6:46; 8:38). theaomai is used of seeing Jes doxa, → glory (Jn. 1:14) and the → Spirit descending (1:32).

(a) Jn. uses the vbs. of seeing in a threefold sense (R. Bultmann, The Gospel John, 1971, 69, n. 2).

(i) They are used in connexion with the "perception of earthly things and happ ings accessible to all men" (Jn. 1:38, 47; 9:8 of things, people, etc.).

(ii) They denote the "perception of supernatural things and events" which o certain men enjoy. Hence, John the Baptist sees the Spirit descending in the form c dove (Jn. 1:32 ff.); this is nevertheless still a physical seeing.

(iii) Jn. also thinks of seeing as the perception of an event of → revelation. Yet t is no mystical inner vision, still less a Platonic vision of the forms, but a spiritual : of seeing, the sight of faith (so Bultmann, ibid., n. 4). The disciples see the Son's glk (1:14), which is also revealed to them in his signs (2:11; → Miracle, art. sēmeio

The real nature of the Son, his doxa, is disclosed to faith. That which in the C was proclaimed and only appeared symbolically now becomes historical reality the incarnate → word. Faith, discerning it through hearing and seeing, responds the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. It also discerns Jesus Christ's doxa in the signs (1:11). The non-believer does not discern it. Spiritual blindness is shown up by Jesus' signs and men must answer for it. Faith's seeing is illustrated in Jn. 6:40. The believer perceives in the Son the → Father who sent him (12:45; 14:9). He who sees the Son also sees the Father.

(b) Although the seer is only occasionally important in the NT (cf. Jn. on Patmos, Rev. 1:9), there is a stronger emphasis in the Johannine literature on the eyewitness ieōrakōs, Jn. 19:35). His testimony is valid (1 Jn. 1:11).

(c) Jesus' own seeing is important in the event of revelation (Jn. 12:45; 14:9). He sees the Father (1:18). This is characteristic of Jesus' special relationship to him and is the basis of his message. He sees what is in man and discloses it. He sees Nathanael under the → fig-tree (1:48) and the thoughts and inner nature of man (2:25).

(d) Hearing and seeing can be used interchangeably in relation to → faith (cf. Jn. 8:24; 8:45; with 5:39; 6:40), and the concept of zōē aiōnios, eternal → life, is associated with seeing. Seeing as well as hearing again and again provide the impetus to faith (2:11; 20:8), lead to knowledge (14:9), and minister to inner perception ("I see that you are a prophet", 4:19). Faith recognizes the coming messiah. Here we have a situation involving decision. Seeing is thus as a whole an existential encounter with Jesus. But faith based on seeing has no advantage. Jesus expects faith without seeing (20:29).

3. The Theological Meaning of these Words in the Rest of the NT. (a) "The sensual organs (ears) are not just symbols for the organs of spiritual perception; in them here actually takes place true hearing of God's summons" (J. Horst, TDNT V 557). What is there applied only to the ear also applies to spiritual seeing in the NT.

(b) Spiritual perception as a function of seeing comes to mean make the acquaintance of (Lk. 23:8), meet (Acts 20:25), watch or look out for (Mk. 13:33; Phil. 3:2). Spiritual seeing is at the same time an experience (Lk. 2:26; Jn. 8:51) or the conceiving of or experiencing of God's love (1 Jn. 3:1).

(c) The idea of → foreknowledge is not very important in the language of the NT and above all is not there given a eudaemonistic interpretation.

(d) As mentioned above, God's eye is only rarely mentioned and then fig. Yet the OT idea is still found, e.g. with the vb. blepō: God sees what is hidden (Matt. 6:4) and knows what we need (Matt. 6:33).

(e) Here too seeing acquires a new perspective with reference to faith. In the Synoptics it is used to express obtaining a share in salvation (Lk. 2:26). Hence, seeing takes on the character of a decision (Matt. 21:32; Mk. 8:18); the unbeliever does not perceive (Matt. 13:13 f.; Mk. 4:12).

(f) Theophanies are not found in the NT. On the other hand, appearances of angels are mentioned in connexion with Jesus' coming (Lk. 2:13), the → temptation (Matt. 4:11), the passion (Lk. 22:43) and the → resurrection (Matt. 28:2, 5). Revelatory → dreams are mentioned only in the prefaces (Matt. 1:20; 2:13, 19). The NT knows nothing about any experiences of the risen Christ in dreams, but there are repeated accounts of visions (horama and optasia). These are given by God, who causes them to be seen (2 Cor. 12:1; Acts 9:10, 12; 10:3). Here too we find an interest both in the character of these as events and in their effect on those seeing them (cf. OT 1; NT 1 (d)).

4. For the NT God is utterly invisible (Jn. 6:46; 1 Tim. 1:17; 6:16; Col. 1:1) “God does not become visible; He is revealed” (W. Michaelis, TDNT V 369), yet → resurrection narratives especially stress that the risen Christ is visible. There he is encountered as a person. The Gospels use a rich vocabulary to describe these encounters with him in the body (Matt. 28:17; Lk. 24:31, 36 f.; Jn. 20:14–29). “In my opinion there is only one thing guaranteed by the copious use of this group of verbs in the resurrection narratives and that is that the decisive experience was primarily one of seeing and being seen” (H. Grass, Ostergeschehen und Osterberichte, 1967, 188). The risen Christ is recognized by his actions (Matt. 28; Lk. 24). The resurrection narratives describe this by means of verbs of seeing and of perception with the eyes. What is novel is the experience of the person of the risen Christ and the proof of his reality. Above all, it is Jesus who appears to the disciples and whom they recognize. That the risen Christ is seen is an event of revelation. “In all the appearances the presence of the risen Lord is a presence in transfigured corporeality” (W. Michaelis, TDNT V 359). In Jn. 20:25 the disciples come to believe through seeing the risen Christ (“We have seen the Lord”). These encounters lead to faith, commitment, to witness and to sending. For faith one needs to behold both the crucified and the risen Lord.

Paul attests that the risen Christ was seen or appeared with the aor. pass. ōphēthē (1 Cor. 15:5 ff.). The appearances are never only visual, but are always bound up with hearing the word of the risen Christ; yet hearing should not be stressed at the expense of seeing. The Easter message is summed up in Jn. 19:35: “He who has seen and has testified to it, so that you may believe.”

5. The verbs of seeing are also used in the NT with respect to the future. The promise for the future contains three essential elements: (a) the vision of God’s glory (1 Cor. 13:12); (b) seeing God’s kingly rule (King → Kingdom) (Jn. 3:3); and (c) supremely, seeing God (Matt. 5:8) and living in fellowship with him (Rev. 21:3). The angels already see God’s face (Matt. 18:10). In the time of fulfillment that is to come God is to restore that fellowship with men that has been broken by sin. He does not put himself at man’s disposal, and he does not give himself up to man’s clutches, but he does open the way to fellowship with himself. Now we still wait in faith, yet the watching community knows that “Blessed are they who are pure of heart, for they shall see God” (Matt. 5:8).

K. Dahms

κολλούριον

κολλούριον (kollourion), eye-salve.

CL The substance after which our modern English word for an eye-wash or salve, collyrium, is derived was common in ancient times. It was used for various purposes, but especially for application to the eyes. References to it are numerous, found in Gk., Lat., and rab. literature.

NT The sole use of kollourion in the NT is Rev. 3:18. Since the context is the letter to the church at Laodicea, it is assumed that the writer had especially in mind the preparation made from powdered Phrygian stone used at the medical school there. Its significance must be understood together with that of the gold, which would mind the prosperity of the city of Laodicea, and the white clothing, which contrasts with the famous black wool of that area. The three items mentioned represent a spiritual value which the church failed to realize was missing (v. 17). Apparently this as a worldly prosperous church whose members mistook both the nature and source of true well being. (On the church at Laodicea → Cold, Hot, Lukewarm NT.)

W. L. Liefeld

ἀναβλέπω

ἀναβλέπω (anablepō), look up (at), see again.

⌚ & ⓄT The two uses of the word go far back into cl. times, recovery of sight being so described as early as Herodotus (2, 111). In the LXX it almost always means simply to look up, but Is. 42:18 has the other sense, “Look [anablepsate], you blind, at you may see [idein].” Moulton-Milligan cite two occurrences in an inscription from the temple of Asclepius (p. 30).

⌚ The simple meaning, look up, is found in several passages (e.g. Mk. 16:4; Lk. 19:5; 21:1). Jesus looked up to → heaven when giving → thanks for the → bread to be multiplied for the crowd (Matt. 14:19; Mk. 6:41; Lk. 9:16) and when healing the → deaf man in Mk. 7:34. The man whose vision was restored by a double touch of Jesus looked up after the first touch (Mk. 8:24). anablepō means to see again in Jesus’ message to John the Baptist about his messianic works (Matt. 11:5; Lk. 7:22; also Mk. 10:51, 52; Lk. 18:41). In Acts 9:12, 17, 18 it refers to the restoration of Paul of Tarsus’ vision. The later report of this in Acts 22:13 uses the same word, but its meaning in the following verse seems to be altered from see to look up by the additional words eis auton (“at him”). Ancient copyists sensed the problem and in order to allow retention of the meaning “see again” omitted eis auton. Jn. 9:11, 15, 18 describes the healing of the man born blind by using anablepō, although obviously the prefix ana- cannot mean “again” here, as the man had never seen. John also describes the miracle as the “opening” of his eyes (vv. 10, 14, 17, 21, 26, 30, 32).

W. L. Liefeld

ἐμβλέπω

ἐμβλέπω (emblepō), look, look at, look in the face, consider.

The NT occurrences of emblepō are generally straightforward. The word usually signifies a look of interest, love or concern. Jesus “looked” at the rich young man and loved him (Mk. 10:21). He later “looked” at the disciples, as he discussed the issues involved (Mk. 10:27; Matt. 19:26). A servant girl who thought Peter might have been associated with Jesus, who has just been arrested, “looked closely” at him. The Lukan parallel has → atenizō, a word indicating an intense look (Lk. 22:56). When Jesus applied the parable of the vineyard he “looked directly” at his audience (Lk. 20:17). In the poignant passage about Peter’s meeting with Jesus after the denial, Jesus “looked straight at” him (Lk. 22:61 NIV, as also in the other examples).

Once emblepō describes the perception of the formerly → blind man after a second healing touch by Jesus (Mk. 8:25). Conversely, Saul of Tarsus was not able to see

SEE

(emblepō) after his exposure to the light on the road to Damascus (Acts 22:11).⁷ account in 9:8 and a minor variant of Acts 22:11 use the simple blepō. Also blepontes of Acts 1:11 became emblepontes in some MSS, the apparent interchangeability showing that the prefix should probably not be given much stress. It is uncertain whether the usage in either Jn. 1:36 or 42 implies some sort of special sight or perception. Since John sometimes varies his vocabulary without special meaning (and conversely may employ one word with two levels of meaning), it is necessary to use care when attributing a deep or “spiritual” meaning to a word in this case (and R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John, Anchor Bible, 1966, pp. 74, 76, thinks especially so in v. 42) the significance of the recognition may justify understanding a similar significance in emblepō. Finally, the use in Matt. 6:26 may be figurative in the sense of Isa. 51:1, 2, 6 (LXX), “consider” or “look to.”

W. L. Liefeld

ἀτενίζω

ἀτενίζω (atenizō), look at a person or thing intently, gaze on, observe.

CL There is little in the cl. use of the word which goes beyond the normal use in the senses listed above. In the later Hellenistic period it came to be used in connection with magical activity (→ Magic; and see further below).

NT In each NT use (all but two of which occur in the Lucan writings) atenizō serves to emphasize the intensity of the look. When Jesus read from Isa. 61 in his hometown synagogue, all eyes were “fastened on him” (Lk. 4:20 NIV). Peter was trying to avoid identification with Jesus after his arrest, but found himself scrutinized by a young girl (Lk. 22:56; Mk. 14:67 has emblepō). In Acts 1:10 the disciples gaze at the ascending Lord. Similar uses are found in Acts 3:12; 6:15; 7:55; 10:4; 11:6; 23:12. 2 Cor. 3:7, 13 atenizō describes the way the Israelites would have stared at Moses’ radiant face, had it not been hidden by the veil.

Three times atenizō is used in connexion with a → miracle (Acts 3:4; 13:9; 14:9). Although eye contact came to be a feature in some secular and rabbinic stories, both healing and cursing (SB II 713 ff.), that may not be of significance here. Peter looked “straight at” (Acts 3:4 NIV) the crippled man and called for his attention (There is a Western MS reading, in D, which reverses the verbs, ascribing the more intensive atenizō to the man instead of to Peter.) The actual healing in the succeeding vv. 6–8 does not include any reference to eye contact. In Acts 14:9 Paul looks at the crippled man intently, but apparently only to determine if he has faith (Acts 14:9). Only in Acts 13:9 is the look directly incorporated in a context of cursing. It is stated or implied, however, that anything like an evil eye is employed in the curse.

W. L. Liefeld

θέατρον

θέατρον (theatron), theatre, place of assembly, a spectacle

CL Theatres are known to have existed in the ancient world from the sixth century B.C. on. That at Epidaurus, built in the fourth cent. B.C. is still in use. There iterary and archaeological evidence of theatres in a number of other cities, used for religious, dramatic and civic events.

† The theatre was a natural place for the citizens of Ephesus to take Paul's companions, Gaius and Aristarchus, during the riot over Paul's preaching (Acts 19:29). Its capacity was around 24,000–25,000. The use of such a place for public assemblies is documented in Moulton-Milligan, 285. While the gathering is properly called an "assembly" (ekklēsia) in Acts 19:32, 41, it was an impromptu assembly, and any judicial action would need to be taken en tē ennomō ekklēsia ("in a legal assembly," 19:39).

The word for "theatre" also served to designate the play or spectacle itself. Thus Paul employs theatron in 1 Cor. 4:9 to describe the apostles as those who are "on stage", as in a theatre. In this imagery the theatre is the whole universe. Similarly the metaphor of the arena is employed in the first part of the verse. Heb. 10:33 uses the verb theatrizomai to convey a similar idea. Believers are exposed to public ridicule and shame.

W. L. Liefeld

→ Blind, → Dream, → Face, → Knowledge, → Revelation

(a). K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God: The Christian Doctrine of the Summum Bonum, Bampton Lectures for 1928, 1932²; W. Michaelis, horaō etc., TDNT V 315–82; W. E. Moore, "Sir, we would see Jesus" – Was this an Occasion of Temptation?", SJT 20, 1967, 75–93; E. J. Pryke, "IDE and IDOU", NTS 14, 1967–68, 418–24; V. K. Robbins, "The Healing of Blind Bartimaeus (10:46–52) in the Marcan Theology", JBL 92, 1973, 224–43; R. Schnackenburg, "Vision of God", EBT III 947–52.

(b). F. Amiot, "Deum nemo vidit unquam (Jn. 1:18)", Mélanges A. Robert, 1957, 470–77; M. Barth, Der Augenzeuge, 1946; W. W. Graf Baudissin, "Gott schauen' in der alttestamentlichen Religion", ARW 18, 1915, 173–239; O. Becker, Plotin und das Problem der geistigen Aneignung, 1940; A. Brunner, "Gott schauen", ZKT 73, 1951, 214–222; J. Botterweck, "Gott erkennen" im Sprachgebrauch des Alten Testaments, 1951; R. Bultmann, "Untersuchungen zum Johannes-Evangelium B. theon oudeis heōraken pōpote", ZNW 29, 1930, 169–92; E. von Dobschütz, "Die fünf Sinne im Neuen Testament", JBL 48, 1929, 1930; E. Fascher, "Deus invisibilis", Marburger Theologische Studien 1, 1931, 41–77; J. Hänel, Das Erkennen Gottes bei den Schriftpropheten, BWANT 2. Folge 4, 1933; N. Hugedé, La Métaphore du Miroir dans les Épîtres de S. Paul aux Corinthiens, 1937; G. Kittel, Die Religionsgeschichte und das Urchristentum, 1932, 95–106; W. Michaelis, Die Erscheinungen der Auferstandenen, 1944; F. Nötscher, Das Angesicht Gottes schauen nach biblischer und babylonischer Auffassung, 1924; G. Rudberg, "Hellenisches Schauen", Classica et Mediaevalia 5, 1942, 159–86; R. Schnackenburg, Die Johannesbriefe, 1963³.

Seed, Plant, Grass, Flower, Harvest

σπέρμα

σπέρμα (sperma), seed; σπείρω (speirō), sow; σπόρος (sporos), seed.

CL In secular Gk. the sperma group is commonly used in the literal sense of sowing plant seeds (Homer, Xenophon) and figuratively of begetting offspring (Euripides, Sophocles, Plato). Reference is also made to the pure (because divine) seed of the god (Pindar). speirō had wide currency in ethical "sowing-reaping" maxims highlighting the inevitable consequences of wilful deeds (Gorgias, Plato).

OT sperma and speirō occur 217 and 52 times in the LXX, chiefly for zera' and zāra', respectively, which literally refer to agronomic seed-sowing (Gen. 47:23; Isa. 55:10; Amos 9:13) and to the flow of male semen (Lev. 15:16; 22:4; Jer. 31:21:13) or collectively (e.g. seed of → Noah, Gen. 9:9; seed of → David, Ps. 89:3; seed of the patriarchs, Deut. 1:8), thereby highlighting the cohesion of the elect community. zera' in Gen. 3:15 includes the two preceding ideas: collectively the seed foreshadows the spiritually renewed posterity of → Adam who strive with → Satan; ultimately it refers to Christ the paramount seed who seals Satan's doom. In Genesis promise texts zera' denotes Abraham's spiritual offspring (Gen. 15:5; 17:8; 22:18) who adhere to the → covenant of Yahweh. Ps. 22:30 refers to the seed (spiritual progeny) of the messiah.

zāra' is used figuratively of Yahweh sowing Israel in the land (Hos. 2:23) or dispersion (Zech. 10:9) and of fructifying the chosen nation (Jer. 31:27; Ezek. 36:30). The imagery of sowing seed is employed in injunctions to ethical action (Hos. 10:1; Jer. 4:3) and in warnings against evil practices (Job 4:8; Prov. 22:8).

Late Judaism employed the ethical idea of seed-sowing and harvest (→ therismos) in an apocalyptic context. The present evil world is likened to a field sown with corrupt seed which can only bear → fruit (karpos) after its kind (2 Esd. 9:17). Until the produce of the corrupt seed is gathered in, the beneficent age-to-come cannot be inaugurated (2 Esd. 4:28 ff.). The seed-sowing imagery was also used of the implantation of the law in the children of Israel (2 Esd. 9:31).

In Philo sperma is interpreted as the starting point of the universe (Plant. 48); of all that exists (Leg. All. 3, 185). Man's body originates from human seed, but soul from divine seed (Vit. Mos. 1, 279). God sows every chaste virtue in the soul (Cherubin 52) and wisdom, the daughter of God, sows knowledge and discernment. But man possesses the capacity of sowing both good (Leg. All. 1, 80) and evil (Coloq. Ling. 152) seed.

Rabbinic tradition interpreted certain OT seed texts (e.g. Gen. 4:25; Isa. 53:10) in terms of the messiah. Thus Gen. R. 23:5 (on 4:25): "Eve saw the offspring whom her origin is elsewhere. Who was this? The King Messiah."

NT 1. Primary Meaning. sperma occurs 44 times and speirō 53 times in the NT, frequently in the → parables of Jesus, where the familiar imagery of seed sown in a field conveys profound teaching about the kingdom of God. In the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:1–9, par. Mk. 4:1–9; Lk. 8:4–8) emphasis rests upon the act of seed sowing which, on the basis of Jesus' identification of the sperma with the "Word of God", is symbolic of the proclamation of the arrival of the kingdom. Jesus' interpretation of the parable (Matt. 13:8–23, par. Mk. 4:13–20; Lk. 8:11–15) emphasizes the four kinds of soils upon which the word was sown, thus illustrating the diverse responses to the message. The seed sown "along the path" symbolizes the stubborn, secular man who is incapable of comprehending the message. That sown on "rocky ground" characterizes the shallow hearer who for want of spiritual earnestness falls away at the first occasion of opposition. The seed sown "among thorns" depicts the selfish recipient in whom the implanted word is choked by carnal concerns. Lastly the seed cast upon "good soil" represents the saved man who embracing the proclaimed word participates in the eternal increase of the kingdom. Although much of the soil is unresponsive to the seed, the parable nevertheless extends the promise of a great overflow of a spiritual harvest (→ therismos), thus e uraging persistence in preaching. The parable's teaching on the side of human possibility should be held in tension with that teaching of Jesus which stresses vine sovereignty. Thus, "Every plant [phyteia] which my heavenly Father has not anted will be rooted up" (Matt. 15:13).

522

In the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:26–29), the seed (sporos) deposited in the earth develops successively into the blade (chortos), the ear (stachys) and finally the full head of grain (sitos), symbolizing the growth of the life of the → spirit in the believer promoted by the secret power of God. Lacking the life of the ngdom, man is like the flower (anthos) of the grass (chortos) which fades and mes to naught (Jas. 1:10, 11). The parable of the wheat and tares (Matt. 13:24–30), in which the Son of man sows the seed of wheat (sitos) and the devil the ed of darnel (zizanon), affirms the simultaneous growth of good and evil during e present age. In the parable of the mustard seed (Matt. 13:31 f., par. Mk. 4:30 ff.; k. 13:18 f.) the growth of the minuscule mustard seed (sinapi) into a magnificent rub highlights the contrast between the insignificant beginnings of the kingdom and s final manifestation in majesty and power.

2. Extended Meaning. (a) The NT frequently employs sperma in the sense of "offspring" or "posterity". The word often occurs in citations of OT promise texts hich foretell the future blessing of the descendants of → Abraham (Lk. 1:55; cf. en. 17:7; 18:18; 22:17; Mic. 7:20; Acts 7:5 f.; cf. Gen. 12:7; 17:8; Deut. 2:5), saac (Rom. 9:7; cf. Gen. 21:12; Heb. 11:18; cf. Gen. 21:12) and → David (Acts 3:23).

(b) In Paul sperma occasionally transcends the basic physical relation to include e spiritual descendants of OT believers. The common NT expression "seed of braham" thus is not restricted to the generic house of Israel, but includes all who ossess the same kind of faith as the patriarch. NT believers are represented as the ue seed of Abraham (Gal. 3:29). The OT promise to the patriarchs therefore ranscended the material prosperity of the nation to include the ultimate spiritual lessing of all who believe, whether Jew or Gentile (Rom. 4:16 ff.). The seed of the oman in Rev. 12:17 represents the NT community which towards the end of the ge becomes the focus of Satan's attack.

(c) Paul ultimately interprets the OT promise of a seed in terms of Christ, the aramount offspring of Abraham (Gal. 3:16–19; cf. Gen. 12:7): "Now the promises vere made to Abraham and to his offspring. It does not say, 'And to offsprings,' effering to many; but, referring to one, 'And to your offspring,' which is Christ. This s what I mean: the law, which came four hundred and thirty years afterward, does ot annul a covenant previously ratified by God, so as to make the promise void. For f the inheritance is by the law, it is no longer by promise; but God gave it to Abraham by a promise. Why then the law? It was added because of transgressions, ill the offspring should come to whom the promise had been made; and it was or-ained by angels through an intermediary." As head of the corporate community (Gal. 3:29), Christ is identified as the ultimate fulfillment of the divine promises to the patriarchs and later to David (Acts 13:23, 33 ff.).

B. A. Demarest

Paul's exegesis here has sometimes been criticized for its artificiality. The plur. of the Heb. zera' is generally used for grain or crops (e.g. 1 Sam. 8:15), and therefore the original Heb. of Gen. 12:7 would have to be sing., even though the promise to Abraham was not confined to a single individual but extended to his posterity general. In reply J. B. Lightfoot points out that the sing. collective implied by Heb. zar'kâ ("your seed") and the Gk. sperma makes Paul's point by involving idea of unity (Saint Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, 1890¹⁰, 142). The arguer not a grammatical one but a theological one. In the first instance, the seed refer the people of Israel, the posterity of → Abraham. Although the children of Ishr were descended from Abraham, there was only one → covenant people descen from him, the line through Isaac. R. N. Longenecker draws attention to the fact t the Targums consistently employ the plur. "and to your sons" here, although t presume a corporate understanding (Biblical Exegesis in the Apostolic Period, 19 123). In drawing attention to the sing. "seed", Paul may be hitting out at targumic plur., especially in view of the fact that for him physical descent was guarantee of spiritual relationship (Rom. 9:6 f.; cf. F. Pereira, "The Galatian C controversy in the Light of the Targums", The Indian Journal of Theology, 20, 19 27). This latter thought is reflected in v. 29: "And if you are Christ's, then you Abraham's offspring, heirs according to promise." Here the sing. is clearly a coll tive. Although he is aware of the strained applications of rabbinic exegesis (cf. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 440–44), Longenecker does not think that Paul is adopting such an exegesis here. "Rather, he is invokin corporate solidarity understanding of the promise to Abraham wherein the Messi as the true descendant of Abraham and the true representative of his people, and Messiah's elect ones, as sharers in his experiences and his benefits, are seen as legitimate inheritors of God's promises [cf. C. A. A. Scott, Christianity According St. Paul, 1927, 154 f.]. The Judaizers at Galatia may have been proclaiming that promises were made to Abraham and to his 'seed' the nation (a generic singular), possibly, as Daube suggests, to Abraham and to his 'seed' Isaac (a specific singul [Daube, op. cit., 440]; and some of Paul's converts may have been taken in by th exposition. But whatever the precise form of the heresy afflicting Christians Galatia, Paul 'deliberately furnishes them with a deeper application' of the promi of God made to Abraham and to his 'seed' [Daube, op. cit., 441]" (Longenecker, c cit., 124).

C. Brown

(d) The Philonic concept of the "divine seed" is given a Christian interpretation 1 Jn. 3:9, where sperma signifies the divine principle of life (the Spirit?) in t believer, which renders continuance in sin incongruous. As the physical sperma w the generator of life in the physical order (Gen. 1:11 ff.), so the divine sperma becomes the fount and origin of life in the new order of recreated humanity.

(e) The figure of seed sown in the earth (cf. Jn. 12:24) is used by Paul to illustr the interment and → resurrection of the bodies of deceased believers (1 Cor. 15:36 f). As the bare grain of wheat (sitos) sown in the soil unfolds into a full grown ear, the germ of spiritual life deposited in the ground will be raised into a glorious n body animated by the Spirit. "The kernel that is sown is different from the plant th springs up, for all the continuity of life; whatever variety of seed be sown, G provides it with its appropriate body, in which the full-grown plant is 'clothed'. A that is necessary for the analogy is the combination of identity with difference; th the seed does not 'die' as the mortal body does is neither here nor there" (F. F. Bruc 1 and 2 Corinthians, New Century Bible, 1971, 151).

(f) Paul employs speirō (and its correlate phyteuō, to plant) in the context of the material maintenance of the gospel preacher. Like the servant who plants a vineyard (1 Cor. 9:7), he who sows the seed of spiritual fruit is entitled to reap the reward of a living wage (1 Cor. 9:11). Underscoring the church's responsibility for the financial support of the evangel, Paul in 2 Cor. 9:6 (and its near parallel Gal. 6:7) asserts that the equality of sowing and reaping determines the spiritual and material benefits one receives (→ Poor, art. ptōchos NT 4 (a)).

(g) In Gal. 6:7 f. this theme is developed into an ethical sowing-reaping proverb familiar to secular antiquity and the OT: "Do not be deceived: God is not mocked, for whatever a man sows, that he will also reap. For he who sows to his own flesh will from the flesh reap corruption; but he who sows to the Spirit will from the Spirit reap eternal life" (cf. Job 4:8; Cicero, De Or. 2, 65; Aristotle, Rhet. 3, 3; Plato, Phdr. 260 c; and Prov. 11:30; 13:2; Amos 6:12 for the metaphor of the → fruit of righteousness). Here, however, Paul focuses attention upon old and new natures as he notes two spheres in which ethical action is sown: a sowing in the flesh yields a certain harvest (→ therismos) of moral corruption, whereas a sowing to the Spirit brings forth eternal life. James adds that the divine standard of ethical conduct is achieved only by those possessors of heavenly wisdom who sow in gentleness, humility and peace (Jas. 3:18).

(h) The hapax legomenon spermologos means lit. "picking up seeds". It is used in cl. Gk. of the rook, but also non-literally of people in the sense of gossip, chatterer, talker, babbler, one who makes his living by picking up scraps, a rag-picker (cf. Arndt, 769). It is applied to Paul by the Athenians: "Some also of the Epicurean and Stoic philosophers met him. And some said, 'What would this babbler say?' Others said, 'He seems to be a preacher of foreign divinities' – because he preached Jesus and the resurrection." Paul's preaching technique is studied by M. A. Robinson in "SPERMOLOGOS: Did Paul preach from Jesus' Parables?", Biblica 56, 1975, 231–40.

B. A. Demarest

θερισμός

θερισμός (therismos), harvest; θερίζω (therizō), reap, harvest; θεριστής (theristēs), reaper, harvester.

CL The noun therismos is rare in cl. Gk. The word group as a whole (from theros, summer) is commonly used in the literal sense of reaping or gathering food crops (Herodotus, Aristophanes, Xenophon). It is also used metaphorically, frequently in proverbs which highlight the inevitable moral consequences of prior actions (i.e. Aristotle, Rhet. 3, 3, 4: "You have sown shame and reaped misfortune"). therizō also occurs in the extended sense of cutting off or destroying human adversaries (Euripides, Sophocles; Plutarch, Mor. 182A: "Alexander . . . reaped Asia, and I am picking up the straws").

OT In the LXX therismos stands primarily for qāšîr (the vb. therizō for qāšar), which in the OT commonly means either the process of harvesting a crop (Gen. 45:6; Exod. 34:21; Ruth 2:21) or the produce reaped (Isa. 16:9; 17:11; Joel 1:11). qāšar is commonly employed in the extended sense of reaping the → fruit of a prior deed either good (Hos. 10:12) or evil (Job 4:8; Hos. 8:7), or of gaining a certain reward through persistent effort (Ps. 126:5).

qāṣîr is symbolically used in the OT of a time of divine appointment in general (Jer. 8:20) and of temporal → judgments in particular: e.g. upon Ethiopia (Isa. 18:5), Babylon (Jer. 51:33), Judah (Hos. 6:11) and the house of Israel (Isa. 17:5). richly descriptive harvest imagery portrays the judgmental acts of God in justice and vengeance. A people ripened by sin are likened to a harvest prepared for the sick divine retribution. First cut down, then bound in bundles, threshed and winnowed the grain is gathered in the store house, whilst the chaff is consumed by fire.

A few OT prophets looked beyond the temporal horizon of divine judgment to a general harvest which would consummate this present age. Joel (3:13) foresees the ingathering of the end-time harvest of the nations. Isaiah (27:12) expands the imagery with the prophecy that the divine threshing process will effect the separation of Israel (grain) from the nations (chaff).

The figure of the world as a ripened field ready for harvest was taken up in Jewish apocalyptic literature. The end of this present evil age, which is to be consummated in a holocaust of judgment, is likened to a harvest (qāṣîr) in which good and evil fruit is reaped (Syr. Bar. 70:2).

The ethical maxims of Philo make frequent use of the “sowing-reaping” metaphor (Conf. Ling., 152; Mut. Nom. 269; Leg. Gai. 293). The Alexandrian also developed the harvesting process into a moral and psychological allegory in which the man of understanding distinguishes virtue from vice, consumes all that is defiled in his life and enshrines the good (Som. 2, 23).

NT 1. Primary Meaning. therismos, which occurs 13 times in the NT, has as its primary meaning the process or time of gathering ripened crops, particularly grain (Matt. 13:30; Mk. 4:29; Jn. 4:35). therizō is found 21 times in the NT (Matt. 6:26; Jas. 5:4), literally in the sense of reaping a cultivated crop and, in the case of grain, of threshing, winnowing and storing the produce. theristēs, which denotes the agent who harvests a crop, is used by Matthew (13:30, 39) alone.

2. Extended Meaning. The commonplace motif of the ingathering of a ripe crop provided Jesus and the NT writers with a powerful imagery for the explanation of various facets of the divine economy.

(a) The therismos group occurs in the Synoptic Gospels in the sense of the increase of one's labour generally. In the parable of the talents (Matt. 25:24, 26) the parable of the pounds (Lk. 19:21, 22) the master and the nobleman, respectively are slighted with the accusation of unjustly appropriating the → fruit (karpos) of others' work.

(b) Jesus developed the basic harvest imagery into the notion of the potential fruit of the Christian mission. Predisposed by God for reception of the gospel, men are likened to a crop of fully ripened grain ready for harvest (Matt. 9:37, 38; Lk. 10:2). With a note of urgency Jesus, “the Lord of the harvest”, enjoins his followers, the reapers, to gather the ripened harvest before it perishes in the field. The Fourth Gospel acknowledges that in the work of the kingdom the spiritual harvester reaps the labours of faithful sowers who went before (Jn. 4:36–38). Both sower and reaper may anticipate due rewards for faithful performance of their appointed tasks.

(c) The harvest imagery admirably depicts the judgmental aspects of ngdom, i.e. the preservation of the righteous and the punishment of evildoers. Using the figure of winnowing grain the Baptist affirms of Jesus: “His winnowing fork [kyon] is in his hand, and he will clear his threshing floor [halon] and gather his heat [sitos] into the granary, but the chaff he will burn with unquenchable fire” (Matt. 3:12).

(d) Jesus’ parabolic teaching employed the harvest imagery to emphasize the eschatological aspects of the divine judgment. In the parable of the seed growing secretly (Mk. 4:29) the decisive event in the life of the kingdom is the reaping of a spiritual harvest with sharpened sickle (drepanon), therismos as a symbol of the final judgment of separation between righteous and wicked is developed by Jesus in the parable of the tares (Matt. 13:24 ff.) where wheat and tares grow together in the world until the end-time harvest, when angel reapers root out the weeds (the unrighteous) for burning and gather the wheat (the righteous) into the granary (the father’s eternal kingdom). The vision of the Son of man (cf. Rev. 1:13; Mk. 13:26, 7) reaping earth’s ripened harvest in judgment with his angels (Rev. 14:15, 16), recapitulates the teaching of the OT and Jesus on the subject. B. A. Demarest

- 1). R. B. Coote, “Hos. 14:8: They Who are Filled with Grain Shall Live”, JBL 93, 1974, 161–73; J. B. Crossan, “The Seed Parables of Jesus”, JBL 92, 1973, 244–66; N. A. Dahl, “The Parables of Growth”, StudTheol. 5, 1951, 132–66; D. Daube, “The Interpretation of a Generic Singular”, in The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism, 1956, 438–44; C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom, 936³; B. Gerhardsson, “The Seven Parables in Matthew xiii”, NTS 19, 1972–73, 16–37; and “The Parable of the Sower and its Interpretation”, NTS 14, 1967–68, 165–93; F. Hauck, therizō, therismos, TDNT III 132–33; A. M. Hunter, Interpreting the Parables, 1964²; and The Parables Then and Now, 971; J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, 1963²; E. Linnemann, Parables of Jesus (London, 1966); W. Neil, “Expounding the Parables: II The Sower”, ExpT 77, 1965–6, 74–77; W. Pesch, “Harvest” EBTI 49 ff.; G. Quell and Z. Schulz, sperma, speirō, spora, TDNT VII 536–47; H. Ridderbos, The Coming of the Kingdom, 1962; V. K. Robbins, “The Parable of the Sower and its Interpretation”, JBL 92, 1973, 65–93; D. Wenham, “The Interpretation of the Parable of the Sower”, NTS 20, 1973–74, 299–319; L. White, “The Parable of the Sower”, JTS New Series 15, 1964, 300–7.
- 2). J. Jeremias, “Zur Deutung des Gleichnisses vom Unkraut unter dem Weizen (Mt. xiii 36–43)”, in Neotestamentica et Patristica. Eine Freundesgabe Herrn Professor Dr. Oscar Cullmann zu seinem 60. Geburtstag überreicht, Supplements to NovT 6, 1962, 59–63.

seek, Find

seek, zēteō, and find, heuriskō, are two concepts that belong together both logically and in practice. They can also refer both to concrete objects and to spiritual matters and – at least in the case of zēteō – to existential ways of behaviour. In the biblical writings they are particularly used to indicate man’s relationship to God; here zēteō lays its main emphasis on the anthropological side of it and heuriskō on the theological and christological. Also included in this article is eraunaō, to search.

εὐρίσκω

εὐρίσκω (heuriskō), find, discover.

3) heuriskō, which is attested from Homer onwards, means to find, discover. Its origin is obscure. While Lat. distinguishes between reperire, which implies finding that is preceded by seeking, and invenire, a chance discovery, Gk. has only one word for both ideas. It is used both literally and figuratively: (a) find by chance, come up (e.g. Homer, Il. 1 498; Od. 24 462); mid. incur (e.g. misfortune, Homer Od. 21, 30 pass. find oneself, be found (e.g. Soph. Philoctetes 452), show oneself (e.g. to be just, Eur., Hecuba 270); (b) find after seeking, discover (e.g. a way out, Homer, Il. 4, 374; a device for rescue, Aesch., Sept. 209; a law of nature, Vitruvius, Architecture 9, Preface 9–12: the famous heureka [“I have found [it]”] Archimedes); (c) fetch, obtain (a price for goods by a sale or auction, Xen., Hell. 4, 24); (d) acquire, procure for some one (e.g. sōtērian, rescue, Plato, Protago 321C), mostly, however, mid. obtain (e.g. advantage, Thuc. 1, 31, 2).

OT In the LXX and late Judaism heuriskō was also used in a literal and a figurative sense. All the senses except that of CL (c) are found: e.g., come upon (e.g. Gen. 18:26, 28 f.); find oneself (e.g. Deut. 20:11; 2 Ki. 14:14); be found (Dan. 1:19; also Josephus, War 3, 6, 1[114], etc.). The vb. chiefly serves in the LXX to translate the Heb. māṣāʿ. The objects of this finding can be either things (ἵναρᾶπῖμ, Gen. 31:1) or persons (e.g. Saul, 1 Sam. 10:21). In theological contexts its objects are → C (e.g. Isa. 55:6), → grace (Gen. 18:3; Exod. 33:13; Num. 11:11; Heb. hēn) and mercy (Gen. 19:19; Jdg. 6:17, also hēn). Occasionally we find references to finding life (Prov. 21:21) and rest (Sir. 11:19). It is never possible to be so sure what heuriskō corresponds to reperire or invenire, when it appears in conjunction with zēteō, seek. Although it is occasionally said of men that they have looked and have either found or not found (1 Sam. 20:21), most passages in which the combination of seeking and finding occurs make the point that God can or should be sought and found (Isa. 55:6; 65:1; cf. Rom. 10:20; Jer. 29[36]:13; Prov. 8:17, Wis. 13:6).

Wisdom, too, as the knowledge of God, can be found (Prov. 14:6), although this notion was contested by Job, who had become sceptical concerning his old ideas of God because of his inexplicable suffering (Job 28:12 f.; → Doubt).

Seeking and finding God happens in → prayer (Isa. 55:6) and hearing (Jer. 29:1) in calling and answering; prayer leads in its turn to the return of the godless (Isa. 55:7), who alters his way of life (Isa. 55:7), and through God’s → forgiveness (Isa. 55:7) is led to recognize that God’s ideas and ways (Isa. 55:8) are not the same as his. Nevertheless, God’s ideas are ideas of well-being (šālôm, → Peace) and not of evil. As such they open up a whole future and give him grounds for → hope (Jer. 29:11). Much as it is expected that man should speak (pray) and act (return) (zēteō), we must remember that, when God is found, he discloses himself to man and lets himself be found (Isa. 55:6; Jer. 29:14; → Revelation): “Here am I, here am I” (Isa. 65:1). God is only found through God himself.

NT 1. Occurrence and Use in the NT. (a) The range of meaning of heuriskō in the NT writings is the same as in the LXX, i.e. the meaning CL (c) does not occur. One can (as in CL (a)) hit upon things (a treasure, Matt. 13:44; leaves, Matt. 21:1) and meet men (particular ones, Jn. 1:41, 45; or unspecified, Matt. 22:9). The apostles can find “children” who “walk in the truth” (2 Jn. 4). There can be men who will seek → death as an escape in the final affliction, but will not find it (Rev. 9:6). What is decisive is whether a man is found in the “book of life” (Rev. 20:15).

(b) heuriskō has a theological significance in Jn. 1:41: “We have found the messiah!” (cf. Jn. 1:45). This human finding is matched by God’s free giving (Jn. 5:39; 17:12, 22; 18:9).

Logically this is close to the idea of predestination. But significantly heuriskō does not occur in the locus classicus for predestination, Rom. 8:28–30. It would be too weak. The emphasis of heuriskō is not on the logical alternatives (some find their salvation through God’s grace, others do not), but on the element of → joy over those who have been found (Lk. 15:7, 10, 23). Hence, the alternatives implied by the vb. at most are that some have found their salvation through God’s grace and others have not yet done so. Such a distinction is, however, always only provisional, corresponding to the biblical God of the future and of hope (Jer. 29:11).

The God who meets us in Jesus Christ seeks and finds the lost (Lk. 15:6, 8–10). He acts like a conscientious → shepherd (Lk. 15:1–6; Jn. 10:9) and like a forgiving → father (Lk. 15:20, 22–24, 32). Such a being lost and being found can be represented by the ideas of death and coming to life (Lk. 15:24, 32; cf. Paul’s idea of the man who was dead but is now in Jesus Christ as a new creature, 2 Cor. 5:17; → Creation). This divine finding which is a creative act is matched by returning on man’s part (→ Conversion) and by repentance (Lk. 15:7, 10, 21) and by so living out his life to the full. Thus man is shown to be like the Christ who issued an invitation to him (Matt. 11:29) and was obedient (Phil. 2:8; cf. also Phil. 2:5 ff.; 1 Thess. 1:6; Matt. 22:9; and Ignatius, Eph. 10:3).

(c) Hence, it is understandable that the use of the passive construction is particularly frequent, not so much with the meaning of find oneself, be found (Lk. 17:18; Acts 8:40), as with that of being found out (to be), show oneself. The follower of Christ no more wants to be found a sinner (Gal. 2:17) or a false witness (1 Cor. 15:15) than the pious Jew means to show himself to be fighting against God (Acts 5:39). The former is concerned rather to show himself to be a faithful steward (1 Cor. 4:2), to be in Christ (Phil. 3:9), to be worthy (Rev. 5:4), blameless (2 Pet. 3:14) and established in the → faith (1 Pet. 1:7). For what matters is the manner of life that the returning Lord finds in his servants (responsibility for one’s neighbour, Matt. 24:46; faith, Lk. 18:8; watchfulness, Matt. 25:1–13; wise stewardship, Matt. 25:14–30).

In accordance with sense CL (b), it is possible to speak of seeking and finding, or not finding, fault. The latter is the case with the question of Jesus’ guilt during his trial (Lk. 23:4, 14, 22; Jn. 18:38; 19:4, 6; Acts 13:28; cf. also 1 Pet. 2:22, where Isa. 53:9 is quoted with a christological interpretation). But it also applies to the trials in which his disciples, Peter and John (Acts 4:21), and later Paul (Acts 23:9; 24:20), were involved. Paul can “discover” a certain state of affairs in the law (Rom. 7:21), and the church at Ephesus can “discover” liars in their ranks (Rev. 2:2), and so on. The meaning of acquire, procure, is found seldom: What has Abraham gained? (Rom. 4:1); Christ has gained for himself an eternal redemption, so that it might benefit us (Heb. 9:12).

2. The Way to Find. heuriskō frequently appears in the NT with → zēteō (used literally: Matt. 12:43; Jn. 7:34; 2 Tim. 1:17; used metaphorically: Matt. 7:7 f., → Prayer, art. krouō; Acts 17:27; Rev. 9:6; used in a parabolic sense: Matt. 13:45). Even where zēteō does not explicitly occur it mostly implies some sort of preliminary to finding. It shows that the act of finding is in no way purely fortuitous (e.g. Matt. 10:39; 11:29; Lk. 23:4). On the other hand, passages like Matt. 13:44 which clearly refer to an accidental finding are in the minority. The fact that it is possible to use heuriskō in these two ways as invenire and reperire is something that the NT has in common with the rest of Gk. It puts the stress less on the manner and way in which it is possible to find than on its object (e.g. Jn. 1:41: “We have found the messiah!” which is to be found or can be missed and so not found. It is presupposed that man is one who seeks (Matt. 7:7 par.; Lk. 11:9). Man is so care-worn, burdened and longin for rest, that he seeks (Matt. 11:29). If he is not found, he is lost (cf. Lk. 15:4 f.; th opposite here is apollymi). What he strives for and finds is by nature a → gift (Het 4:16); otherwise the word is meaningless. It is also presupposed that by his way c life he will show himself to be a follower of Jesus Christ (cf. Phil. 2:8 with 3:9).

3. The Subject and Object of Finding. The natural man primarily seeks to hold o to his natural → life in the sense of his instinct for self-preservation. Man is able t find his life, but only through death “for my sake”, as in the logion of Matt. 16:25 (cf par. Mk. 8:35; Lk. 9:24; Jn. 12:25 f.). The real thing that is to be found is the - kingdom of God (Matt. 13:44 ff.; cf. also 6:33, where heuriskō is not explicitly men tioned). Other phrases mean basically the same thing: one must find → “the way t life” (Matt. 7:14), → “rest” (Matt. 11:29; cf. Jer. 6:16; Isa. 28:12) which the unclean spirit cannot find (Matt. 12:43 par. Lk. 11:24), and → “grace [or favour] with God” (Lk. 1:30; cf. Acts 7:46; Heb. 4:16). Even where it is not explicitly mentioned as th object, the affairs of the kingdom of God, however they are described, are implied

Jesus is depicted as he who finds faith or does not find it, and that as both the On on earth (Matt. 8:10; used in a parable, Matt. 18:13 par. Lk. 15:5) and also as th coming Son of man (Lk. 18:8; cf. Matt. 24:46; → Son, art. ho hyios tou anthrōpou) Jesus Christ who wants to find faith in himself and his message and the man wh who wants to find the “way to life” are inseparably connected. Where Jesus finds faith th man also finds the “way to life” and thus to a new way of life (Phil. 2:5 ff.). Where man finds the “way to life” Jesus also finds faith.

B. Gärtner

ζητέω

ζητέω (zēteō), seek; ἐκζητέω (ekzēteō), seek, search for ἐπιζητέω (epizēteō), seek after, strive for, search for, want ζήτησις (zētēsis), investigation, argument, discussion, debate.

CL zēteō, attested from Homer onwards (cf. dizēmai, strive after something, also from Homer onwards), has the general meaning of to seek. In cl. Gk. the word became a technical term for striving after knowledge, and especially for philosophical investigation (Xen., Cyr. 8, 5, 13; Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 28, 20; 4, 1, 51). Occasionally zēteō was also used as a legal term for a judicial investigation (Dinarchus 1 8; P. Oxy. 237, 6, 41; 726, 16). The compounds ekzēteō 1st cent. B.C. onwards and epizēteō (Hdt. onwards) emphasize the basic meaning: seek, investigate, strive (e.g. Aristotle, Eth. Nic. 9, 9, 1169b, 13). Apart from that, ekzēteō can refer to scientific investigation (BGU. IV 1141, 41) and epizēteō to legal searching or claims (Josephus, Ant. 17, 10, 10[295]). The noun zētēsis (Soph., Hdt. onwards, not in the LXX) corresponds to the basic meaning of zēteō, and is used as a technical term for philosophical investigation (Plato, Cratylus 406A; Epictetus, Dissertationes 1, 22 17; 2, 11, 13; 3, 14, 10).

OT The LXX uses zēteō some 400 times, principally to translate the piel of bāqaš seek, aspire, demand, ask; the less frequent compounds ek- and epizēteō chiefly represent the qal of dāraš, enquire about, investigate, search for, question.
530

1. First of all, zēteō can in the LXX refer to non-religious processes: Joseph sought his brothers (Gen. 37:16); Saul looked for the runaway she-asses (1 Sam. 10:2, 14); Pharaoh sought to kill → Moses (Exod. 2:15; cf. 4:19). The phrase zētein tēn psychēn, “to seek the life”, is regularly used of the intent to kill (1 Sam. 24:10; 25:29; 26:20; 2 Sam. 4:8; 1 Ki. 19:10, 14; Jer. 11:21; Ps. 35:4, etc.). It is significant that already this secular OT seeking entails no mere intellectual process but an activity which involves the whole person. The men of the ancient East conceived of seeking as having an emotional element. Seeking in the OT included the will and the aspirations of man. It is an existential act and not an intellectual one.

2. (a) When they are applied figuratively to man’s relationship to God, zēteō and its compounds denote the conscious turning of the Israelites to their God with all their being, or that of Yahweh to his people. In the prophets’ message of judgment, the reproach constantly recurs, that Israel has not sought its God (Isa. 9:13; 31:1; Jer. 10:21). At the same time they warn the rebellious people to seek their God, i.e. to be obedient to him (Jer. 29:13 f.; Deut. 4:29; Isa. 55:6). In the Pss. particularly (24:6; 27:8; 83:16; 105:3 f.) and 2 Chr. (7:14; 11:16; 15:12; 18:4, 7) there occurs the formula zētein ton kyrion, theon, to prosōpon kyriou, to seek the Lord, God, the face of the Lord, which has become fixed as a technical term. These expressions are, on the one hand, a summary of what willing obedience to Yahweh means; and, on the other hand, they also contain an allusion to cultic occasions like worship and prayers. To seek God thus acquires the meaning to seek after God, where he is to be found, in the → temple and cult. Seeking finds its fulfilment in oracles, instructions and adoration.

(b) The passages that speak of God’s seeking are essentially fewer but are all the more important. Like a → shepherd, God will seek again his people who have wandered away, and he will gather them (Ezek. 34:12–16). Hence, the theological use of zēteō in the LXX serves to express the reciprocal → covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel.

3. (a) In Philo, philosophical thinking and questions of the intellect are connected with the seeking of the heart to form a unique synthesis (Abr. 87; Spec. Leg. 1, 345).

(b) dāraš also occurs frequently in the Qumran texts. To seek God is a basic claim laid upon the Essenes (1QS 1:1). That means seeking and asking about God’s will. Their zealous study of the Torah served this end. The sect expected the appearance of a figure in the end-time who was called “the Teacher of the Torah” (4Qflor 1:11; CD 7:18).

NT In the NT zēteō is a word primarily used by the evangelists (Matt. 14 times; Mk.

10; Lk. 34; Jn. 10) and in the Pauline writings (20 times). It occurs less often in Acts (10 times) and the Catholic Epistles (1 Pet. 3:11 = Ps. 34:14; 1 Pet. 5:8); it occurs once in Heb. (8:7) and Rev. (9:6). Its range of meaning embraces the Gk. and Heb. elements in the concept. Thus, zēteō in the NT refers, on the one hand, to following and seeking something (Lk. 15:8), and to probing ideas and reflections (Mk. 11:18; 14:1, 11), as well as judicial enquiry (Jn. 8:50b). On the other hand, it means anything from deliberate striving and desiring (Matt. 6:33; 1 Cor. 10:33) to an assertion of one’s claims (Mk. 8:12). ekzēteō occurs only 7 times in the NT with an intensive sense (Lk. 11:50 f., which is based on OT usage, is significant: to demand satisfaction for the blood of the prophets; cf. also Acts 15:17 = Amos 9:1; Rom. 3:11 = Ps. 14:2; Heb. 11:6; 12:17; 1 Pet. 1:10). ekzētēsis, useless speculation occurs only at 1 Tim. 1:4. epizēteō is not much more frequent (12 times) and has similar intensive force (Matt. 6:32; 12:39; 16:4; Lk. 4:32; 12:30; Acts 12:19; 13:19:39; Rom. 11:7; Phil. 4:17; Heb. 11:14; 13:14).

1. The secular use of the word is instructive. When the → parables tell of merchant looking for beautiful pearls (Matt. 13:45), or a housewife hunting through her home to find a drachma (Lk. 15:8), or when the Passion-narratives tell of Judas seeking for an opportunity to betray Jesus (Matt. 26:16 par. Mk. 14:11, Lk. 22:6) the use of zēteō implies an act of the will rather than reflection of the intellect.

2. Like the prophets, Jesus' preaching called upon its hearers to seek God, i.e. to put their whole life at the disposal of God's will and rule: "But seek first [zēteite God's kingdom and his righteousness, and all these things [i.e. about which you worry] shall be yours as well" (Matt. 6:33; cf. 7:7 f.; Lk. 11:9 f., 12:31; → Prayers art. krouō). According to John's Gospel, the Jews opposed this call by seeking Jesus' life (Jn. 5:18; 7:1, 19; 8:37) and by seeking to establish their own glory (Jn. 7:11; 5:44; contrasted with Jesus in 5:30 and 8:50).

3. Paul gives the clearest statement of the contrast between man's self-assertion and his seeking of God when he rebukes Israel for wanting to establish its own righteousness (Rom. 10:3), and sets over against it the way of faith which seeks to attain to righteousness in Christ (Gal. 2:17). Similarly he censures his opponents who "sought their own interests" (Phil. 2:21), while he ventures to assert of himself that he does not seek his own advantage (1 Cor. 10:33; cf. 1 Cor. 13:5: love does not seek its own interests). In both cases zēteō describes, not just one aspect of life, but the decisive direction of the human will.

4. It is in keeping with Gk. ways of thinking and speaking that Acts 17:27 speaks of the nations seeking God, and 1 Cor. 1:22 refers to Gk. questioning and striving after → wisdom. The Gk. concept of zētēsis, which was unknown to the LXX, came in the NT to mean an argument, battle of words, dispute (Jn. 3:25; Acts 15:25:20). It is not an important concept in the NT and, in the view of the author of the Pastoral Epistles, it advances neither faith nor the building up of the community, as is made plain by the association of argument with words like quarrelling, envy, strife, slander (1 Tim. 6:4; cf. 2 Tim. 2:33, Tit. 3:9).

5. Finally God's zēteîn must be mentioned. It includes both God's claim to the fruits of obedience (Lk. 13:6, the fig-tree; → Fruit, art. sykē), to true worship (Jn. 4:23) and to faithful stewardship (1 Cor. 4:2), and also the dedicated pursuit of the Son of man whose mission it is to seek that which is lost and rescue it (Lk. 19:10

H.-G. Link

ἐραυνάω

ἐραυνάω (eraunaō), search; ἐξεραυνάω (exeraunaō) search out; ἀνεξεραυνήτος (anexeraunētos), unsearchable

CL ereunaō (related to ereō, ask, inquire), as well as the almost synonymous exereunaō, signified originally: (a) tracking by animals; sniff out, track down (Homer, Od. 19, 436; Empedocles, Frag. 101); then (b) in the human sphere to track out, examine, search out, search, e.g. in connexion with a house search, a judicial hearing, and especially a scientific, philosophical and religious investigation (this particularly in Plato and Philo). anexereunētos means unsearchable, unfathomable (once in Heraclitus). Hellenistic forms without change of sense include eraunaō, exeraunaō, etc.

OT 1. In the LXX, while rendering other Heb. terms, the word (including the composite form) sometimes translates ḥāpās (mostly piel), meaning seek, search thoroughly, and expresses, for instance, Laban's angry search for his missing household gods (Gen. 31:35), the plundering search of houses (1 Ki. 20:6), but also the quest for wisdom and discernment (Prov. 2:4) and the contrite examination of one's way of life (Lam. 3:40). God and his thoughts cannot be searched out (Jud. 8:14).

2. Philo says that man can penetrate the innermost being of God (Fug. 165; Leg. All. 3, 84). He also uses the word to describe learned investigation of the thought and exegesis of the OT (Det. Pot. Ins. 13:57; Cherubin 14). The Qumran sect regarded searching the Scriptures as its main task in order in this way to fathom the will of God (cf. A. R. C. Leaney, The Rule of Qumran and its Meaning, 1966, 63–77; G. Vermes, Scripture and Tradition in Judaism, 1961).

NT The NT use of eraunaō (6 times) and exeraunaō (once) resembles that of secular Gk.

1. In Jn. 5:39 and 7:52 eraunaō refers to the penetrating examination of Scripture to obtain its meaning, the searching by the Jews – here presumably in the Law (note the accusation of infringing the law, v. 16; cf. also v. 45). eraunate in Jn. 5:39 is to be understood as indicative (“you search”), not imperative (“search!”); the Jews search the Scriptures, but they are preoccupied with words and think that by a mere fulfillment of the letter they can ensure themselves eternal life. This very searching, however, blinds them to the pointers to the true life proclaimed by the OT Scriptures. A preconceived attitude and approach to the study of the law led to the rejection of Jesus (7:52), in whom alone is life.

2. In 1 Pet. 1:10, 11 exeraunaō and eraunaō refer to the prophets' eager searching and reflection over the information revealed to them by the Spirit; it must be sharply distinguished from prophēteuō (prophecy).

3. An OT concept appears in Rom. 8:27 and Rev. 2:23. God searches the hearts of men (cf. 1 Sam. 16:7; 1 Ki. 8:39; Ps. 7:10). While God searches the depths of men's hearts, his judgments on them are unfathomable (Rom. 11:33, anexeraunētos). Only the → Spirit of God working in a man is able to search for knowledge of that which is still hidden in the depths of God (1 Cor. 2:10; cf. Matt. 11:25; 13:11; 16:17; Eph. 3:3, 5). 1 Cor. 2:9 takes up Isa. 64:4; 65:17. Where the Spirit searches, the barrier to all autonomous human search falls. M. Seitz

→ Prayer, → Spirit

G. Delling, anexereunētos, TDNT I 357; and ereunaō, exereunaō, TDNT II 655 ff.; H. Greeven, zēteō etc., TDNT II 892–96; H. Preisker, heuriskō, TDNT II 769 f.

Separate, Divide

χωρίζω

χωρίζω (chōrizō), divide, separate; (pass.) depart, b separated, separate (oneself).

CL Secular Greek authors use chōrizō in a literal sense to denote such separation as the freeing of the soul from the body at death (Plato) or the dividing of opposing military forces. Metaphorically the vb. often indicates a separation in thought, i.e. logical distinctions or observable differences.

OT In LXX Greek the term denotes spatial separation of persons (Lev. 13:46; Jdg 4:11) or things (1 Esd. 4:44, 57), departure (Jdg. 6:18; 2 Macc. 10:19; 12:12) exclusion from office (1 Esd. 5:39), or separation from evil (Ezr. 9:1; Neh. 9:2 1 Esd. 7:13; 9:9). In the passive chōrizō was often used in the papyri as a technical term in connexion with divorce: “to separate the one from the other” (Moulton Milligan, 696; R. H. Charles cites P. Ryl. 2, 154, 24 ff. dated A.D. 66, and BGU IV 7 ff. dated 13 B.C.; diachōrizesthai means to desert in Josephus, Ant. 15, 259, cf. 1 Cor. 7:10; chōrizō means to divorce in Polyb., 32, 12, 6; R. H. Charles, The Teaching of the New Testament on Divorce, 1921, 114 f.).

NT 1. Spatial Separation. The vb. may signify a physical separation of persons (Phlm. 15, “he was parted from you”) or a departure from a city or locality (Acts 1:4; 18:1, 2).

2. Figurative Separation. (a) So convinced was Paul of the constancy of divine love that he could actually list – and then dismiss as impotent – all potential obstacles to the continued flow of God’s love in Christ (Rom. 8:35–39). To his question “Who shall separate [chōrisei] us from the love of Christ?” (v. 35a) comes the answer “Nothing will be able to separate [chōrisai] us” (v. 39). Neither adverse circumstance (vv. 35–36) nor created form or phase of being (vv. 38–39) could sever that love.

(b) If the phrase “separated [kechōrismenos] from sinful men” in Heb. 7:26 is construed with what precedes (“holy, blameless, unstained”), it refers to Christ’s sinlessness. If it is taken with what follows (“exalted above the heavens”), it refers to his withdrawal from the world of evil. Perhaps the author intends us to understand Christ’s separation as both moral and spatial.

3. Divorce. (a) Matt. 19:3–9 (cf. Mk. 10:2–9; Lk. 16:18) records an incident in which the Pharisees were trying to inveigle Jesus into taking sides in the contemporary dispute between the schools of Shammai and Hillel concerning the permissible grounds of → divorce (cf. Deut. 24:1–4). “Is it lawful for a man to divorce [apolysai] his wife on any given ground?” (v. 3). In reply Jesus appealed to the divine ordinance that predated any Mosaic legislation (cf. Deut. 24:1–4 with Gen. 2:24). In the divinely ordained nuptial bond the two partners become “one flesh”. Man must not undo God’s work by trying to separate (mē chōrizeitō) what God has joined together (v. 6).

(b) In 1 Cor. 7 Paul is addressing an aberrant situation at Corinth in which a group of proto-gnostic ascetics seemed to be enjoining on the Corinthians either celibacy (cf. vv. 1–2, 8–9) or celibacy within marriage (cf. vv. 3–7) or even the dissolution of marriages, whether Christian (cf. vv. 10–11) or mixed (cf. vv. 12–16).

Paul appeals in vv. 10–11 to Christ’s prohibition of divorce (Matt. 19:6; cf. 5:32; 19:9); he had no need to express his own opinion (cf. vv. 12, 25). A wife should not separate (mē chōrīsthēnai) from her husband nor should he divorce (mē aphienai) her (vv. 10b, 11b). Parenthetically the apostle adds (v. 11a) – probably in answer to a specific Corinthian question – that “if a separation does take place [ean . . . kai chōrīsthē]” on the wife’s initiative (owing either to her husband’s adultery or to his ascetic tendencies), she should remain unmarried or else seek reconciliation. Her option might possibly imply his guilt.

However, with regard to mixed marriages Paul knows of no relevant verbum Christi (v. 12a). His judgment is that separation is permissible (chōrizesthō) only if the unbelieving partner initiates it (probably on the ground of religious incompatibility) (v. 15a). In such circumstances, where the unbeliever was unwilling for cohabitation, the believing partner did not need to feel bound to persist in seeking reconciliation since God’s calling was to peace, not discord (v. 15b) and there was no assurance that the unbelieving wife or husband would come to faith (v. 16).

M. J. Harris

4. Divorce, Separation and Remarriage. (a) The Teaching of Paul. In principle Paul regards the marriage bond as life-long (1 Cor. 7:10 f., 39; cf. Rom. 7:1–3; → Woman), particularly so far as the wife is concerned. For the law in Deut. 24:1–4 made provision only for the husband to effect a divorce. But in either case the act of sexual intercourse outside marriage is adulterous. Elsewhere Paul pictures the marriage union as an image of Christ and the church (Eph. 5:21–33). It is grounded in the creation ordinance of Gen. 2:24: “For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one” (Eph. 5:31). However, the “one flesh” relationship is not confined to marriage. The act of sexual intercourse with anyone establishes a relationship for good or ill. This question is not dealt with in 1 Cor. 7:1–24, where Paul is addressing himself to the questions raised by the Corinthian church concerning celibacy, celibacy within marriage, mutual obligations within marriage, and whether Christians should continue in existing mixed marriages. There he argues that separation may be the right course for the Christian (see above 3 (b)). It is in the previous two chapters that Paul discusses the breach of marriage through gross sexual offences, and in these cases the issue is much deeper than that of separation. It involves questions of fellowship and discipline which affect the whole church.

In 1 Cor. 5 Paul deals with the case of a man living with his father’s wife; in such a case excommunication is imperative (1 Cor. 5:5, 13; → Destroy, art. olethros NT 5). Paul then turns to the question of adultery, pointing out that the “one flesh” relationship also applies to relations with prostitutes. “Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Shall I therefore take the members of Christ and make them the members of a prostitute? Never! Do you not know that he who joins himself to a prostitute becomes one body with her? For, as it is written, ‘The two shall be one flesh.’ But he who is united with the Lord becomes one spirit with him” (1 Cor. 6:25 ff. RSV mg.). It is because sexual acts establish relationships through the body that Paul distinguishes sexual immorality from all other sins (v. 18).

In the OT the prescription of the law in the case of incest was the execution of the offending parties (Lev. 20:11 f.). The same punishment was laid down for adultery which constituted a breach of the Seventh Commandment (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:2 cf. Exod. 20:14; Lev. 18:20; Deut. 5:18; Jn. 8:1–11, on the latter see J. D. M. Derrett, “The Woman Taken in Adultery”, in Law in the New Testament, 197 156–88). But in the NT excommunication takes the place of execution. Just as certain acts affected the community in the OT and had to be purged, Paul urges that offenders have to be removed from the NT community. The immoral and adulterers have no place in the kingdom of God (1 Cor. 5:9 ff.; 6:9 ff.). However, the addition of 1 Cor. 6:11 shows that such sins were not beyond the grace of Christ and that truly penitent could take their full place in the fellowship of the church: “And such were some of you. But you were washed, you were sanctified, you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God” (cf. also Jn. 8:11).

It is against this background that Paul writes on separation and divorce in 1 Cor. 7. The foundation of his teaching is a frank recognition of human needs and the fact that marriage is God’s appointed way of avoiding those sins which he has just been dealing with. “But because of the temptation to immorality, each man should have his own wife and each woman her own husband” (1 Cor. 7:2). Moreover, they should give each other their conjugal rights, for each rules over the other’s body (vv. 3 f.). They are to refrain from normal married life in which intercourse plays a part only to devote themselves to prayer – and that only temporarily – lest Satan tempt them through the lack of self-control which might issue from disregarding their natural needs and inclinations (v. 5). Some have the gift of celibacy. In such cases the believer may devote him- or herself to the things of the Lord and be spared the troubles that beset the married, especially in view of the times (vv. 1, 7, 26, 29 ff., 32 ff). “But each has his own special gift from God, one of one kind and one of another” (1 Cor. 7b). For those who have not the gift of celibacy it is better to marry than to burn (1 Cor. 7:9). Here burning is generally understood as being “afame with passion” (cf. RSV). But it is also just possible that it may reflect the rabbinic teaching that the lustful will burn in Gehenna (on this see F. F. Bruce, 1 and 2 Corinthians, New Century Bible, 1974, 68, who cites Pirke Aboth 1:5 and Kiddushin 81a). Whichever of these interpretations is adopted, Paul sees normal married life as the divine provision for marriage and natural needs. R. N. Longenecker comments: “1. Continence must be considered a gift, not an obligation, else we enslave men to our ideal and do not allow them to stand in the liberty to which Christ has set them free. 2. Abstinence from sexual expression in marriage can be justified only in light of our Christian purpose, the present circumstances, and/or our expectation of Christ’s imminent return, but never on the ground that sexual relations within marriage are evil per se. 3. The obligation of permanent abstinence, without the gift of continence, can set one ‘afame with passion’ and be a ‘temptation to immorality’, thus causing havoc within the Christian community and displaying, by the ascetics’ insistence upon it as an obligation for a failure on their part to condition their own Christian liberty by love” (Paul, Apostles of Liberty, [1964] 1976, 239).

It is this recognition of basic human needs, gifts and the provision that God himself has made which Paul wants the Corinthians to bear in mind as they consider such questions as mixed marriages (vv. 12–16) and separation (vv. 10 f.). With v. 10 Paul turns to the “unmarried”. In the first instance, these are parthenoi, “virgin” (vv. 25, 28, 34, 36 ff.; → Woman, art. parthenos). But Paul also uses the term agamos (vv. 8, 11, 32) meaning the “unmarried”, as distinct from widows (v. 8). Th ncludes those who have never been married and those who have been married and are now unmarried. This can be seen from Paul's use of agamos in v. 11, where "unmarried" is used of the wife who has separated from her husband. What Paul proceeds to say applies equally to the single, widowers and widows and the divorced. But the particular argument is drawn from the case of the divorced, and applies a fortiori to the others. He begins by saying that his observations are not based upon a specific command of the Lord. He concludes by saying that it is not a sin for anyone in their position to marry. "But concerning the unmarried, I have no command of the Lord, but I give my opinion as one who by the Lord's mercy is trustworthy. I think that in view of the impending distress it is well for a person to remain as he is. Are you bound [dedesai] to a wife? Do not seek to be free [lysin]. Are you free [lelyesai] from a wife? Do not seek marriage. But if you do marry, you do not sin, and if a girl marries she does not sin. Yet those who marry will have worldly troubles, and I would spare you that" (vv. 25–28). Here the key term is not chōrizō (separate) but lyō (loose, set free) which covers all de facto termination of existing marriage relationships (→ Redemption, Loose etc., art. lyō NT 6 (f)). It is the opposite of deō (→ bind) which occurs in the assertion that "A wife is bound to her husband as long as he lives" (v. 39) and in the statement "Thus a married woman is bound by the law to her husband as long as he lives; but if her husband dies she is discharged from the law concerning her husband. Accordingly, she will be called an adulteress if she lives with another man while her husband is alive. But if her husband dies she is free from that law, and if she marries another man she is not an adulteress" (Rom. 7:2 f.).

In the two latter passages Paul is describing the situation laid down by the law. The law lays down the following points: (1) marriage is intended by God to be lifelong; (2) but the relationship is not such that remarriage after the death of a partner is precluded; (3) sexual relations outside the marriage constitute adultery and are thus forbidden; (4) in such cases the law did not prescribe divorce but the execution of the offenders, leaving the innocent party free to remarry; (5) whereas the act of adultery was sinful, the remarriage was not. It is this last point which resolves the apparent contradiction between the divinely intended lifelong purpose for marriage in Rom. 7:2 f. and 1 Cor. 7:39 and the declaration in 1 Cor. 7:27 f. that remarriage is not a sin. On the one hand, any breach of the marriage through adultery is a sin. On the other hand, the early church was not in a position to exact the penalty prescribed by the law in such cases. Nor indeed, did it seek to inflict capital punishment. Expulsion from the fellowship of the church is the maximum penalty that the church can inflict (→ Destroy, art. olethros). In 1 Cor. 7 Paul does not even insist that divorce must follow an act of adultery (v. 27). As we have noted already, grace and reconciliation are available in Christ for those who seek them (1 Cor. 6:9 ff.). But there can be circumstances where divorce is the most humane solution, and such considerations weighed with Paul (cf. v. 15).

For those who find their marriages broken beyond repair and for whom the formal proceedings of the divorce court are merely the legal recognition of an existing state of affairs, remarriage is not a sin (1 Cor. 7:27 f.). The question whether they should actually remarry has, according to Paul, to be decided with two factors in mind. On the one hand, there are the times in which we live, coupled with the fact that marriage necessarily brings with it a division of loyalties (vv. 26–35). But on the other hand, there is the question of the kind of people that we are, with our basic human needs and gifts (vv. 2–9, 36 ff.; on these latter verses → Marriage, art. hyperakmos). In Paul's opinion this second factor is the decisive one, for if we have not the gift of celibacy, the unmarried state can be more of a hindrance than a help (vv. 2 ff., 5, 13, 36 ff.). It can mean less devoted service, and even expose one to great moral danger.

(b) The Teaching of Jesus. Paul's teaching is not in conflict with that of Jesus. The question that the Pharisees raised with him concerned the interpretation of Deut. 24:1–4 in the light of existing marriages (Matt. 19:1–12 par. Mk. 10:1–12; cf. Lev. 16:18; → Divorce). The so-called “exceptive clauses” in Matt. 5:32 and 19:9 permit divorce and remarriage on the grounds of porneia, a term which includes adultery and any kind of illegitimate sexual intercourse (→ Discipline, art. porneuō; → Marriage, art. moicheuō). It is rendered by the RSV as “unchastity”. porneia may well have been used instead of moicheia to cover all the sexual offences listed in Lev. 18 (cf. Acts 15:20, 29). J. A. Fitzmyer thinks that it alludes to Gentile marriages contracted within the forbidden degrees and cites 11QTemple 57:17–19, CD 4:12b–5:14a from Qumran in support (“The Matthaean Divorce Texts and Some New Palestinian Evidence”, Theological Studies 37, 1976 197–226). But it would be arbitrary and hypocritical to allow divorce for this kind of porneia only and not for the forms mentioned in Lev. 18. In each case the guilty party was to be cut off from the people (Lev. 18:29).

The OT law provided for divorce by the husband on the grounds of existing unchastity discovered after the marriage had taken place (Deut. 24:1–4). All he had to do was to give his wife a bill of divorce and send her away. She was then free to marry, but not to return to him as his wife after being married to someone else even if the second husband were to die. The question raised by the Pharisees arose out of the way in which this ground for divorce had been extended and trivialized. The strict school of Shammai prescribed divorce in cases of adultery, whereas the more lenient school of Hillel extended it to incompatibility on various grounds. The OT law permitted divorce in cases of unchastity or indecency discovered in the wife by the husband after he had taken her, but in the case of adultery after marriage the penalty was not divorce but the execution of the offending parties (Lev. 20:10; Deut. 22:22 cf. Gen. 38:24; Ezek. 16:38 ff.) which would thus leave the wronged party free to remarry. The practice of stoning the offenders was still an issue in Jesus' lifetime although it was by no means always carried out and it was stopped under Roman rule shortly afterwards (Jn. 8:1–11; cf. R. H. Charles, The Teaching of the New Testament on Divorce, 1921, 5–10, who draws attention to the Babylonian Talmud Sanhedrin 41a and T. J. Sanhedrin 18a, 24b; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament, 1965², 40 ff.). Under the Romans adultery was a penal and even capital offence prior to Augustus (F. Hauck, TDNT IV 733).

Jesus' teaching went behind the Mosaic permission to the creation ordinance of Gen. 2:24: “Therefore a man leaves his father and mother and cleaves to his wife and they become one flesh.” In so doing, he was basing his reply not on the provision made by the law for what a man might do, if he found “some indecency” (Deut. 24:1) in the wife that he had married. Jesus ascribes such action to “your hardness of heart” (Matt. 19:8; Mk. 10:5). Instead, he bases his answer on the “one flesh” relationship which constitutes the essence of marriage and distinguishes the relationship from all others. “But from the beginning of creation, ‘God made them male and female.’ ‘For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one.' So they are no longer two but one. What therefore God has joined together [synezeuxen], let not man put asunder [anthrōpos mē chōrizetō]" (Mk. 10:6–9 RSV; cf. par. Matt. 19:5 ff.; cf. Gen. 1:27; 5:2; 2:24; for discussion of the variant readings see Metzger, 104 f.).

The culminating pronouncement is double-edged. The Pharisees had tried to manoeuvre Jesus into making a statement on a controversial issue which would force him to take sides and possibly even to contradict the law (Matt. 19:3; Mk. 10:2; see further below; and cf. J. D. M. Derrett, "The Teaching of Jesus on Marriage and Divorce", in Law in the New Testament, 1970, 363–88). In point of fact the law covered only the limited cases described in Deut. 24:1–4. Jesus' reply might be best translated: "What therefore God joined together let man not separate." It is, as Derrett points out, "a veritable judgement of Portia" (op. cit., 383). For the separating or putting asunder applies not only to the husband who sends his wife away with a certificate of divorce in her hand; it touches the action of either partner or third party that causes the break up of the marriage.

It thus includes any action which contributes to the breakdown of the relationship which God had intended, i.e. the mutual help and companionship (Gen. 2:18) and the ongoing physical relationship which constitutes the "one flesh" relationship (Gen. 2:24). Where there is a lack of mutual love, respect and caring, the relationship already falls short of what God intended marriage to be (Eph. 5:21–33; Col. 3:18 f.). Where a partner refuses conjugal rights, as Paul describes them in 1 Cor. 7:2–7, a step has already been taken to putting the marriage asunder. But the adulterous look is also such a step (Matt. 5:27 ff.; cf. Jn. 8:7 ff.), and either partner who actually commits adultery is de facto putting the marriage asunder.

There is a significant juxtaposition of the two vbs. synezeuxen ("joined together") and chōrizetō ("put asunder") in Jesus' pronouncement. What God has joined together is the "one flesh" relationship of man and woman, when the two leave their parents to be united. The sexual relationship between a man and his wife establishes the marriage. It is this relationship which constitutes the essence of marriage in Scripture and distinguishes it from all other relationships. In neither the OT nor the NT is there any form of marriage contract or prescribed vows (→ Marriage, art. gameō OT 6). It is rather the physical union which makes the marriage; and it is the contracting of a physical union outside marriage which breaks the marriage. The physical relationship does not exist merely on the human plane. The physical act of taking a wife establishes a relationship which God himself joins together. But the physical act of one of the marriage partners with someone outside the marriage has the effect of putting asunder the relationship established by God.

However, Jesus does not put the point in the form of a bare, factual statement. As elsewhere in his teaching, instead of giving a factual answer which would resolve an intellectual puzzle, Jesus issued a challenge designed to compel his hearers to examine their own lives. For example, the parable of the Good Samaritan (Lk. 10:25–37) is given in answer to the question, "And who is my neighbour?" Not only does it contain a reply to the question posed; it forces the questioner to come to terms with the question of the kind of neighbour he ought to be, and concludes with the pronouncement, "Go and do likewise." Similarly, the pronouncement, "What therefore God joined together let man not put asunder", puts the onus on the questioners to examine their own attitudes and practice. It recognizes that it is possible for the marriage relationship to be put asunder. But the burden of the pronouncement falls on the responsibility of anyone who brings this about. It is thus not a law or piece of halachah – either for the Pharisees or the church – but a challenge. It is addressed not to those whose marriages are already put asunder, but to those whose marriages are still intact.

In the explanations which follow, all three evangelists record the point that the man who divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery (Matt. 19:9; Mk. 10:11; Lk. 16:18a); cf. also the case of Herod Antipas who divorced his own wife and married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Philip (Matt. 14:3; Mk. 6:18; Lk. 3:19; cf. Lev. 18:16; 20:21). It is not beyond the bounds of possibility that the Pharisees' question was prompted by the case of Herod and Herodias, which had been denounced by John the Baptist, and which ultimately led to the Baptist's death. For if Jesus condoned the liaison, he would have implicitly condemned the Baptist and contradicted the law. But if he had denounced it, he would have exposed himself to the same fate as John. The question would have added point as Jesus had now entered the territory of Antipas "beyond the Jordan" (Matt. 19:1; Mk. 10:1). Mk. 10:12 denounces as adultery the case of the woman who divorces her husband in order to marry another. (This too would fit the case of Herodias, and the fact that Jesus gave this teaching to the disciples in private might be an indication that Jesus was avoiding open conflict on this subject as his hour had not yet come.) Lk. 16:18b applies the teaching to the man who marries a woman so divorced. In each case the crucial act in God's sight is not the formalities of the divorce proceedings, but the action which constitutes the break-up of the marriage relationship. In each case the starting-point is the marriage that already exists intact. What is condemned as adulterous is the action which causes the break-up of a marriage for the sake of contracting a new liaison.

Taken out of context, it might appear that Mk. and Lk. forbid remarriage under any circumstances. This would appear to conflict not only with the teaching of Paul (1 Cor. 7:27 f.; cf. v. 15) but also with the teaching given in Matt. The Sermon on the Mount contains the statement: "But I say to you that every one who divorces his wife, except on the ground of unchastity [parektos logou porneias], makes her an adulteress; and whoever marries a divorced woman commits adultery" (Matt. 5:32). In the discussion with the Pharisees Matt. gives Jesus' reply as: "And I say to you whoever divorces his wife, except for unchastity [mē epi porneia], and marries another, commits adultery" (Matt. 19:9).

Many scholars regard the "exceptive clauses" in Matt. as additions by the evangelist which soften the rigorous teaching of Jesus (cf. D. R. Catchpole, The Synoptic Divorce Material as a Traditio-Historical Problem, 1974, reprinted from BJR 57, 1974, 92–127). Others, like John Murray (Divorce, 1953) and J. R. W. Sto (1972), reprinted from "The Biblical Teaching on Divorce", The Churchman 85, 1971, 165–74) see them as the faithful representation of Jesus' actual words which were abbreviated by Mk. and Lk. Clearly abbreviation has taken place in the case of Lk. who gives only the pronouncement without any background or prior discussion. R. H. Charles, on the other hand, concedes the probability that the "exceptive clauses" represent a Matthaean addition. But he sees them as the editor's clarification by the evangelist expressing the mind of Jesus in the light of the historical situation. "Now, it was impossible to misinterpret the plain words of Christ, as stated in Mark, at the time they were uttered, and so long as the law relating to the infliction of death on the adulteress and her paramour was not abrogated. But, as we know, this law was abrogated a few years later. The natural result was that to our Lord's words, which had one meaning before the abrogation of this law, a different meaning was attached after its abrogation, and they came to be regarded as forbidding divorce under all circumstances, though really and originally they referred only to divorces on inadequate grounds – that is, grounds not involving adultery” (op. cit., 22). “By the insertion of these clauses Matthew preserves the meaning of our Lord's statements on this subject for all subsequent generations that had lost touch with the circumstances and limitations under which they were originally made” (op. cit., 24).

If Charles is right, the “exceptive clauses” are comparable with the kind of insertion which a modern editor would make in a quotation which today would be printed in square brackets within the quotation, thus showing that it was not part of the original words but it nevertheless explains their meaning and intention. If the background is that of Herod Antipas and Herodias, it is understandable why the “exceptive clauses” should be omitted as they would be inapplicable to their case. Indeed, this liaison would be one of porneia, both in the sense of adultery and that of a “marriage” within the forbidden degrees of Lev. 18. On the other hand, the inclusion of the “exceptive clauses” would make divorce on the permitted grounds consonant with the teaching of the OT with regard to porneia. Whether or not this is so, it must again be pointed out that the question that Jesus was discussing concerned marriages which were still intact, but which could be put asunder by a partner contracting a relationship with someone else. Where adultery had already taken place, the OT law did not prescribe divorce but the infliction of capital punishment on both offending parties, and this was the law which still obtained for Jesus (cf. Matt. 5:17 f.). It must therefore be presupposed not only in reading Matt., but also Mk. and Lk. However, the onus of Jesus' teaching falls not on the penalty for breaking the law but on preventing such a break from coming about (cf. Jn. 8:1–11). But where the relationship has already been put asunder, the privileges of the believer are no less under the new covenant than under the old, as the teaching given by Matt. makes explicit.

Finally, in this connexion attention may be drawn to the parallel between the teaching of Matt. 19:10 ff. and Paul's teaching on gifts in relation to marriage and celibacy (1 Cor. 7:1–9, 36 ff.). The response of the disciples is similar to that of the spiritual party at Corinth, implying that the best course for the follower of Jesus is to refrain from sexual relations altogether including marriage: “The disciples said to him, ‘If such is the case of a man with his wife, it is not expedient to marry’ ” (Matt. 19:10). The implication is that the only safe course is to try to live as if one were a → eunuch, i.e. to have no sexual relations. Jesus' reply crystallizes their thought by putting this explicitly, deliberately using the word eunuch. But he distinguishes between those who are such by nature and those who are capable of living as such for the sake of the kingdom (v. 12). Just as Paul said that both marriage and celibacy are gifts, so Jesus declares that “Not all men can receive this precept, but only those to whom it is given” (v. 11). Deliberately to avoid marriage for fear of not being able to keep to marriage is a completely unrealistic solution. It all depends on the gifts that one has been given: “He who is able to receive this, let him receive it” (v. 12).

There is a division of opinion as to what “this precept” (v. 11) is. D. Hill takes it to mean that “Jesus is commending the unmarried state to those whose ‘call’ demand it, and who are fitted for it” (The Gospel of Matthew, New Century Bible, 1972, 281 cf. W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount, 1964, 393 ff.). But the question may be asked whether it is appropriate to call the disciples’ statement of v. 10 a “precept [logon]”. This term might seem more appropriate to Jesus’ “word” of v. 9 which rounds off Jesus’ answer to the Pharisees. In this case Jesus would be giving recognition to the fact that, human nature being what it is, we must expect a wide variety of causes for marital breakdown and remarriage. Jesus would then be taking people as they are, recognizing their failures, and dealing with them, as always, as individuals at their point of need. To keep “this precept” is itself a gift of God. But with the pronouncement in v. 6, Jesus’ last word on the subject is formulated, not as a statement, but as a challenge: “He who is able to receive this, let him receive it” (v. 12).

Remarriage is therefore sanctioned in certain clear-cut cases. But there are many cases in modern society, where marriage has broken down through incompatibility, drink, cruelty and sundry other causes on which there are no explicit pronouncements of Scripture. There are also many cases in society of divorcees marrying and subsequently being converted. Is the church to deny the right of marriage to the former group and to tell the latter to unscramble their marriages? This would be the logical consequence of the rigorist interpretation of Jesus’ teaching. But this would not seem to represent the mind of Jesus. The foundation of his teaching – “What God joined together let man not put asunder” – is a formula for avoiding the breakdown of marriage, and not an iron law putting into equal bondage the callous the innocent and the penitent. In cases where a believing partner desires to remarry, we should follow the example of Jesus and examine the situation in the light of God’s purposes in creation and the two great commandments. In creating man and woman it was God’s intention that man should not dwell alone (Gen. 2:18), and, as we have seen from Paul’s argument in 1 Cor. 7:1–9, the saving knowledge of God was not intended as a substitute for normal human relationships. Just as the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath, so marriage was made for man. We do not cease to have the need of physical and person-affirming relationships, when marriage breaks down. At the same time, the two great commandments also apply: We are to love God with all our heart, mind and soul, and our neighbours as ourselves (Matt 22:37 f. par. Mk. 12:30 f.; cf. Lk. 10:25–28; Deut. 6:5; Lev. 19:18).

As a matter of fact, Paul introduces the second great commandment in his discussion of relationships between husband and wife: “Even so husbands should love their wives as their own bodies. He who loves his wife loves himself” (Eph. 2:28). In context, this applies to the care that the man should have for his wife. It certainly precludes entering a relationship with someone else outside a marriage that is intact. But it also has an application for those who find themselves divorced but desiring to enter into the person-affirming relationship that God intended marriage to be. To those who would preclude the possibility of remarriage on the grounds that marriage is indissoluble the question must be put: By what right do you, who enjoy the security and warmth of a happy marriage, deny the possibility to others who find that their former marriage has broken down irretrievably and that there is nothing that they can now do to restore it? To those who would seek remarriage the question must be put: Do you believe in your hearts that in your new marriage you can love God, each other and those around you more fully than if you were to remain as you are?

C. Brown

σχίζω

σχίζω (schizō), split, tear, divide, separate; σχίσμα (schisma), split, tear, division.

Ⲙ In secular Gk. schizō (cf. Lat. scindo, split) is generally used literally of dividing into parts or breaking into pieces and only rarely in the figurative sense of the division of opinion. The noun schisma, which is rare and generally plural, denotes a lit or cleft or a clique.

ⲎⲐ While schisma is not found in the LXX, in the papyri it is used of “ploughing” (rending the ground) (Moulton-Milligan, 619) although hyposchismos is the more regular word for this. schizō occurs 11 times in the LXX in reference to such “rending” as the cleaving of wood (Gen. 22:3), rock (Isa. 48:21) or mountain (Zech. 4:4), or the dividing of water (Exod. 14:21).

ⲎⲐ (a) Rent heavens (schizomenous tous ouranous) marked the → baptism of Jesus (Mk. 1:10), a sign of divine disclosure at a nodal point of history (cf. Jn. 1:51; Acts 7:56; 10:11; Apoc. Bar. 22:1). To heighten the allusion to Isa. 64:1 (“O that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down”), Mk. renders the Heb. vb. qr’ “rend”) by schizō, departing from the more general LXX rendering (where anoigō, “open” is used) that is reflected in Matt. 3:16 and Lk. 3:21.

(b) In each of the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 9:16; Mk. 2:21; Lk. 5:36) the conflictory about the failure of Jesus’ disciples to → fast is followed by a “parable” (so Lk.) about patching clothing. No one ever sews a piece of newly-woven, unshrunk cloth into an old garment because the added patch would tear away some of the garment and make a rend (schisma) worse than ever. Lk’s. form of the saying (using the verbal forms schisas and schisei, Lk. 3:36) further emphasizes the same point of the incompatibility of Christianity and Judaism. Any attempt to mix the new with the old will spoil both.

(c) Jesus’ death was marked by the rending (eschisthē) “in two, from top to bottom” of the inner curtain of the → temple (Mk. 15:38 par. Matt. 27:51; Lk. 23:45) that separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies (Exod. 26:31–35; 40:21). This symbolized the opening up of direct access into God’s presence that was secured by Christ’s sacrifice (Heb. 6:19–20; 9:8; 10:19–20). In the parallel passage in Matt. (27:51), mention is also made of an earthquake which split open eschisthēsan the rocks (cf. Isa. 48:21).

(d) In the decision of the soldiers not to tear (mē schisōmen) the tunic of Jesus but to cast lots for it, Jn. sees a fulfilment of Scripture (Jn. 19: 24, citing Ps. 22:18). Behind the observation that even the 153 fishes did not cause the tearing (eschisthē) of the net (Jn. 21:11) lies a contrast with Lk. 5:6 where Simon Peter was also directly involved. And on three occasions John observes that there was a division of opinion (schisma) regarding Jesus: the points at issue were his identity (Jn. 7:43), his miraculous cure of the man born blind (Jn. 9:16), and his teaching (Jn. 10:19).

(e) Paul’s preaching is twice said to have prompted a cleavage of opinion

(eschisthē): one case involved the people of Iconium (Acts 14:4); the other, 1 Sanhedrin (Acts 23:7).

(f) About A.D. 55 there was evident in the Corinthian church not only squabbles (erides, 1 Cor. 1:11) but also a tendency to form cliques (schismata, 1 Cor. 1:11:18), probably on the basis of sociological groupings or personal preferences of one church leader over another (see 1 Cor. 1:12; 3:4; 11:17–22, 33–34), not doctrinal differences. Such divisions, Paul insisted, constituted a denial of their allegiance to one Lord (1 Cor. 1:10, 13) and their membership of one body (1 Cor. 12:12–13) where discord (schisma) had no place (1 Cor. 12:25). M. J. Harris

→ Discipline, → Divorce, → Marriage, → Redemption, Loose, art. lyō

(a). R. H. Charles, The Teaching of the New Testament on Divorce, 1921; L. M. Epstein, Marriage Laws in the Bible and Talmud, 1942; J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Matthean Divorce Texts and Some Palestinian Evidence", Theological Studies 37, 1976, 197–226; A. Isaksson, Marriage and Ministry in the New Temple: A Study with Special Reference to Mt. 19:3–12 and 1 Cor. 11:3–16, 1965; H. M. Teffore, "Jesus on Divorce and Remarriage", in Marriage, Divorce and the Church: The Report of a Commission appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury to prepare a statement on the Christian Doctrine of Marriage, (1971) 1975⁵, 79–95, 169 f.; C. Maurer, schizō, TDNT VII 959 ff.; J. Munck, Jesus and the Salvation of Mankind, 1959, 135 ff.; J. Murray, Divorce, 1953; J. R. W. Stott, "The Bible Teaching on Divorce", The Churchman 85, 1971, 165–74 (reprinted separately 1972). For further literature see the bibliographies attached to the articles given in the cross-references.

(b). H. Baltensweiler, Die Ehe im Neuen Testament. Exegetische Untersuchungen Über die Ehelosigkeit und Ehescheidung, 1967; K. Haacker, "Ehescheidung und Wiederverheiratung im Neuen Testament", TQ 151, 1971, 28–38; A. Myre, "Dix ans d'exégèse sur le divorce dans le Nouveau Testament", Le Divorce. L'Église Catholique ne Devrait-elle pas Modifier son Attitude Seculaire à l'Égard de l'Indissolubilité du Mariage?, 1973, 139–63.

Serve, Deacon, Worship

When we speak of serving we imply work done for another either voluntarily or compulsorily (→ Slave), the benefit of which will accrue to the one for whom it has been done. Service does not exclude → reward. The activity of serving stands in contrast to ruling (→ Lord; → Strength). Faithful service presupposes → humility in the one who serves as the inferior, in contrast to → pride. He who serves is in a position of dependence and his → freedom is limited. The Bible, however, makes it clear that a man who has been freed from the dominion of → sin and the → law finds true freedom in the service of God (→ Hear, art. akouō), which implies service for his fellow-men as well. The varieties of such service are expressed by three Gk. word-groups. leitour, originally expressed voluntary service for the political community, and then priestly service in the cultus. latreuō primarily stresses details of the cultus, but is then used for the inner attitude of worship. diakoneō and its derivatives, as their etymology suggests, are used mainly for personal help to others.

διακονέω	διακονέω (diakoneō), serve, support, serve as a deacon; διακονία (diakonia), service, office, aid, support, distribution (of alms etc.), office of a deacon; διάκονος (diakonos), servant, deacon; ὑπηρέτης (hypēretēs), servant, helper, assistant; ὑπηρέτεω (hypēreteō), serve, render service, be helpful.
----------	---

↳ diakoneō, serve, is cognate with Lat. conari, give oneself trouble. It is not linked with konis, dust, and therefore does not mean go through the dust.

Basic in secular Gk. are: (a) to wait at table; this is expanded to (b) care for household needs, and from this to the general meaning (c) to serve generally. The first meaning involves personal subjection which was considered unworthy and dishonouring for a free man. When used in the third sense it can be service for a cause, e.g. for the good of the community (in Plato in connexion with the polis), or for a god. As such it is an honourable task and a fitting occupation for a free man. In general the voluntary giving of oneself in the service of one's fellow man is alien to Gk. thought. The highest goal before a man was the development of his own personality.

The derivative noun diakonia expresses the occupations implied by the vb., and means service, office. The second derived noun diakonos denotes the person carrying out the task. Hence, the primary meaning in secular Gk. was a waiter at table, and it is so used later in reference to cultic meals.

